19. The sense of this verse depends upon the force of κτήσασθε, which many Commentators say is an Imper. for Fut. Indic. This, however, would be contrary to the propriety of the language; and as to the examples adduced in proof of the idiom, they fail of the purpose, being of another nature. And although several ancient Versions express the Future, yet that was because the Translators had κτήσεσθε in their copies, which, indeed, is found in a few MSS., but too few to deserve attention. Nor are we compelled by the context to adopt it; since, although κτήσεσθε makes a good sense, yet it is not so good as κτήσασθε; which, moreover, is required by the words subjoined at Matt. xxiv. 13. The sense in both passages being, 'Do not yield to these evils; but, by your patient endurance under these trials, preserve your lives, procure your safety; for he that endureth unto the uttermost shall be saved.' Of this sense of κτάομαι (which is also adopted by Euthymius) examples are adduced by Markland, on Lysias, p. 87, ex. gr. Lysias, p. 500, τὰς ψυχὰς ἀλλοτρίας διὰ τὸν θάνατον ('by the loss of their own lives') κακτῆσθαι. The common version, 'possess your souls,' is forbidden by the ὑμῶν, which thus makes no tolerable sense. And to take κτάομαι for κατέχω (to denote self-government) is utterly unsupported by example.

— στρατοπεδίων.] Meaning, 'encamped armies,' as in the case of a siege.

21. φανυίμενων εἰς τὰ ὄρη.] Comp. Ps. cxxi. 1. By τὰ ὄρη are meant those mountains described in Ps. cxxv. 2, as 'round about Jerusalem.'

— ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῆς.] Meaning, as appears from what follows, at Jerusalem itself; which was especially ἐν μέσῳ Ἰουδαίας, just as Delphi was said to be ἐν μεσομφάλῳ τῆς γῆς. So the Pesh. Translator renders, 'within the city itself;' doubtless from a very ancient marginal gloss which had crept into the text. At ἐκχωρ. supply ἐκ μέσου, taken from ἐν μέσῳ. So Numb. xvi. 45, ἐκχωρήσατε ἐκ μέσου τῆς συναγωγῆς αὐτῶν. By ταῖς χώραις are meant (as in Acts viii. 1) the country parts of Judaea, whether towns or villages, &c., as distinguished from the metropolis.

 22. ὅτι ἡμέραι ἐκδ., &c.] Render, 'for days of avengement (i. e. penal retribution) are these to be.' Τοῦ is for εἰς τὸ ὅσον, meaning, 'whenever will be fulfilled all that was written [in the prophets] respecting the final destruction of this impudent city.' See Dan. ix. 26, 27.

For πληρωθῆναι very many MSS. have πληρῶναι, which is received by several Editors. [Comp. Dan. ix. 26, 27. Zech. xi. 1.]

23. ἀνάγκη.] For θλίψις, which is found in the parallel passage of Matthew. A sense of the word occurring both in the Sept. and the Classical writers.

— ἐν τῷ λαῷ τ.] The ἐν, not found in most MSS., is cancelled by the recent Editors.

24. στόματι μαχ.] Στόμα μαχ. is said to be a Hebraism for שׁוּט וּפ, as in Deut. xx. 13. Yet examples of the same expression are adduced by Wetstein and Elmsler from the Classical writers. It is said that 1,100,000 Jews perished.

— αἰχμαλωτισθήσονται εἰς πάντα τὰ ἔθνη.] A prediction fully verified by the statements of the Jewish historian, especially Bell. vi. 2, 3, cited by Wetstein, τοῦ δὲ λαοῦ πλεονεξίας ὑπὲρ ἧς ἔτη θύσαν ἐπαμψεν εἰς τὰ κατ' ἐξ ἑκατὶν ἔργα, πλείστον δ' εἰς τὰς ἐπερχομὲν διασπάρσας. Τίτος, φθαρσοποιῶν ἐν τοῖς διατέροις σιδήρῳ καὶ θηρίοις· οἱ δὲ ἱσθὶς ἐν ἑαυτοῖς ἐπαρθεσαν.

— πατουμένη.] Some take this to mean oppressed, and consequently profaned. So Rev. xii. 2. 1 Macc. iii. 52, τὰ ἁγία σου καταπατήσονται καὶ βεβήλωται. Others interpret, 'ignominiously

treated.' So Cic. ad Attic. viii. 11, 'Conculcari miseram Italiam videbis proximaestate, et quati utriusque vi:' and Æschyl. Eum. 110, καὶ πάντα ταῦτα λᾶξ ὁρῶ πατούμενα. The two significations, however, merge into each other, the full meaning being, that 'it shall be in the possession of, and under oppressive and insulting subjection to, the Gentiles, just as captives in war are trodden under the feet of the conqueror.'

— ἄχρι πληρωθῶσι καιροὶ ἐθνῶν.] The sense of these words has been disputed. Some take it to be, 'the times when the Gentiles shall be visited for their sins;' see Jerem. xxvii. 7. Ezek. xxi. 25. xxii. 3, 4. xxx. 3. Yet that would suppose the words to be perfectly enigmatical. Others (as the ancient and earlier modern Commentators) understand 'the time when the number of Gentiles to be called to God shall be complete.' This, however, would seem to be negated by Rom. xi. 12, seqq. Others, again, consisting of the most eminent Commentators, from Lightfoot, Whitby, and Newton downwards, are of opinion that the words refer to a period when the Jews shall be restored; i. e. when the times of the four great kingdoms predicted by Daniel shall have expired, and the fifth, or kingdom of Christ, shall be set up in their place, when the scattered sheep of Israel shall be again collected, and become one fold under one shepherd, as citizens of the new Jerusalem. After all, the simplest and truest representation of the sense may be that offered by Dr. Pearce, 'until those Gentiles have done all which God has decreed that they should do; namely, by utterly destroying the city; in which it may be implied, that the desolation should continue as long as God should see fit,—until the period allotted for the termination of the desolation inflicted by them should be completed. Thus the words will have reference to the primary import of our Lord's prophecy, and probably were meant to be confined to that. See Note on Matt. xxiv. 29.

25. τῇ γῇ.] The recent Commentators in general understand this of Judæa; while the ancient ones take the expression in its usual sense, 'the earth.' Much may be urged in support of either view; nay, both may have place, according as the passage is referred to the destruction of Jerusalem, or that of the world; see Note on Matt. xxiv. 3. [Comp. 2 Pet. iii. 10. 12. Is. xli. 10. Ezek. xxxii. 7. Joel ii. 10. Rev. vi. 12.]

— συνοχῇ.] A term denoting, like the Latin anxietas, such anxiety as holds the mind as it were enchained. So 2 Cor. ii. 4, θλίψις καὶ συνοχὴ καρδίας. Hence it is often associated with nouns denoting distress. So Job xxx. 3, θλίψις καὶ ταραχώδης; and Artemid. cited by Wotstein, τοῖς πίνουσιν, καὶ δοῦλοις, καὶ βαρύνουσιν, καὶ καταχρῶσιν, καὶ τοῖς ἐν συνοχῇ εἰσι. Ἀπορία denotes ignorance, or the not knowing what to do. So Herodot. iv. 14. 1, ἀπορία τοῦ πρακτέου. Render, 'amidst perplexity.'

— ἡχούσης θαλάσσης καὶ σάλου.] These words involve a difficulty which has occasioned both variety of reading and diversity in interpretation. To first advert to the former,—several ancient MSS. and the Syriac, Persic, Arabic, Vulg., Italic, and Slav. Versions have ἡχουσα θαλ., which is approved by Bengel and Kuinoel, and edited by Griesbach, in his third Edition, and Lachman. But without any good reason; for the sense thus arising is harsh and frigid, and ill comports with the other imagery in this sublime description. The reading in question arose, I much suspect, from certain ancient Critics, who stumbled at the intermixture of circumstances denoting, as they thought, physical, with those of moral agitation. Such, however, is frequent in the Old Test., and by no means rare in the New Test., especially in the Apocalypse; nay, is found in the Classical writers, as Æschylus. Yet it is not necessary, nor would it be proper, here to take the words in sensu physico. They must be understood in a metaphorical sense, as belonging to the same sublime description as that of Matt. xxiv. 29. and Mark xiii. 24, 25. And it is well remarked by Grotius, that in the Prophetic books 'Mare significat statum mundi variis casibus turbidum; sonus, excitatio inde tumultus.' In proof of this I would refer to Is. viii. 7, 8, and Jerem. li. 54, 55. At σάλου supply ἡχούσας, taken from ἡχούσας preceding. Or we may suppose a sort of Hendiadys. By ἡχούσας θαλάσσης καὶ σάλου are, as Kypke observes, designated ἀκαταστασίαι 'et turbulentæ harum commotiones et tumultus.' There may, too, be an allusion to Ps. lxxv. 7, where it is given as an attribute of God, that he 'stilleth the raging of the sea, and the noise of its waves, and the tumult of the people; where strepitus maris is explained by the following fremitus nationum. There is in both passages a nautical metaphor. Nor is this without example in the Classical writers. So Soph. Œd. Tyr. 23. πόλις γὰρ ἤδη σαλεύει· κἀνακουφίσαι κἀρα Βυθῶν ἐπ' οὐχ οἷα τε φοινῖον σάλου. See also Plut. Fab. Max. 37. Rom. 24. Theophyl. Sim. p. 72, 749, and comp. Pind. Pyth. iv. 484. Upon the whole, therefore, this may be regarded simply as an image of extreme distress, thrown in parenthetically.

26. ἀποψυχόντων ἀνθρώπων ἀπὸ φόβου καὶ προσδ.] An Hendiadys for 'a fearful expectation.' Or καὶ may be ægetical, and signify even. Ἀποψυχ., is by many explained of death; but it seems only to mean (like ἐκθνήσκειν), as we say to die away with fear. These words are very suitable to the nautical metaphor above noticed; for in such distress at sea men's hearts may be said 'to die in them for fear.'

— ἐπερχ.] This word, like the Latin superuenio, and our befall, is generally used of the occurrence of evil.

Matt. xxiv. 29, and Mark xiii. 24, 25, are all of the same nature, and relate to the very same events; i. e. primarily, to the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish state; but secondarily, to the destruction of the world. The imagery seems formed upon a passage of Is. xiii. 10, 13. (which treats of the destruction of Babylon) where Bp. Lowth remarks (after Sir Is. Newton) that 'when the Hebrews intend to express happiness, prosperity, the instauration and advancement of states, kingdoms, and potentates, they make use of images taken from the most striking parts of nature, from the heavenly bodies, from the sun, moon, and stars; which they describe as shining with increased splendour, and never setting; the moon becomes like the meridian sun, and the sun's light is augmented seven-fold (see Is. xxx. 26.); new heavens and a new earth are created, and a brighter age commences. On the contrary, the overthrow and destruction of kingdoms is represented by opposite images: the stars are obscured, the moon withdraws her light, and the sun shines no more; the earth quakes, and the heavens tremble; and all things seem tending to their original chaos. See Joel ii. 10. iii. 15, 16. Amos viii. 9.'

28. ἀνακύνετε.] I have so pointed, with Markland, in order to indicate that anak. should not be construed with κεφαλὰς. The word, indeed, of itself signifies to raise up the body (as opposed to συγκύνεω), and sometimes the head only. So Philo, p. 988. τὸν αὐχένα συμφοραῖς πιεζόμενος, οὐδ' ὅσον ἀνακύνει σθῆναι, &c. Hence it is figuratively used in the sense animum rockere, as in many passages adduced by Wetstein, Kypke, and Loesner; ex. gr. Joseph. Bell. Jud. vi. 8. δ. ὀλίγον ἐκκύναντες ἐκ τοῦ θύου.

— ἐγγίξει ἡ ἀπολύτρωσις ὑμῶν.] According to the primary application, this will signify, your deliverance from Jewish persecution, and the tribulations and calamities of Judæa; when, as is suggested by ver. 31, the kingdom of God, or the dispensation of the Gospel, shall be fully established. According to the secondary application, it will denote redemption.

30. ὅταν προβάλῃσιν.] Supply καρπὸν or φύλλα. So Dioscorid., cited by Grotius, has προβάλλειν ἄνθος.

31. ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ] i. e. the Christian dispensation firmly established. See Note on Matt. xxiv. 14.

33. [Comp. Ps. cii. 26, 27. Is. li. 6. Heb. i. 11. 2 Pet. iii. 7. 10.]

34—36. Here they are exhorted to be continually expecting these great events, and not to be led to forget them by the security, and self-satisfaction, induced by the use of the good things of this life, so as to forget that 'the Judge is at the door.' In these verses the secondary sense far predominates, as appears from the air of the whole passage, especially the terms παγίς, πύξις τῆς γῆς, and σταθῆναι ἑμπερ. τοῦ Ἰησοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. To the primary, indeed, there is merely an allusion at ἐκφυγεῖν ταῦτα πάντα.

34. βαρυνθῶσιν αἱ καρδίαι.] Very many MSS. and early Editions have βαρυνθῶσιν, which is adopted by Wetstein, Matthæi, and others down to Scholz. But I suspect that the σ arose from a confusion with υ, the abbreviations being very similar. It is a great confirmation of the common reading, that the Sept. Translators very often use βαρύνεσθαι, never βαρύνεσθαι. They have indeed the phrase ἰσβαρύνθη ἡ καρδία at Esai. viii. 15. ix. 7. 31. x. 1. and at Sap. Sol. ix. 14. φθαρτὸν γὰρ σῶμα βαρύνει ψυχὴν. So Bas. Sat. II. ii. 79. 'Quin corpus onustum Hostium vitium animum quoque pregruunt una, Aique effugit humo divine particulam auræ.'

In κραιπλῇ καὶ μέθῃ there is a Hyperproteron; the latter term denoting the drunkenness itself; the former, the effects of it in haste, &c. [Comp. Rom. xiii. 13. 1 Thes. v. 6. 1 Pet. iv. 7.]

35. ὥς παγίς γὰρ ἐπελεύσ.] Παγίς and ἐπελεύσ. are, like the Heb. פָּצוּ, frequent imperatives expressive of calamity, especially such as is sudden and unexpected, (as here and in Rom. x. 15.) by which men are taken (like beasts in a trap) before they are aware. Καθημένοι means existing. There is a reference to Jo. xxv. 29. [Comp. 1 Thes. v. 2. 2 Pet. iii. Rev. iii. 3. xvi. 15.]

οὐν ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ, δεόμενοι ἵνα καταζιωθῇτε ἐκφυγεῖν ταῦτα πάντα τὰ μέλλοντα γίνεσθαι, καὶ σταθῆναι ἔμπροσθεν τοῦ Υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.

88. σταθῆναι.] A forensic term, signifying stand absolved or acquitted. It here implies entrance and salvation; but, in the primary use, deliverance from the perils in question.

89. [Comp. John viii. 1, 2.]

90. ὠρθρίζειν αὐτόν.] Ὁρθρίζειν signifies, 1. to rise early; 2. to go about any business; 3. and when followed by a preposition setting motion towards, to go or resort to any one; or, as here, person.

XXII. 1. ἡ ἑορτὴ τῶν ἀζύμων.] So Joseph. R. 1, 3. τῇ τῶν ἀζύμων ἐνοστάσει ἑορτῇ, καὶ παρὰ τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις καλεῖται.

2. ἐζήτουν—πῶς ἀνέλυσιν αὐτόν.] Here Jesus answers to the calling of the council, the deliberation spoken of at John xi. 47, which, and the consequent determination to bring him to death, the Priests and Scribes unwittingly fulfilled the prophecy at Ps. ii. 2, as added to by Peter and John, Acts iv. 27. At Acts iv. 21. α. there is that idiom, by which the whole is prefixed to a whole clause, then to be taken as independent, and itself forming an act; as Acts iv. 21. μηδὲν εὐρίσκοντες τὸ ἐκώλυσαι αὐτόν, and often elsewhere. Math. Gr. § 280.

3. ἐφοβούντο γὰρ.] The γὰρ has reference to the clause here suppressed, i. e. 'but not on the day;' yet expressed in the passages of Matt. 26 and Mark.

4. εἰσῆλθε δὲ ὁ Σ.] Not implying a physical entry of Satan into Judas; but to be understood of his influence and instigation. As those who obey the divine motions are said to receive him as a divine guest, so Satan is said to enter those who consent unto criminal suggestions. See John xii. 2. Acts v. 3. Ephes. ii.

2. and the Notes on Matth. iii. 16. iv. 1. Luke ii. 27. This view does not at all negative the personality of Satan; that being implied.

The Article before Σατ., not found in many MSS. and early Editions, is cancelled by Griesb., Vater, Tittman, and Scholz; but perhaps without reason: for though the word, as partaking of the nature both of a proper name and an appellative, may either admit, or reject it; yet as here three-fourths of the MSS. have it, and as it is almost always found in the New Test. with Σατανᾶς, except in the Vocative case, it is best to retain it here.

4. στρατηγοῖς] scil. τοῦ ἱεροῦ, expressed infra v. 42. By these I would understand, not, with some, the officers charged with the superintendence of the buildings of the Temple; but, with Lightfoot and Bp. Middleton, the commanders over those bodies of Levites who kept guard in the Temple, mentioned in Acts v. 26. and Joseph. Bell. vi. 5. 3, of whom one, the chief, is mentioned at Acts iv. 1, and sometimes in Josephus, as ὁ στρατηγὸς τοῦ ἱεροῦ. These στρατηγοί, however, were, properly speaking, not military, but civil officers, and, besides the duty above mentioned, acted as præfecti and curatores Templi generally.

6. ἐξωμολόγησε.] The word signifies, 1. to say the same thing with any one; and 2, as here, to agree with, assent to, what he proposes.

7. θύεσθαι.] The term θύω is used, because the slaying of the paschal lamb was a kind of sacrifice. Hence the phrase πρὸς τὴν θύαν to slay the paschal lamb, occurs in the Old Test. On this verse to v. 13, see the Notes on Matt. xxvi. 17—19. and Mark xiv. 12—16.

11. οἰκοδεσπότη τῆς οἰκίας.] A pleonasm, with which Bornemann compares οἰκοφύλαξ δόμων, αἰκόλια αἰγῶν, συμβόσια σὺν, τὰ βοσκόλια τῶν βοῶν, and others.

14. ἡ ὥρα] 'the time'; namely, of the evening appointed for eating the paschal lamb.

15. ἐπιθυμία ἐπιθύμησα.] A Hebrew idiom, as in Gen. xxxi. 30. ἐπιθυμία γὰρ ἐπιθύμησας ἐπελθεῖν εἰς τὸν οἶκον τοῦ πατρὸς. Here Blackwall, Winer, and Bornemann produce what they call similar phrases from the Greek writers; but, in truth, they are not quite similar. In Hebrew the idiom has a strongly intensive force; in the Greek Classical writers scarcely ever so.

The reason why our Lord thus ardently longed for the arrival of the passover, was, 1. because he knew he should then enter on that conflict, which should terminate in a glorious victory over sin and Satan, and produce the most blessed results to his faithful people of every age. And as he was so soon to leave them, he wished to open his mind freely, and prepare them for the loss they were so soon to suffer, and the trials which ere long awaited them; that they might bear the one and sustain the other. Doubtless, too, he then anticipated the period so shortly to arrive, when he should institute for their use, and that of his followers of all ages, the sacred feast appointed as a sacramental memorial of his death and passion.

16. οὐκέτι οὐ μὴ.] A negative of the strongest kind, and somewhat unusual; though examples are adduced by Bornemann from the Classical writers. Ἐξ αὐτοῦ, 'henceforth' is also an expression extremely rare without parallel in the Classical next words, οὐ μὴ φάγω ἐξ αὐτοῦ πληρωθῇ ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ. To be explained in the same manner that 'he should hold no more social them on earth, up to the period of redemption by his blood (in which the Passover was the type accomplished, and the kingdom blished.'

19. τοῦτο ποιεῖτε, &c.] 'Do that which I have just done,—but See Bornemann, who here adduces as in the present, the pronoun denoted ad remotiora, and where for ἐμοῦ. He also brings forward Schäfer, that the Greek writers oft to save the repetition of a verb present.

Various passages are here cited from the Rabbinical writers, from ancient Jewish Church, in ceremonial feast, always had in view the the Messiah. [Comp. 1 Cor. xi. 28

20. τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον, &c.] 'the administration of this cup I in religion, to be ratified by my blood.'

21. ἡ χεὶρ—τραπέζην.] An old saying, 'the person is at table with John xiii. 18. Ps. xli. 9. Acts i. 16

24. ἰγίνετο δὲ καὶ φιλονεικία, &c.] From the difference of circumstances, notwithstanding the identity of the thing itself, some have maintained that this represents an occurrence distinct from that recorded at Matt. xx. 20. and Mark x. 28. But, as Doddridge remarks, 'we cannot suppose such a contention for superiority should have occurred immediately after so affecting a lesson of humility.' Accordingly he and some other eminent Commentators are of opinion that this is the same circumstance with that mentioned by Matthew and Mark, but here brought in out of the regular order, of which St. Luke is less observant than the other Evangelists. However, as Matthew and Mark inform us that the contention took place in the way, before they came to Jerusalem, or even Jericho, ἰγίνετο must be taken in a pluperfect sense, 'there had been,' viz. on the road to Jericho.

25. ὑπεργίται καλοῦνται.] Εὐεργέται was among the Greeks a title of honour, assigned to one who had in any way deserved well of the monarch or state, and was the title arrogated by, and through flattery bestowed on, the princes or emperors of antiquity. See Herodot. iii. 140. See my Note on Thucyd. i. 129. καὶ ταῖς σοὶ ὑπερ-

26. Our Lord now takes occasion to explain the nature of his kingdom; intimating that it was established on different principles from those of this world, so that he who would be most advanced in his kingdom must be the most humble.

— οὐκ οὕτως.] Supply, with Schoettg., ἵστασθε, with Bornemann, ἵστέτε.

— ὁ μείζων.] From the antithetical word οὐκ οὕτως, this has been by some supposed to denote one who is elder, like the Latin major. But, as the parallel passage of Matthew, it is plain οὐκ οὕτως is rather to be accommodated to μεινέτω ὡς νεώτερος; and Kypke has adduced several Classical authorities for νεώτερος in the sense of an inferior. He shows that the expressions employed throughout have reference to our station in the kingdom of Christ. [Comp. ix. 48. 1 Pet. v. 3.]

VOL. I.

27. τίς γὰρ, &c.] [Comp. John xiii. 14. Phil. ii. 7.]

28. πειρασμοῖς] 'trials, afflictions.'

29. διατίθεται ὑμῖν.] The best Interpreters, ancient and modern, are of opinion that διατ. has here the sense engage for, or promise; but that, just after, it must have the further removed sense of grant or bestow. The former is found in the Sept.; the latter sprang from the usual import of corenanting, which implies something granted. [Comp. supra xii. 32. Matt. xxiv. 4.]

30. καθίσεσθε.] This, instead of καθίσασθε, found in many of the best MSS. and some early Editions, has been received by Wetstein, Matthei, Griesbach, and others; and rightly: for, as Bornemann observes, the Future was more likely to be changed into the Subj. than the contrary. And that the Future is meant to be construed with ἵνα, is probable from a similar construction at John xv. 8.

31. Our Lord now directs his discourse to Peter (though intending his admonition for all present), in order to forewarn him, and put him on his guard against the temptation soon coming upon him, and also to supply him with an admonition to be made use of on being brought to repentance.

— ἐξητήσατο ὑμᾶς.] Ἐξαιτῆσθαι signifies to require any one to be delivered up to us, whether for good or for evil; but chiefly the latter. The difference between the active and middle is that ἐξαιτῶ signifies to ask or beg any one for another; ἐξαιτῆσθαι, to ask for one's own use. The sense here is simply, 'Satan desires to get you into his power;' a strongly figurative form of expression, used with allusion to the Scripture narrative of Job's temptation.

— τοῦ σινιάσαι.] Σινιάζειν (from σινίον, a sieve), signifies to sift, or winnow; and as that implies agitation, commotion, and separation, so the expression has been usually supposed to mean disturb, loosen, i. e. undermine, and overthrow your fidelity. But the primary sense is more apt, namely, sift you, scrutinize, or try your fidelity and constancy. [Comp. 1 Pet. v. 8.]

32. ἐπιστρέψας.] Neut. for reciprocal. The full sense is: 'having recovered thyself [from that lapse which will befall thee] by hearty repentance,' &c.

35. The connection here with the preceding context is obscure, and may best be traced by considering the purpose of our Lord in what he was now saying; namely, to warn his disciples of, and prepare them for, future trials. This could not be better done than by contrasting their past state with that so near at hand. They are apprised that a total change will shortly take place in their condition, which consequently will require a corresponding change in their plans and measures. Before he had sent them forth for a brief period only, and in their own country; in which case there was no need of long preparation in provisions for their journeys, or precautions against perils. But now they were to go forth to the world at large (see Matt. xxviii. 19.), and would have to encounter every form of hardship, necessity, and peril. (See 2 Cor. xi. 26, 27.) Hence there would be need to provide for altered circumstances by suitable precautions.

36. πωλησάτω τὸ ἱμάτιον.] A proverbial form of expression, by which a thing is counselled to be done at any rate. I would compare Thucyd. viii. 81. οὐδ' ἦν δὲν, τελευτώντα τὴν ἑαυτοῦ στρωμνὴν ἱεραγυρῶσαι. Xen. Anab. vii. 5, 5. καὶ προσδανεισάμενος, εἰ μὴ· ἄλλως ἰδύνα, καὶ ἀποδόμενος τὰ σκευὴ ἱμάτια.

This direction to buy swords at any rate is not to be considered as a positive command so to do; but rather an allegorical mode of intimating the extreme perils they would have to encounter. So the Prophets of the Old Test. are accustomed to prefigure perilous times, by representing what men then commonly do to guard against danger. See Is. xiv. 21. and Jerem. ix. 17, 18.

37. ἔτι τοῦτο—ἐν ἐμοί.] As much as to say: 'After all that I have suffered, this last now remains,—namely, that I should (as was long ago prophesied of me) be brought unto an ignominious death. And as I have suffered, so must you; for the hatred and reproach encountered by the master shall extend to you his disciples.' (Gen.) Τέλος ἔχει is synonymous with τελεσθῆναι, and is used by the best Classical writers of the completion of predictions. Of the many examples cited by Weststein and Kypke, the most apposite are the following: Æschyl. Prom. 13. ἄνελθ' Διὶς ἔχει τέλος. Dionys. Hal. Ant. ix. 12. τέλος εἶχε τοῖς Τ. τὰ μαρτύματα.

38. ἰδοὺ μάχαιραι ὡς δύο.] 'See here our two swords.' How it happened that they had two swords, and for what purpose, has been variously accounted for; but best by Grotius, who remarks that, as the road from Galilee to Jerusalem was infested with robbers, travellers took swords. See as Schoettgen has shown, at that time in Judea even the Priests carried arms when on a journey. And, as we find from Josephus, even the quiet and pacific Essenes took swords when travelling. So Bell. ii. 8, 4. διὰ καὶ ποιοῦνται τὰς ἀσπίδας οὐδὲν μῖν ὅλων ἐπικριζόμενοι, διὰ δὲ τοῦ ἀποσπάρσας ἑαυτοὺς.

—Ἰκανόν ἐστι.] The best Commentaries, ancient and modern, are agreed that ἰκανόν has here a sense not unfrequent, in this and similar expressions in all languages (see the examples adduced in Rec. Syn.), as employed on occasions when we do not care to rectify a dull misapprehension, but dismiss both the person and the thing with 'It is very well; that will do;' &c. in the words of Bornemann, 'pluribus causis nulli non opus est in periculis instantibus, nullā pugnā removeri poterant.'

41. ἀπεσπάρσθη.] Many Commentaries consider 'proripuit sese.' But the more common, both ancient and modern, are of opinion, that no idea of impetuosity is implied; the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans using words,

— ὡς εἰς θρόμβοι αἵματος.] It has been ge-rally supposed, that our Lord's sweat was actually blood, or at least bloody; and examples of such a phenomenon have been adduced. But the most eminent Expositors, ancient and modern, understand the meaning to be, 'his sweat became like
 drops of blood;' a sense, they think, demanded
 by the words themselves. Compare Acts ix. 19.
 Nay, Theophylact and Photius (Epist. 13.) consider this as merely a proverbial mode of expression, by which it is said of those who labour, that they sweat drops of blood. A view, however,
 quite inadmissible. Surely the very existence of the saying in the Greek, as well as in our own
 and other languages, at least attests the existence
 of bloody sweats, under excessive perturbation of
 mind or distress of body. See Lucan, Phars. ix.
 809—14, where, among other expressions, we have sudor rubet. So that, after all, those who understand it of a sanguineous appearance in the
sweat, probably take the most correct view; especially as such sweats have been, by numerous
 authorities adduced or referred to in Rec. Synop.,
 proved to have sometimes attended extreme mental agony. So Aristot. Hist. Anim. iii. 19. adduces
 an instance of sanguineous sweat from extreme agitation; and Dr. Mead, in his Medica Sacra, gives the same attestation from Galen. This view
 is, I would add, strongly supported by the following citation from an eminent medical writer,
Blainville, for which I am indebted to the British
 Critic for 1831, p. 1. 'On l'a trouvée (la sueur)
colorée en rouge dans une affection qui a reçu le nom de Diapedese, maladie dans laquelle il n'y a
 pas une véritable transpiration, mais qui constitue
 plutôt une hémorragie par exhalation, comme
 celle que l'on observe à la surface de la membrane
 pituitaire. Cette transudation a lieu dans les cas
 où, par suite d'une frayeur subite, ou d'une vive
 émotion, il se fait congestion.'

45. κοιμωμένους ἀπὸ τῆς λύπης.] The force
 of the expression may best be understood by considering, that extreme grief has a stupifying tendency, and tends to induce a sort of heavy, though unrefreshing, sleep; an effect which is alluded to
 in various passages of the Classical writers cited
 by Wetstein; ex. gr. Hom. Od. μ. 310. Quint.

tion are all emphatical, and there is a sort of climax ; q. d. ' Betrayest thou thy master, and him the Son of Man, and that with a kiss ?' Φιλήματι, as denoting that which constituted the greatest aggravation of the guilt, is placed first, in order to be made most prominent. [Comp. John xviii. 3.]

49. εἰ πατάξομεν.] Ei may here be rendered nam, as in Mark viii. 23, where see Note. The full sense is : '[What] if we strike ?' Or πατάξομεν may be taken for πατάσσομεν. 'En is here said to stand for sὺν. But no good writers use sὺν to denote the instrumental cause ; whereas ἐν is sometimes found in that sense, though in the writers of the New Test. it, no doubt, proceeded from Hebraism.

50. [Comp. John xviii. 10.]

51. ἔατε ἕως τούτου.] These words (obscure from brevity) admit of two different interpretations, according as they are supposed to be addressed to the multitude, or to the disciples. Agreeably to the former view, the sense is, 'leave me free till I shall have healed the wounded man.' This, however, besides supposing a very harsh ellipsis, yields a sense not a little objectionable. According to the latter view, the expression will denote (by an ellipsis of αὐτοὺς after ἔατε), 'let them do what they please,—desist.' Yet this ellipsis of αὐτοὺς is not a little harsh. The true ellipsis after ἔατε is τὸ πρᾶγμα ; and ἔατε stands for ἀφίετε, 'let alone.' There is also a sensus praeognans, as in Thucyd. i. 71. μέχρι τοῦδε ὠρίσθω ὑμῖν ἡ βραδύτης. The sense, then, may be explained (as it is done by Wetstein, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, and Schleusner), 'Let the matter rest [after its having proceeded] thus far' ! q. d. 'Enough of this.'

52. ὡς ἐπὶ ληστῆν.] The construction is : ἔξελ. μετὰ μαχαίρων καὶ ξύλων ἐπ' ἐμέ, ὡς ἐπὶ ληστῆν ; The ἐπὶ signifies against, namely, for apprehension ; as in Josephus Antiq. xiv.

11, 6. ἐξελεῖν ἐπὶ Μάλιχον παῖθι μετὰ φιδίων.

53. ἀλλ' αὕτη—σκότους.] There is here again a certain obscurity, occasioned by the semper being, from intensity of feeling, but imperfectly developed. Some take the words to mean, 'This is the time most opportune for your purpose ; this is the hour fitted for deeds of darkness.' An interpretation supported by several passages adduced from the Classical writers. Others explain, 'This is the time destined and permitted by God, and this is the power of iniquity ; i. e. iniquity has obtained this power ; αὕτη ἐστὶν being supplied before ἔξουσία. The latter sense is preferable ; and the interpretation, as far as concerns the first clause, is confirmed and illustrated by Matt. xxv. 45, 56. The sense of the second clause, however, has not been so well discerned. It should mean that ἔξουσία τοῦ σκότους is, as it were, a personification of the Prince of darkness, the Devil, called at Eph. ii. 2 ὁ ἀρχὸν τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ αἵματος, and his subordinate agents ἔξουσία τοῦ σκότους. Of ἔξουσία, as used for agency, examples occur supra xii. 11. Rom. xiii. 1. 1 Cor. xv. 24. Eph. i. 21. iii. 10. Col. i. 16. ii. 10. The complete sense is : 'This is the time when power is given you against me by the determinate counsel of God (Acts iv. 28), and in which the Power, or Prince of darkness is permitted to exercise his rancour against me.' In the last clause there is an ellipsis of αὕτη ἐστὶν, to be supplied from the preceding one.

54. [Comp. John xviii. 12. 24.]

56. ἀτενίσασα αὐτῷ.] Ἀτανύξω σημαίνει 'to fix oneself intently ;' and, with ὁρμῇ αὐτοφθαλμοῖς, to fix one's view intently. These words, however, are almost always left to be understood ; and the object of view is expressed either by an Accus. with αἰς (as in Acts i. 10. iii. 4.), or by a Dative without a preposition, as here and in Luke iv. 20.

[ἢ ἕτερος.] In the passage of Matthew we ἄλλῃ, 'another mañt-geant.' This discrepancy, however, may be removed on the principle noted by Wetstein,—that ἕτερος may be used reference to ἀνθρώπος being understood, it is sometimes used of a woman. Example of this idiom are frequent. Thus Pausanspeaking of two women, τούτους δὲ φασιν; Sophocles Elect. 977. τάδε τὴ κασιγνήτω.
 ἄνθρωπος.] This, like the Latin homo, and man, is a term of expostulation.

[δυσχυρίζετο] 'strongly affirmed,' as
 xii. 15, and in passages of Lysias, Ælian, and Josephus, cited by the Commentators.
 (Comp. John xiii. 38. xviii. 27.)

[ἐκλαυσε πικρῶς.] So the Sept. in Is.
 l. 7. for the Heb. to pita.

[τὸ πρεσβ. τοῦ λαοῦ.] Luke alone, in this passage, and in Acts xxii. 5, gives this name to the Sanhedrim. At Acts v. 21. he calls it ἡ συνέδριον.

[εἰ εἶ—εἰπὲ ἡμῖν.] These words admit of being rendered in three different ways. 1. 'Art thou the Christ? tell us.' 2. 'If thou be the Christ, tell us [so].' 3. 'Tell us whether thou art the Christ [or not].' The 1st mode has far less commendation than the 2d and 3d, of which the latter seems, on account of its greater suitableness to the occasion and the context, (especially the words of the answer) to be entitled to preference.

[ἐὰν δὲ καὶ ἐρωτήσω.] So little satisfaction the ordinary sense of ἐρωτ., that Heinsius here assigns that of supplicare. But that signification is ill founded, and the sense arising would here be very objectionable; being, indeed,

 at variance with the words following, οὐ μὴ ἀπο- κριθῆτέ μοι, by which interrogation of some kind is certainly adverted to;—of what kind is the question. Certainly not what Bp. Pearce understands, concerning the Christ: still less what Doddridge supposes, 'inquiring wherefore they persist in their infidelity.' To ask questions, in order to convince, is incongruous. The true force of the expression was alone, I think, seen by Grotius, who observes, that 'it bears a sense which, united with that of interrogation, yet has another, namely, that of argumentation.' 'The Hebrews (says he),
 as well as the Greeks, used to carry on argument by interrogation.' Of this he adduces an example from Aristotle. He might have added, that this use of the word to signify questionem proponere, is (as H. Steph. Thes. in v. attests) frequent in the Dialecticians, especially Sextus Empiricus; as also interrogare in Latin. The sense, then, may be thus expressed: 'If I simply tell you [that I am the Christ], ye will not believe me; and if I propose questions in argument, [to support my claim,] ye will not answer me, nor, though convinced, will you release me. [However] henceforward shall the Son of Man (meaning himself)
 be [seen] sitting,' &c. On which last words comp.

XXIII. 1. τὸ πλῆθος αὐτῶν.] Πλῆθος. Render, 'cætum;' and by αὐτῶν understand the chief priests, &c. Or πλ. may here have simply the sense number, without reference to great or small. So Thucyd. i. 47. τῶν εἴκοσι νεῶν, ἀπὸ ἐλάσσονος πλῆθους, οὐ παρουσῶν, and elsewhere. Ἠγαγον (instead of the Vulg. ἡγάγεν) is found in almost all the best MSS., and has been adopted by most Editors. [Comp. John xviii. 28.]

2. τούτον εὗρομεν διαστρέφοντα, &c.] Εὗρίσκω is here a forensic term, denoting conviction after legal trial. [See Matt. xxvii. 25. xxii. 21. Mark xii. 17. supra xx. 25. Rom. xiii. 7. Acts xvii. 7.]

— κωλύοντα Καίσαρι φ. δ.] This use of the Infinitive after κωλύω (found elsewhere in the New Test.) is far less usual in Greek than μὴ and the Subjunctive; yet, as Bornemann observes, it is not without example in the best writers.

4. οὐδὲν εὗρίσκω αἴτιον.] Αἴτιος is properly an adjective neuter, from αἴτιος, signifying worthy of, or the cause of; and when used in a forensic sense, means worthy of blame, and consequently of punishment.

5. ἀρξάμενος ἀπὸ τῆς Γ.] On this form see Note at Matt. xx. 8. Here the terminus ad quem is added, ἕως ᾧδε; where ᾧδε is for ταύτης τῆς πόλεως, and there is an ellipsis of καὶ πορευόμενος, or such like.

7. ἐπιγινούσας.] Render, 'having learnt.' Ἐκ

τῆς ἑξουσίας, 'ex ditione,' namely, the power over which he held power. Ἀνέπεμψεν, remitted to use the corresponding term in the Roman law. 'It was (observes Grotius) the regular practice of the Roman law to remove the prisoner to the governor of the province or district to which he belonged, though governors had the right of trying all offences within their own province.'

8. ἐχάρη.] Join this closely with ἰδὼν; as in John xx. 20. ἐχάρησαν ἰδόντες τὸν Κύριον, in which idiom see Matt. Gr. Gr. § 555.

— ἦν γὰρ θέλων, &c.] [Comp. Acts xxi. 26. supra ix. 7. Matt. xiv. 1.]

9. ἐπηρώτα.] Render, 'interrogated him;' the word being used in a judicial sense, as John xvi. 21. Our Lord returned no answer to these interrogatories, as well knowing that they were not put from any desire to know the truth.

10. εὐτόνως] intense, valid. So Herodotus explains ἰσχυρῶς, with a reference, it may be supposed, to this passage, or that of Acts xvi. 21.

11. ἐξουθενήσας] 'having treated him with insult and ignominy.' How, and in what manner see Matt. xxvii. 29. and Mark xv. 18; though what is here said is chiefly meant of Herod's soldiers.

— στρατεύμασιν] soldates, i. e. his bodyguards, as in Acts xxiii. 10. More than that Pilate would not have allowed him to bring.

— περιβαλὼν αὐτὸν ἐσθῆτα, &c.] This construction (Accus. both of person and thing) is not αὐτόν! Ὁ δὲ τρίτον εἶπε πρὸς αὐτούς· Τί γὰρ κακὸν ἐποί- 23

an example of it occurs in Test. xii. Patr. 648.

12. ἐγένοντο φίλοι] 'were made friends,' Acts iv. 27. It is observed by M. Saurin, that the reconciliation of Herod and Pilate is no wonderful than their enmity. The enigma, never, is solved by the profound remark of the spirit, that 'it contributes much to the formation of friendship, or to the recovery of it, to her love or hate the same person; to be enmied, no matter how, as colleagues in the same cause.' That, in the present instance, was the thing down of the Gospel; though, of course, interchange of civilities would tend to promote the reconciliation. Comp. Æschyl. Agam. l.

ἐν ἐχθρᾷ.] Classical usage would require ἐχθρᾷ, as in Thucyd. i. 69. Schleusner and Beel say that προϋπ. has the force of an adverb here and at Acts viii. 9. But, in fact, ὑπάρ. here follows the construction of τυγχάνειν, ὄντες could not be dispensed with. For though we may say εἶναι ἐν ἐχθρᾷ, yet we cannot ἔχειν ἐν ἐχθρᾷ.

The cause of this enmity may have been, as Julius and Whiston suppose, that Pilate had meddled with Herod's jurisdiction; and that, in order to make up the matter, he sent Christ to him at this time.

ἀποστρέφοντα τὸν λαόν] scil. ἀπὸ τοῦ βασιλέως, 'from their allegiance to Cæsar.' So Isa. xli. 11. καὶ ὅσοι οὐκ ἀποστράφησαν ἀπὸ Κυρίου.

ἀνέπεμψα γὰρ ὑμᾶς πρὸς αὐτόν.] Some of the best MSS. have ἀνέπεμψε γὰρ αὐτόν ἐν ὑμᾶς, which is preferred by Grotius and others, but without reason; this being a manifest attempt to remove an obscurity proceeding from a vulgar and too brief mode of expression, but to be filled up.

καὶ ἰδοὺ, οὐδὲν ἄξιον θανάτου.—αὐτῷ.] This is added in the E. V. and most other Versions, 'so, nothing worthy of death is done unto him.' Yet how such a sense can be defended, I see not; nay, it may be said to border on absurdity. It should seem that, according to the opinion of many eminent Commentators, αὐτῷ here is (as often in the Greek writers) to be taken for ὑπ' αὐτοῦ; the πεπραγμένον being understood of Jesus, not of Pilate. And this is quite agreeable to the use of the phrase πράσσειν τι ἄξιον θανάτου elsewhere. So Acts xxv. 25. I have pointed accordingly; considering the words ἀνέπεμψα—αὐτόν as hypo-parenthetical.

16. παιδεύσας] 'having chastized.' Παιδεύειν properly signifies to educate a child; and then, from the adjunct, to correct, either generally, or in some particular manner, expressed or understood. Here punishment by flagellation is meant; which, among the Romans, always preceded capital punishment. The kind of flagellation varied according to the offence, being sometimes simply flogging with rods; in most cases scourging with the flagella. Here, however, the flagellation meant must be that spoken of by St. Paul, 2 Cor. xi. 25. 'thrice was I beaten with rods.' [Comp. John xix. 1.]

17. ἀνάγκην εἶχε.] A phrase very much like the Latin opus habere, yet occasionally found in the later Classical writers. The kind of necessity will depend upon the context. Here that of custom is meant. See Acts iii. 14.

18. παμπληθεῖ] 'the whole multitude together.'

—αἶρε τοῦτον] i. e. 'Away with this man to death!' So John xix. 15. ἄρον, ἄρον· σταύρωσον αὐτόν, and Acts xxi. 36. So also the word is used in Joseph. Ant. xvi. 1, 1. ἀραμίνω τὸν ἀδελφόν. And so sometimes the Latin tollo and the Heb. נשא.

21. ἐπεφώνουν.] Render, acclamabant, voce forebantur.

22. τί γὰρ, &c.] The γὰρ has reference to a negative clause left understood; q. d. Not so! for what, &c.

15. ἣ οὐ δυνήσονται, &c.] Wetstein compares C. Nep. Alcib. 1, 'Tanta erat commendatio oris et orationis, ut nemo ei dicendo posset resistere.' [See Exod. iv. 12. Is. liv. 17. Acts vi. 10.]

18. καὶ θριξέτε ἐκ τῆς κεφαλῆς, &c.] A proverbial and hyperbolic mode of expression to denote that they shall suffer no material injury. [See Matt. x. 30. 1 Sam. xiv. 45. 2 Sam. i. 11. 1 Kings i. 5.]

19. The sense of this verse depends upon the force of κτήσασθε, which many Commentators say is an Imper. for Fut. Indic. This, however, would be contrary to the propriety of the language; and as to the examples adduced in proof of the idiom, they fail of the purpose, being of another nature. And although several ancient Versions express the Future, yet that was because the Translators had κτήσεσθε in their copies, which, indeed, is found in a few MSS., but too few to deserve attention. Nor are we compelled by the context to adopt it; since, although κτήσεσθε makes a good sense, yet it is not so good as κτήσασθε; which, moreover, is required by the words subjoined at Matt. xxiv. 13. The sense in both passages being, 'Do not yield to these evils; but, by your patient endurance under these trials, preserve your lives, procure your safety; for he that endureth unto the uttermost shall be saved.' Of this sense of κτάσθαι (which is also adopted by Euthymius) examples are adduced by Markland, on Lysias, p. 87, ex. gr. Lysias, p. 500, τὰς ψυχὰς ἀλλοτρίας διὰ τὸν θάνατον ('by the loss of their own lives') κακτῆσθαι. The common version, 'possess your souls,' is forbidden by the ὑμῶν, which thus makes no tolerable sense. And to take κτάσθαι for κατέχω (to denote self-government) is utterly unsupported by example.

— στρατοπέδων.] Meaning, 'encamped armies,' as in the case of a siege.

21. φανυίτωσαν αἱ τὰ ὄρη.] Comp. Ps. cxli. 1. By τὰ ὄρη are meant those mountains described in Ps. cxv. 2, as 'round about Jerusalem.'

— ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῆς.] Meaning, as appears from

what follows, at Jerusalem itself; which was especially ἐν μέσῳ Ἱουδαίας, just as Delphi was said to be ἐν μεσοπόλῳ τῆς γῆς. So the Peric Translators renders, 'within the city itself;' doubtless from a very ancient marginal gloss which had crept into the text. At ἐκχωρ. supply ἐκ μέσῳ, taken from ἐν μέσῳ. So Numb. xvi. 45, ἐκχωρεῖτε ἐκ μέσῳ τῆς συναγωγῆς αὐτῆς. By ταῖς χώραις are meant (as in Acts viii. 1) the country parts of Judæa, whether towns or villages, &c., as distinguished from the metropolis.

22. ὅτι ἡμέραι ἐκδ., &c.] Render, 'for days of avengement (i. e. penal retribution) are then to be.' Τοῦ is for αἰς τὸ ὥστε, meaning, 'whereby will be fulfilled all that was written [in the prophets] respecting the final destruction of the impenitent city.' See Dan. ix. 26, 27.

For πληρωθῆναι very many MSS. have πληρῆναι, which is received by several Editions. [Comp. Dan. ix. 26, 27. Zech. xi. 1.]

23. ἀνάγκη.] For θλίψις, which is found in the parallel passage of Matthew. A sense of the word occurring both in the Sept. and the Classical writers.

— ἐν τῷ λαῷ τ.] The ἐν, not found in most MSS., is cancelled by the recent Editors.

24. στόματι μαχ.] Στόμα μαχ. is said to be a Hebraism for שׁוּט וּפָּ, as in Deut. xx. 13. Yet examples of the same expression are adduced by Wetstein and Elsner from the Classical writers. It is said that 1,100,000 Jews perished.

— αἰχμαλωτισθήσονται εἰς πάντα τὰ ἔθνη.] A prediction fully verified by the statements of the Jewish historian, especially Bell. vi. 2, cited by Wetstein, τοῦ δὲ λοιποῦ πλείονος τοῦ ἑκάστου ἐργα, πλείστον δ' εἰς τὰς ἐπαρχίας διεδωρήσατο Τίτος, φθαρσομένους ἐν τοῖς Σιδάτροις σιδήρῳ καὶ θηρίοις· οἱ δὲ ἐντὶ τῇ ἐντὶν ἐπιδόθησαν.

— πατουμένη.] Some take this to mean oppressed, and consequently profaned. So Rev. xii. 1 Macc. iii. 52, τὰ ἁγία σου καταπατήσονται καὶ βεβήλωται. Others interpret, 'ignominiously

treated.' So Cic. ad Attic. viii. 11, 'Conculcari miseram Italiam videbis proximaestate, et quati utriusque vi:' and Æschyl. Eum. 110, καὶ πάντα ταῦτα λᾶξ ὀρύ παρούμενα. The two significations, however, merge into each other, the full meaning being, that 'it shall be in the possession of, and under oppressive and insulting subjection to, the Gentiles, just as captives in war are trodden under the feet of the conqueror.'

— ἄχρι πληρωθῶσι καιροὶ ἐθνῶν.] The sense of these words has been disputed. Some take it to be, 'the times when the Gentiles shall be visited for their sins;' see Jerom. xxvii. 7. Ezek. xxi. 25. xxii. 3, 4. xxx. 3. Yet that would suppose the words to be perfectly enigmatical. Others (as the ancient and earlier modern Commentators) understand 'the time when the number of Gentiles to be called to God shall be complete.' This, however, would seem to be negatived by Rom. xi. 12, seqq. Others, again, consisting of the most eminent Commentators, from Lightfoot, Whitby, and Newton downwards, are of opinion that the words refer to a period when the Jews shall be restored; i. e. when the times of the four great kingdoms predicted by Daniel shall have expired, and the fifth, or kingdom of Christ, shall be set up in their place, when the scattered sheep of Israel shall be again collected, and become one fold under one shepherd, as citizens of the new Jerusalem. After all, the simplest and truest representation of the sense may be that offered by Dr. Pearce, 'until those Gentiles have done all which God has decreed that they should do;' namely, by utterly destroying the city; in which it may be implied, that the desolation should continue as long as God should see fit,—until the period allotted for the termination of the desolation inflicted by them should be completed. Thus the words will have reference to the primary import of our Lord's prophecy, and probably were meant to be confined to that. See Note on Matt. xxiv. 29.

25. τῆς γῆς.] The recent Commentators in general understand this of Judæa; while the ancient ones take the expression in its usual sense, 'the earth.' Much may be urged in support of either view; nay, both may have place, according as the passage is referred to the destruction of Jerusalem, or that of the world; see Note on Matt. xxiv. 3. [Comp. 2 Pet. iii. 10. 12. Is. xli. 10. Ezek. xxxii. 7. Joel ii. 10. Rev. vi. 12.]

— συνοχή.] A term denoting, like the Latin anxietas, such anxiety as holds the mind as it were enchained. So 2 Cor. ii. 4, θλίψιν καὶ συνοχῇ καρδίας. Hence it is often associated with nouns denoting distress. So Job xxx. 3, συνοχὴ καὶ ταραχὴ καρδίας; and Artemid. cited by Wetstein, τοῖς πένθις, καὶ δούλοις, καὶ ἐκείνοις, καὶ καταχρήσις, καὶ τοῖς ἐν συνοχῇ εἶναι. 'Απορία denotes ignorance, or the not knowing what to do. So Herodot. iv. 14. 1, ἀπορία τοῦ πρακτέου. Render, 'amidst perplexity.'

— ἡχοῦσης θαλάσσης καὶ σάλου.] These words involve a difficulty which has occasioned both variety of reading and diversity in interpretation. To first advert to the former, several ancient MSS. and the Syriac, Pœrsic, Arabic, Vulg., Italic, and Slav. Versions have ἡχοῦς θαλάσσης, which is approved by Bengel and Kuinoel, and edited by Griesbach, in his third Edition, and Lachman. But without any good reason; for the sense thus arising is harsh and frigid, and ill comports with the other imagery in this sublime description. The reading in question arose, I much suspect, from certain ancient Critics, who stumbled at the intermixture of circumstances denoting, as they thought, physical, with those of moral agitation. Such, however, is frequent in the Old Test., and by no means rare in the New Test., especially in the Apocalypse; nay, is found in the Classical writers, as Æschylus. Yet it is not necessary, nor would it be proper, here to take the words in sensu physico. They must be understood in a metaphorical sense, as belonging to the same sublime description as that of Matt. xxiv. 29. and Mark xiii. 24, 25. And it is well remarked by Grotius, that in the Prophetic books 'Mare significat statum mundi variis casibus turbidum; sonus, excitatio inde tumultus.' In proof of this I would refer to Is. viii. 7, 8, and Jerem. li. 54, 55. At σάλου supply ἡχοῦντος, taken from ἡχοῦσης preceding. Or we may suppose a sort of Hendiadys. By ἡχοῦσης θαλάσσης καὶ σάλου are, as Κύρκιο observes, designated ἀκαταστασίαι, 'et turbulæ harum commotiones et tumultus.' There may, too, be an allusion to Ps. lxxv. 7, where it is given as an attribute of God, that he 'stilleth the raging of the sea, and the noise of its waves, and the tumult of the people;' where strepitus maris is explained by the following fremitus nationum. There is in both passages a nautical metaphor. Nor is this without example in the Classical writers. So Soph. CEd. Tyr. 23, πόλις γὰρ Ἡδὴ σαλεύει· κἀνακουφίσαι κἀρα Βυθῶν ἐπ' οὐχ ὅλα τε φοινὸν σάλου. See also Plut. Fab. Max. 37. Rom. 24. Theophyl. Sim. p. 72, 749, and comp. Pind. Pyth. iv. 484. Upon the whole, therefore, this may be regarded simply as an image of extreme distress, thrown in parenthetically.

26. ἀποφυγόντων ἀνθρώπων ἀπὸ φόβου καὶ προσδ.] An Hendiadys for 'a fearful expectation.' Or καὶ may be exegetical, and signify even. 'Ἀποφυγῶν' is by many explained of death; but it seems only to mean (like ἐκθνήσκω), as we say to die away with fear. These words are very suitable to the nautical metaphor above noticed; for in such distress at sea men's hearts may be said 'to die in them for fear.'

Matt. xxiv. 29, and Mark xiii. 24, 25, are all of the same nature, and relate to the very same events; i. e. primarily, to the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish state; but secondarily, to the destruction of the world. The imagery seems formed upon a passage of Is. xiii. 10, 13. (which treats of the destruction of Babylon) where Bp. Lowth remarks (after Sir Is. Newton) that 'when the Hebrews intend to express happiness, prosperity, the instauration and advancement of states, kingdoms, and potentates, they make use of images taken from the most striking parts of nature, from the heavenly bodies, from the sun, moon, and stars; which they describe as shining with increased splendour, and never setting; the moon becomes like the meridian sun, and the sun's light is augmented seven-fold (see Is. xxx. 26.); new heavens and a new earth are created, and a brighter age commences. On the contrary, the overthrow and destruction of kingdoms is represented by opposite images: the stars are obscured, the moon withdraws her light, and the sun shines no more; the earth quakes, and the heavens tremble; and all things seem tending to their original chaos. See Joel ii. 10. iii. 15, 16. Amos viii. 9.'

28. ἀνακύνετε.) I have so pointed, with Markland, in order to indicate that ἀνακ. should not be construed with κεφαλὰς. The word, indeed, of itself signifies to raise up the body (as opposed to συγκύπτω), and sometimes the head only. So Philo. p. 988. τὸν αὐχένα συμφοραῖς πιεζόμενος, οὐδ' ὅσον ἀνακύνει σθίνων, &c. Hence it is figuratively used in the sense animum recipere, as in many passages adduced by Wetstein, Kypke, and Loesner; ex. gr. Joseph. Bell. Jud. vi. 8. 5. ὀλίγον ἱκανύνατες ἐκ τοῦ θόλου.

— ἐγγίζει ἡ ἀπολύτρωσις ὑμῶν.) According to the primary application, this will signify, your deliverance from Jewish persecution, and the tribulations and calamities of Judaea; when, as is suggested by ver. 31, the kingdom of God, or the dispensation of the Gospel, shall be fully established. According to the secondary application, it will denote redemption.

33. [Comp. Pa. cii. 26, 27. Is. li. 6. Heb. i. 11. 2 Pet. iii. 7. 10.]

34—36. Here they are exhorted to be continually expecting these great events, and not to be led to forget them by the security, and self-satisfaction, induced by the use of the good things of this life, so as to forget that 'the Judge is at the door.' In these verses the secondary sense far predominates, as appears from the air of the whole passage, especially the terms παγίς, τέσσε τῆς γῆς, and σταθῆναι ἑμπερ. τοῦ Υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. To the primary, indeed, there is merely an allusion at ἱκανύειν ταῦτα πάντα.

34. βαρυνθῶσιν αἱ καρδίαι.] Very many MSS. and early Editions have βαρυνθῶσιν, which is adopted by Wetstein, Matthæi, and others down to Scholz. But I suspect that the η arose from a confusion with ὑψ, the abbreviations being very similar. It is a great confirmation of the common reading, that the Sept. Translators very often use βαρύνεσθαι, never βαρύνεσθαι. They have indeed the phrase ἱβαρύνθη ἡ καρδία at Esai. viii. 15. ix. 7. 31. x. 1. and at Sap. Sol. ix. 14. φθαρτὸν γὰρ σῶμα βαρύνει ψυχὴν. So Hes. Sat. II. ii. 79. 'Quin corpus onustum Hecatais vitis animum quoque pregravat una, Atque effigit humo divinæ particulam aure.'

In κραιπλή καὶ μέθη there is a Hyponym proteron; the latter term denoting the drunkenness itself; the former, the effects of it in haste, &c. [Comp. Rom. xii. 13. 1 Thes. v. 6. 1 Pet. iv. 7.]

35. ὡς παγίς γὰρ ἐπελ.] Παγίς and σκιδάλον are, like the Heb. פור, frequent images expressive of calamity, especially such as is sudden and unexpected, (as here and in Rom. x. 6.) by which men are taken (like beasts in a snare) before they are aware. Καθημένοι μὲν means existing. There is a reference to James xxv. 29. [Comp. 1 Thes. v. 2. 2 Pet. iii. 10. Rev. iii. 3. xvi. 15.]

prudence and salvation; but, in the primary use, deliverance from the perils in question.

R. [Comp. John viii. 1, 2.]

now answers to the calling of the council,
the deliberation spoken of at John xi. 47.
which, and the consequent determination to kill him to death, the Priests and Scribes unwittingly fulfilled the prophecy at Ps. ii. 2, as admitted by Peter and John, Acts iv. 27. At this ἀνέλ. α. there is that idiom, by which the verb is prefixed to a whole clause, then to be understood as independent, and itself forming an sentence; as Acts iv. 21. μηδὲν εὐρίσκοντες τὸ ἐναντιοῦνται αὐτόν, and often elsewhere.
[Math. Gr. § 280.

ἡ ἐφοβούντο γάρ.] The γάρ has reference to the clause here suppressed, i. e. 'but not on the day'; yet expressed in the passages of Matthew and Mark.

ἡ εἰσῆλθε δὲ ὁ Σ.] Not implying a physical entry of Satan into Judas; but to be understood of mental influence and instigation. As those who obey the divine motions are said to receive him as a divine guest, so Satan is said to enter those who consent unto criminal suggestions. See John xii. 2. Acts v. 3. Ephes. ii.

2. and the Notes on Matth. iii. 16. iv. 1. Luke
ii. 27. This view does not at all negative the personality of Satan; that being implied.

The Article before Σατ., not found in many
MSS. and early Editions, is cancelled by Griesb., Vater, Tittman, and Scholz; but perhaps without reason: for though the word, as partaking of the nature both of a proper name and an appellative, may either admit, or reject it; yet as here three-fourths of the MSS. have it, and as it is almost always found in the New Test. with Σατανᾶς, except in the Vocative case, it is best to retain it here.

4. στρατηγοῖς] scil. τοῦ ἱεροῦ, expressed infra
v. 42. By these I would understand, not, with some, the officers charged with the superintendence of the buildings of the Temple; but, with Lightfoot and Bp. Middleton, the commanders over those bodies of Levites who kept guard in the Temple, mentioned in Acts v. 26. and Joseph.
Bell. vi. 5. 3, of whom one, the chief, is mentioned at Acts iv. 1, and sometimes in Josephus, as ὁ στρατηγὸς τοῦ ἱεροῦ. These στρατηγοί,
however, were, properly speaking, not military,
but civil officers, and, besides the duty above mentioned, acted as præfecti and curatores Tem-pli generally.

6. ἐξωμολόγησε.] The word signifies, 1. to say the same thing with any one; and 2, as here,
to agree with, assent to, what he proposes.

7. θύεσθαι.] The term θύω is used, because the slaying of the paschal lamb was a kind of sacrifice. Hence the phrase Πάσχα to slay the passover, occurs in the Old Test. On this verse to v. 13, see the Notes on Matt. xxvi. 17—19.
and Mark xiv. 12—16.

11. οἰκοδεσπότη τῆς οἰκίας.] A pleonasm, with which Bornemann compares οἰκοκύριος δόμων, αἰκόλια αἰγῶν, συμβύσια συνῶν, τὰ βοσκόμενα τῶν βοῶν, and others.

14. ἡ ὥρα] 'the time;' namely, of the evening appointed for eating the paschal lamb.

16. ἐπιθυμία ἐπαθύμησης.] A Hebrew idiom, as in Gen. xxxi. 30. ἐπιθυμία γὰρ ἐπαθύμησης ἐπαλθεῖν εἰς τὸν οἶκον τοῦ πατρὸς. Here Blackwall, Winer, and Bornemann produce what they call similar phrases from the Greek writers; but, in truth, they are not quite similar. In Hebrew the idiom has a strongly intensive force; in the Greek Classical writers scarcely ever so.

The reason why our Lord thus ardently longed for the arrival of the passover, was, 1. because he knew he should then enter on that conflict, which should terminate in a glorious victory over sin and Satan, and produce the most blessed results to his faithful people of every age. And as he was so soon to leave them, he wished to open his mind freely, and prepare them for the loss they were so soon to suffer, and the trials which were long awaited them; that they might bear the one and sustain the other. Doubtless, too, he then anticipated the period so shortly to arrive, when he should institute for their use, and that of his followers of all ages, the sacred feast appointed as a sacramental memorial of his death and passion.

16. οὐκέτι οὐ μὴ.] A negative of the strongest kind, and somewhat unusual; though examples are adduced by Bornemann from the Classical writers. Ἐξ αὐτοῦ, 'henceforward' is also an expression extremely rare without parallel in the Classical writers. Next words, οὐ μὴ φάγω ἐξ αὐτοῦ, πληρωθῇ ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ, have the same character with those at Matt. x. 23. to be explained in the same manner that 'he should hold no more social converse with them on earth, up to the period of redemption by his blood (the Passover) which the Passover was the type accomplished, and the kingdom established.'

19. τοῦτο ποιεῖτε, &c.] 'Do that which I have just done,—here I have just done.' See Bornemann, who here adduces examples from the present, the pronoun demonstrative referred ad remotiora, and where it is used for ἐμοῦ. He also brings forward Schaefer, that the Greek writers often use the repetition of a verb precisely in this manner.

Various passages are here cited from the Rabbinical writers, from the ancient Jewish Church, in celebration of the feast, always had in view the Messiah. [Comp. 1 Cor. xi. 23. 20. τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον, &c.] 'the administration of this cup I do in remembrance of my blood.'

21. ὁ χεὶρ—τραπέζην.] An old saying, 'the person is at table with a person.' John xiii. 18. Ps. xli. 9. Acts i. 16.]

24. ἐγένετο δὲ καὶ φιλονικία, &c.] From the difference of circumstances, notwithstanding the identity of the thing itself, some have maintained that this represents an occurrence distinct from that recorded at Matt. xx. 20. and Mark x. 35. But, as Doddridge remarks, 'we cannot suppose such a contention for superiority should have occurred immediately after so affecting a lesson of humility.' Accordingly he and some other eminent Commentators are of opinion that this is the same circumstance with that mentioned by Matthew and Mark, but here brought in out of the regular order, of which St. Luke is less observant than the other Evangelists. However, as Matthew and Mark inform us that the contention took place in the way, before they came to Jerusalem, or even Jericho, ἐγένετο must be taken in a pluperfect sense, 'there had been,' viz. on the road to Jericho.

25. εὐεργέται καλοῦνται.] Εὐεργέτης was among the Greeks a title of honour, assigned to all who had in any way deserved well of the monarch or state, and was the title arrogated by, and through flattery bestowed on, the princes or magnates of antiquity. See Herodot. iii. 140. and my Note on Thucyd. i. 129. καὶ ταῖς σοὶ εὐεργεσίαις.

26. Our Lord now takes occasion to explain the nature of his kingdom; intimating that it was established on different principles from those of the world, so that he who would be most advanced in his kingdom must be the most humble.

— ὁ μείζων.] From the antithetical word μειν, this has been by some supposed to denote 'one who is elder,' like the Latin major. But, from the parallel passage of Matthew, it is plain that μειν is rather to be accommodated to μειν than εἰς ὅτι; and Kypke has adduced several Classical authorities for μειν as the expression of an inferior. He shows that the expressions employed throughout have reference to, or station in the kingdom of Christ. [Comp. ix. 48. 1 Pet. v. 8.]

VOL. I.

27. τίς γὰρ, &c.] [Comp. John xiii. 14. Phil. ii. 7.]

28. πειρασμοίς] 'trials, afflictions.'

29. διατίθεται ὑμῖν.] The best Interpreters, ancient and modern, are of opinion that διατ. has here the sense engage for, or promise; but that, just after, it must have the further removed sense of grant or bestow. The former is found in the Sept.; the latter sprang from the usual import of covenanting, which implies something granted. [Comp. supra xii. 32. Matt. xxiv. 4.]

30. καθίσασθε.] This, instead of καθίσασθε, found in many of the best MSS. and some early Editions, has been received by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, and others; and rightly: for, as Bornemann observes, the Future was more likely to be changed into the Subj. than the contrary. And that the Future is meant to be construed with ἵνα, is probable from a similar construction at John xv. 8.

31. Our Lord now directs his discourse to Peter (though intending his admonition for all present), in order to forwarn him, and put him on his guard against the temptation soon coming upon him, and also to supply him with an admonition to be made use of on being brought to repentance.

— ἐξητήσατο ὑμᾶς.] Ἐξαιτεῖσθαι signifies to require any one to be delivered up to us, whether for good or for evil; but chiefly the latter. The difference between the active and middle is that ἐξαιτῶ signifies to ask or beg any one for another; ἐξαιτεῖσθαι, to ask for one's own use. The sense here is simply, 'Satan desires to get you into his power'; a strongly figurative form of expression, used with allusion to the Scripture narrative of Job's temptation.

— τοῦ σινιάσαι.] Σινιάσαι (from σινίον, a sieve,) signifies to sift, or winnow; and as that implies agitation, commotion, and separation, so the expression has been usually supposed to mean disturb, loosen, i. e. undermine, and overthrow your fidelity. But the primary sense is more apt, namely, sift you, scrutinize, or try your fidelity and constancy. [Comp. 1 Pet. v. 8.]

Καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Ὅτε ἀπέστειλα ὑμᾶς ἄτερ βαλαντίου 35 καὶ πήρας καὶ ὑποδημάτων, μὴ τινος ὑστερήσατε; οἱ δὲ εἶπον· Οὐδενός. 32. ἐπιστρέψας.] Neut. for reciprocal. The full sense is: 'having recovered thyself [from that lapse which will befall thee] by hearty repentance,' &c.

35. The connection here with the preceding context is obscure, and may best be traced by considering the purpose of our Lord in what he was now saying; namely, to warn his disciples of, and prepare them for, future trials. This could not be better done than by contrasting their past state with that so near at hand. They are apprised that a total change will shortly take place in their condition, which consequently will require a corresponding change in their plans and measures. Before he had sent them forth for a brief period only, and in their own country; in which case there was no need of long preparation in provisions for their journeys, or precautions against perils. But now they were to go forth to the world at large (see Matt. xxviii. 19.), and would have to encounter every form of hardship, necessity, and peril. (See 2 Cor. xi. 26, 27.) Hence there would be need to provide for altered circumstances by suitable precautions.

36. πωλησάτω τὸ ἱμάτιον.] A proverbial form of expression, by which a thing is counselled to be done at any rate. I would compare Thucyd. viii. 81. οὐδ' ἢν δὲν, τελευτῶντα τὴν ἰαντοῦ στρωμνὴν ἱεραγυρῶσαι. Xen. Anab. vii. 5, δ. καὶ προσδανεισάμενος, εἰ μὴ γ' ἄλλως εἶδύν, καὶ ἀποδόμενος τὰ σαυτοῦ ἱμάτια.

This direction to buy swords at any rate is not to be considered as a positive command so to do; but rather an allegorical mode of intimating the extreme perils they would have to encounter. So the Prophets of the Old Test. are accustomed to prefigure perilous times, by representing what men then commonly do to guard against danger. See Is. xiv. 21. and Jerem. ix. 17, 18.

37. ἐπὶ τοῦτο—ἐν ἐμοί.] As much as to say: 'After all that I have suffered, this last now remains,—namely, that I should (as was long ago prophesied of me) be brought unto an ignominious death. And as I have suffered, so must you; for the hatred and reproach encountered by the master shall extend to you his disciples.' (Ant.) Τέλος ἔχει is synonymous with τελεσθῆναι, and is used by the best Classical writers of the completion of predictions. Of the many examples cited by Wetstein and Kypke, the most apposite are the following: Æschyl. Prom. 13. ἐπὶ τοῦ Διὸς εἶχε τέλος. Dionys. Hal. Ant. ix. 12. τέλος εἶχε τοῖς Τ. τὰ μαντεύματα.

38. ἰδοὺ μάχαιραι ὡς δύο.] 'See here are two swords.' How it happened that they had the swords, and for what purpose, has been variously accounted for; but best by Grotius, who supposes that, as the road from Galilee to Jerusalem was infested with robbers, travellers took swords. See, as Schoettgen has shown, at that time in Judea even the Priests carried arms when on a journey. And, as we find from Josephus, even the quiet and pacific Essenes took swords when travelling. See Bell. ii. 8, 4. διὰ καὶ ποιοῦνται τὰς δουλείας οὐδὲν μὲν ὅλως ἐπικρινομένοι, διὰ δὲ καὶ ληστὰς ἐνοπλοῖ.

—ἰκανόν ἐστι.] The best Commentaries, ancient and modern, are agreed that ἰκανόν ἐστι has here a sense not unfrequent, in this and similar expressions in all languages (see the examples adduced in Rec. Syn.), as employed on occasions when we do not care to rectify a dull comprehension, but dismiss both the person and the thing with 'It is very well; that will do;' e.g. in the words of Bornemann, 'pluribus oculis plerumque non opus est in periculis instantibus, nullā pugnā removeri poterant.'

41. ἀπεσπᾶσθη.] Many Commentaries understand 'proripuit sese.' But the more common, both ancient and modern, are of opinion, that no idea of impetuosity is implied; the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans using words, which

— ὥσεί θρόμβοι αἵματος.] It has been generally supposed, that our Lord's sweat was actually
 blood, or at least bloody; and examples of such a phenomenon have been adduced. But the most eminent Expositors, ancient and modern, understand the meaning to be, 'his sweat became like
 drops of blood;' a sense, they think, demanded
 by the words themselves. Compare Acts ix. 19.
 Nay, Theophylact and Photius (Epiat. 13.) consider this as merely a proverbial mode of expression, by which it is said of those who labour, that
 they sweat drops of blood. A view, however,
 quite inadmissible. Surely the very existence of
 the saying in the Greek, as well as in our own
 and other languages, at least attests the existence
 of bloody sweats, under excessive perturbation of
 mind or distress of body. See Lucan, Phars. ix.
 809—14, where, among other expressions, we
 have sudor rubet. So that, after all, those who understand it of a sanguineous appearance in the
sweat, probably take the most correct view; especially as such sweats have been, by numerous
 authorities adduced or referred to in Rec. Synop.,
 proved to have sometimes attended extreme mental
 agony. So Aristot. Hist. Anim. iii. 19. adduces
 an instance of sanguineous sweat from extreme agitation; and Dr. Mead, in his Medica Sacra,
 gives the same attestation from Galen. This view
 is, I would add, strongly supported by the following citation from an eminent medical writer,
Blainville, for which I am indebted to the British
 Critic for 1831, p. 1. 'On l'a trouvée (la sueur)
colorée en rouge dans une affection qui a reçu le
 nom de Diapedese, maladie dans laquelle il n'y a
 pas une véritable transpiration, mais qui constitue
 plutôt une hémorrhagie par exhalation, comme
 celle que l'on observe à la surface de la membrane
 pituitaire. Cette transudation a lieu dans les cas
 où, par suite d'une frayeur subite, ou d'une vive
 émotion, il se fait congestion.'

45. κοιμωμένους ἀπὸ τῆς λύπης.] The force
 of the expression may best be understood by considering, that extreme grief has a stupifying ten-
 unrefreshing, sleep; an effect which is alluded to

tion are all emphatical, and there is a sort of climax; q. d. 'Betrayest thou thy master, and him the Son of Man, and that with a kiss?' Φιλήματι, as denoting that which constituted the greatest aggravation of the guilt, is placed first, in order to be made most prominent. [Comp. John xviii. 3.]

49. εἰ πατάξομεν.] Ei may here be rendered num, as in Mark viii. 23, where see Note. The full sense is: '[What] if we strike?' Or πατάξομεν may be taken for πατάξωμεν. 'En is here said to stand for σύν. But no good writers use σύν to denote the instrumental cause; whereas ἐν is sometimes found in that sense, though in the writers of the New Test. it, no doubt, proceeded from Hebraism.

50. [Comp. John xviii. 10.]

51. ἴατε ἕως τούτου.] These words (obscure from brevity) admit of two different interpretations, according as they are supposed to be addressed to the multitude, or to the disciples. Agreeably to the former view, the sense is, 'leave me free till I shall have healed the wounded man.' This, however, besides supposing a very harsh ellipsis, yields a sense not a little objectionable. According to the latter view, the expression will denote (by an ellipsis of αὐτοῦς after ἴατε), 'let them do what they please,—desist.' Yet this ellipsis of αὐτοῦς is not a little harsh. The true ellipsis after ἴατε is τὸ πρᾶγμα; and ἴατε stands for ἀφετε, 'let alone.' There is also a sensus praeiens, as in Thucyd. i. 71. μίχρι τοῦδε ὠρίσθω ὑμῖν ἡ βραδύτης. The sense, then, may be explained (as it is done by Wetstein, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, and Schleusner), 'Let the matter rest [after its having proceeded] thus far!' q. d. 'Enough of this.'

52. ὡς ἐπὶ ληστῇν.] The construction is: ἐξελ. μετὰ μαχαίρων καὶ ξύλων ἐπ' ἐμέ, ὡς ἐπὶ ληστῇν; The ἐπὶ signifies against, namely, for apprehension; as in Josephus Antiq. xiv.

11, 6. ἐξελεῖν ἐπὶ Μάλχον παῖδι μετὰ φιλίδων.

53. ἀλλ' αὕτη—σκότους.] There is here again a certain obscurity, occasioned by the sense being, from intensity of feeling, but imperfectly developed. Some take the words to mean, 'This is the time most opportune for your purpose; this is the hour fitted for deeds of darkness.' An interpretation supported by several passages adduced from the Classical writers. Others explain, 'This is the time destined and permitted by God, and this is the power of iniquity;' i. e. iniquity has obtained this power; αὕτη ἐστὶν being supplied before ἐξουσία. The latter sense is preferable; and the interpretation, as far as concerns the first clause, is confirmed and illustrated by Matt. xxi. 45, 56. The sense of the second clause, however, has not been so well discerned. It should seem that ἐξουσία τοῦ σκότους is, as it were, a personification of the Prince of darkness, the Devil, called at Eph. ii. 2. ὁ ἀρχὼν τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ αἵματος, and his subordinate agents ἐξουσία τοῦ σκότους. Of ἐξουσία, as used for ἀρχὴ, examples occur supra xii. 11. Rom. xiii. 1. 1 Cor. xv. 24. Eph. i. 21. iii. 10. Col. i. 16. ii. 10. The complete sense is: 'This is the time when power is given you against me by the determinate counsel of God (Acts iv. 28.), and in which the Power, or Prince of darkness is permitted to exercise his rancour against me.' In the latter clause there is an ellipsis of αὕτη ἐστὶν, to be supplied from the preceding one.

54. [Comp. John xvii. 12. 24.]

56. ἀτενίσασα αὐτῷ.] Ἀτενίσκειν signifies 'to fix oneself intently'; and, with ὁρμὴν or ὀφθαλμοῖς, to fix one's view intently. These words, however, are almost always left to be understood; and the object of view is expressed either by an Accus. with εἰς (as in Acts i. 10. iii. 4.), or by a Dative without a preposition, as here and in Luke iv. 20.

[ἕτερος.] In the passage of Matthew would here be very objectionable; being, indeed, at variance with the words following, οὐ μὴ ἀποκριθῇτέ μοι, by which interrogation of some kind is certainly adverted to;—of what kind is the question. Certainly not what Bp. Pearce understands, concerning the Christ: still less what Doddridge supposes, 'inquiring wherefore they persist in their infidelity.' To ask questions, in order to convince, is incongruous. The true force of the expression was alone, I think, seen by Grotius, who observes, that 'it bears a sense which, united with that of interrogation, yet has another, namely, that of argumentation.' 'The Hebrews (says he), as well as the Greeks, used to carry on argument by interrogation.' Of this he adduces an example from Aristotle. He might have added, that this use of the word to signify questionem proponere, is (as H. Steph. Thea. in v. attests) frequent in the Dialecticians, especially Sextus Empiricus; as also interrogare in Latin. The sense, then, may be thus expressed: 'If I simply tell you [that I am the Christ], ye will not believe me; and if I propose questions in argument, [to support my claim,] ye will not answer me, nor, though convinced, will you release me. [However] henceforward shall the Son of Man (meaning himself) be [seen] sitting, &c. On which last words comp. Matt. xxvi. 64, where indeed the πλὴν may seem more definite; but there is very great force in the Asymdeton here.

[δύσχυρίζετο.] 'strongly affirmed,' as xii. 15, and in passages of Lysias, Ælian, and Josephus, cited by the Commentators.

[εἰ εἶ—εἰπὲ ἡμῖν.] These words admit of being rendered in three different ways. 1. 'Art thou the Christ? tell us.' 2. 'If thou be the Christ, tell us [so].' 3. 'Tell us whether thou art the Christ [or not].' The 1st mode has far less commendation than the 2d and 3d, of which latter seems, on account of its greater suitableness to the occasion and the context, (especially the words of the answer) to be entitled to preference.

[ἔδεν δὲ καὶ ἐρωτήσας.] So little satisfaction is the ordinary sense of ἐρωτ., that Heinsius here assigns that of supplicare. But that signification is ill founded, and the sense arising would here be very objectionable; being, indeed, at variance with the words following, οὐ μὴ ἀποκριθῇτέ μοι, by which interrogation of some kind is certainly adverted to;—of what kind is the question. Certainly not what Bp. Pearce understands, concerning the Christ: still less what Doddridge supposes, 'inquiring wherefore they persist in their infidelity.' To ask questions, in order to convince, is incongruous. The true force of the expression was alone, I think, seen by Grotius, who observes, that 'it bears a sense which, united with that of interrogation, yet has another, namely, that of argumentation.' 'The Hebrews (says he), as well as the Greeks, used to carry on argument by interrogation.' Of this he adduces an example from Aristotle. He might have added, that this use of the word to signify questionem proponere, is (as H. Steph. Thea. in v. attests) frequent in the Dialecticians, especially Sextus Empiricus; as also interrogare in Latin. The sense, then, may be thus expressed: 'If I simply tell you [that I am the Christ], ye will not believe me; and if I propose questions in argument, [to support my claim,] ye will not answer me, nor, though convinced, will you release me. Matt. xxvi. 64, where indeed the πλὴν may seem more definite; but there is very great force in the Asymdeton here.

XXIII. 1. τὸ πλῆθος αὐτῶν.] Πλῆθος. Render, 'cetum;' and by αὐτῶν understand the chief priests, &c. Or πλ. may here have simply the sense number, without reference to great or small. So Thucyd. i. 47. τῶν εἰκοσι νῆων, ἀπὸ ἑλάσσονος πλῆθους, οὐ παρουσῶν, and elsewhere. Ἠγάγον (instead of the Vulg. ἤγαγεν) is found in almost all the best MSS., and has been adopted by most Editors. [Comp. John xviii. 28.]

2. τοῦτον εὗρομεν διαστρέφοντα, &c.] Εὐρίσκω is here a forensic term, denoting conviction after legal trial. [See Matt. xxvii. 25. xxii. 21. Mark xii. 17. supra xx. 25. Rom. xiii. 7. Acts xvii. 7.]

— κωλύοντα Καίσαρι φ. δ.] This use of the Infinitive after κωλύω (found elsewhere in the New Test.) is far less usual in Greek than μὴ and the Subjunctive; yet, as Bornemann observes, it is not without example in the best writers.

4. οὐδὲν εὐρίσκω αἴτιον.] Αἴτιος is properly an adjective neuter, from αἴτιος, signifying worthy of, or the cause of; and when used in a forensic sense, means worthy of blame, and consequently of punishment.

5. ἀρξάμενος ἀπὸ τῆς Γ.] On this form see Note at Matt. xx. 8. Here the terminus ad quem is added, ἕως ὧδε; where ὧδε is for ταύτης τῆς πόλεως, and there is an ellipsis of καὶ παρανόμενος, or such like.

7. ἐπιγινούς.] Render, 'having learnt.' Ἐκ

τῆς ἐξουσίας, 'ex ditione,' namely, the region over which he held power. Ἀντίκριψε, respondit, to use the corresponding term in the Roman law. 'It was (observes Grotius) the regular practice of the Roman law to remove the prisoner to the governor of the province or district to which he belonged, though governors had the right of trying all offences within their own province.'

8. ἐχάρη.] Join this closely with ἰδὼν; as in John xx. 20. ἐχάρησαν ἰδόντες τὸν Κύριον, in which idiom see Matt. Gr. Gr. § 555.

— ἦν γὰρ θέλων, &c.] [Comp. Acts xv. 28. supra ix. 7. Matt. xiv. 1.]

9. ἐπηρώτα.] Render, 'interrogated him;' the word being used in a judicial sense, as John xii. 21. Our Lord returned no answer to these interrogatories, as well knowing that they were put from any desire to know the truth.

10. εὐτόνως] intense, validè. So Herod explains ἰσχυρῶν, with a reference, it may be supposed, to this passage, or that of Acts xvii. 21.

11. ἐξουθενήσας] 'having treated him with insult and ignominy.' How, and in what manner, see Matt. xxvii. 29. and Mark xv. 18; though what is here said is chiefly meant of Herod's soldiers.

— στρατεύμασιν] astutibus, i. e. his bodyguards, as in Acts xxiii. 10. More than Herod's soldiers would not have allowed him to bring.

example of it occurs in Test. xii. Patr.

ἡσαντο φίλοι] 'were made friends,'
 iv. 27. It is observed by M. Saurin, reconciliation of Herod and Pilate is derful than their enmity. The enigma, tion, or to the recovery of it, to one of this enmity may have been, as and Whiston suppose, that Pilate had lled with Herod's jurisdiction; and that, make up the matter, he sent Christ to this time.

ἀποστρέφοντα τὸν λαόν] scil. ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡ, 'from their allegiance to Cæsar.' So
 vi. 11. καὶ ὅσοι οὐκ ἀπεστράφησαν ἡν.

πέμψα γὰρ ὑμᾶς πρὸς αὐτόν.] Some
 MSS. have ἀνέπεμψα γὰρ αὐτόν ἡ, which is preferred by Grotius and without reason; this being a manifest to remove an obscurity proceeding from and too brief mode of expression, but filled up.

ἡδὲ, οὐδὲν ἄξιον θανάτου—αὐτῷ.] This ἡ in the E. V. and most other Versions, nothing worthy of death is done unto him.' Yet how such a sense can be defended, I see not; nay, it may be said to border on absurdity. It should seem that, according to the opinion of many eminent Commentators, αὐτῷ here is (as often in the Greek writers) to be taken for ὑπ' αὐτοῦ; the πεπραγμένον being understood of Jesus, not of Pilate. And this is quite agreeable to the use of the phrase πρᾶσσειν τι ἄξιον θανάτου elsewhere. So Acts xxv. 25. I have pointed accordingly; considering the words ἀνέπέμψα—αὐτόν as hypo-parenthetical.

16. παιδεύσας] 'having chastised.' Παιδεύειν properly signifies to educate a child; and then,
 from the adjunct, to correct, either generally, or in some particular manner, expressed or understood.
 Here punishment by flagellation is meant; which,
 among the Romans, always preceded capital punishment. The kind of flagellation varied according to the offence, being sometimes simply flogging with rods; in most cases scourging with the flagella. Here, however, the flagellation meant must be that spoken of by St. Paul, 2 Cor.
 xi. 25. 'thrice was I beaten with rods.' [Comp.
 John xix. 1.]

17. ἀνάγκην εἶχε.] A phrase very much like the Latin opus habere, yet occasionally found in the later Classical writers. The kind of necessity will depend upon the context. Here that of custom is meant. See Acts iii. 14.

18. παμπληθεῖ] 'the whole multitude together.'

—αἶρε τοῦτον] i. e. 'Away with this man to death!' So John xix. 15. ἄρον, ἄρον· σταύρωσον αὐτόν, and Acts xxi. 36. So also the word is used in Joseph. Ant. xvi. 1, 1. ἀραμίνω τοὺς ἀδελφούς. And so sometimes the Latin tollo and the Heb. נשא.

21. ἡπεφώνουν.] Render, acclamabant, voce
ferabantur.

22. τί γάρ, &c.] The γάρ has reference to a negative clause left understood; q. d. Not so!
 for what, &c.

23. ἐπέκειντο φωναῖς μεγ.] ἐκπαύοντι ἀλλὰ voce, 'were urgent with him in loud voices.' So Aristoph. Equit. 252, παῖε, καὶ δῖωκε, καὶ τάραττε—καπικαίμενος βόα, ἐπὶ τὸ τοσφῆρα.

24. ἐπέκρινε] 'judicando decrevit.' The word denotes the final adjudication, or decree, of a judge. So Plutarch, 864, B. cited by Wetstein:
ἐπαγαγὼν τοὺς μάρτυρας καὶ ἐπικρίνας, &c., 2 Macc. iv. 47.

25. ἀπέλυσεν αὐτοῖς] i. e. 'he pardoned at their request'; αὐτοῖς being a dat. commodi. In many MSS., &c., the αὐτοῖς is not found; and it is cancelled by Griesbach, Knapp, and Scholz;
but rashly; for more causes may be imagined for the omission, than for the insertion of the word.

— τῷ θελήματι α.] Namely, as the other three Evangelists express it, ἕνα σταυρωθῆναι.

26. τοῦ ἐρχομένου.] The τοῦ, not found in the greater part of the MSS. and early Editions, is cancelled by almost all Editors. Propriety of language will not admit it; and it seems to have arisen from the ἰον preceding.

— ὀπισθεν τοῦ [I.] i. e., as Grotius explains, he laying hold of the hind part, and Jesus of the fore part.

27. αὶ καὶ ἐκόπτοντο.] Render, 'who also were bewailing themselves and lamenting him.'

28. μὴ κλαίετε ἐπ' ἐμὲ, &c.] Meaning, 'Weep not so much for me as, &c.' For ἐπ' ἐμὲ some MSS. have ἐπ' ἐμοί, which is supported by Luke
xix. 41. But the other reading is confirmed by the usage of the Sept.

'Here,' observes Grotius, 'our Lord speaks agreeably to the manner of men, who weep rather for their own evils, than for those of others'; q. d.
'If you could see the calamities which await you and your children, you would have no tears left for me.' So Sophocles. Phil. 339, *οἷμαι μὲν ἐπεὶ σοὶ γὰ καὶ τὰ σ', ὦ τάλας, Ἀλγήμεν', ὅτι

μὴ τὰ τῶν πέλας στήνεις.*

29, 30. How awfully the predictions contained in these verses were fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem, the narrative of the great Jewish historian abundantly attests. The first of these verses alludes to a pathetic circumstance, to which numerous parallels from the ancient writers are adduced by Pricæus, Grotius, and Wetstein. The second contains a yet more touching feature of this graphic sketch; with which may be compared similar descriptions in Is. ii. 19. Hos. x. 8. Rev.
vi. 16, 17. ix. 6, and from the Greek writers.
Here, however, I cannot agree with Kuinoel and certain recent Commentators, that 'per montes et colles intelliguntur cavernæ et speluncæ'; see Matt. xxiv. 16. To suppose any allusion to the caves as places of refuge would be to mar the beauty of the idea, which simply expresses that they would even wish for speedy death to rid them of their troubles. So Josephus, Bell. ii. 6 2 (speaking of what had taken place under Herod's reign), says, *πλείστον γοῶν ἀνθρώπων ἐν αὐτοῦ, τοιαῦτα πεποιθῆναι τοὺς καταλύει
Σίντας, ὅτι μακαρίζεσθαι τοὺς ἀπολλόμενους.*

31. ἐν τῷ ὕψω—γίνηται.] A proverbial form of expression; for (as we find from Ps. i. 3. Ps.
xx. 47. Eccles. vi. 3, and especially the Rabbinical writers) the Hebrews were accustomed to figuratively call the righteous green trees, and the wicked dry ones; as if to intimate that the righteous are undeserving of punishment, as a green tree is unfit for burning; see Alp. Newcome. [Comp. 1 Pet. iv. 18.]

32. It is the opinion of Commentators in general, that Christ is here numbered among wicked

agreeably to what was said supra xxii. 37, μετὰ ἀνόμων ἐλογίσθη, and because he was considered by the Jews. This view, however, involves no little harshness, must not, and, need not be adopted, if, with H. Stephens many of the recent Commentators, we regard ἄρχοντες as not in concord, but in opposition, ἡ ἑτεροί; by which the expression will be equivalent to οἱ ἦσαν κακούργοι. As an example this idiom it may suffice to adduce Thucyd. iv. οἱ δὲ μετὰ τοῦ Δημοσθένους Πλαταιῆς τολοῖ καὶ ἑταροί, περιπόλοι, (for οἱ ἦσαν π.) ἦσαν, &c.

by this term κακούργοι are, it is supposed, not strictly speaking, robbers, but insurgents, πράξαι. It is true that these are called by ἡσὺ and Μάρκ ἡσὺται. But the terms ἡσὺ and κακούργοι were, as Kypke and Wetstein have shown, convertible; and from the ἡσὺ they have adduced, it is clear that both were applied not only to robbers, but to ἡσὺ, and robbers in war. On the latter see Thucyd. ii. 67. vii. 4. 10. ii. 22. iii. 1. &c.; and on the former, Thucyd. iv. 2. viii. 40, my Notes there. Probably, however, the ἡσὺ in question were both insurgents and ἡσὺ, who, having taken up arms on a principle of resistance to the Roman oppression, were, ἡσὺ, professedly opposed to the Romans only; when engaged in their lawless courses, made difference between Romans and Jews than at first set out with doing.

Πάτερ, ἄφες αὐτοῖς, &c.) The complete function is an Accusative of the thing (the ἡσὺ) and a Dative of the person, i. e. the door of in Matt. vi. 12. As to the next words, οὐ οἶδασι τί ποιοῦσι, it is well remarked by ἡσὺ, 'that much may be pleaded in extenuation of crime of the people at large, especially as in their ignorance of the real nature of Him whom they so injuriously treated. And ignorance was, by the universal consent of the philosophers of old, considered, if not an excuse for crime, an extenuation of its guilt. Thus the Grecian Moralists distribute offences into ἀτυχήματα, ἀμαρτήματα, and ἀδικήματα. Now, though the offence of the Jews was not a mere ἀτύχημα, nay, exceeded the ordinary sort of ἀμαρτήματα, yet it carried with it something of the ἀτύχημα, from the ignorance joined with it. This ignorance, indeed, was in all of them, both the Priests and the people, in a great degree voluntary, since they might have known what they were doing, and were therefore liable to punishment. Our blessed Lord, however, compassionating their ignorance, whatever might be its cause, implores God to pardon them, praying that opportunity for repentance might be granted to the guilty, and that pardon might be extended to such as should lay hold on the mercy of God. That not a few ἡσὺ repent, is clear from the Evangelical history contained in the Acts of the Apostles.

35. σὺν αὐτοῖς.] This is to be closely connected with ἐξεμυκτήριζον; as if the sentence had been thus written: καὶ εἰστήκει ὁ λαὸς θεωρῶν καὶ μυκτηρίζον. Συνεξεμυκτήριζον δὲ καὶ οἱ ἄρχοντες, λέγοντες, &c. The thing is more clearly expressed in the passages of Matthew and Mark, where it is said that the people, or 'passers-by, reviled him, &c.; and likewise also the chief priests mocking him, with the scribes and elders, said, He saved others,' &c.

40. οὐδὲ φοβῆ σὺ τὸν Θεόν, &c.] The best Commentators are agreed that the οὐδὲ must be connected with σὺ; q. d. 'Art thou not afraid of offending God [by thus acting], thou who art suffering the same punishment [and might therefore be expected to feel sympathy]; a punishment, too, by him wholly undeserved; for we indeed are suffering justly (since, &c.), but He,' &c.

42. ὅταν ἔλθῃς ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ σου.] Markland, Reiske, and Kuinoel assign as the sense, 'quando redieris in regno tuo,' i. e. Rex, regia potestate praeditus. But though that sense of ἐρχεσθαι and ἔκειν be found in the Classical writers, it does not obtain in the Scriptural ones; and, upon the whole, the interpretation is a strained one. There is, indeed, no reason to abandon the common view (supported by the Versions), by which ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ is taken for eis τὴν βασιλείαν, especially since this idiom is common in the later Greek writers.

It is a point of greater importance, and greater difficulty, to ascertain the precise idea affixed by the penitent malefactor to this coming of Jesus to his kingdom. That he recognised Jesus to be the Messiah is certain; but what notion he formed of the Messiah it is impossible to determine; as also whether he expected an immediate translation of Jesus to his kingdom, or one to be enjoyed at the day of judgment. All we know assuredly is, that he believed in the Messiahship of Jesus, and entreated to have an interest in the kingdom (of whatever nature that might be, whether temporal or spiritual) that he believed him come to establish.

43. σήμερον μετ' ἐμοῦ, &c.] It is a point not a little discussed by Commentators, both of ancient and modern times, what our Lord intended the penitent malefactor to understand by the paradise here promised. Chrysostom, Euthymius, Grotius, Wetstein, and the most eminent Expositors are agreed that no countenance was here meant to be given to Jewish fables, or the notions of the Essenes, still less the Pharisaical ones (like the Mahometan) of a paradise of sensual delights. Also that we are not to suppose that by Paradise is here meant hæven. The word itself is derived from the Persian or Armenian درد, a garden. Now, as great pains were bestowed by the Orientals on their gardens, thus the word easily came to mean a pleasure garden, a place of luxury and enjoyment. In this sense παράδεισος often occurs in Xenophon. Hence it is no wonder that the term came to denote, among the later Jews, that pleasant abode in Hades appointed for the reception of the just, until they should, after the day of judgment, be again united to their bodies in a future state; see Josephus, Bell. Jud. iii. 8. 4. ii. 8. 11. This, Chrysostom has shown, was the idea entertained of Paradise by all the orthodox believers of his time. The sense, therefore, intended to be expressed was, that the penitent malefactor might hope from the mercy of God for something far beyond what Jewish opinions attached to the idea of Paradise, even a secure and quiet retreat for the time which should intervene between death and the resurrection; and also (which was implied in the other) an admission into the regions of that eternal felicity, of which the other was but a foretaste and earnest.

44. With this and verse 49, comp. Acts i. 4. & 46. ἐξίστασθε.] Supply τὴν ψυχὴν, expressed in Eurip. Orest. 1163. (Comp. John xix. 31.)

47. ὁντως—δίκαιος ἦν.] See Note on Matt. xxvii. 54, by which a method of removing the minute discrepancy between the accounts of the Evangelists will suggest itself. Thus, too, we see how suitable ὁντως is to this passage of Luke, as ἀληθῶς is to those of Matthew and Mark; in the first of which the sense is, 'This was truly (what he appeared to be) a just person;' in the second and third, 'This was really the personage he claimed to be, the Son of God.' At the same time, when we consider that, in prophetic language, Christ was called the Just One, and that this was probably a common appellation among the Jews (one, too, not unfrequently given by this Evangelist to the Messiah, see Acts iii. 14. vii. 52. xxi. 14), there may be some reason to think, with Dr Middleton, that δίκαιος is here put for ὁ δίκαιος.

51. συγκατατεθειμένος.] Συγκατατεθειμένος (with a Middle form and Deponent sense) signifies, 1. to lay down any thing with another; 2. also with ψήφον expressed, to give one's vote with another; 3. with ψήφον implied (as here), it means figuratively to agree with any one, and when followed by a dative of thing (as γινώσκω αἰσ), to assent to any measure. In this last use the word is used both in the Sept. and the classical writers.

81. προσεδέχετο τὴν βασιλείαν τ. Θ.] This promise (which occurs also at Mark xv. 43) was, 'he, in firm faith, expected the coming of a Messiah.' It is, however, implied in the context that he believed JESUS to be that Messiah. The present is nearly equivalent to the promise used, in this same case, by Matt. vii. 57, ἡμαρτάνουσι τῷ Ἰησοῦ, and John xix. 31, ἡμαρτάνουσι τῷ Ἰησοῦ.

82. ἐν μνήματι λαξευτῷ] i. e. 'hewn out of a solid rock' (so Matthew and Mark have δὲ στήλην ἐν τῇ πέτρᾳ); not, as the term will import in a Classical writer, 'of hewn masonry.' Indeed all the Jewish μνημεῖα were subterranean caves or vaults, and (in so rocky a country) would of course have to be cut out of solid rock.

83. ἐπιφώσκει] 'was just dawning,' i. e. commencing. As the Sabbath commenced in the evening of the preceding day, the expression ἐπιφώσκει requires to be taken by a metaphor which may seem strange. Yet it is justly observed by Knobel (after Wetstein), that however incongruous it might sound to Greek and Roman ears, as they heard of the evening, or approach of day, expressed by ἐπιφώσκειν, yet to Jewish ears it was familiar, and by no means harsh.

XXIV. 1. μιᾷ] for πρώτη, by Hebraism. — ὄρθρου βαθίος.] Βαθὺς is often used with its denoting time, especially evening, night, or dawn of day, as here. With respect to ὄρθρου βαθίος, on Lennep Etymolog. in v. says, 'the phrase properly means, "when the day dawns forth;" and that by rendering it, primus mane no discrepancy will be involved in the accounts in the other Evangelists.' An idiot, however, unnecessary, and which seems to have been resorted to from the idea that the word had something to do with light. And so Mr. Mitchell, on Aristoph. Vesp. 216, explains it, 'the time when the sun rises.' But it may rather be said to denote that period which immediately precedes its rise. The word derives its origin from ὄρω, to stir; and denotes properly that light stir of the air which ushers in the dawn; what the Poet beautifully terms

'The breezy call of incense-breathing morn.'

Hence, also, the Latin aurora. This will account for, and illustrate, the use of the epithet with the word; a use, too, by no means Hellenistic, but occurring in the purest Attic writers, as Aristoph. Vesp. 216, and Plato, more than once. [Comp. John xx. 1.]

4. ἄνδρες δύο.] This, instead of the common reading δύο ἄνδρες, is edited by Griesbach, Matthæi, Vater, and Scholz, from all the best MSS. and the Ed. Prince.

— ἀστραπτούσαις.] Not meaning, as some explain, 'streaming out light.' The term merely denotes the shining of pure whiteness, and may be rendered, 'dazzling white.' So Luke ix. 29, ὁ ἡματισμὸς αὐτοῦ λευκὸς ἔαστραπτων. Also Mark ix. 3, ἡμάτια στιλβόντα. White garments are, indeed, appropriate to angelic messengers, see John xx. 12. Acts i. 10; and hence the expression is employed of the angel of God, Rev. iii. 4, 5. See Note on John xx. 12.

5. κλινουσῶν τὸ πρόσωπον.] With a mixed feeling of reverence and terror, which forbade them to look up; agreeably also to the opinion (founded on Exod. iii. 6. xix. 27. Judges xiii. 20, et al.) which regarded it as highly dangerous to look at any heavenly appearance. That the heathens also partook of this feeling is clear from the passages cited from Wetstein, especially Apoll. Rhod. iv. 1315, αὐτὰρ ὅγ' εἰς ἑτέρωσι παλμπόταν ὄμματ' ἐνεκτε, Δαίμονας αἰδέσθαις.

5. τί ζητεῖτε, &c.] This, as appears from the citations in Wetstein, was a popular adage among the Jews to denote that any one is employing himself to no purpose.

6. See Matt. xvi. 21. xvii. 23.

10. αἱ λοιπαὶ] 'the other women;' meaning that company of women who, along with the two Marias and Joanna, are mentioned so frequently in this history; see supra viii. 3.

11. ἐφάνησαν—ῥήματα αὐτῶν.] Similarly it is said, Lucian Tim. 1 (cited by Wetstein), ἅπαντα ταῦτα λῆρος ἦδη ἀναπέφνην.

—ἠπίστουν αὐταῖς.] Not that they believed them to have fabricated the account, but as regarding them in the light of foolish women; since, as it is truly observed by the great philosophic historian (L. vi. 33), οἱ τὰ μὴ πιστὰ δοκοῦντα εἶναι ἀπαγγέλλοντες, οὐ μόνον οὐ πείθουσιν, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀφρονεῖς δοκοῦσιν εἶναι.

12. With this verse comp. John xx. 8. 12.

—παρακύψας.] Παρακύπτειν properly signifies to stoop to any thing, and especially to stoop in order to look down or into any thing. This last is the sense in the present passage, of which I have met with an example in Theocr. Id. iii. 7, τοῦτο κατ' ἄντρον παρακύπτουσα.

—μόνα] scil. τοῦ σώματος, 'without the body of Jesus.'

—ἀπῆλθε, πρὸς ε. θ.] The sense here will depend upon the construction. Πρὸς ἑαυτὸν may be construed either with the preceding, ἀπῆλθε, or the following, σαυμάζων. Several ancient and some modern Commentators adopt the former mode, adducing in its support certain passages from the Classical writers and from the New Test. But of the latter only one is to the purpose, John xx. 10, ἀπῆλθον οὖν πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς οἱ μαθηταί; and, at all events, this will only show that such may be the sense, if the context shall permit it. Yet this it scarcely does; for as to the sense which they assign, 'he went home to his inn or lodging,' it is truly observed by Campbell, that 'it seems more probable from infra v. 24, and John xx. that Peter did not go directly home from the sepulchre, but returned to the place where the Apostles and disciples were assembled.' Hence it is better to construe the words with σαυμάζων as is done by most Expositors, ancient and modern (supported by the authority of all the best ancient Versions and Theophylact); especially as from the occurrence of the similar expression διελογίζοντο πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς at xx. 14, it appears to be very suitable to the style of the Evangelist.

13. δύο ἐξ αὐτῶν.] These words must be referred to verse 9, where we read ἀπέχουσαν ταῦτα πάντα τοῖς ἑνδεκα, καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς λοιποῖς. The two persons here mentioned are, with reason, supposed to have been of the number of the Apostles, or at least Seventy disciples. The name of one of those persons the Evangelist has recorded; that of the other he has omitted to mention, and has thereby exercised the ingenuity of the Commentators in guessing it; some of whom conjecture Nathanael, others Bartholomew or Luke himself.

—Ἐμμαούς.] There were two places of this name; one a town, 160 stadia from Jerusalem and often mentioned in Josephus, the Books of Maccabees, and the Rabbinical writings; the other (the one here meant) a village distant only 70 stadia. These persons probably lived at Emmaus, and were returning thither from the feast of the Passover.

14. ὁμίλουν πρὸς ἀλλήλους.] 'conversed.' This signification of ὁμ. is rare in the Classical writers but not unfrequent in the Hellenistic ones.

16. οἱ δὲ ὀφθαλμοὶ αὐτῶν ἐκρ.] It is not agreed among the Commentators, whether this being prevented proceeded from natural causes, or supernatural ones. The ancients and early moderns take the latter view, and attempt to trace the mode in which this was effected; adducing several passages of the Classical writers, where a similar effect is ascribed to the influence of some Deity, ex. gr. Soph. Aj. 85, ἰγὼ σκοτώσω βλῖψα καὶ δαδουκῶτα. The more recent Commentators ascribe it to natural causes, taking the word metaphorically; and refer the hindrance to the inattention of the observers, or to our Lord's being so situated as not to be distinctly seen, especially with the change of apparel mentioned at Mark xvi. 12. In this view it is considered as an Oriental and popular mode of expression, importing that they were prevented from recognising, i. e. failed to recognise him. But ἐκρᾶντο, when coupled with διηνοίχθησαν just after, seems to be too strong a term to permit us to suppose anything less than Divine agency, on either the body or the mind, or both. Though as there is a marked economy in all the preternatural operations of the Deity, it is not for us to pronounce too far that agency might be exerted, or how far the natural causes might contribute to the effect is a question. Be that as it may, the words ought to be rendered, 'their eyes were held fast that they did not see him,' i. e. recognise him.

17. ἀντιβάλλετε.] The word properly signifies to turn backwards and forwards, as a ball; but is here used of the reciprocation or interchange of remark in conversing or arguing. So 2 Macc. xi. 13, ἐπεὶ ἑαυτὸν ἀντιβάλλον, reasoning with himself. At καὶ ἐστε σκυθρωποὶ, Kuin. and Born. supply τί, why, taken from the preceding τίνες. The subject of their conversation and reasoning was with another was doubtless on the evidence for the Messiahship of Jesus.

18. σὺ μόνος παροικεῖς, &c.] Some difference of opinion exists as to the exact import of these words. The ancient and earlier modern Commentators take the sense to be, 'Art thou the only sojourner, (lit. by-dweller or, as others render, the only resident) in Jerusalem who art present of those things?' The best Expositors, however, from Whitby and Wolf downwards, take παροικεῖς in the sense 'art thou a stranger?'

and regard the words as a form of speech applied to those who are ignorant of what is doing around them, adducing several passages from Classical writers, as Dio Chrys. Or. iii. p. 42, σὺ ἄρα μόνος ἀνέκοις αἱ τούτων, ἃ πάντες ἴσασιν; But I would rather take μόνος for μόνον, and παροικεῖς for πάροικος αἱ; rendering, 'Art thou (though) but a stranger in Jerusalem, ignorant?' &c. The ἐν, not found in most of the ancient MSS. and the early Editions, is cancelled by almost every Editor from Bengel and Wetstein to Scholz; but perhaps without sufficient cause.

19. ἀνὴρ προφήτης.] The ἀνὴρ is not, as some imagine, redundant; nor yet is it, as others suppose, emphatic, and intended as a title of honour; but in it we have merely a vestige of the wordiness of primitive phraseology, by which what are now verbal nouns, were formerly only adjectives, and consequently required ἀνὴρ, or some other noun, to make them serve for substantives.

— δυνατὸς ἐν ἔργῳ καὶ λόγῳ.] Δυνατὸς properly signifies 'having power'; but sometimes, 'having authority or influence'; and here (as also at Acts vii. 22.) both power and skill, or excellence. So Thucyd. i. 139, λίγαι τε καὶ πράττειν δυνατώτατος, and Cebes, Tab. p. 6. ἀνὴρ ἔμφρων, καὶ δεινὸς περὶ σοφίαν λόγῳ τε καὶ ἔργῳ. Here ἔργῳ relates to the miracles, and λόγῳ to the Divine teaching, or doctrine of our Lord.

20. ὅπως τε.] It is well remarked by Bornemann, that ὅπως τε refers to the οὐκ ἔγνως at v. 18.

— παρέδωκαν.] Render, 'has delivered.'

21. σὺν πᾶσι τούτοις.] The σὺν is said to be for ἐπὶ, as often in the Scriptural and Classical writers, like עִם for עַם in Hebrew. The phrase σὺν πᾶσι τ. may, indeed, be compared with our adverb withal, which was once likewise a phrase signifying 'with all this' or these things. In this very sense, indeed, σύμπας occurs in Dionys. Hal. i. 59. Ἀλλὰ γὰρ, just before, is noted by Bornemann as a very rare formula, and to be rendered at nimirum, or at scilicet.

— τρίτην ταύτην ἡμέραν ἄγει σήμερον.] Here there is a certain irregularity in the phraseology, which has perplexed the Commentators. Some suppose a Nomin. (as Θεός or οὐρανός) to be left understood. Others regard ἄγει as put for ἀγεται, taken impersonally; but this is cutting the knot. Others, again, take σήμερον as a Nominative. All these methods are more or less objectionable. More to be recommended is the one pursued by Beza, Kypke, Middleton, and others, who supply αὐτός, supposing here an idiom (frequent in the best writers) whereby, when it is intended to show that a thing has been done on a certain day, that which belongs properly to the day, is ascribed to the person. Thus the sense will be such as is assigned in our common Version. Yet the expression τρίτην ἡμέραν ἄγει contains an allusion to that being the third day since his death, as well as the other circumstances in question. There is, in fact, a blending of two modes of expression; namely, τρίτην ταύτην ἡμέραν ἄγει, 'it is now the third day [since his death],' and τρίτη ἡμέρα ἵστιν ἀφ' οὗ ταῦτα ἐγένετο. The above ellipsis is frequent. So Lucian has: ἐν Βαβυλῶνι κείμεναι ταύτην τὴν ἡμέραν, scil. ἀγων, 'since my death.' Also (taken ap. Wets. τετάρτην ἡμέραν ἄγων (i. e. 'since he was wounded'), ἀνάδυνος ἦν. But ἡμέραν, &c. often occurs without the ἀγων, it being understood, as in the passage of Lucian.

22. ἐξέστησαν) 'have thrown us into amazement.' This active sense is also found in Acts viii. 9, and in the Classical writers. There is an ellipsis of τοῦ νοῦ, or τοῦ φρονεῖν. 'Ὁρθρῃαι is adject. for adverb, as often, especially in adjectives of time, both in Greek and Latin. So Job xxxix. 7. Sept. Ἐξεπορεύετο ὄρθριος. Virg. Æn. viii. 465. 'Æneas ac matutinus agebat.'

25. ἀνόητοι.) Doddridge and Campbell object to the common version 'fools,' and render thoughtless. And indeed that ἀνόητος and similar terms (as μαρὸς and μάταιος) are often, in Greek, and in all languages, used in a milder sense, is certain. If foolish be thought too harsh, we may render 'misjudging.' The word, indeed, denotes either 'one who has not, or who uses not, the faculty of reason;' or, as here, 'who uses it not aright.'

— καὶ βραδεῖς τῇ καρδίᾳ.] Βραδὺς is often opposed to ἀγχίους (ready-witted), to signify 'dull of understanding;' a sense which καρδία generally bears in the Classical writers. Yet as it is here followed by τοῦ πιστεύειν, for εἰς τὸ πιστεύειν (liko James i. 19. βραδὺς εἰς τὸ λαλῆσαι), which points to the affections rather than the understanding, it should rather be explained 'sluggishly disposed, indisposed to believe,' namely, from the force of previous opinions and prejudices.

— ἐπὶ πᾶσιν οἷς ἐλάλησαν] 'all that the prophets have spoken,' namely, on the subject of the Messiah and his sufferings.

26. οὐχὶ ταῦτα ἔδει παθεῖν) 'ought not,' i. e. must not, was it not indispensable to the fulfilment of prophecy and the salvation of man, that Christ should thus suffer, and thereby enter into the glory destined for him? So Heb. ii. 16. ἐκρετι αὐτῷ (i. e. Θεῷ) τὸν ἀρχηγόν τῆς σωτηρίας αὐτῶν διὰ παθημάτων ταλαιώσαι. The reason for the necessity, implied in ἔδει, is the justice of God; which required that honour to his violated laws should be united with pardon to guilty, however penitent, man.

27. ἀρξάμενος.) This is not (as some consider it) redundant, merely to signify 'commencing his discourse;' but is very significant, denoting that the action in question is done completely. We need we stumble at its being said that Christ began from all the prophets; for it should seem that we have here merely an extremely brief mode of expression, and a sort of Synchysis, or confusion of the order in which the words would naturally run; q. d. 'and commencing from the books of Moses, and proceeding through all the prophets, he explained to them the things therein, and in all the other Scriptures, concerning the Messiah;' meaning himself. For it should seem that, after showing them what the Scriptures foretold respecting the Messiah, he left them to determine how far they applied to himself.

The expression τὰ περὶ ἑαυτοῦ includes not only prophecies, but types and symbols; as in the case of the brazen serpent. The passage, we may suppose, peculiarly dwelt upon would be Gen. iii. 15. xlix. 10. Deut. xviii. 15. Num. xii. 8, 9. Is. ix. 6, 7. liii. Dan. ix. 25—27. Pa. xli. xxii. cx. Mal. iv. 2—6. Though doubtless is opened out to them the true character, as not temporal but spiritual, of the Messiah; rectifying their erroneous notions on that subject, and thus disposing them to embrace the evidence for his being the long-expected Messiah.

28. προσεκοιμήτο παρῶν τῶν.) Προσεκοιμήσθαι signifies properly 'to take to oneself, make one's own;' and, in a metaphorical sense, to make ἐπὶ τῷ; a sense occurring both in the Scriptural (as 1 Sam. xxi. 13. 2 Sam. xiii. 5.) and the classical writers. See Note on Mark vi. 48. Lathymius well explains it ἐξημαρτίζετο, 'he made a motion as though.' This by no means involves any thing like dissimulation; for our Lord would really have gone on, had he not been restrained by their friendly importunity, which, indeed, is all that παρεβιάσαντο, scil. μνῆναι, imports. See Note on Matt. xiv. 22, and Mark iv. 23. The Evangelist had, I imagine, in mind what is said respecting the angels and Lot, Gen. x. 2, 3. καὶ κατεβιάσαντο, where the Alexandrian MS. has παρεβιάζετο, probably the reading in St. Luke's copy.

29. πρὸς ἐσπέραν.] Πρὸς with nouns of time denotes the proximity of it (like our towards). Thucyd. iv. 135. πρὸς ἑσπ. ἤδη.

30. κλάσας.] This was contrary to the custom of guests, that office belonging to the host; except when the host, out of respect, chose to resign to the guest. (Grotius and Pric.)

32. διηνοίχθησαν οἱ ὀφθαλμοί.] On the hinges before adverted to, v. 16, being removed, [on a nearer approach, they recognised Christ. — ἄφαντος ἐγένετο δ. α.] Some difference of opinion exists as to the exact sense of these words. The best Expositors are now agreed that we are not to suppose our Lord to have vanished as spectre might be imagined to do. From the usage of ancient writers adduced by Abresch [Wetstein, there is no doubt that the sense is, 'he suddenly or abruptly withdrew from the society.' In the passages adduced there, and my Note on Thucyd. viii. 38. ἀποσπένδειν—ἐκτρέφει, all that is implied by this use of word is a notion of suddenness or abruptness in the action of the verb.

32. καρδία ἡμῶν καιομένη ἦν, &c.] Καίεσθαι has a use of the more lively emotions, especially joy. See Pa. xxix. 4. The feeling here experienced was doubtless a compound one, made up partly of respectful affection towards one who had so ably expounded the oracles of the Prophets; of desire to longer enjoy his society and instruction; of joy,—since they anxiously longed that what he had taught them of the resurrection of the Messiah might prove true; and they rejoiced in the anticipation of that truth.

34. λέγοντας· ὅτι ἡγέρθη—Σίμωνι] 'who told them that the Lord had risen indeed, and had appeared to Simon.' The indirecta oratio is far more suitable to these, and especially the following words.

This appearance to Peter, not mentioned in the other Gospels, is alluded to in 1 Cor. xv. 5.

36. ἔστη ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν.] Namely, when the Apostles had assembled together, with closed doors, for fear of the Jews. It is plain from the context that our Lord appeared suddenly and unexpectedly.

— εἰρήνη ὑμῖν.] This form of salutation was, indeed, in common use; but in the present case it was peculiarly suitable, as addressed to them in their present state of alarm, and coming from Him who had, before his death, said, 'My peace I leave with you.' See John xiv. 27.

37. πτοηθέντες καὶ ἔμφοβοι, &c.] This extreme fear doubtless arose from the suddenness of the appearance. So Quintil., cited by Wetstein: 'Inopinata subito amici mei species effulsit: obstupui, totumque corpus perfudit frigidus pavor.'

38. διαλογισμοὶ ἀναβαίνουνσι.] This figurative use of ἀναβαίνειν occurs with eis or ἐπὶ τὴν καρδίαν at Acts vii. 23. 1 Cor. ii. 9, and also in the Sept. at Is. lxxv. 17. Jer. iii. 16, and elsewhere; answering to the Heb. בְּלִבְךָ תָּחָה. So also surgere in Latin; ex. gr. Virg. Æn. i. 582. 'nate Dea, quæ nunc animo sententia surgit!' 'En ταῖς καρδίαις is for eis τὰς καρδίας. The expression διαλογ. has reference to συζητεῖν at v. 15.

μου καὶ τοὺς πόδας μου, ὅτι αὐτὸς ἐγὼ εἰμι· ψηλαφήσατέ με καὶ ἴδετε· ὅτι πνεῦμα σάρκα καὶ ὀστέα οὐκ ἔχει, καθὼς ἐμὲ θεωρεῖτε ἔχοντα. Καὶ αὐτοὶ προσκυνήσαντες αὐτὸν, ὑπέστρεψαν 52 εἰς Ἰερουσαλὴμ μετὰ χαρᾶς μεγάλης· καὶ ἦσαν διαπαντός ἐν 53 τῷ ἱερῷ, αἰνοῦντες καὶ εὐλογοῦντες τὸν Θεόν. ἀμήν.

39. πνεῦμα σάρκα καὶ ὀστέα οὐκ ἔχει.] From the citations adduced by Wetstein and others, it is plain that both the Jews and the Gentiles alike believed in the immateriality of departed spirits. See Hom. Od. λ. 217. and Virg. Æn. vi. 700. And so Max. Tyr. Diss. xv. 1. οὐ γὰρ σάρκες αἱ δαιμόνων φύσεις, οὐδὲ ὅσα οὐδὲ αἷμα, agreeably to Ovid, Met. iv. 443. 'errant exsangues, sine corpore et ossibus umbræ.' It is, however, the opinion of the recent Commentators in general, that our Lord is not to be understood as confirming those notions, but as meaning to show his hearers that, according to their own ideas with respect to the nature of spirits, he could not be one. Yet the opinion in question may, with reason, be considered as strongly countenanced by these words of our Lord. See Bp. Pearson on the Creed, p. 452.

41. ἀπιστοῦντων αὐτῶν ἀπὸ τῆς χ.] This is sometimes the case on the occurrence of events very felicitous, which happen suddenly and unexpectedly. We think the news too good to be believed, and fancy we are dreaming. So Ovid: 'Tarda solet magnis rebus incense fides.'

42. ἀπὸ μελισσίου κηρίου.] A frequent food with the ancients, especially among the abstemious. So Porphyry. Vit. Pyth. 34. says of Pythagoras: τῆς δὲ διαίτης τὸ μὲν ἀριστον ἦν κηρίον, ἡ μάλιστα δ' ἀρσενικὸν ἐκ κεγχρήλου.

44. οὗτοι οἱ λόγοι (scil. αἱσι) οὓς ἐλ. &c.]

Meaning: 'The words spoken by me, when I was with you, imported that all things written of me (that I should die, &c.) should be fulfilled. The Psalms stand for the Hagiographia, as being the chief book of that division.

45. διηνοιξεν α. τὸν ν.] This is quite distinct from the explanation of the Scriptures supra v. 27. and imports an enlightening of the mind by assisting the natural powers; and it may also include inclining and disposing the mind to attain to the knowledge in question.

47. καὶ κηρυχθῆναι, &c.] Supply dei from ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι. — ἀρχάμενον ἀπὸ Ἰ.] That the commandment should be made from Jerusalem, was a prerogative of the Holy City.

48. τούτων.] Namely, of the events of his life, death, and especially resurrection of Christ as an unequivocal proof of his Divine mission.

49. ἐπαγγελίαν] i. e. the thing promised, namely, the gift of the Holy Ghost.

— ἐνδύσῃ.] 'Ἐνδύσθαι answers to the Heb. וּלְבָשׁ and the Latin induere; but, like ἐν when taken in conjunction with δύναμιν, denotes that supernatural energy from on high so indispensable to qualify them for their important mission.

52. προσκυνήσαντες αὐτόν.] The term προσκύνησις must denote no less than the prostration of the genua, now first rendered to Christ the Apostles, even though absent and invisible, decisive proof of their opinion of his divinity.

Of all the Gospels, this may be considered the most important, both as regards the subjects treated of and the doctrines thence to be deduced. No other have we the real person of the Redeemer so fully exhibited. Inasmuch that it was the reason called by the Fathers the Spiritual sense, the Pectus Christi. While the other Evangelists chiefly occupy themselves in narrating the events which marked our Lord's earthly life, St. John applies himself, almost exclusively, to record the discourses of Christ, and never, either of words or deeds, was calculated to show forth his majesty and glory, his Divinity, the nature of the office committed to him by the Father, and the efficacy of his death as an atonement for the sins of the world. The other Evangelists have, indeed, inculcated this fundamental doctrine, but only occasionally and incidentally; St. John professedly and systematically. Next, the purpose of St. John in writing this Gospel differed materially from that of the other Evangelists. It was not to write a history of the life of Christ, but to select some of the most remarkable parts of his personal history, in order to introduce some of the most important discourses, in which he spoke of himself, person, and his office; intending thereby to manifest his Divine nature, to show the efficacy of his office, and to vindicate the truth of the Jews and Judaizing Christians of those times, and sceptical persons of every age,—who, free from the influence of error or deep-rooted prejudice, should entertain notions derogatory to the honour of the Saviour. This the Evangelist does; not by resorting to subtilty of argument, by stating the evidence of facts, and urging the authority of our Lord himself. As, then, St. John did not intend to write the life of Christ, he does not, not with his birth by the Virgin Mary, but carries us back beyond even the creation of the universe, and teaches that our Saviour lived before that period. He commences with the beginning (forming, indeed, the sum and substance of the whole Gospel), which has been termed the Golden Proem, and which again tells us a Platonic Philosopher said it to be written in letters of gold, and hung

up in all churches,—wherein we have inculcated the following weighty truths:—that the promised Messiah existed before the beginning of the world with God, and was God; that he was Creator of the universe, but was made man, and lived among men, and by words and works manifested himself to be the Son of God, the Saviour of mankind. After adverting to the strong testimony of John the Baptist, and recording the commencing miracles wrought in Cana of Galilee and the Temple of Jerusalem, it seems to have been the intent of the Evangelist to furnish his readers with some specimens of the Discourses of Christ, in order thence to establish and illustrate the positions laid down in the Preface. For in each year of Christ's ministry he has narrated certain actions and miracles, and recorded certain discourses in which our Saviour spoke of his person and office. These actions he seems to have related solely with a view to the discourses which gave rise to them. As to the miracles, it was not his intention to accumulate as many instances as possible of the miraculous powers exerted by Christ; but only to select such as were best adapted to the purpose of his Gospel. The later discourses of our Lord, and the history of his passion, death, and resurrection, St. John has more fully detailed, both that Christians might be assured of the reality of his death (to which so great an efficacy was attached), and that they might be convinced of his resurrection, and the glory into which he was afterwards received. It is, too, from this Gospel especially that we collect the actual state of the controversy of the Christians with the Jews.

To advert to the personal history of the Evangelist himself, suffice it to say that, as being the son of a respectable master fisherman, he must have had a tolerable education; and, although without pretensions to learning properly so called, could not be termed illiterate. He and his brother James had probably received a careful religious education, had been well grounded in the Scriptures; if not in the original, yet in the Syro-Chaldee Version, or Paraphrase, and in the Septuagint, and were probably not wholly unversed in the Rabbinical learning of the day. From the time that they received their immediate call from

Christ, they became first his disciples, then his constant attendants, and lastly, were appointed, with others, as Apostles. With respect to the character and disposition of the Evangelist, we have every reason to think that it was at once frank and amiable, uniting suavity with firmness. Hence he became the object of our Lord's peculiar regard and confidence; which he repaid by the most sincere attachment to his Master.

The genuineness of the present Gospel is unquestionable; not only as being attested by the strongest internal evidence (namely, in its style and peculiar character, the circumstantiality of its details, and the evident marks of the writer's having been an eye-witness of much that he relates), but from the strongest external evidence, in an unbroken chain of testimonies from writers in the Apostolical age down to that of Epiph., Chrys., and Jerome. It was, indeed, never disputed, until lately by Bretschneider; whose doubts, however, have been, as he confesses, entirely removed by the very able writers who came forward to maintain the authenticity of the Gospel. On the genuineness of a particular part of it, namely, the narrative of the woman taken in adultery, ch. viii. 1—11, and also of ch. xxi., see the Notes in locis.

To advert to the character of this Gospel, the Evangelist has a style and manner peculiar to himself, uniting plainness of diction with sublimity of character; not such as results from art, but is engendered by magnitude of conception, united with a natural simplicity of expression; and which, coming from the heart, speaks to the heart. Among the peculiarities in his style, the following (as noticed by Kuinoel) are the most remarkable:—1. We have in this writer a frequent use of abstracts for concretes, as φῶς, ζωή, ὁδός, ἀνάστασις, &c. 2. We have the same sentiment expressed affirmatively and negatively. See i. 3, 20. iii. 15. v. 24. viii. 18. x. 28, &c. 3. We have frequently a repetition of the same words and formulas; ex. gr. μαρτυρεῖν and μαρτυρία, v. 31—34; λαμβάνω, v. 41—44; ἀρτος, vi. 26, 31—35, 48—58; δοξάζειν, xiii. 31, 32; xvii. 1, 3, 4, 10, 22; εἶναι and μῖναι ἐν τινι, xiv. 10, 11, 20. xv. 4—11. 4. We not unfrequently find words and expressions used in a different sense in the same verse. See i. 33. We have also a frequent challage of the tenses. See viii. 58. Many words, too, are used in a peculiar acceptance, ex. gr. ἀμαρτία, to denote lying, as opposed to ἀλήθεια, viii. 46; ἀμαρτωλός, a liar or impostor, ix. 16, 24, 25, 31, 34; ἐλκεῖν, to draw or lead, vi. 44. xii. 32; τὰ ἴδια, house or domicile, i. 11. xvi. 32. xix. 27; κατοικία, for παράβολη, x. 6. xvi. 25, 29. Among words peculiar to this writer are ἀποσυνάγωγος, ix. 22. xii. 42. xvi. 2; ἀρχιτεκτονός, ii. 8, 9; γενετή, ix. 1; γλωσσόκομος, xii. 6; ἐκκεντῶ, xix. 37; ἐμφυσάω, xx. 22; κερματιστής, xi. 14; κηπουρός, xx. 15; λίγνιστος, xiii. 4, 5; Μασίας, i. 42. iv. 25; παρακλητός, xiv. 16, 26. xvi. 7; προβατική, v. 2; προσφάγιος, xxi. 5; συμβατήτης, xi. 16; τετραμήνην, iv. 38; φραγγέλλω, ii. 15; ψωμίον, xiii. 26, 27, 30. Add to this that the use here of καί at the beginning of a sentence is very peculiar, as standing in the place of several of the Conjunctions.

This Gospel is, however, by no means without its difficulties, which may be accounted for in various ways. 1. From the abstruseness of the subjects treated on; for, as it is well remarked by Campbell, 'it does not appear to have been our Saviour's intention to express himself in such a manner as to be equally intelligible to all. His own disciples he brought by little and little to the full knowledge of his doctrine.' 2. These difficulties may be attributed to the obscure and manner of the writer; and 3, to the strongly Hebraic character of the style; and that not only in the acceptance of words (some of which are peculiar to himself), but in the structure of sentences, and especially in the use of the Tenses; where Enallage of Past, Present, and Future is not unfrequent. Hence, after all the labour which has been so profusely bestowed upon it by learned and pious Expositors, yet there is not any book of the New Test. of which the interpretation has been so uncertain and undetermined.

But to consider some circumstances connected with this Gospel, namely, as to the place when and time when it was written, the unanimous voice of antiquity testifies that the place was Ephesus. And to this all the moderns readily assent. On the time, however, considerable difference of opinion exists. It has been the general sentiment, both of ancient and modern inquirers, that it was published about the close of the first century. While some of those who are best able to judge of such matters (as Lampe, Lardner, Owen, Tittman, and Kuinoel), suppose it to have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem, though they differ as to the exact date. The former opinion, indeed, is alleged to be most agreeable to ancient authority. Yet the testimonies adduced are almost entirely from writers (such as Epiphanius, Theodoret, and Jerome) of a period too far remote from the Apostolic age to have much weight. In fact, the only ancient authority alleged is Irenæus ap. Euseb. Eccl. Hist. v. 8. (where, however, it is merely said that John wrote after the other Evangelists) and another passage cited from him by Lardner, vi. 187, from which it has been inferred, but very precariously, that this Gospel was written long after the destruction of Jerusalem. The evidence, however, is not such as to establish the point in question. And the opinion itself seems to have originated in the notion (prevalent both in ancient and modern times) that this Gospel was written for the especial purpose of confuting the heresies of Cerinthus and the Gnostics as to the person of Christ, and partly the notions of the Sabæans and Johannites. Now if we inquire what evidence can be alleged for that opinion, several expressions in the Proeme are pointed out, and a few others occurring up and down in the Gospel. Yet this cannot, without the aid of strong imagination, be thought to give any great countenance to it; and Expositors best acquainted with the contents of this Gospel (as Calvin, Lampe, Tittman, Kuinoel, and Tholuck) are decidedly of opinion the notion is unfounded, and that the design

this Gospel was of a general nature to convey to the Christian world the real nature, character, and great Teacher who came to instruct mankind. As he himself says, things are written, that ye may know that the Christ, the Son of God; and, ye may have life in his name. If, as the opinion prevailed, that it was a polemical one, and written to men were obliged to suppose as the life of the Evangelist would be the publication of the Gospel; since questions were not prevalent before the first century. Another opinion almost universal, wrote to supply the deficiencies and be former Evangelists,—for this undation, at least in the Gospel, it is attempted to unite this late date, the inconsistency is for if the date were what those and if St. John wrote to supply deficiencies in the former Gospels, why things unaccountably omitted? as, he remarkable fulfilment of our desires respecting the destruction of which would have tended in the to confirm whatever the Evangelist re. Moreover, if St. John meant, supply the omissions and confirm of the preceding Evangelists, is it would have suffered 30 or 40 years at doing either one or the other? who contend for a late date, ground not only on external testimony, evidence, namely, in the contents of the Evangelist, they allege, con- whom he is addressing as little ac- the Jewish customs and names; various explanations, even more St. Mark and St. Luke. The, they think, was, that, at the time, wrote, many more Gentiles had; and thus it became necessary to circumstances, which required no the Jewish Polity was in ex- arguments, however, are rather solid. For the very same reasons, same degree, might exist 28 or 29 Upon the whole, it should seem a conclusive evidence adduced for a question. On the other hand, are pressed too far in favour of the destruction of Jerusalem. How- ants, though not all of equal weight, hole, overbalance those on the con- advert to a few of both.—Lampe, there appeal to ch. v. 2, 'there is y the sheep-market, a pool,' &c. as his Gospel must have been written struction of Jerusalem; since it city as in being when the words This others attempt to set aside, that writers 'do not weigh their ly;' and that 'the Present there the Past tense.' But the former some; and as to the latter, such a confusion of tenses cannot be admitted in para- ration. And when it is suggested that Jerusalem might, during a period of 26 or 27 years, have risen from its ruins—yet of that there is no sort of historical evidence; while to its utter and total destruction Josephus bears testimony in his Bell. vii. 1, where he says that the whole city was so completely destroyed and dug up, ὥστε μηδὲ πάποι' οἰκισθῆναι πιστὸν εἶναι παρασχῆν τοῖς προσελθούσι. And if, in the course of those years, a few houses might have been erected, yet surely not so as to be called a city, and have its streets designated by names. Nor are there wanting, in addition to the above, strong internal arguments adduced by the Commentators, who maintain the publication before the destruction of Jerusalem. These are, however, closely connected with the question as to the main purpose of the Evangelist; which, if it was, as it should seem, general, evidently points to a date far earlier than the close of the first century. With respect to the above two points, the date and the design of the Gospel, it appears most probable that it was published not very long after St. John had gone to reside at Ephesus, and only a short period before the destruction of Jerusalem, say A. D. 69, probably 4 or 5 years after. John had left Judæa when the troubles were beginning, which ended in the destruction of the Jewish state. Had, indeed, St. John written so late as the close of the first century, he would surely have done more towards repressing the heresies of the Gnostics, Cerinthians, Nicolaitans, and others, than barely employ a few expressions intended to repress their dogmas; since in the Apocalypse he has censured them pointedly, openly, and by name. If, how- ever, the expressions in question should appear to be such as to imply a settled purpose in the writer, we may suppose that, together with the above-mentioned general design, there was united a particular one,—namely, to encounter those heretical notions, which probably were even then starting up like weeds in the rising corn. In this view I find I am supported by the opinion of Dr. Pye Smith (Scrip. Test., vol. iii. 73, sq. & 121.), who, while he 'dares not affirm that St. John wrote with an expressly polemical purpose, to refute the notions of the Gnostics or others, yet thinks that he might write to correct those errors, or perhaps to anticipate them, and prevent their dissemination.' This latter view (namely, as regards anticipation, and thereby prevention, by nipping in the bud) is, I apprehend, the most just and exact that can well be imagined. That the design of the Evangelist was of a mixed nature is also confirmed by a long and instructive passage adduced, with translation, by Dr. Pye Smith from Bertholdt, in which the learned writer observes, that, 'admitting St. John's general design to be the same as that of the three other Evangelists, yet he had special objects in view, i. e. together with certain principal objects, collateral ones; and accordingly that the design of this Gospel was of a mixed kind, partly his- torical and partly controversial.' Although, then, it cannot be proved that St. John wrote for the purpose of supplying the omissions of his prede- cessors, yet, as he has, in some measure, done so,

by the insertion of certain particulars not required by his principal design, we may say that his Gospel was intended to be, in some degree, supplementary to, and consequently confirmatory of, those of the other Evangelists.

I. 1, & seqq. On this noble Proeme, see an erudite Dissertation of C. Vitringa, t. ii. p. 122—156, or the substance of it, as found in Townsend's Chron. Arr.; also Dr. Pye Smith's Scrip. Test., vol. iii. 68, seqq.

—ἐν ἀρχῇ ἦν ὁ Λόγος.] One cannot but notice the wonderful majesty and dignity contained in this brief but comprehensive introductory clause, probably formed on the simple but noble commencement of Genesis, ἐν ἀρχῇ ἐποίησεν ὁ Θεὸς τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ τὴν γῆν.

At ἐν ἀρχῇ understand τοῦ κόσμου. The expression answers to the Heb. מֵאֲרֵכָה in Gen. i. 1, and denotes 'the origin of all things.' That ἀρχῇ must have this sense, and not that contended for by the Unitarians, 'the beginning of the Gospel dispensation,' is ably evinced by Dr. Pye Smith, ubi supra. On account of the ἦν, many Commentators, indeed, explain the phrase to mean 'before the creation of the world;' referring, in support of this sense of ἐν ἀρχῇ, to John xvii. 5. Eph. i. 4. and Prov. viii. 23; in which last passage the meaning is more exactly defined by the preceding πρὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος and the following πρὸ τοῦ τῇ γῇ ποιῆσαι. But neither in the passage of Proverbs, nor in the one before us, has ἐν ἀρχῇ properly that sense; nor can it ever have it. It is only implied from the context. For what was existing at the creation of the world must have existed before it.

—ὁ Λόγος.] On this most important subject (to which the limits of a work of this nature must be quite inadequate) the reader is referred to Tittman, p. 27—29, Kuin. Proleg. § 7. 13—90, Dr. Burton's Bampton Lectures, p. 212—24, and Dr. Pye Smith's Scrip. Test., vol. iii. p. 70. Whatever may be the source from whence St. John derived this term, all the most competent judges are agreed that it designates a real subsisting Being, and not an attribute, as Wisdom or Reason. Indeed, the personality of the Logos is manifest from the whole portion.

—πρὸς τὸν Θεόν.] The phrase εἶναι πρὸς τὸν Θεόν denotes close union, and in the present context, compared with infra xvii. 5. and I John i. 1. (where see Note) cannot be thought to mean less than communion of the Divine nature, and participation of the Divine glory and majesty, implying also a community of actions and counsels; or, as Dr. Smith expresses it, that 'the Word existed in the eternal period before all creation, naturally and essentially one Being with the Deity, yet possessing some species of relative distinction.'

This assertion is repeated in the next verse, in order to more fully explain what is meant by this communion with God, and to show how the Son used and evinced his majesty, and the Divine power which he had with the Father.

—καὶ Θεὸς ἦν ὁ Λόγος.] The sense is clearly, 'and the Logos was God;' ὁ Λόγος being the subject, and Θεὸς the predicate, as in John iv. 24. πνεῦμα ὁ Θεός, and iv. 8. ὁ Θεὸς ἀγάπη ἐστίν.

For, according to the idiom of the language, it is the noun preceding the Article the subject; the other is the attribute ἀρετὴ πλουτὸς ἐστίν. The temerity who, to destroy this irrefragable testimony Godhead of Jesus Christ, proposed to to Θεοῦ, met with well-merited chastity Bengel and Wetstein. Some, after his attempted to compass the same end, being, that as Θεός has not the Article, taken in a lower sense, to denote αὐτὸν that position has been completely over Bengel, Campbell, Middl., Kuinoel, &c.

3. πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ, &c.] By πάντα stand all things in the world—the universe, 'were brought into existence;' ζῆτο. See Ps. cxlviii. 5. Many take noting the instrumental cause, as in But there is no reason to abandon the almost all the ancient, and the most modern Interpreters, that it denotes a principal cause, as in Rom. xi. 36 9. Gal. i. 1, and often elsewhere. passage of Hebrews, it is of quite a different nature from this of St. John; since in only one agent is spoken of, but in the agents are adverted to. Thus the Logos is described as being 'very God,' and Crea universe; who, on account of his αὐτὸν with the Divine nature, hath an equal the Father, and, by his co-operation Father, created the world.

The next words καὶ χωρὶς—γίνονται explained as yielding an identity with the foregoing clause; the αὐτὸν being expressed both by affirmation and negation, as very often in this Gospel. However, it should seem, we have not merely thing expressed, but a much stronger sense. Even the dialect οὐδὲ ἓν has an intense See Bp. Bull's Jud. Eccles., p. 15, and

4. Lightfoot observes, that to the plac ation by the Logos is here subjoined a moral one by the same. Strictly speaking, there is here (as Chrysostom and remark) a reason given for what has affirmed.

—ἐν αὐτῷ ζωὴ ἦν, καὶ ὁ ζωὴ ἦν τὸ On the exact meaning here of ζωὴ and difference of opinion exists; and that very extensive signification of these is the several senses in which it is equally our Saviour was life and light. By Expositors think, is here meant another salvation; and by φῶς, teacher and pre of its doctrine, the Gospel. This sense, though agreeable to the usus loquendi, is inapplicable in the present instance.

The general sense here intended is, in the source of both natural and spiritual I consider the two clauses of the sentence, the relation of the first to the sentence is, as Dr. Smith thinks, the cause adequate to the effect. The second this: that He possesses conscious and willence, so as to have the power of bringing beings into existence. The second denotes that was centered in himself, i. e. was (with the Prophets) self-derived, and exerted by a proper and natural, not an adventitious, acquired, or delegated force. Thus he is elsewhere said ζῶν ἔχων ἐν ἑαυτῷ. So we read in Ps. xxxvi. 9. 'with Thee is the fountain of life.' And so at v. 36, the Father is said ἔχειν ἐν ἑαυτῷ ζῶν. In the latter clause (as observes Dr. Smith) 'He who is described as the Author of existence is further on represented (in a designation nearly the same as those by which the Prophets describe the Messiah) as the Author of all that constitutes the good of existence, deliverance from error, sin, and misery, designated by the Scriptural metaphor of darkness.'

ἃ καὶ τὸ φῶς—οὐ κατέλαβον.] Σκοτία is in Scripture a frequent image of ignorance, and sin, and also the misery consequent upon it. See Is. lx. 2. Matth. iv. 16. Acts xxvi. 18, and compare the citations from ancient writers in Keenes, Syn. Here the word is put (abstract for concrete) in the place of οἱ ἐσκοτισμένοι τῇ διανοίᾳ. Eph. v. 18, namely, those immersed in ignorance, idleness, and vice, and consequently far removed from light and virtue, holiness and happiness. Thus the sense is: 'And this salvation was offered a wretched, corrupt, and miserable man; but the act of salvation they did not comprehend, much less accept and embrace it.'

6—8. The scope of these verses is to show that John the Baptist, whom many so magnified, was not the Christ, but one sent by God to bear witness of Him, and to prove, even on the evidence of John himself, the infinite superiority of Jesus to that Prophet; q. d. 'To bear witness of this light, and further its reception, was John sent by God; not as being himself that light, namely, the Messiah,—but to bear witness to the divine mission of Him who was so.'

—ἐγίνετο ἄνθρωπος, &c.] Lit., a man raised up or brought forward, as a messenger from God. —ἀντ' for ὑπ', by an idiom not confined to a Hebrew, but extending to the popular dialect of every language.

7. eis μαρτυρίαν, ἵνα μαρτ.] Here there is not so much a repetition of the same thing in other terms, as rather, in ἵνα μαρτ., &c., an endorsement upon eis μαρτυρίαν τοῦ φωτός. John was not only a Forerunner of the Messiah (so he is described in the three first Gospels), but Witness, such as he is represented in this Gospel. After our Lord's baptism in the river Jordan, John's former character ceased, and the law commenced. And up to his death John did not, on all proper occasions, to bear deed testimony to the exalted character of Jesus. ἑ. καὶ ἑαυτοῦ. This is to be taken emphatically. ἑαυτοῦ, 'he himself.'

8. ἐν τῷ φῶσι τὸ ἀληθινόν.] Render, 'that being (as) was the true light.' In the sense of being there is here implied excellency, as infra vi. xv. 1. and elsewhere. Φωτίζει may be either passed to stand for the Fut. φωτίζει; or may be taken to mean, 'is to enlighten.' By πάντα ἄνθρωπον (which is emphatic) are to be understood men of all nations, and not the Jews only (see Luke ii. 32.), in opposition to the Jewish notion, that the Messiah was come for the salvation of the Jews only.

The next words ἐρχ. εἰς τὸν κόσμον are commonly taken with πάντα ἄνθρωπον. But the best Commentators are generally agreed that they should be construed with τὸ φῶς; since in the former construction the words would seem unnecessary, and never occur in that sense; whereas in the latter the phrase is very weighty, and well suited to the connection. Moreover, ὁ ἐρχόμενος εἰς τὸν κόσμον was an usual phrase to designate the Messiah. See vi. 14. xviii. 37. And so at iii. 19. xii. 46. he is designated as a light coming into the world. Finally, the other sense would require the Article after ἄνθρωπον. Not to say that the sense usually assigned would be scarcely reconcilable with facts. Nor is the interpretation above stated without the support of ancient authority; since so the passage was taken by the very ancient author of the Test. xii. Patr. p. 578. τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου τὸ δοθὲν ἐν ὕμιν πρὸς φωτισμὸν πάντων ἀνθρώπων. With respect to the scope of the declaration, it seems to repeat, somewhat more emphatically, what was said at ver. 4. ἡ ζωὴ ἦν τὸ φῶς τῶν ἀνθρώπων.

10. ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἦν.] These words affirm the appearance and existence of the Logos on earth in a human form,—i. e. that he became incarnate. In this and the following verse there is a kind of climax in the four particulars now presented concerning the True Light; q. d. 'The only and true Saviour came to, and abode in the world,—a world created by him, but which, nevertheless, knew him not, recognised him not as such. Nay, though he came to his own people especially, yet even they received him not as the Saviour.' Some take τὰ ἴδια to mean 'the world at large.' But though it be true that 'the whole earth is the Lord's,' yet Christ could not be said to be rejected by those to whom he did not reveal himself as Saviour; viz. the Gentiles. Indeed he professes (Matt. xv. 24.) that 'he was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.' The best Expositors are therefore, with reason, agreed that τὰ ἴδια, sub. οἰκίματα, can only mean his own country, or people; a sense of which numerous examples are adduced by Krebs, Wetstein, and Kypke. The metaphor (as observes Smith, Scrip. Test.) is that of a sovereign over a state, or the head of a family over his household. The Jews, indeed, might be called Christ's own people, as being the peculiar people of God, and consequently of Christ, as united in the Godhead; and moreover, from his having been born and having lived among them.

12. From the Jews, who rejected Jesus as their Saviour, the Evangelist turns to those, whether Jews or Gentiles, who received him.

ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς ἐξουσίαν τέκνα Θεοῦ γενέσθαι, τοῖς πιστεύουσιν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ. ὁ οὐκ ἐξ αἱμάτων, οὐδὲ ἐκ θελή-ματος σαρκὸς, οὐδὲ ἐκ θελήματος ἀνδρός, ἀλλ' ἐκ Θεοῦ ἐγεννήθησαν. Καὶ ὁ Λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο, καὶ ἐσκήνωσεν

12. ὅσοι δὲ ἔλαβον α.] The reasoning may be completed thus: 'His countrymen, as a body, rejected him. Yet his coming was not utterly without effect. Some few did acknowledge him as the Christ. And to such as did (or hereafter should) he gave the privilege of adoption into the number of God's children;' for ἐξουσία here denotes privilege or prerogative; a signification sometimes occurring in the later Classical writers and the Sept. By τέκνα Θεοῦ are meant obedient and true worshippers of God, and, from the adjunct, those who are acknowledged by God as such, and admitted to the privilege of sonship,—the most supreme blessing a created being can receive, comprehending both the privileges of Christians in the present state, and their felicity in the future; a blessed resurrection and a glorious immortality; in short, to be eternally as happy as infinite goodness, united with infinite wisdom, can make them.

13. οὐ οὐκ—ἐγεννήθησαν.] Meaning, 'who obtained that privilege of sons, not by virtue of ancestry, nor by any affinity or connexion of human descent, but by the free grace of God.' The plural is used by way of adaptation to ἔδωκεν before; though, of course, what is here applied to those who received Jesus as the Christ during his abode on earth, is equally applicable to those who should, at any future period, receive him. The plural αἱμάτων is used to denote all the degrees of consanguinity and lines of descent, and has reference to the several ancestors from whom the children of Israel boasted their descent, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; see 2 Cor. xi. 22, sq. This use of the word in the plural is very rare; but I have noted it in Eurip. Ion, 693, ἄλλων τραφεὶς ἀφ' αἱμάτων, and Lycoph. Cassand. v. 804. 1249. The two phrases ἐκ θελ. σαρκ. and ἐκ θελ. ἀνδρός designate, by Héndiadys, the natural mode of descent, as opposed to the spiritual one proceeding from the adoption of God.

14. καὶ ὁ Λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο.] This is closely connected with ver. 10, ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἦν, and is a resumption of what was there said; q. d. 'And [accordingly] the Logos was clothed with a human body, and sojourned among us [men].' This addition of the human nature to the Divine implies that conjunction by which the same person is both Son of God and Son of Man. Σὰρξ, for σάρκινος. So Artemid. ii. 35, ἐάν τε γὰρ σάρκινος οἱ θεοὶ φαίνονται.

—ἐσκήνωσεν.] Here there is no need to suppose (with Lampe and Schoettgen) any reference to the Schechina; the sole object of the Evangelist being to prove that the Logos became incarnate. The full sense is that laid down by Wetstein: 'He who had dwelt in heaven descended from thence, that he might sojourn with men.' For σκηνῶν signifies to take up one's quarters, or sojourn. And it is here used in preference to ζῆν, with allusion to the life of man as a sojourner; and because it better designates that sumulcrum vivere, which seems here intended;

The next words καὶ θεασάμεθα, &c., may be considered as, in some measure, another proof that the Logos became incarnate; yet they seem meant also to intimate, that though he was really man, yet he was also something far more; namely, Son of God; implying a community of the Divine nature. Ἐθεασάμεθα is a very significant, as even emphatic, term; q. d. We distinctly saw his glory. Now there were many ways in which his disciples saw the glory of Christ; namely, in his miracles (see ii. 11); and not only in acts which evinced power, but wisdom and goodness also; in that unspeakable love to men for which he was content to suffer death, even the death of the cross, for their salvation. The Apostles themselves, too, had some of them seen his glory in his transfiguration on Mount Tabor. Though then and the other evidences of Christ's glory in his mediatorial capacity, John did not intend to specify, being content with affirming it to have been δόξαν ὡς μονογενοῦς παρὰ Πατρός, 'such a glory as might be expected in a Being the only begotten Son of the Father;' who accordingly is (as it is said, Heb. i. 3.) the ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης, καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ. The ὡς (as Chrysostom and Tittman remark, expresses not similitude, but identity and truth; meaning 'truly such.' On the full sense of μονογενὴς, see Lampe and Tittman, and Dr. Smith. The use here of the verbal for the verb, μονογενὴς for μόνος γεννηθείς, will account for the use of the Genitive with παρὰ instead of the simple Genitive. Besides, as it is truly observed by Bp. Bull, Judic. Eccl. p. 56, μονογενὴς παρὰ seems more significant (expressing the Divine generation of the Son from the Father) than the simple genitive.

With respect to the construction of the passage, many, as Kuinoel, in order to avoid a slight irregularity, would make the words καὶ θεασάμεθα—Πατρός parenthetical, referring πλάσσειν ἐσκήνωσεν. A procedure which does violence to the whole sentence, in which the words thus attempted to be separated from the rest, are any thing but parenthetical. And as to the method of Lampe and Smith, who would construe πλάσσειν χάριτος καὶ ἀλ. with ἐσκήνωσεν, and consider them as the second clause of the sentence; this supposes a harsh transposition, and such as it were difficult to account for, since no reason can be imagined why the natural position should have been thus changed; not to mention that both the above methods tend to weaken the sense. We may, I think, best regard the words πλάσσειν χάριτος καὶ ἀληθείας as continuative of the foregoing idea, and intended to carry on the feeling of devout admiration inherent in δόξαν ὡς μονογενοῦς παρὰ Πατρός. And we have only to suppose, with some eminent Expositors, an ellipsis of πλάσσειν for πλάσσειν, a figure frequent in the writer; and which may have been here resorted to in order to prevent the words being by mistake added to (what it might otherwise have seemed added for) Πατρός just before. This view is strongly confirmed by an imitation of the passage which I have noted in Theophylact Simoc. p. 115, ἡ ἰθιασάμεθα τὴν δόξαν αὐτῆς πλήρη χάριτος.

Χάριτος καὶ ἀληθείας is put, per Hendiadyn, χάριτος ἀληθείης; and the expressions are, as Dr. Smith observes, 'peculiarly strong, denoting the largeness of possession, and the profusion or infinite liberality of communication,' as in similar passage of St. Paul, Eph. iii. 8. 18, 1.

15. Having appealed, in a general way, to the testimony borne by the Baptist to Jesus, the evangelist now proceeds to mention what that testimony was; and by κέκραγε he intimates that he uttered it openly, ex animo, and decisively. — ὁ ὀπίσω μου ἐρχόμενος.] Meaning, 'He who enters (i. e. is to enter) upon this office after me, of whom I am the forerunner;' in which the ἐρχόμενος frequently occurs in the New Test. and sometimes in the Sept. The interpretation of ἐμπροσθέν μου γίγ. is uncertain; since the words may be understood either of time or of place. According to the former view the clause πρῶτός μου ἦν must be considered as expressing the same sense as the preceding; and thus the meaning will be, that 'though he came after him both birth and entrance into office, yet that he had existed long before him.' According to the latter, the meaning will be, 'This is He of whom I said, He who cometh into the world [or entereth into his office] after me, is become of greater dignity than myself,—inasmuch as [by his own Divine nature] he was [always] before me; i. e. more venerable than I.' An interpretation which may perhaps be thought to deserve the preference, yielding a sense equally suitable to the context, and more worthy of the illustrious speaker than is either.

16—18. It has been disputed whether these verses are from the Baptist or from the Evangelist. The former opinion has been adopted by many interpreters, though (as Tittman observes) it lies open to the objection, that what is contained in these verses could hardly have been said by John the Baptist of himself, his own times, and that of his disciples. They are, doubtless, the words of the Evangelist; who, in using the πλῆρωμα (answering to the Heb. מלך, which denotes the sum of any thing, and also plenty) seems to have had reference to the expression πλήρης χάριτος καὶ ἀληθείας at ver. 14 (for this verse is a continuation of what was said at ver. 14, ver. 11 being in some measure parenthetical), and meant by it to express the idea of abundance. Thus ἐκ τοῦ πληρ. αὐ. means, 'from his rich store-house of benefits and blessings.' Of the controverted phrase, χάριν ἀντὶ χάριτος, the only two interpretations deserving of notice are the following. 1. That of those who regard it as a periphrasis of the superlative, like the Hebr. מן הַרְבֵּה; an idiom not unknown in the Greek (classical writers. Thus Theogn. Admon. 344. εὐίης ἀντ' ἀνίων ἀνίας. The sense will thus be, 'grace upon grace,' or 'benefits upon benefits,' abundance of benefits. 2. That of those who suppose the fulness here mentioned to be no other than the grace and truth of which the Logos was just said to be full. Thus the καὶ will be merely explicative; and αὐτοῦ, which occurs after πληρώματος, will have to be repeated after χάριτος; the sense being, 'we have received grace answering or correspondent to that which is in Christ Jesus.' This sense, however, cannot be elicited without considerable harshness. And therefore the other interpretation (especially as it presents a sense more worthy of the Evangelist) is entitled to the preference. Render, 'Yea, of this fulness (i. e. his exuberant abundance) have we all received [grace], even grace upon grace, blessings superlatively great.' So Plato i. 334, cited by Wetstein, says the Deity, after giving τὰς πρώτας χάριτας, εἰσαυθὺς ἐτίρας ἀντὶ ἐκείνων, καὶ τρίτας ἀντὶ τῶν δευτέρων, καὶ ἄλ νῆας ἀντὶ παλαιωτέρων ἐπιδοῦσι.

17. ὅτι ὁ νόμος—ἰγίνετο. In these words are exemplified and illustrated the benefits received from Christ by his disciples; and the grace of the Gospel is opposed to the rigour of the Law. The Law was given as a benefit to the Israelites; yet it was harsh and burdensome, its blessings scanty, and those confined to one nation; whereas the Gospel imparts its blessings, through Christ, plentifully to the whole human race. (Kuinoel.) Ἡ χάρις καὶ ἡ ἀλ. denotes, per hendiadyn, ἡ χάρις ἀληθινή, 'the true and most excellent grace;' namely, a religion full of grace. This χάρις Christians receive from the πλῆρωμα of Christ, since to him (as it is said at iii. 34) οὐκ ἐκ μέτρου δίδωσιν ὁ Θεὸς τὸ Πνεῦμα.

18. Here we have a confirmation and illustration of the foregoing sentiment as to the superiority of the Gospel over the Law, and that deduced from the clear knowledge of God communicated by Christ. 'Lest, however (says Dr. Smith), we should suppose some communicated knowledge, not involving identity or proximity of nature, there is added another figure, derived for ἀγεται, taken impersonally; but this is cutting the knot. Others, again, take σήμερον as a Nominative. All these methods are more or less objectionable. More to be recommended is the one pursued by Beza, Kypke, Middleton, and others, who supply αὐτὸς, supposing here an idiom (frequent in the best writers) whereby, when it is intended to show that a thing has been done on a certain day, that which belongs properly to the day, is ascribed to the person. Thus the sense will be such as is assigned in our common Version. Yet the expression τρίτην ἡμέραν ἄγει contains an allusion to that being the third day since his death, as well as the other circumstances in question. There is, in fact, a blending of two modes of expression; namely, τρίτην ταύτην ἡμέραν ἄγει, 'it is now the third day [since his death],' and τρίτην ἡμέραν ἔστιν ἀφ' οὗ ταῦτα ἰγίνετο. The above ellipsis is frequent. So Lucian has: ἐν Βαβυλῶνι κίμαι ταύτην τὴν ἡμέραν, scil. ἄγων, 'since my death.' Also (Ialen ap. Wets. τετάρτην ἡμέραν ἄγων (i. e. 'since he was wounded'), ἀνάδυνος ἦν. But ἡμέραν, &c. often occurs without the ἄγων, it being understood, as in the passage of Lucian.

22. ἐξέστησαν] 'have thrown us into amazement.' This active sense is also found in Acts viii. 9, and in the Classical writers. There is an ellipsis of τοῦ νοῦ, or τοῦ φρονεῖν. Ὁρθρίαι is adjunct, for adverb, as often, especially in adjectives of time, both in Greek and Latin. So Joh xxxix. 7. Sept. ἔξεπορεύετο ὄρθριος. Virg. Æn. viii. 465. Æneas se matutinus agebat.

25. ἀνόητοι.] Doddridge and Campbell object to the common version 'fools,' and render thoughtless. And indeed that ἀνόητος and similar terms (as μωρός and μάταιος) are often, in Greek, and in all languages, used in a milder sense, is certain. If foolish be thought too harsh, we may render 'misjudging.' The word, indeed, denotes either 'one who has not, or who uses not, the faculty of reason;' or, as here, 'who uses it not aright.'

— καὶ βραδεῖς τῇ καρδίᾳ.] Βραδὺς is often opposed to ἀγχίνους (ready-witted), to signify 'dull of understanding;' a sense which καρδία generally bears in the Classical writers. Yet as it is here followed by τοῦ πιστεύειν, for εἰς τὸ πιστεύειν (like James i. 19. βραδὺς εἰς τὸ λαλῆσαι), which points to the affections rather than the understanding, it should rather be explained 'sluggishly disposed, indisposed to believe,' namely, from the force of previous opinions and prejudices.

— ἐπὶ πᾶσιν οἷς ἐλάλησαν] 'all that the prophets have spoken,' namely, on the subject of the Messiah and his sufferings.

26. οὐχὶ ταῦτα ἔδει παθεῖν] 'ought not,' i. e. must not, was it not indispensable to the fulfilment of prophecy and the salvation of man, that Christ should thus suffer, and thereby enter into the glory destined for him? So Heb. ii. 18. ἔκρινε αὐτῷ (i. e. Θεῷ) τὸν ἀρχηγόν τῆς σωτηρίας αὐτῶν διὰ παθημάτων τελευτῶσαι. The reason for the necessity, implied in ἔδει, is the justice of God; which required that honour to his violated laws should be united with pardon to guilty, however penitent, man.

27. ἀρξάμενος.] This is not (as some consider it) redundant, merely to signify 'commencing his discourse;' but is very significant, denoting that the action in question is done completely. We need we stumble at its being said that Christ began from all the prophets; for it should seem that we have here merely an extremely brief mode of expression, and a sort of Synecdoche, or confusion of the order in which the words would naturally run; q. d. 'and commencing from the books of Moses, and proceeding through all the prophets, he explained to them the things therein, and in all the other Scriptures, concerning the Messiah;' meaning himself. For it should seem that, after showing them what the Scriptures foretold respecting the Messiah, he left them to determine how far they applied to himself.

The expression τὰ περὶ ἑαυτοῦ includes not only prophecies, but types and symbols; as in the case of the brazen serpent. The passages we may suppose, peculiarly dwelt upon would be Gen. iii. 15. xlix. 10. Deut. xviii. 15. Num. xii. 8, 9. Is. ix. 6, 7. liii. Dan. ix. 25—27. Ps. xli. xxii. cx. Mal. iv. 2—6. Though doubtless he opened out to them the true character, as not temporal but spiritual, of the Messiah; rectifying their erroneous notions on that subject, and thus disposing them to embrace the evidences for his being the long-expected Messiah.

28. προσεποιεῖτο πορῶν τ.] Προσεποιεῖσθαι signifies properly 'to take to oneself, make one's own;' and, in a metaphorical sense, to make thought; a sense occurring both in the Scriptural (as 1 Sam. xxi. 13. 2 Sam. xiii. 5.) and the classical writers. See Note on Mark vi. 48. Isidymus well explains it ἰσχυματίζετο, 'he made a motion as though.' This by no means involves any thing like dissimulation; for our Lord would really have gone on, had he not been restrained by their friendly importunity, which, indeed, is all that παρεβιάσαντο, scil. μένειν, imports. See Note on Matt. xiv. 22, and Mark iv. 23. The Evangelist had, I imagine, in mind what is said respecting the angels and Lot, Gen. x. 2, 3, καὶ καταβιάσαντο, where the Alexandrian MS. has παρεβιάζετο, probably the reading in St. Luke's copy.

29. πρὸς ἐσπέραν.] Πρὸς with nouns of time notes the proximity of it (like our towards). Thucyd. iv. 135. πρὸς ἑαρ ἤδη.

30. κλάσας.] This was contrary to the custom guests, that office belonging to the host; except when the host, out of respect, chose to resign to the guest. (Grotius and Pric.)

32. διηνοίχθησαν οἱ ὀφθαλμοί.] On the hinges before adverted to, v. 16, being removed, on a nearer approach, they recognised Christ. — ἄφαντος ἔγινετο ἄ. α.] Some difference of opinion exists as to the exact sense of these words. The best Expositors are now agreed that we are not to suppose our Lord to have vanished, as apocryph might be imagined to do. From the usage of ancient writers adduced by Abresch Wetstein, there is no doubt that the sense is, 'he suddenly or abruptly withdrew from the society.' In the passages adduced there, and my Note on Thucyd. viii. 38. ἀποσπλίνω—ἐκτρέφει, all that is implied by this use of the word is a notion of suddenness or abruptness in the action of the verb.

33. καρδία ἡμῶν καυμένη ἦν, &c.] Καίεσθαι was used of the more lively emotions, especially joy. See Pa. xxix. 4. The feeling here experienced was doubtless a compound one, made up partly of respectful affection towards one who had so ably expounded the oracles of the Prophets; of desire to longer enjoy his society and instruction; of joy,—since they anxiously longed that what he had taught them of the resurrection of the Messiah might prove true; and they rejoiced in the anticipation of that truth.

34. λέγοντας· ὅτι ἡγέρθη—Σίμωνι] 'who told them that the Lord had risen indeed, and had appeared to Simon.' The indirrecta oratio is far more suitable to these, and especially the following words.

This appearance to Peter, not mentioned in the other Gospels, is alluded to in 1 Cor. xv. 5.

36. ἔστη ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν.] Namely, when the Apostles had assembled together, with closed doors, for fear of the Jews. It is plain from the context that our Lord appeared suddenly and unexpectedly.

— εἰρήνη ὑμῖν.] This form of salutation was, indeed, in common use; but in the present case it was peculiarly suitable, as addressed to them in their present state of alarm, and coming from Him who had, before his death, said, 'My peace I leave with you.' See John xiv. 27.

37. πτοηθέντες καὶ ἔμφοβοι, &c.] This extreme fear doubtless arose from the suddenness of the appearance. So Quintil., cited by Wetstein: 'Inopinata subito amici mei species effulsit: obstupui, totumque corpus perfudit frigidus pavor.'

38. διαλογισμοὶ ἀναβαίνουνσι.] This figurative use of ἀναβαίνειν occurs with εἰς or ἐπὶ τὴν καρδίαν at Acts vii. 23. 1 Cor. ii. 9, and also in the Sept. at Is. lxxv. 17. Jer. iii. 16, and elsewhere; answering to the Heb. בְּהַרְגֵּז. So also surgere in Latin; ex. gr. Virg. Æn. i. 582. 'nato Dea, quæ nunc animo sententia surgit.' 'En ταῖς καρδίαις is for ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις. The expression διαλογ. has reference to συζητεῖν at v. 15.

μου καὶ τοὺς πόδας μου, ὅτι αὐτὸς ἐγὼ εἰμι· ψηλαφήσατέ με καὶ ἴδετε· ὅτι πνεῦμα σάρκα καὶ ὀστέα οὐκ ἔχει, καθὼς ἐμὲ θεωρεῖτε ἔχοντα. 39. πνεῦμα σάρκα καὶ ὀστέα οὐκ ἔχει.] From the citations adduced by Wetstein and others, it is plain that both the Jews and the Gentiles alike believed in the immateriality of departed spirits. See Hom. Od. λ. 217. and Virg. Æn. vi. 700. And so Max. Tyr. Diss. xv. l. οὐ γὰρ σάρκεν αἱ δαιμόνων φύσεις, οὐδὲ ὅσα οὐδὲ αἷμα, agreeably to Ovid, Met. iv. 443. 'errant exsangues, sine corpore et ossibus umbræ.' It is, however, the opinion of the recent Commentators in general, that our Lord is not to be understood as confirming those notions, but as meaning to show his hearers that, according to their own ideas with respect to the nature of spirits, he could not be one. Yet the opinion in question may, with reason, be considered as strongly countenanced by these words of our Lord. See Bp. Pearson on the Creed, p. 452.

41. ἀπιστούντων αὐτῶν ἀπὸ τῆς χ.] This is sometimes the case on the occurrence of events very felicitous, which happen suddenly and unexpectedly. We think the news too good to be believed, and fancy we are dreaming. So Ovid: 'Tarda solet magis rebus incense fides.'

42. ἀπὸ μελισσίου κηρίου.] A frequent food with the ancients, especially among the abominous. So Porphy. Vit. Pyth. 34. says of Pythagoras: τῇ δὲ διαίτῃ τὸ μὲν ἄριστον ἦν κηρίον, ἡ μὲν δὲ δειπνὸν δ' ἄριστον ἐκ κεγχρίου.

44. οὗτοι οἱ λόγοι (scil. εἰσι) οὓς ἐλ. &c.]

Meaning: 'The words spoken by me, when I was with you, imported that all things written of me (that I should die, &c.) should be fulfilled. The Psalms stand for the Hagiographæ, as being the chief book of that division.

45. διηνοίξεν α. τὸν ν.] This is quite distinct from the explanation of the Scriptures supra v. 27 and imports an enlightening of the mind by assisting the natural powers; and it may also include inclining and disposing the mind to attain to the knowledge in question.

47. καὶ κηρυχθῆναι, &c.] Supply δεῖ from ἐπὶ — ἀρχάμενον ἀπὸ Ἱ.] That the commandment should be made from Jerusalem, was a prerogative of the Holy City.

48. τούτων.] Namely, of the events of his life, death, and especially resurrection of Christ as an unequivocal proof of his Divine mission.

49. ἐπαγγελίαν] i. e. the thing promised, namely, the gift of the Holy Ghost.

— ἐνδύσῃτε.] 'Ενδύεσθαι answers to Heb. ὑπὸ and the Latin induere; but, like that when taken in conjunction with δόξαμιν, denoting that supernatural energy from on high so indispensable to qualify them for their important function.

52. προσκυνήσαντες αὐτόν.] The term προσκύνησις must denote no less than the performance of religious worship, now first rendered to Christ, the Apostles, even though absent and invisible, decisive proof of their opinion of his divinity.

Of all the Gospels, this may be considered the most important, both as regards the subjects treated of and the doctrines thence to be deduced. In no other have we the real person of the Redeemer so fully exhibited. Inasmuch that it was with reason called by the Fathers the Spiritual Volume, the Pectus Christi. While the other Evangelists chiefly occupy themselves in narrating the events which marked our Lord's earthly course, St. John applies himself, almost exclusively, to record the discourses of Christ, and whatever, either of words or deeds, was calculated to show forth his majesty and glory, his Divine origin, the nature of the office committed to him by the Father, and the efficacy of his death as an atonement for the sins of the world. The other Evangelists have, indeed, inculcated this fundamental doctrine, but only occasionally and incidentally; St. John professedly and systematically. In fact, the purpose of St. John in writing this Gospel differed materially from that of the other Evangelists. It was not to write a history of the life of Christ, but to select some of the most remarkable parts of his personal history, in order thereby to introduce some of the most important of his discourses, in which he spoke of himself, of his person, and his office; intending thereby to demonstrate his Divine nature, to show the excellency of his office, and to vindicate the truth against the Jews and Judaizing Christians of those times, and sceptical persons of every age,—who, whether from the influence of error or deep-rooted prejudice, should entertain notions derogatory to the honour of the Saviour. This the Evangelist does; not by resorting to subtlety of argument, but by stating the evidences of facts, and urging the authority of our Lord himself. As, then, St. John did not intend to write the life of Christ, he commences, not with his birth by the Virgin Mary, but carries us back beyond even the creation of the universe, and teaches that our Saviour lived before that period. He commences with Prose (forming, indeed, the sum and substance of the whole Gospel), which has been very termed the Golden Prose, and which Justin tells us a Platonic Philosopher said ought to be written in letters of gold, and hung

up in all churches,—wherein we have inculcated the following weighty truths:—that the promised Messiah existed before the beginning of the world with God, and was God; that he was Creator of the universe, but was made man, and lived among men, and by words and works manifested himself to be the Son of God, the Saviour of mankind. After adverting to the strong testimony of John the Baptist, and recording the commencing miracles wrought in Cana of Galilee and the Temple of Jerusalem, it seems to have been the intent of the Evangelist to furnish his readers with some specimens of the Discourses of Christ, in order thence to establish and illustrate the positions laid down in the Preface. For in each year of Christ's ministry he has narrated certain actions and miracles, and recorded certain discourses in which our Saviour spoke of his person and office. These actions he seems to have related solely with a view to the discourses which gave rise to them. As to the miracles, it was not his intention to accumulate as many instances as possible of the miraculous powers exerted by Christ; but only to select such as were best adapted to the purpose of his Gospel. The later discourses of our Lord, and the history of his passion, death, and resurrection, St. John has more fully detailed, both that Christians might be assured of the reality of his death (to which so great an efficacy was attached), and that they might be convinced of his resurrection, and the glory into which he was afterwards received. It is, too, from this Gospel especially that we collect the actual state of the controversy of the Christians with the Jews.

To advert to the personal history of the Evangelist himself, suffice it to say that, as being the son of a respectable master fisherman, he must have had a tolerable education; and, although without pretensions to learning properly so called, could not be termed illiterate. He and his brother James had probably received a careful religious education, had been well grounded in the Scriptures; if not in the original, yet in the Syro-Chaldee Version, or Paraphrase, and in the Septuagint, and were probably not wholly unversed in the Rabbinical learning of the day. From the time that they received their immediate call from

in writing this Gospel was of a general nature,—namely, to convey to the Christian world notions of the real nature, character, and of that great Teacher who came to instruct to redeem mankind. As he himself says, 11, 'These things are written, that ye may see that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; that believing, ye may have life in his name.' arg., however, as the opinion prevailed, that Gospel was a polemical one, and written to win heresies, men were obliged to suppose as a date as the life of the Evangelist would fit, for the publication of the Gospel; since heresies in question were not prevalent before latter end of the first century.

to advert to another opinion almost universal, St. John wrote to supply the deficiencies and omissions of the former Evangelists,—for this is no foundation, at least in the Gospel. And when it is attempted to unite this with the late date, the inconsistency is very great; for if the date were what those allege, and if St. John wrote to supply the deficiencies in the former Gospels, why so many things unaccountably omitted? as, instance, the remarkable fulfilment of our Father's prophecies respecting the destruction of Jerusalem; which would have tended in the most degree to confirm whatever the Evangelist wished to prove. Moreover, if St. John meant, very say, to supply the omissions and confirm authority of the preceding Evangelists, is it very that he would have suffered 30 or 40 years space without doing either one or the other? is, indeed, who contend for a late date, ground arguments not only on external testimony, internal evidence, namely, in the contents of Gospel. The Evangelist, they allege, con- siders those whom he is addressing as little acquainted with the Jewish customs and names; he gives various explanations, even more minutely than St. Mark and St. Luke. The time of which, they think, was, that, at the time St. John wrote, many more Gentiles had been converted; and thus it became necessary to state several circumstances, which required no mention while the Jewish Polity was in existence. These arguments, however, are rather loose than solid. For the very same reasons, nearly the same degree, might exist 28 or 29 years earlier. Upon the whole, it should seem there is no conclusive evidence adduced for late date in question. On the other hand, very arguments are pressed too far in favour of the before the destruction of Jerusalem. However, the arguments, though not all of equal weight, appear the whole, overbalance those on the con- trary side. To advert to a few of both,—Lampe, himself, and others appeal to ch. v. 2, 'there is Jerusalem by the sheep-market, a pool,' &c. as proof that this Gospel must have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem; since it represents the city as in being when the words are written. This others attempt to set aside, pretending, that writers 'do not weigh their words so exactly;' and that 'the Present there is to put for the Past tense.' But the former is a loose excuse; and as to the latter, such a confusion of tense cannot be admitted in para- ration. And when it is suggested that Jerusalem might, during a period of 26 or 27 years, have risen from its ruins—yet of that there is no sort of historical evidence; while to its utter and total destruction Josephus bears testimony in his Bell. vii. 1, where he says that the whole city was so completely destroyed and dug up, ὥστε μηδὲ πάποις οἰκισθῆναι πιστὸν ἂν εἴη παρασχεῖν τοῖς προσελθούσι. And if, in the course of those years, a few houses might have been erected, yet surely not so as to be called a city, and have its streets designated by names. Nor are there wanting, in addition to the above, strong internal arguments adduced by the Commentators, who maintain the publication before the destruction of Jerusalem. These are, however, closely connected with the question as to the main purpose of the Evangelist; which, if it was, as it should seem, general, evidently points to a date far earlier than the close of the first century. With respect to the above two points, the date and the design of the Gospel, it appears most probable that it was published not very long after St. John had gone to reside at Ephesus, and only a short period before the destruction of Jerusalem, say A. D. 69, probably 4 or 5 years after. John had left Judæa when the troubles were beginning, which ended in the destruction of the Jewish state. Had, indeed, St. John written so late as the close of the first century, he would surely have done more towards repressing the heresies of the Gnostics, Cerinthians, Nicolaitans, and others, than barely employ a few expressions intended to repress their dogmas; since in the Apocalypse he has censured them pointedly, openly, and by name. If, however, the expressions in question should appear to be such as to imply a settled purpose in the writer, we may suppose that, together with the above-mentioned general design, there was united a particular one,—namely, to encounter those heretical notions, which probably were even then starting up like weeds in the rising corn. In this view I find I am supported by the opinion of Dr. Pye Smith (Scrip. Test., vol. iii. 73, sq. & 121.), who, while he 'dares not affirm that St. John wrote with an expressly polemical purpose, to refute the notions of the Gnostics or others, yet thinks that he might write to correct those errors, or perhaps to anticipate them, and prevent their dissemination.' This latter view (namely, as regards anticipation, and thereby prevention, by nipping in the bud) is, I apprehend, the most just and exact that can well be imagined. That the design of the Evangelist was of a mixed nature is also confirmed by a long and instructive passage adduced, with translation, by Dr. Pye Smith from Bertholdt, in which the learned writer observes, that, 'admitting St. John's general design to be the same as that of the three other Evangelists, yet he had special objects in view, i. e. together with certain principal objects, collateral ones; and accordingly that the design of this Gospel was of a mixed kind, partly historical and partly controversial.' Although, then, it cannot be proved that St. John wrote for the purpose of supplying the omissions of his predecessors, yet, as he has, in some measure, done so,

by the insertion of certain particulars not required by his principal design, we may say that his Gospel was intended to be, in some degree, supplementary to, and consequently confirmatory of, those of the other Evangelists.

I. 1, & seqq. On this noble Proeme, see an erudite Dissertation of C. Vitringa, t. ii. p. 122—156, or the substance of it, as found in Townsend's Chron. Arr.; also Dr. Pye Smith's Scrip. Test., vol. iii. 68, seqq.

— ἐν ἀρχῇ ἦν ὁ Λόγος.] One cannot but notice the wonderful majesty and dignity contained in this brief but comprehensive introductory clause, probably formed on the simple but noble commencement of Genesis, ἐν ἀρχῇ ἐποίησεν ὁ Θεὸς τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ τὴν γῆν.

At ἐν ἀρχῇ understand τοῦ κόσμου. The expression answers to the Heb. מֵרִאשִׁית in Gen. i. 1, and denotes 'the origin of all things.' That ἀρχῇ must have this sense, and not that contended for by the Unitarians, 'the beginning of the Gospel dispensation,' is ably evinced by Dr. Pye Smith, ubi supra. On account of the ἦν, many Commentators, indeed, explain the phrase to mean 'before the creation of the world'; referring, in support of this sense of ἐν ἀρχῇ, to John xvii. 5. Eph. i. 4. and Prov. viii. 23; in which last passage the meaning is more exactly defined by the preceding πρὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος and the following πρὸ τοῦ τῆν γῆν ποιῆσαι. But neither in the passage of Proverbs, nor in the one before us, has ἐν ἀρχῇ properly that sense; nor can it ever have it. It is only implied from the context. For what was existing at the creation of the world must have existed before it.

— ὁ Λόγος.] On this most important subject (to which the limits of a work of this nature must be quite inadequate) the reader is referred to Tittman, p. 27—29, Kuin. Proleg. § 7. 13—90, Dr. Burton's Bampton Lectures, p. 212—24, and Dr. Pye Smith's Scrip. Test., vol. iii. p. 70. Whatever may be the source from whence St. John derived this term, all the most competent judges are agreed that it designates a real subsisting Being, and not an attribute, as Wisdom or Reason. Indeed, the personality of the Logos is manifest from the whole portion.

— πρὸς τὸν Θεόν.] The phrase αἶψα πρὸς τὸν Θεόν denotes close union, and in the present context, compared with infra xvii. 5. and 1 John i. 1. (where see Note) cannot be thought to mean less than communion of the Divine nature, and participation of the Divine glory and majesty, implying also a community of actions and counsels; or, as Dr. Smith expresses it, that 'the Word existed in the eternal period before all creation, naturally and essentially one Being with the Deity, yet possessing some species of relative distinction.'

This assertion is repeated in the next verse, in order to more fully explain what is meant by this communion with God, and to show how the Son used and evinced his majesty, and the Divine power which he had with the Father.

— καὶ Θεὸς ἦν ὁ Λόγος.] The sense is clearly, 'and the Logos was God'; ὁ Λόγος being the subject, and Θεὸς the predicate, as in John iv. 24. πνεῦμα ὁ Θεός, and iv. 8. ὁ Θεὸς ἀγάπη ἐστίν.

For, according to the idiom of the Greek language, it is the noun preceding the Article that is the subject; the other is the attribute; ex. gr. ἀρετὴ πλουτὸς ἐστίν. The temerity of Crell who, to destroy this irrefragable testimony to Godhead of Jesus Christ, proposed to alter θ to Θεοῦ, met with well-merited chastisement fr Bengel and Wetstein. Some, after his time, attempted to compass the same end, by maintaining, that as Θεός has not the Article, it should taken in a lower sense, to denote a God. I that position has been completely overturned Bengel, Campbell, Middl., Kuinoel, and Smith.

3. πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ, &c.] By πάντα we stand all things in the world—the universa. ἔνετο, 'were brought into existence'; for ἐκ ζετο. See Ps. cxlviii. 5. Many take διὰ as noting the instrumental cause, as in Heb. i. But there is no reason to abandon the opinion almost all the ancient, and the most excellent modern Interpreters, that it denotes the efficient and principal cause, as in Rom. xi. 36. 1 Cor. 9. Gal. i. 1, and often elsewhere. As to the passage of Hebrews, it is of quite a different nature from this of St. John; since in the last only one agent is spoken of, but in the other several agents are adverted to. Thus the Logos is ascribed as being 'very God,' and Creator of the universe; who, on account of his communion with the Divine nature, hath an equal power with the Father, and, by his co-operation with the Father, created the world.

The next words καὶ χάρις—γίγοντες are usually explained as yielding an identity of sentiment with the foregoing clause: the same thing being expressed both by affirmation and by negation, as very often in this Gospel. Here, however, it should seem, we have not merely the same thing expressed, but a much stronger sentiment. Even the διὰ οὐδὲ ἦν has an intensive force. See Bp. Bull's Jud. Eccles., p. 15, and Dr. Smith.

4. Lightfoot observes, that to the physical creation by the Logos is here subjoined a new and moral one by the same. Strictly speaking, however, there is here (as Chrysostom and Tittman remark) a reason given for what has been just affirmed.

— ἐν αὐτῷ ζωὴ ἦν, καὶ ἡ ζωὴ ἦν τὸ φῶς.] On the exact meaning here of ζωή and φῶς some difference of opinion exists; and that from the very extensive signification of these terms, and the several senses in which it is equally true that our Saviour was life and light. By ζωή, our Expositors think, is here meant author of life and salvation; and by φῶς, teacher and promulgator of its doctrine, the Gospel. This sense, however, though agreeable to the verbo loquendi, is one quite inapplicable in the present instance.

The general sense here intended is, that 'He is the source of both natural and spiritual life.' To consider the two clauses of the sentence separately, the relation of the first to the preceding sentence is, as Dr. Smith thinks, the 'causative cause adequate to the effect. The argument being this: that He possesses conscious and active existence, so as to have the power of bringing beings into existence.' The ἐν denotes that the power was centered in himself, i. e. was (unlike that of ἄνθρωπον (which is emphatic) are to be understood men of all nations, and not the Jews only (see Luke ii. 32.), in opposition to the Jewish notion, that the Messiah was come for the salvation of the Jews only.

The next words ἐρχ. εἰς τὸν κόσμον are commonly taken with πάντα ἄνθρωπον. But the best Commentators are generally agreed that they should be construed with τὸ φῶς; since in the former construction the words would seem unnecessary, and never occur in that sense; whereas in the latter the phrase is very weighty, and well suited to the connection. Moreover, ὁ ἐρχόμε-νος εἰς τὸν κόσμον was an usual phrase to designate the Messiah. See vi. 14. xviii. 37. And so at iii. 19. xii. 46. he is designated as a light coming into the world. Finally, the other sense would require the Article after ἄνθρωπον. Not to say that the sense usually assigned would be scarcely reconcilable with facts. Nor is the interpretation above stated without the support of ancient authority; since so the passage was taken by the very ancient author of the Test. xii. Patr.
 p. 578. τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου τὸ δοθὲν ἐν ὁμίᾳ πρὸς φωτισμόν παντός ἀνθρώπου. With respect to the scope of the declaration, it seems to repeat, somewhat more emphatically, what was said at ver. 4. ἡ ζωὴ ἦν τὸ φῶς τῶν ἀνθρώπων.

10. ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἦν.] These words affirm the appearance and existence of the Logos on earth in a human form,—i. e. that he became incarnate.
 In this and the following verse there is a kind of climax in the four particulars now presented concerning the True Light; q. d. 'The only and true Saviour came to, and abode in the world,—a world created by him, but which, nevertheless, knew him not, recognised him not as such. Nay, though he came to his own people especially, yet even they received him not as the Saviour.' Some take τὰ ἴδια to mean 'the world at large.' But though it be true that 'the whole earth is the Lord's,' yet Christ could not be said to be rejected by those to whom he did not reveal himself as Saviour; viz. the Gentiles. Indeed he professes (Matt. xv. 24.) that 'he was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.' The best Expositors are therefore, with reason, agreed that τὰ ἴδια, sub. οἰκήματα, can only mean his own country, or people; a sense of which numerous examples are adduced by Krebs, Wetstein, and Kypke. The metaphor (as observes Smith, Scrip.
 Test.) is that of a sovereign over a state, or the head of a family over his household. The Jews, indeed, might be called Christ's own people, as being the peculiar people of God, and consequently of Christ, as united in the Godhead; and moreover, from his having been born and having lived among them.

12. From the Jews, who rejected Jesus as their Saviour, the Evangelist turns to those, whether Jews or Gentiles, who received him.

12. ὅσοι δι' ἔλαβον α.] The reasoning may be completed thus: 'His countrymen, as a body, rejected him. Yet his coming was not utterly without effect. Some few did acknowledge him as the Christ. And to such as did (or hereafter should) he gave the privilege of adoption into the number of God's children;' for ἐξουσία here denotes privilege or prerogative; a signification sometimes occurring in the later Classical writers and the Sept. By τέκνα Θεοῦ are meant obedient and true worshippers of God, and, from the adjunct, those who are acknowledged by God as such, and admitted to the privilege of sonship,—the most supreme blessing a created being can receive, comprehending both the privileges of Christians in the present state, and their felicity in the future; a blessed resurrection and a glorious immortality; in short, to be eternally as happy as infinite goodness, united with infinite wisdom, can make them.

13. οἱ οὐκ—ἐγεννήθησαν.] Meaning, 'who obtained that privilege of sons, not by virtue of ancestry, nor by any affinity or connexion of human descent, but by the free grace of God.' The plural is used by way of adaptation to ἔδωκεν before; though, of course, what is here applied to those who received Jesus as the Christ during his abode on earth, is equally applicable to those who should, at any future period, receive him. The plural αἱμάτων is used to denote all the degrees of consanguinity and lines of descent, and has reference to the several ancestors from whom the children of Israel boasted their descent, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; see 2 Cor. xi. 22, sq. This use of the word in the plural is very rare; but I have noted it in Eurip. Ion, 693, ἀλλων τραφαῖς ἀφ' αἱμάτων, and Lycoph. Cassand. v. 804. 1249. The two phrases ἐκ θελ. σαρκ. and ἐκ θελ. ἀνδρὸς designate, by Hendiadys, the natural mode of descent, as opposed to the spiritual one proceeding from the adoption of God.

14. καὶ ὁ Λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο.] This is closely connected with ver. 10, ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἦν, and is a resumption of what was there said; q. d. 'And [accordingly] the Logos was clothed with a human body, and sojourned among us [men].' This addition of the human nature to the Divine implies that conjunction by which the same person is both Son of God and Son of Man. Σὰρξ, for σάρκινος. So Artemid. ii. 35, εἰν τε γὰρ σάρκινος οἱ θεοὶ φαίνονται.

—ἐσκήνωσα.] Here there is no need to suppose (with Lampe and Schoettgen) any reference to the Schechina; the sole object of the Evangelist being to prove that the Logos became incarnate. The full sense is that laid down by Wetstein: 'He who had dwelt in heaven descended from thence, that he might sojourn with men.' For σκηνῶν signifies to take up one's quarters, or sojourn. And it is here used in preference to ζῆν, with allusion to the life of man as a sojourn; and because it better designates that familiariter vivere, which seems here intended;

The next words καὶ ἐθεσάμεθα, &c., may be considered as, in some measure, another proof that the Logos became incarnate; yet they seem meant also to intimate, that though he was really man, yet he was also something far more; namely, Son of God; implying a community of the Divine nature. Ἐθεσάμεθα is a very significant, and even emphatic, term; q. d. We distinctly saw his glory. Now there were many ways in which his disciples saw the glory of Christ; namely, in his miracles (see ii. 11); and not only in acts which evinced power, but wisdom and goodness also;—in that unspeakable love to men for which he was content to suffer death, even the death of the cross, for their salvation. The Apostles themselves, too, had some of them seen his glory in his transfiguration on Mount Tabor. Though these, and the other evidences of Christ's glory in his mediatorial capacity, John did not intend to specify, being content with affirming it to have been δόξαν ὡς μονογενοῦς παρὰ Πατρός, 'such a glory as might be expected in a Being the only-begotten Son of the Father;' who accordingly is (as it is said, Heb. i. 3,) the ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης, καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ. The ὡς (as Chrysostom and Tittman remark) expresses not similitude, but identity and truth; meaning 'truly such.' On the full sense of μονογενοῦς, see Lampe and Tittman, and Dr. Smith. The use here of the verbal for the verb, μονογενὴς for μόνος γεννηθείς, will account for the use of the Genitive with παρὰ instead of the simple Genitive. Besides, as it is truly observed by Bp. Bull, Judic. Eccl. p. 56, μονογενὴς τῷ Θεῷ seems more significant (expressing the Divine generation of the Son from the Father) than the simple genitive.

With respect to the construction of the passage, many, as Kuinoel, in order to avoid a slight irregularity, would make the words καὶ ἐθεσάμεθα—Πατρός parenthetical, referring πλήρως to ἐσκήνωσεν. A procedure which does violence to the whole sentence, in which the words thus attempted to be separated from the rest, are any thing but parenthetical. And as to the method of Lampe and Smith, who would construe πλήρως γέγονεν καὶ ἄλ. with ἐσκήνωσα, and consider them as the second clause of the sentence; this supposes a harsh transposition, and such as it were difficult to account for, since no reason can be imagined why the natural position should have been thus changed; not to mention that both the above methods tend to weaken the sense. We may, I think, best regard the words πλήρως γέγονεν καὶ ἀληθείας as continuatives of the foregoing idea, and intended to carry on the feeling of devout admiration inherent in δόξαν ὡς μονογενοῦς παρὰ Πατρός. And we have only to suppose, with some eminent Expositors, an ellipsis of πλήρως for πλήρως, a figure frequent in the writer; and which may have been here resorted to in order to prevent the words being by mistake read to (what it might otherwise have seemed added for) Πατρός just before. This view is amply confirmed by an imitation of the passage as I have noted in Theophylact Simoc. p. 115.

θεασάμεθα τὴν δόξαν αὐτῆς πλήρη ἔργου.
ἔργου καὶ ἀληθείας is put, per Hendiadyon, ἔργου ἀληθείης; and the expressions are Dr. Smith observes) 'peculiarly strong, declaring the largeness of possession, and the profuseness or infinite liberality of communication,' as in similar passage of St. Paul, Eph. iii. 8. 18,

14. Having appealed, in a general way, to the testimony borne by the Baptist to Jesus, the evangelist now proceeds to mention what that testimony was; and by κέκραγε he intimates that he uttered it openly, ex animo, and decisively.
— ὁ ὀπίσω μου ἐρχόμενος.] Meaning, 'He enters (i. e. is to enter) upon this office after me, of whom I am the forerunner; in which he ἔρχομαι frequently occurs in the New Testament, and sometimes in the Sept. The interpretation of ἔμπροσθέν μου ἦν, is uncertain; since the words may be understood either of time or of rank. According to the former view the clause πρῶτός μου ἦν must be considered as expressing the same sense as the preceding; and thus the meaning will be, that 'though he came after him both birth and entrance into office, yet that he existed long before him.' According to the latter, the meaning will be, 'This is He of whom I said, He who cometh into the world (or entereth his office) after me, is become of greater dignity than myself,—inasmuch as (by his own Divine power) he was [always] before me; i. e. more honourable than I.' An interpretation which perhaps be thought to deserve the preference, yielding a sense equally suitable to the context,
and more worthy of the illustrious speaker than the other.

15.—18. It has been disputed whether these words are from the Baptist or from the Evangelist. The former opinion has been adopted by many interpreters, though (as Tittman observes)
it lies open to the objection, that what is contained in these verses could hardly have been said
by John the Baptist of himself, his own times, and that of his disciples.' They are, doubtless, words of the Evangelist; who, in using the ἐκ πληρώματος (answering to the Heb. מלך, which denotes the sum of any thing, and also that which seems to have had reference to the expression πλήρης χάριτος καὶ ἀληθείας at ver. 14 (for this verse is a continuation of what was said at

ver. 14, ver. 11 being in some measure parenthe-tical), and meant by it to express the idea of abundance. Thus ἐκ τοῦ πληρ. αὐ. means, 'from his rich store-house of benefits and blessings.'
Of the controverted phrase, χάριν ἀντὶ χάριτος,
the only two interpretations deserving of notice are the following. 1. That of those who regard it as a periphrasis of the superlative, like the Hebr. מְרִיבֵי מְרִי; an idiom not unknown in the Greek Classical writers. Thus Theogn. Admon.
344. δόξης ἀντ' ἀνίων ἀνίας. The sense will thus be, 'grace upon grace,' or 'benefits upon benefits,' abundance of benefits. 2. That of those who suppose the fulcrum here mentioned to be no other than the grace and truth of which the Logos was just said to be full. Thus the καὶ will be merely explanatory; and αὐτοῦ, which occurs after πληρώματος, will have to be repeated after χάριτος;
the sense being, 'we have received grace answering or correspondent to that which is in Christ Jesus.' This sense, however, cannot be elicited without considerable harshness. And therefore the other interpretation (especially as it presents a sense more worthy of the Evangelist) is entitled to the preference. Render, 'Yea, of this fulness
(i. e. his exuberant abundance) have we all received [grace], even grace upon grace, blessings superlatively great.' So Plato i. 334, cited by Weiststein, says the Deity, after giving τὰς πρῶ-τας χάριτας, εἰσαυθὺς ἑτέρας ἀντὶ ἐκείνων, καὶ τρίτας ἀντὶ τῶν δευτέρων, καὶ αἱ νῦν
ἀντὶ παλαιωτέρων ἐπιδίδωσι.

17. ὅτι ὁ νόμος—ἐγένετο.] In these words are exemplified and illustrated the benefits received from Christ by his disciples; and the grace of the Gospel is opposed to the rigour of the Law. The Law was given as a benefit to the Israelites; yet
it was harsh and burdensome, its blessings scanty, and those confined to one nation; whereas the Gospel imparts its blessings, through Christ, plenteously to the whole human race. (Kuinoel.)
'Ἡ χάρις καὶ ἡ ἀλ. denotes, per hendiadyon, ἡ χάρις ἀληθινή, 'the true and most excellent grace,' namely, a religion full of grace. This χάρις Christians receive from the πληρῶμα of Christ, since to him (as it is said at iii. 34) οὐκ ἐκ μήτρων δίδωσιν ὁ Θεὸς τὸ Πνεῦμα.

18. Here we have a confirmation and illustration of the foregoing sentiment as to the superiority of the Gospel over the Law, and that deduced from the clear knowledge of God communicated by Christ. 'Lest, however (says Dr.
Smith), we should suppose some communicated knowledge, not involving identity or proximity of nature, there is added another figure, derived from the ancient custom of reclining, not sitting at meals (whereby he who was placed next the host, who was at the top of the table, seemed to lie in his bosom), to denote intimate and perfect conjunction, ὁ ὢν ἐν τὸν κόλπον τοῦ Πατρὸς. An intimacy of communion not merely that of saints with angels, but of one who is a SON, in a sense absolutely uniquely, intimating that the acquaintance the Messiah has with the Divine nature, will, and purposes, is peculiar to him, and such as could be affirmed of no other being. And thus the expression corresponds with that at verse 2, 'the Word was with God.'

— Θεὸν οὐδεὶς ἰώρακε πώποτε.] In other words, 'No wonder that the Gospel of Christ should be so superior to the Law of Moses; for no man hath seen (i. e. perfectly known) God; not even Moses and the Prophets (so Eccclus. xliii. 31, τίς ἰώρακεν αὐτόν, καὶ ἐκδηγήσεται), but the Only-begotten, he hath fully disclosed,' &c. On the extent of sense in ἰώρακε, see Dr. Smith, who shows that it denotes an absolutely perfect and intellectually intuitive perception, such as is the property of no other being.

Thus the present passage is by no means in contradiction to Exod. xxxiii. 11, 'the Lord spake to Moses face to face.' Indeed there is reason to think that it was Christ, the Logos, who appeared as the JEHOVAH-ANGEL on that and other occasions.

— ἐξηγήσατο] scil. τὸν Θεόν; namely, τὰ Θεῖα, 'hath fully disclosed or revealed what is to be known by man of the Deity, his nature, attributes, will,' &c., agreeably to the usage of the Greek Classical writers, who apply this term to their prophets or others, called ἐξηγηταί, who were supposed to have secret communication with the Gods, and accordingly delivered and explained the Divine oracles, and regulated the religious ceremonies. Thus Dionys. Hal. describes Numa as τὰ Θεῖα ἐξηγήσασθαι σοφόν.

19. The Evangelist, again reverting to John, points to the well-known public testimony of John, given by him to the great Council of the nation, which had the charge of religion. Render, 'Moreover, this is the testimony of John, when the Jews sent,' &c.

— οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι ἐξ Ἰερ.' 'the Jews of Jerusalem;' meaning those who are elsewhere called οἱ ἀρχόντες τῶν Ἰουδ., namely, the Sanhedrim, who had the authority of making inquiry into the pretensions of prophets. There is no reason to suppose, with some, that the Evangelist has not given the whole address; for the τίς in the question evidently refers to the kind of prophetic character claimed by John, which implied an inquiry, 1. whether he was the Christ; 2. whether he was Elias. The form σὺ τίς εἶ was (it appears from Wetstein's citations) not unusual, as addressed by those who demanded to know any one's authority to act in any business. Though the Sanhedrim knew that John's ancestry did not accord with that which had been predicted of Christ; yet, when they bore in mind what had happened to Zacharias in the Temple, and that his mother was of the lineage of David, they might think it possible that he was the Messiah; especially as it was not absolutely determined among the doctors whether Christ was to be born at Bethlehem or not.

— ὡμολόγησε — καὶ ὡμολόγησε.] These words contain the strongest assertion possible, since the two methods, assertion by affirmation and by negation of the contrary, together with a repetition of the affirmation, are here united.

21. τί οὖν;] A popular form of expression; q. d. 'What is it, then, you mean to say?'

— Ἠλίας εἶ σύ;] The Jews supposed, from Malachi iv. 5, that Elijah would return from Heaven, whither he had been caught up, and would usher in and anoint the Messiah.

— οὐκ εἶμι] i. e. not in the sense in which the question was asked; though in another sense he might be called Elias, as he came in the spirit and power of Elias; see Matt. xi. 14.

— ὁ προφήτης εἶ σύ;] It is plain that this cannot mean Elijah, since that would involve a vain repetition. The Article shows that it must denote some particular prophet. The best Commentators, ancient and modern, are of opinion that Jeremias is meant; q. d. the prophet promised (namely, in Deut. xviii. 15. 19. See Acts iii. 22), who, they supposed, would appear previously to the advent of the Messiah, to recover the ark of the covenant which he had hidden; see 2 Macc. ii. 8.

22. τίς εἶ;] i. e. 'what sort of a person art thou,' whether a prophet or not?

23. ἐγὼ φωνή, &c.] q. d. What the Prophet Isaiah (xl. 3) says, 'the voice of one,' &c., hath good of me; you will find there what will sufficiently explain who I am, and what it is I have to do.

24. ἦσαν ἐκ τῶν Φαρισαίων.] Why not (as may be asked) of the Sadducees too, since they also went to John's baptism? Because the Pharisees formed by far the greater part of the Sanhedrim, and held the whole power in their own hands. So Josephus, Antiq. xviii. 1. 4, ἐκρίθη δ' ἀπ' αὐτῶν (scil. Saddoucaίων) οὗτος ἐκ εἰκῆς ὅτις γὰρ ἐπ' ἀρχὰς παρεβίβη

was the more ancient one, and the original name of the place (probably the Bethabara of Judg. vii.
 29), but that in the time of Christ it was usually called Bethany, as then better designating its situation (probably at about five miles from the embouchure of the Jordan into the Dead Sea);
 the original crossing by ford having now been changed to that by ferry; though notwithstanding this, the old name (of which many examples might be adduced) still continued in use. Insomuch that in the time of Origen it seems to have been commonly called Bethabara. Hence he changed the reading, which others also approved.

29. τῇ ἐπαύριον.] Namely, the day after the mission of the priests and Levites. So at ver. 35
 it denotes 'the day after.' Ο Ἰωάννης, not found in many ancient MSS. and Versions, is cancelled by Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz; but,
 I think, on insufficient grounds.

— Ἴδε ὁ ἄμνος—κόσμου.] In order to rightly understand these words, we must observe, that as often as in Scripture the name Lamb is applied to Christ, so often the subject of what is spoken is his death and passion; inasmuch as he underwent it for men. And in this view John the Baptist considered Jesus, when he called him
lamb, namely, as suffering and dying like a victim.
 It is clear that he meant to represent our Lord as one dying, and that in the place of others. For he has subjoined the words ὁ αἴρων τὴν ἀμαρτίαν τοῦ κόσμου, by way of explication. Now the phrase αἴρειν τὴν ἀμαρτίαν answers to the Hebr. נָשָׂא מִן הָעוֹלָם, which never signifies to remove sins, i. e. extirpate iniquity from the earth (as some recent Interpreters suppose), but to forgive sins (as in Gen. i. 17. Exod. xxxiv. 7.
 Num. xiv. 19. Ps. xxxii. i. 5. 1 Sam. xv. 25.
 xxv. 28), or to pay the penalties of sin, either one's own, or others, as in Exod. xxviii. 30. Lev.
 v. i. x. 17, where are conjoined, as synonymous,
 the formulas to bear the sin of the people, and expiate and to atone the people with God. Therefore the formula to bear sin signifies to be punished
 because of sins, to undergo punishment of sins.
 Furthermore, as to bear one's own sin denotes to be punished for one's own sin, so to bear the sin
of others must mean to be punished for the sins of others, to undergo the punishment which the sins of others have deserved.

Moreover, Christ is said to bear the sin of the whole world; and therefore the interpretation above mentioned can have no place. It must be observed, too, that there is in these formulas a manifest allusion to, and comparison with, a pe- ccular victim. For such a victim was solemnly brought to the altar, and then the Priest put his hands over the head; which was a symbolical action, signifying that the sins committed by the persons expiated were laid upon the victim: and when it was slaughtered, it was then said to bear or carry away the sins of the expiated; by which it was denoted that the victim paid the penalty of the sins committed, was punished with death in their place, and for the purpose of freeing them from the penalty of sin. Therefore when Christ is called the Lamb bearing the sins of the world, it is manifest that we must understand one who should take upon himself the sins of men, so as to pay the penalties of their sins, and in their stead, for the purpose of freeing them from those penalties. (Tittman.) For by ἁμαρτία is here to be understood the imputation, or punishment, of sin; see 1 John iii. 5. And so we have αἵρειν τὸ ἁμάρτημα, 1 Sam. xv. 25. Comp. the marginal reference in Scott's Bible (all abundantly testifying to the grand and fundamental doctrine of the Atonement), and see Dr. Pyc Smith's Scrip. Test. vol. ii. 31. 39.

30—34. John now mentions how he obtained this knowledge, that Jesus was the Messiah; namely, by an express revelation from God. Up to the period of his baptism, our Lord, it seems, had passed for a mere man. He was first made known as Messiah by John at his baptism, and through him to the multitude. Whether John had before any personal knowledge of Jesus is variously disputed. Certain it is that he did not know him to be the Messiah. That knowledge he obtained by a Divine revelation, which had given him the sign whereby he should recognise the Messiah, namely, the descent of the Holy Spirit, in symbolic figure, upon him. That sign he saw in Jesus, and was therefore sure he was the very personage. The words ἵνα φανερ.,

&c., should be rendered: 'But to the end that he should be made manifest to Israel am I come baptizing with water.' It is not said that this was the sole, but only that it was the chief end.

34. μεμαρτύρηκα.] Here there is supposed the use of the Preterite for the Present. But the sense is rather, 'I have borne, and do bear witness.'

35. τῇ ἐπαύριον.] Namely, two days after this testimony was borne, and after the mission of the Priests and Levites.

— εἰστίκει.] 'was standing,' i. e. was there. Ὁ Ἰωάννης, not found in many MSS., Version, and Fathers, is cancelled by Matthæi, Vater, Tittman, and Scholz.

36. ἐμβλέψας.] 'having fixed his eyes intently upon him;' with that deep interest which he would naturally feel on beholding the long-expected Messiah; see Note on Matt. xii. 48.

37. ἠκολούθησαν τῷ Ἰ.] 'became followers of Jesus.'

39. τί ζητεῖτε.] A popular form of expression, signifying, 'What is your business with me?'

— ποῦ μένεις.] 'where abidest thou?' Ménais, like the Latin manere, is used either of a fixed habitation, or a lodging, as in Luke xix. 5. xxi. 29. Acts xviii. 3. 20, and often in the Sept., and sometimes in the Classical writers. Such also must be the sense here, since our Lord's home was at Nazareth. By calling him Ῥαββί they showed that they sought instruction; and by addressing to him the question, ποῦ μένεις; they requested private conversation; doubtless, on the great doctrine which then occupied the minds of all serious and reflecting Jews.

40. ἔρχεσθε καὶ ἴδετε.] Our Lord did not tell them where he abode; but graciously bade them follow him, to inspire them with confidence to ask what they wished to know. Of these disciples one, we learn, was Andrew. The other is generally supposed to have been the Evangelist himself, who usually suppresses his own name (see xiii. 23. xviii. 15. xix. 26).

— ἦρα δὲ ἦν.] The δὲ, not found in most of the ancient MSS. and the early Editions, has been cancelled by almost every Editor from Bengel and Wetstein to Scholz.

Ἐ ἀδελφὸν τὸν ἴδιον] for ἀδ. αὐτοῦ (like the Heb. suffix י), 'his brother.' An idiom frequent both in the New Test. and the Sept.

— τὸν Μεσσίαν, ὃ ἐστὶ μεθ.] When a significant name (such as Peter, Thomas, or Tabitha) was given to any one, it was usual to translate it, when the person was spoken of in a different language.

44. ὁ Ἰησοῦς.] In very many MSS., Versions, and Fathers, ὁ Ἰ. is not found here, but after λίγαι; and so Griesbach, Matthæi, and Scholz.

— ἀκολουθεῖ μοι.] A form of speaking equivalent to 'become my disciple;' and sometimes used by the Grecian Philosophers. Thus Socrates ap. D. Laert. ii. 48, says to Xenophon, ἔπον τοῖνυν καὶ μάθαν. In the present instance, however, it imported more than mere discipleship; namely, the embracing Christ's doctrines and following his example.

46. Ναθαναὴλ.] Supposed to have been the same with the Bartholomew mentioned by Matthew; 1. because all the rest of John's followers mentioned in the Chapter were received into the number of the Apostles; 2. because John nowhere makes mention of Bartholomew, nor the rest of the Evangelists of Nathanael; 3. because Luke vi. 14, in his list of the Apostles, puts Bartholomew after Phillip, with whom Nathanael was converted. This opinion is, moreover, confirmed by Bartholomew's being a surname, as is plain from the simple Θεολομαῖος (Heb. שׁלמ׳) occurring in Josephus. The meaning of that is son of Thol.

47. ἐκ Ναζαρέτ δύναται τι ἀγαθὸν εἶναι:] As we should say, 'can any thing extraordinary come out of, &c.' It seemed little probable to Nathanael that a prophet, much less the Messiah, could come out of Galilee, still less from Nazareth; which was but a mean country town, whose inhabitants, as indeed all the Galilæans, were held in contempt by the Jews; the cause for which has been attributed to their being a mixed race, partly of Gentile origin, very corrupt in their morals, and proverbially boorish and stupid.

— ἔρχου καὶ ἴδε.] A proverbial formula equivalent to 'Judge for yourself; seeing is believing.'

48. ἀληθῶς Ἰσρ.] for ἀληθῆς Ἰσρ. So Plutarch de Is. (cited by Schleusner) Ἰσραὴλὸς ὡς ἀληθῶς. The appellation true Israelite (denoting one who imitates the virtues of the Patriarch Israel, see Rom. ix. 6) was given, among the Jews, to persons remarkable for uprightness and integrity; comp. also Rom. ii. 28. In the words ἐν ᾧ δόλος οὐκ ἔστι, there is supposed to be a reference to what is said of Jacob, Gen. xxv. 27. But it should rather seem that we have here a phrase derived from Ps. xxxii. 2. xiv. 3 (comp. 1 Pet. ii. 22), to designate a man of undoubted integrity towards men, and unfeigned piety towards God; what Martial Epigr. i. 40. 4, calls, 'vera simplicitate bonus.'

49. πότερ με γ.] Meaning, 'knowest my disposition and character.' Nathanael seems here to hint that Jesus had been previously informed of his character by his friends. In order, therefore, to remove this supposition, and show Nathanael that he knew him, not from the information of Philip, or any other person, but from his own knowledge,—our Lord mentions, what none could know but Philip and Nathanael, πρὸ τοῦ σε Φίλιππον φωνῆσαι, ὄντα ὑπὸ τὴν συκὴν, εἰδὼν σε. Now this circumstance of sitting under the fig-tree Chrysostom and Theophylact, with the best modern Commentators, well illustrate by supposing that Philip had found Nathanael under a particular fig-tree, and had then, as often before, conversed with him about Christ; and that now our Lord mentions this in order to evince his divine power. And no wonder; for there had been a conversation of only two, nor was there any one present who could tell what had passed at it. Thus a conversation was alluded to, held at some time previous, and in a particular place, identifying it, and distinguishing it from any other. A proof this of supernatural knowledge, and consequently of a Divine commission. (Tittman.) That conversation, meditation, and prayer, was not unfrequently carried on under fig-trees is proved by the Rabbinical citations of Lightfoot and Schoettgen.

Πρὸ τοῦ σε Φίλιππον φωνῆσαι, ὄντα ὑπὸ τὴν συκὴν εἶδ' σε. Ἀπεκρίθη Ναθαναὴλ καὶ λέγει αὐτῷ· Ῥαββί, σὺ εἶ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, σὺ εἶ ὁ βασιλεὺς τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ. Ἀπεκρίθ' Ἰησοῦς καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Ὅτι εἶπόν σοι· Εἰδὼν σε ὑποκάτ τῆς συκῆς, πιστεύεις; μείζω τούτων ὄψει. Καὶ λέγει αὐτῷ Ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, ἀπ' ἄρτι ὄψεσθε τὸν οὐρανὸν ἀνεγῶτα, καὶ τοὺς ἀγγέλους τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀναβαίνοντας καὶ κατὰ βαίνοντας ἐπὶ τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.

50. σὺ εἶ ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, σὺ εἶ, &c.] Similar to the confession of Peter, Matt. xvi. To the usual expression to denote the Messiah he adds that of ὁ βασιλεὺς τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, King of Israel; one of the titles designating the expected Saviour, and which is applied to Christ in various parts of the Gospel. This, from the circumstance that under the Jewish theocracy God was King of Israel, has been supposed to allude to the Divinity of the Messiah. It is more obvious to discern in it, with Calvin, the notion of an earthly kingdom, and one confined to Judæa.

51, 52. πιστεύεις—Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρ.] On the scope of this assurance Commentators differ; some recognising reproof, others, more properly, praise. With respect to the words ἀπ' ἄρτι—Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, it has been disputed whether they should be taken literally, to denote such angelic manifestations as those recorded at Matt. iv. 11. xxviii. 2. Luke ii. 9. 13. 22. Acts i. 10; or figuratively, in the sense, 'henceforth shall ye see the power of God and His providence most signally displayed to defend and protect me; ye shall see far greater works than this,—even signs and mighty deeds wrought by me, such as to prove of a truth that I am the Son of God.' The former view was adopted by the ancient and the earlier modern Commentators; but the latter has been maintained by those of after times, and especially the recent Interpreters, and is far preferable; for the angelic ministrations in ev were past events. The whole phraseology, it may best be considered as metaphorical, by ὄψεσθε is meant, 'ye shall have evident of the thing.' The remaining figures, 'the I opened, and the angels in attendance upon the Son of Man,' are, however, I apprehend solely meant to denote such interpositions above, as should evince the Divine mission Jesus. The use of the term ἀπ' ἄρτι, which Calvin observes, suggests the idea of now (as Rev. xiv. 13, μακάριοι οἱ νεκροὶ οἱ ἐν ἀποθνήσκοντες ἀπ' ἄρτι). See also John x. xiv. 7), and especially the allusion to the vision (Gen. xxviii. 12) of Jacob's ladder, point at a secondary sense, denoting the open heaven by the Gospel dispensation, where heaven, which had been closed to sinful man, opened by 'the Mediator of the New Covenant.' Thus there is here a double sense; one as now Christ personally, the other as he was Son of the representative of the human race. The regarded the proof of his being sent from the second, of God's having come to now visited him. Now the declaration, in its present sense, was fulfilled at those various times of his earthly career, at his passion, death, and resurrection, when the angels appeared to honor support him, thereby evincing him to be Christ, the Son of God.' The expressions ascending and descending are used suitably allusion above adverted to; but are also used to denote zealous ministration, just as ὁ signifies literally, 'one who is busily engaged in attendance' on another. Thus it is meant they should henceforward see such a success 'signs and wonders and mighty deeds' wrought by Christ, in the course of his ministry, that it seem as if heaven were opened, and the angels God were continually (as they appeared in vision Jacob) ascending and descending upon the head of Man; intimating also, that in the Gospel dispensation, now about to commence, should realized the blessings which had been formerly represented by that vision.

II. 1. τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ τρίτῃ.] Namely third day after Christ's arrival in Galilee Bethany, or rather after his conversation with Nathanael.

—γάμος] meaning, 'a wedding-feast.' 2. ἐκλήθη.] On what ground, which relationship, or of acquaintance, Jesus was invited has been variously conjectured. It is most probable that the bride or bridegroom, or both,

related to his mother Mary, who, it is supposed, had been προμηστρία, or νομφαγωγός, and had been already there making arrangements for the feast, since it is plain that she had the chief direction therein. The house is conjectured to have been that of Alpheus or Clopas, who married the sister of Jesus's mother.

[ὁ οἶνος οὐκ ἔχουσι.] Equivalent to ὑπερῆσεν ὁ οἶνος, 'the wine is falling short.' Comp. (Gen. xliii. 2. This might very well happen, without supposing any excess on the part of the guests, since these festivities lasted a considerable, though not any certain, number of days; not to mention the probable accession of many beyond the number of guests originally expected, attracted to the company by the presence of Jesus.

On the intent with which Mary addressed these words to our Lord, some difference of opinion exists. To omit several frivolous and improbable suppositions, it should seem (according to the view adopted by Chrysostom and almost all the earlier modern Commentators) that the words, while intimating the inability of the host to provide a further supply of wine, were intended to convey a hint to our Lord that he should remove the want by a miracle,—a miracle most suitable wherewith to commence his ministry, as it would supply a decisive proof of his Divine mission, and while benefiting her friend, would most signally evince his own Divine power. Certainly the directions given by Mary to the servants mark such an expectation of miraculous agency; an expectation, indeed, warranted by the wonderful circumstances of her son's birth and childhood, and the recent testimony to his Divine mission by John the Baptist.

4. τί ἐμοὶ καὶ σοί, γύναι.] These words cannot import (as some have supposed) strong reprehension; for that would seem unmerited by the address preceding. As far as the opinion rests on the expression γύναι it is groundless, this being a form of address used even to the most dignified persons, and, in fact, employed by Jesus to his mother on the most affecting of all occasions. With respect to the remaining words, τί ἐμοὶ καὶ σοί, they are a formula taken from the language of common life, and must be interpreted according to the occasion, and the circumstances of the case. It usually denotes impatience of interference, signifying, 'What hast thou to do with me?' (i. e. with what belongs to me)? And such would seem to be the sense here, though it was probably modified by the tone of voice, and softened into a mild rebuke for interfering with him, in a matter where her parental claim to respect could have no authority over him.

The words following, οὐπὼ ἤκει ἡ ὥρα μου, evidently mean, 'The time for what you suggest is not yet come,'—implying that he alone was the proper judge of that season, and would seize it when it arrived, thus mixing comfort with mild reproof. That time would be when the wine was quite exhausted, whereby the reality of the miracle would be undoubted.

6. ὑδρίαί] i. e. water vats for the various ablutions prescribed by the Jewish law; see Luke xi. 39. Κατὰ is here used for πρὸς, and signifies for the purpose of, a very rare sense.

—ἀνὰ μετρητὰς δύο ἢ τ.] Μετρ. may either designate the Hebr. טא, to which this word answers in the Sept., namely, a measure containing 7½ gallons, or the Attic measure Metretres, consisting of nine gallons. The latter is the more probable; though, even according to the former, the quantity of liquor has been cavilled at by sceptics. But besides that the largeness of the quantity would the more manifestly prove the miracle, this cannot be considered enormous for many days' consumption, if we take into account the number of guests already assembled to partake of it; to which more would now be added by the fame of the miracle, and from curiosity to see the worker of it. Not to say that we need not suppose all the wine to have been used. The surplus, if any, would be acceptable to the newly married couple.

7. γεμίσατε—ἕως ἄνω.] These circumstances are not too minute to be worthy of introduction. They are mentioned to evince the truth and magnitude of the miracle. So in that worked by Elijah, 1 Kings xviii. 33, 35, the Prophet in like manner exclaims, 'Fill four barrels with water, and pour it, &c. Do it the second time. Do it the third time.' The words were doubtless pronounced, and the thing done, publicly; and the servants were made the doers of it to prevent misrepresentation.

8. ἀρχιτρικλίνῳ] 'the director of the feast.' Namely, the person appointed to superintend the preparations for, and management of a feast; to examine the provisions and liquor brought forward, and pass among the guests to see that they were in want of nothing, and to give the necessary orders to the servants (see Eccles. xxxii. 1). This ἀρχιτρικλίνος is to be distinguished from the συμποσίαρχος, βασιλεὺς, or στρατηγός, of the Greeks, and the moderator, arbiter, or rex convivii, of the Romans. This latter was one of the guests, chosen sometimes by lot, who presided at the table, and prescribed rules in regard to drinking, &c. Whereas the former was really a domestic, answering to the τραπεζομικός of the Greeks,

and the Tricliniarches of the Romans. As confirmatory of which Juvenius, in his Hist. Evang., terms the Architricleus a 'summus minister.' The wine was, as usual, handed to the Architricleus, in order that he might taste and see whether it were worthy of being set before the company.

10. πᾶς ἄνθρωπος—τίθῃσι] 'sets on [the table].' So Bel and Drag. 11, τὸν οἶνον τιθ. And so sometimes in the Classical writers. The present tense denotes what it was customary to do. Μεθεῖναι, from μέθυ (probably derived from the Northern word Med or Meth), signifies to moisten; and μεθεῖσθαι, to be moistened with liquor, and, in a figurative sense (like the Latin maderare vino), to be filled with wine. In Classical use it generally, but not always, implies intoxication. In the Hellenistic writers, however, as Josephus, Philo, and the LXX., it (like the Hebr. צָו) very often denotes (as Gen. xliii. 34) drinking freely, and the hilarity consequent, which is probably the sense here. It is to be considered, however, that the Architricleus is not speaking of the guests present, but only makes a general observation as to what was usual.

—σὺ τετήρηκας τὸν καλόν, &c.] To preclude the idea of any deception as to the water thus become wine, our Lord orders it first to be carried to the Director of the feast, who being by his office obliged to observe the strictest sobriety, could not but pronounce correctly as to the quality of what was thus handed to him by the servants.

11. ταύτην τὴν ἀρχὴν] for τ. τὴν πρῶτην. So Heb. iii. 14, τὴν ἀρχὴν τῆς ὑποστάσεως for τὴν ὑπόστασιν τὴν πρῶτην, and Heb. v. 12.

—σημείων] Σημείον properly signifies, 1. a mark or token, by which any thing is known to be what it is, and distinguished from something else; 2. a pledge or assurance, taken in evidence; 3. a token of Divine interposition, A MIRACLE, either 1. in confirmation of the Divine power or legation of the worker of it; or 2. a miracle simply; in which case it is either joined with τέρας, or stands by itself. A miracle may be defined, with Bishop Malby, Serm., 'every sensible deviation from, and every seeming contradiction to, the laws of nature, so far as they are known to us.' 'By thus expressing myself,' says the learned Prelate, 'I would guard against an objection which has been made to the language employed by some advocates, as well as enemies of Christianity, when they represent miracles as violations of the laws of nature.' Dr. Brown, a profound metaphysician, and the successor of the celebrated Dugald Stewart, contends that miracles,

à priori, are possible; that they are not violations of the laws of nature, and are capable, under certain circumstances, of being made credible by testimony. 'The possibility,' says Dr. Brown, 'of the occasional direct operation of the power which formed the world, in varying the usual course of its events, it would be in the highest degree unphilosophical to deny; nor can we presume to estimate the degree of its probability. The laws of nature, surely, are not violated when a new antecedent is followed by a new consequent; they are violated only when the antecedent being exactly the same, a different consequent is the result. A miracle is not a violation of any law of nature. It involves, therefore, primarily, no contradiction, nor physical absurdity. It has nothing in it which is inconsistent with our belief of the most undeviating uniformity of nature; for it is not the sequence of a different event, when the preceding circumstances have been the same: it is an effect that is new to our observation, because it is the result of new and peculiar circumstances. The antecedent has been by supposition different; and it is not wonderful, therefore, that the consequent also should be different. While every miracle is to be considered as the result of an extraordinary antecedent, since it flows directly from a higher power than is accustomed to operate in the common train of events which come beneath our view, the sequence which it displays may be regarded, indeed, as out of the common course of nature, but not as contrary to that course.' Such being the case, therefore, I apprehend, a miracle may be defined, 'such an interposition and direct agency of Almighty power, as either 1. brings forward certain phenomena, which, though not at variance with the general laws of nature, are yet effected without being, as consequences, the result of antecedent causes, and which may be termed preternatural; or 2. such a direct agency of omnipotence as produces phenomena which the common course of nature (i. e. the ordinary continuation of antecedents and consequents) never produces; for example, raising the dead, &c. which may be termed supernatural.' In the former class we may number the healing of the sick, the passage of the Red Sea by the Israelites, through the influence of a strong West wind which drove back the waves; the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah. In the latter the passage of the Jordan recorded in the third Chapter of Joshua; the standing still of the sun at the prayer of Joshua, and the change of water into wine; which last (as appears from the citations in Rec. Syn.) was by the heathens regarded as especially evincing divine power. Thus they atti-

ed it to some of their gods; and Philostratus does not hesitate to claim it for his Apollonius.

- καὶ ἐτίσταντοσαν.] The καὶ may be rendered 'accordingly,' as in Matt. xii. 45. xiii. 22. x. 12. Acts vii. 10, and sometimes in the 2.

2. τὸ πάσχα.] The best Commentators, best and modern, are generally agreed that John mentions four Passovers as occurring during Christ's ministry, of which they reckon 'the first; that mentioned at v. 1 the 2d; that at vi. 4 the third; and that at which he suffered as the fourth. Thus his ministry extend to three years and a half.

4. εἶρεν—πωλοῦντας.] It is plain that this instance was prior to, and consequently different from the similar one recorded at Matt. xxi. 12. There, indeed, seems a great propriety in a symbolical action (which denoted the purification of the Jewish religion) being used both at beginning and the close of Christ's ministry. - βόας.] Render, not, 'oxen,' but cattle. A number of victims of all sorts sometimes amounted to 2,500,000, and it is certain from the medical writers that immense traffic was carried on in beasts and birds for victims, and much action practised, a great part of the profits of which accrued to the priests. Even at the best, great indecorum was occasioned.

5. κερματιστοὶ here are the same as the λεῖστοι at Matt. xv. 12; namely, the small of the larger coin into the κέρματα or λεῖστοι, i. e. the smaller.

6. φραγέλλιον ἐκ σχ.] 'a scourge of ropes,' made of rushes, &c., such as were used upon the cattle. We need not, however, say much, if any, made of the φραγέλλιον (and that only to the beasts); this being only meant to serve as a symbol of authority, and, there was no need of stripes. The traffic, conscious of the unlawfulness of their dealings, would not hesitate to obey Christ's actions, especially as the crowd of approving onlookers would be ready to enforce that obedience.] The word denotes any kind of small coin, from κείρω. For the most ancient coins (especially the Oriental) being (like Spanish rials) of a square form, admitted of being cut, so as to form the lesser kind of money. Ἐξέχεις is a term especially suited to the dispersion of minute coin. For ἀνίστραψις some would read ἀνίστραψις, from certain MSS. But though that is more accordant with Classical usage, it is probably a mere gloss. Ἀναστρέφειν was probably used in the common dialect for ἀνατρέπειν. Thus it occurs in Polybius.

16. τὸν οἶκον τοῦ Πατρὸς μου.] Thus claiming to be the Son of God, since the prophets never address the Deity as their Father, but only as their God.

17. ὁ ζῆλος—με.] This brought to the disciples' minds the words of Ps. lxi. 9. Καταφάγει involves an Oriental and lively metaphor, appropriate not only to grief or indignation (as here), but to other of the more vehement emotions; see Job xix. 22. Ζῆλος τοῦ οἴκου σου signifies, not zeal of, but zeal for, as Rom. x. 20, ζῆλον Θεοῦ.

For vulg. κατέφαγε many MSS. and early Editions have καταφάγεται, which is adopted by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz.

18. ἀπεκρίθησαν οἱ Ἰ.] Render, 'Whereupon the Jews addressed him, saying, "What sign (i. e. miracle) shewest thou unto us that thou doest these things?"' The ὅτι may be rendered since; but the other is the more literal version; the sense is, however, the same according to either. But as we have the idiom in our own language, it is better retained in translating. Ποιεῖ ταῦτα savours of an affected moderation, perhaps resorted to from necessity and for fear of the people. The σημεῖον (or proof by miracle) here demanded is in the next verse enigmatically adverted to; our Lord there intimating that, by his resurrection from the dead, he shall furnish the proof of his Divine mission which they demanded.

19. λύσατε τὸν ναόν.] Our Lord here refers his interrogators to the same proof as he had done on another occasion, recorded by Matt. xii. 38. He was also pleased to express his meaning by an acutè dictum, so worded as to draw the attention of the by-standers; the understanding of which, however, was probably aided by action; our Lord perhaps pointing to his own body, the temple of the Logos. Thus the Hebrews used to call the body המקדש, skēnos; see Note on 2 Cor. v. 1. Nay, Philo calls it ισρόν, with reference to the dignity of the soul which tenants it. Indeed, δέμας and δομή (found in the sense of body in Lycophr. Cass. 783) both denote a building; and St. Paul often speaks of the body of a Christian as being a temple of the Holy Spirit. The Imper. has here, as often, a permissive sense (q. d. you may destroy), differing little from the hypothetical one, 'Be it that you destroy my body,' as you have defiled the Sanctuary, and set at nought the remonstrance of the Lord of the Sanctuary, &c. In ἐγερῶ ('I will raise it up') we have an irrefragable proof of Divinity, since such language would be unsuitable to any created being whatever.

III. Ἦν δὲ ἄνθρωπος ἐκ τῶν Φαρισαίων, Νικόδημος 1

20. τεσσαράκοντα—οὔτος.] 'Forty and six years hath this Temple been a building.' A rendering permitted by the use of the Aorist, and required by facts. For though it was then the 46th year since the time when Herod commenced the building, it was not yet completed. Herod formed it on a dilapidated one originally erected by Zorobabel, using the old materials, and sometimes building on the old foundations. In consequence of which, and especially as it was raised by parts, the old buildings being gradually pulled down, and new ones erected in their place, so the edifice was still commonly called Zorobabel's, and the second Temple.

22. ἐπίστευσαν τῇ γραφῇ] i. e. By a comparison of those parts of the Old Test. (including Ps. xv. 10) which predict the Messiah's rising from the dead, with the words of Jesus, treasured up in their minds, and the fact of his resurrection, they thoroughly believed what the Scriptures declared, and were convinced of the Divine mission of Jesus. Πιστεύω here simply signifies to believe, though in the next verse it is used, as generally in the New Test., of faith in Jesus, as the Messiah.

23. ἐν τῇ ἑορτῇ.] Rendor, 'during the time of the feast.' Before Ἱεσορ. many MSS. and early Editions have τοῖς, which is adopted by Bengel, Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz.

— ἐπίστευσαν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα α.] Their faith, however, as appears from what follows, was but an external and historical, not an internal and vital one. The understanding was convinced, but the will was not subdued to obedience.

— τὰ σημεῖα.] What these were, we know not. But from this passage, and from iv. 45, and vi. 2, it is certain that Christ worked many miracles not recorded by the sacred writers.

24. οὐκ ἐπίστευσαν ἰ. αὐ.] either 'did not trust his person to them;' or rather, 'did not place implicit confidence in them, carried himself cautiously towards them.' Why? 'because he well knew them all;' not all men, which would be a harsh ellipsis. Verse 25 is explanatory; and showing the how: i. e. since his knowledge was not from others, but self-derived, and complete; penetrating to the very heart, Ps. vii. 9. Καὶ ὅτι is an exegetical formula, meaning, 'Et quidem ut,' equivalent to Nec, as the Pesch. Syr. renders, or Et non, as the Pers., Arab., and Ethiop. The passage supplies one of the strongest proofs of Christ's Divinity; omniscience being the attribute alone of Deity; see 1 Kings viii. 39.

III. We are now advanced to a most important narrative, in which, as it has a bearing on the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel, more than usual care should be taken to trace the true intent of the Evangelist in recording this transaction; and to ascertain the real import of the terms in which it is expressed. Now the design of the sacred historian was here, as in other parts of his Gospel, to set forth the glory of the Lord; and, in the present instance, especially to illustrate his omniscience. Another important point, as a key to unravelling the difficulties of the whole portion, is the true character and real motives of Nicodemus in seeking this interview. Then, however, no little obscurity exists, since on these points we have no direct information from the Evangelist, but are left to collect the required information from the narrative itself, which, while it doubtless contains the substance of what was said by our Lord, yet probably records but a part of what was said, at least, by Nicodemus. Hence no little diversity of opinion exists as to the character and motives of this ruler. Some ascribe to him integrity, candour, and diffidence, united, however, with timidity; and they suppose his motives in seeking this interview to have been of the most honourable kind. Others paint his character in very different colours, ascribing his ins to pride, cloaked under pretended humility, refinement, and dissimulation, subservient to a purpose of treachery. Between these opposite views a middle course will probably conduct us nearest to the truth. We may suppose him to have been proud, and at the same time timid, and in a great degree worldly-minded man; and though, it should seem that, in his character, the good predominated above the evil; and his motives in this visit appear, upon the whole, to have been good. If this Nicodemus was (as is generally thought) the Nicodemus of whom so much is said in the Rabbinical writers, we may gather some information, which will prove important towards ascertaining his real character and views. He is there described as a man of unbounded wealth, of magnificent liberality, and of piety the most ardent; inasmuch that they ascribe to him the working of miracles. His splendid fortunes were, however, they say, attended by a reverse almost as great as that of Job. If to this we add, (which we learn from the Evangelist,) his official character, as a Ruler, and his high renown for learning, as the teacher of Israel, we have the picture tolerably complete. Now it is obvious, that a person so circumstanced,—with much to lose, and nothing, in a worldly point of view, to gain, by any change of religion in the Jewish nation,—would be naturally disposed to favour the present state of things, and to be tardy in embracing a new religion; and especially one so persecuted and evil spoken of as the Christian. No person of his rank in life had hitherto embraced it; and, accordingly, he might think that great caution was necessary on his part. Uneasy doubts had probably long weighed on his mind. His reason was, on due inquiry, convinced that the evidence of the Messiahship of Jesus was of the strongest kind; and he could not but consider, with alarm, that would be his punishment if he neglected so great salvation. But to yield to these convictions, and openly embrace the Gospel, involved sacrifice of the severest kind; all that was considered valuable in life, nay, probably life itself. Now Nicodemus was not one of those who are ready to give up all for religion's sake. In short, with many prejudices of the mind, was, doubtless, also a latent unsoundness of the heart. His conclusions of the reality of our Lord's pretensions had probably been gradual, but were now decided. As he was not prepared to make those unsparing sacrifices, which the circumstances of his case demanded. Not venturing openly to avow what he secretly believed, he resolves, like most timid and selfish men, to steer a middle course; and, in the usual expedient of cowardice, seeks to that privately which he was afraid to do publicly; and, accordingly, seeks an interview by night, in order to be secretly admitted to discipleship. From the manner in which that interview was conducted, it is plain that our Lord had penetrated into his real character. And if we turn in mind the various prejudices and infirmities of the man, in conjunction with his recent conversion, but not deeply rooted, faith in Christ,—we shall be enabled to ascertain the real scope of what our Lord addressed to him. It seems to have been the especial intent of our Lord first to humble that pride of rank, wealth, and talents, which had, it seems, induced Nicodemus to think that Jesus would receive him as his convert on easier and less humiliating terms than those which he required from the people at large; namely, that of submitting to public baptism, and thus owning his need of repentance, and a total change of character. We cannot, of course, ascertain precisely the nature of the information for which Nicodemus meant to have applied, had he been allowed to propound all his inquiries. But they were probably on the nature and properties of true religion, and the way in which those imperfections which he could not fail to discern in the Jewish might be remedied. He commences the conversation with a sort of half-proud, half-flattering compliment, expressive of the conviction of himself and all who weighed the evidence of miracles to prove a divine mission, that Jesus was at least a teacher sent from God. Whether Jesus were the MESSIAH or not, Nicodemus was probably uncertain; and perhaps one chief purpose of his visit was to ascertain that point, in a close and confidential interview. Fluctuating between hope and fear, doubt and conviction, he was resolved to know how far the doctrines of Jesus, when stated in private and confidential communication, did, or did not, coincide with the notion which he had formed of the Messiah: see a Sermon of Bp. Heber on the character of Nicodemus, to which I have been much indebted in the foregoing observations.

1. ἦν δέ.] The δέ ought not to have been passed over in our Translation, but rendered now; for it has a continuative and explanatory, or exemplificatory force, as in Mark iv. 37. John vi. 10. Acts xxiii. 13. Rom. iii. 22. 1 Cor. x. 11. xv. 56. Accordingly there is (though the Editors and Commentators have failed to perceive it) a connexion of this portion, vv. 1. 21, with the foregoing narration; and the narration is resumed at ver. 22. The purpose of the Evangelist was to illustrate our Lord's intimate acquaintance with men's characters, and perfect knowledge of the human heart; of which the present transaction affords a remarkable example.

2. τὸν Ἰησοῦν.] Many MSS. and some Versions have αὐτόν, which was approved by Mill and Bengel, and edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz. I have not, however, thought proper to follow their example; since, while external evidence is certainly not superior, for the new reading, internal is at least equally balanced between that and the common reading. When, then, it is considered that τὸν Ἰησοῦν was, at xix. 39, altered to αὐτόν in the most ancient of those MSS. for no better a reason than to remove a tautology, little dependence can be placed on their authority here. This, then, is a case in which antiquity of text, not of parchment and ink, ought to decide; and therefore the ancient ecclesiastical reading is here to be preferred. Accordingly, I have retained the common reading, supported as it is by the earliest of the ancient Versions, and the Ed. Princps.

3. ἀπεκρίθη—ἐὰν μὴ, &c.] It is, with great probability, supposed by Beza, Calvin, Lampe, Tittman, and Kuinoel, that this reply of our Lord interrupted Nicodemus in his address; and that, in order to increase his faith, by evincing his perfect knowledge of what was passing in the mind of the Jewish teacher, our Lord, without waiting till he should have propounded his inquiries, anticipated him, by replying to them, while only in thought. What those inquiries were, has been much disputed. The earlier Commentators suppose them to have been on the mode of attaining eternal salvation; but most recent Expositors, on the person of the Messiah, and the nature of the salvation to be expected. There is, however, no reason why these views may not be united. The question, however, hinges on the force of the expression γεννηθῇ ἄνωθεν. Many recent Expositors (as Rosenmüller and Kuinoel) maintain that it here denotes a total change of sentiment and opinion as to the Messiah, the nature of his kingdom, and the benefits thereof. But no proof has been made out, that the expression in question was ever used merely of a change of sentiments and views. Besides, it is plain, from a comparison of these words with those at vv. 5, 7, that such cannot be the sense here intended. It should seem that our Lord did not intend to advert to any particular heads of inquiry meant to be propounded by Nicodemus, but to cut off all such discussions at once, by laying the axe at the root of the prejudices and errors, which struggled with his faith, and made him only half a believer, declaring that there must be an entire change of heart, disposition, &c., as implied in the sincere embracing of a new and spiritual religion, before he could hope for salvation through the Messiah. The expression ἄνωθεν γενν. is plainly equivalent to ἀναγεννηθῆναι, or παλιγγενεσία, which denotes properly a new birth, but figuratively a complete alteration and thorough reformation. Our Lord, however, evidently intended more than even that,—as appears from ver. 5, which is of no little importance in determining the sense here. That Nicodemus understood his words in the manner above explained, there can be no doubt; for the expression was a common one among the Jews to signify an entire change of heart and life; though it was almost always connected with baptism as the symbol or pledge of it. The expression, therefore, of Nicodemus, in his answer, ver. 4, γεννηθῆναι and δεύτερον γεννηθῆναι, must not be taken, with many Expositors, in a physical, but in a moral and metaphorical sense, q. d. 'As it involves not only a physical impossibility, but a moral unfitness, for an aged man to be born again, so it involves as great a moral unfitness for such a person to be figuratively born again by a total change of mind and heart.' He meant, doubtless, to hint that there would be a far greater moral unfitness in this case, a man of his great consequence in all respects; such as ought to exempt him from ordinary probations and empty ceremonies. To this our Lord replies by simply repeating his former assertion; and, though he retains the same figure, he varies its form, to set forth the full extent of what was required of him. Now the expression δεύτερον γεννηθῆναι was so commonly used by the Jews to denote a total change of religion, from heathenism to the worship of the one true God; but it was also applied to the entire change of heart and purification of mind, typified by the ceremony of baptism. That the term ὕδατος must be understood of baptism, is plain from Titus iii. 5, and other passages.

—ἰδοὺ τὴν βασιλείαν τ. Θ.] Dr. Robinson, in his Lexicon, in v., explains this, 'enjoy the privileges of the kingdom of God' (i. e. the Gospel). Comp. iii. 36, οὐκ ὁφείλεται ζωὴν, &c.

5. The purpose of this verse seems to be to set forth the indispensable necessity of this regeneration by water and the Spirit, in order to the attaining of everlasting salvation; for that, as the mere natural, or animal, life depends upon flesh and blood, so does the spiritual life depend upon the baptism by water and by the Spirit.

The expression εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τὴν βασ. v. 5, is by Dean Turtton (against Wiseman) understood to mean 'become a true member of the Christian society about to be established.'

8. The argument here is, that, however strange this two-fold regeneration may seem, it is not to be thought impossible, any more than many wonderful phenomena in the natural world; which are obvious to the senses, though their cause defy all explanation. In order to illustrate a p that truth by something familiar to the senses, as Lord subjoins a popular example from the mid—on the causes of which, or its laws, (as Volger, an eminent writer on physics, has shown,) we are quite ignorant. Inasmuch that, as Wolf, Wolfstein, and others have proved, both the Hebrews, and the ancients in general, used to signify any thing unknown or obscure by comparing it with the wind. Thus, in like manner, I would have, Xen. Mem. iv. 3. 14, in proof of the existence of the ἀόρατα ἐκ τῶν γιγνομένων, notices the thunder and lightning, and the noise. Of which latter his words are, ἃ οἱ ἄνθρωποι φανερὰ ἡμῖν ἐστί, καὶ προσκόντων οὐκ ἀποθανόμεθα. Ἀλλὰ μὴν καὶ ἀνθρώπου π ψυχῇ, εἴπερ τι καὶ ἄλλο τῶν ἀνθρωπίνων, ὡς ζῆλον μετρίχει· ὅτι μὴ γὰρ βασιλεύει ἡ ψυχὴ φανερὸν, ὁράται δὲ οὐδ' αὐτή.

In ἔπον ζῆλου there seems an allusion to the wisdom of Divine grace, both as to nations and individuals. The words οὕτως ἐστί πᾶς ὁ γνησιμότης ἐκ τοῦ Πνεύματος are intended to copy the comparison; meaning that there are marks of resemblance between the effects of the God in nature, and those of the Spirit in him who is born of the Spirit; and that they are of a kind which every one must ascribe to the Author of all good. He cannot, indeed, trace the exact reason by which that heavenly agency was employed for this effect; but he does not the less believe its reality.

2. On hearing this, Nicodemus, partly perplexed with what seemed obscure, and partly offended with what, though he understood, he was not prepared to receive, exclaims, with unexpressed surprise, πῶς δύναται ταῦτα γινέσθαι; a mode of expression which involves a modest request for further information. Our Lord, however, before he communicated this, was pleased to humble his pride by adverting to his ignorance of what, as 'a teacher of Israel,' he might have known; because the Prophets of the Old Testament, though obscurely, intimated these truths; as Isaiah xlix. 21. lxi. 8. Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27. ἔπον 9, 10. His humiliation must have been increased, if the expression ὁ διδάσκαλος, in our Lord's reply, should mean, as Bp. Middleton, with great reason, supposes, 'the teacher of Israel,' a title which he aptly compares with those men, in the middle ages, to the great Schoolmen; one of whom was called the Angelic Doctor, another, the Admirable, and a third, the Irreprehensible. So Winer, Gr. § 17. 4, says, Nicodemus was called by contrast with others, and consequently κατ' ἐξοχήν; and refers to various Critics on this idiom.

ployed agreeably to the usage of persons in authority (see Mark iv. 30). The next clause ὁ μαρτ. is still more significant than that which preceded. And both are expressive of that complete knowledge which the Son, as united with God the Father, could not but possess. There is also implied knowledge by a virtue of his own, and not by revelation.

12. Having at verse 11 asserted the authority with which he was invested as a teacher sent from God, and made his claim to absolute truth in every statement, and unerring wisdom in every doctrine, our Lord here points out the improbability of producing conviction in greater matters, when his endeavours to convince upon the smaller had been thus unsuccessful. 'If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things?' as much as to say, The same absence of impartial inquiry—the same disposition to measure every tenet offered to your consideration by your own confined views or crooked prepossessions—the same unwillingness to examine the grounds upon which, as Teacher of Israel, you have erected your pretensions to superior sanctity and sanctity,—these very same causes, which prevent you from believing what is more obvious to your understanding, will betray you into still more criminal incredulity, when I expatiate upon a subject of far greater difficulty and moment. By τὰ ἐπίγεια are (as B. L. Raphelius has shown) denoted earthly doctrines, such as that of regeneration by water and the Spirit, so called because they are things done upon earth, and therefore to be comprehended. By ἐπουράνια (as the same writer proves) are meant the purposes of God for the salvation of man, involving the doctrines mentioned in the subsequent part of this discourse, and also other doctrines, which, though not adverted to in this conversation, were afterwards revealed by the Holy Spirit; namely, the mysterious union of Christ with God, and His being subject unto death not only for the Jews, but for the Gentiles; such as are by St. Paul termed μυστήρια.

13. The connexion may be thus traced: 'Yet to one alone, even the Son of Man, belongs the knowledge of these heavenly things. He alone knoweth and can declare the counsels of God.'

— οὐδεὶς ἀναβίβ., &c.] Literally to ascend to heaven could not apply to our Saviour; for his ascension had not yet taken place. The expression must be taken figuratively, to denote the investigation of hidden things, for which Christ, who came down from heaven, was peculiarly qualified; see Smith's Scrip. Test. vol. ii. 103. The phrase ἀναβαίνειν εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν is here used agreeably to the language commonly employed of one who announced any revelation; q. d. that he had ascended to heaven and fetched his knowledge from thence. Of ὃ ὦν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ the sense is, 'whose proper dwelling-place is in heaven.' Render: 'And no one has ever ascended to heaven to bring down this knowledge from heaven, nor can any one, except the Son of Man, reveal the counsels of God for the salvation of man; i. e. 'No one knoweth the counsels of God but he who came down from God; see Deut. xxx. 11, 12, compared with Rom. x. 6, where see Note. Christ, then, who literally had been in heaven, is figuratively said to have ascended thither, because, being in the bosom of his Father, he had the fullness of knowledge in heavenly things.

14. Our Lord does not content himself with stating that Nicodemus would not believe, if he told him of heavenly things, but he points out his own peculiar knowledge of these things, showing that no mere man hath so understood these heavenly things as the Son of Man, who came down from heaven to reveal them. Having asserted that the Jews would not believe him when he spoke of heavenly things, and declared, that the knowledge of these is peculiarly his who had been in heaven; he selects a most striking instance of that which the Jews refused to admit, and which he himself knew and came to reveal. He simply lays before Nicodemus two of the purposes of Divine wisdom for the salvation of men, which unassisted reason never could have pointed out—purposes which, till revealed, might well be called mysteries—purposes which, having been revealed, instead of being any longer mysterious to the human mind, became at once level to our comprehensions, credible to our reason, and such as powerfully to interest our affections. Now Nicodemus had, in common with other Pharisees, looked for the temporal advantages of the Messiah's kingdom, and his imagination arrayed him in all the pomp of earthly majesty. But what says Christ? 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up.' Was not, then, the doctrine of a crucified Redeemer one of those heavenly things, which Nicodemus and his countrymen were most unlikely to receive? Was it not a doctrine, the knowledge and communication of which was reserved for that exalted Being who came down from heaven?

This doctrine, however, of a suffering and dying Messiah, our Lord as yet, for good reasons, revealed under the veil of figure and enigma; and though the saying was intended to stimulate Nicodemus's attention, it was, we may suppose, very imperfectly comprehended by him then; though he would afterwards bring it to mind, and both see the full truth, and recognise a solemn prediction fulfilled.

It is a point somewhat disputed, whether or not this brazen serpent was meant to be a type of Christ crucified. Almost all the ancient, and nearly all the modern Commentators up to the middle of the last century, maintained the former. But the latter has (after Gregorius Nazianzenus) been supported by nearly all the best Commentators since the time of Vitrings. There is, they think, only a comparison, consisting, 1. in Christ's being suspended on the cross as the brazen serpent was suspended aloft by Moses; 2. that as all who looked with faith upon the serpent were cured of the bite of the fiery serpents, so will all who have faith in a crucified Saviour not perish, but have everlasting life.

15. ἵνα πᾶς—αἰώνιον.] Our Lord here adverts to the purposes and the effects of his being thus lifted up. And this he does both negatively and affirmatively. Now those purposes were, 1. to save the human race from utter perdition by sin, original and actual; 2. to acquire for them eternal salvation. The effects were, 1. deliverance from perdition; and 2. restoration to that favour of God which is 'better than life.'

16—21. Most recent Commentators regard these verses as the words, not of Jesus, but of the Evangelist. This they argue from certain repetitions, the style, and other matters of doubtful disputation. But there is no reason to abandon the common opinion, that they are a continuation of our Lord's discourse.

16. Τὸν κόσμον is, as Grot., Lightf., and Tittman remark, meant to show that the salvation to be attained by the Saviour, was to be extended to all the nations of the earth, even every individual of the human race, in contradiction to the notion of the Jews, that he would come to bless and save their nation alone. Comp. 1 John i. 2. 'Ἐδωκεν is here equivalent to παρίδωκεν, and signifies, 'hath delivered him to death; implying that he was a ransom for a sinful world. (Comp. Luke xxii. 19. Rom. viii. 32. Gal. i. 4.)

17. It is observed by Tittman, that what is said from v. 17. to 21. is levelled against the Jewish notion, that the Messiah would come for the benefit of the Jews only, nay, would rather destroy the Gentiles.

—οὐ γὰρ ἀπέστειλεν, &c.] Kρίναι is said to be for κατακρίναι, and to have the sense punish and destroy. Here it is declared that God sent his Son into the world, not to exercise arbitrary judgment and inflict punishment, on any nation of the world, but that every one of them, through his atonement and satisfaction, might be put into the way of salvation.

18. The same truth is here repeated, but so as to show that there will be no distinction between

ο πιστεύων εἰς αὐτὸν· οὐ κρίνεται· ὁ δὲ μὴ πιστεύων ἤδη ^a κρίνεται, ὅτι μὴ πεπίστευκεν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ μονογενοῦς ^b οὐ τοῦ Θεοῦ. and Gentile, since every one, of whatever will have part in this salvation. Our however, engrafs upon it another sentiment; κρίνεται, namely, — that he who refuses of salvation, is for this not only doomed to ruin, but is already as good as punished, so is his condemnation; nay, is self-condemned, and past all hope of salvation. By a mode of expression it is said by Joseph. l. 8, 6, that the Essenes thought that he cannot be believed without resorting to an ἡ κατεγνώσθαι.

ἡ δὲ κρίσις, &c.] By this (as we observe) it is intimated that unbelief is speculative mistake, into which any honest may be led, but originates in the enmity of man to God; so that this is the ground of man's condemnation,—that light is come into the world, but men refuse to receive the truth coming with the fullest evidence, and the gracious offer of salvation; 'in (to use the words of the Apostle, 2 Cor. i. 12) the God of this world hath blinded the eyes of them which believe not, so that the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ should not shine into them.'

II. The sentiment at the last clause of v. 18 is illustrated, and the discourse concludes with a sentiment of general application (intended for Pharisees at large), showing the evil effects of unbelief on all inquiries after truth, and (to use the words of an old writer), that truth is against a man, a man is against

as well as words.' Indeed, as Bp. Warburton has finely observed in his Sermon on 2 Pet. i. 5. 'Truth and Virtue are twin-born sisters, with only a name of distinction; truth being speculative virtue, and virtue practical truth.' Accordingly, the Heb. עֲדָרָה, truth, comes from the Arabic root عَدَرَ, 'to be right and just.' The opposite ψευδός occurs in Rev. xxi. 27. xxii. 5.

— ἐν Αἰνῶν] i. e. agreeably to the will of God. 22—24. Soon after this conversation our Lord left Jerusalem, and withdrew into the more retired parts of the country, where he preached and collected followers, and his more stated disciples baptized them.

22. εἰς τὴν Ἰουδ. γῆν.] Not, 'into the land of Judæa,' since any one in Jerusalem must necessarily be in Judæa; but, as Wolf, Lampe, and Kuin, interpret, 'the territory of Judæa, as distinguished from its metropolis.' So Luke v. 17. vi. 17, and not unfrequently in the Sept., as Josh. viii. 1, 'I have given into thy power the king of Ai,' καὶ τὴν πόλιν αὐτοῦ καὶ τὴν γῆν αὐτοῦ. So Jerusalem and its χώρα (which is the more usual term) are distinguished infra xi. 55. Thus also in Thucyd. the χώρα of Attica is sometimes mentioned in opposition to its metropolis, exactly as we oppose town and country.

It is not said to what place our Lord went, to hold his baptism. We may, I think, not improbably conjecture it to have been Bethany, or Bethabara, where John had been baptizing; on which see Note supra i. 28. It should seem that John had removed from Bethabara to Ænon, in order that the Samaritans might the more conveniently come to his baptism.

— ἐβαπτίζεν.] Namely, through the medium of his disciples; for Christ did not himself baptize. See iv. 2. Thus what a king's servants do, is often spoken of as done by himself. Our Lord declined himself baptizing, because baptism bound the persons to religious obedience to himself, and might therefore, with less ostentation, be administered by another. Partly, too, because of the evil which might have attended it, from the persons baptized by himself overvaluing themselves on that account.

23. ὕδατα πολλὰ] 'many streams;' meaning, from the adjunct, much water. At παρεγίνοντο and ἐβαπτ. supply ἄνθρωποι.

ἡ φαῦλα πράσσωσιν.] The Present tense is used to denote habitual action. Πράσσει, acteth. On ἐλεγχθῇ see Note at Ephes. v. 13. See Note on Thucyd. vi. 38. No. 15.

ὁ δὲ ποιῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν.] The idea of truth, and in some other passages of the New Testament, is that of rectitude and goodness, as in 1 to what is wicked and vicious. So in xxii. 6. ἀλήθεια is opposed to ἀδικία. Yet ποιῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν is so rare, that it is supposed peculiar to St. John. This, it is overtaken by the fact, that it often is used by the Rabbinical writers. Its propriety is indicated by the remark of Doddridge, here really is a truth or falsehood in actions

25. ζήτησις] for συζήτησις, 'disputation,' as in Acts xv. 2. At ἐκ τῶν μαθ. Beza, Grotius, Middleton, and Kuinoel supply τις, certain of; an ellipsis not unfrequent after a Genitive, but here not necessary to be resorted to, since ἐκ, like the Heb. מִן, may mean 'on the part of;' and thus the same sense will arise as if τις had been written. Instead of the common reading Ἰουδαίου, very many Versions and Fathers have Ἰουδαίον, which is preferred by most Commentators, and adopted by almost all the Editors from Wetstein to Scholz; and with reason; for the ellipsis of τινός is frequent, whereas that of τινῶν would be anomalous. Besides, the change of Ἰουδαίου into Ἰουδαίον was likely to take place, from the plural just before. This Jew may be supposed to have been one of those who had been baptized by Christ's disciples.

— περὶ καθαρισμοῦ.] The meaning here is not quite clear. Some understand this of the comparative merit, or efficacy, of John's baptism with that of Jesus, or the various ceremonial washings founded on tradition. This, however, is a sense which cannot well be elicited from the words. It should seem that the discussion was on the nature, efficacy, and necessity to Jews of baptismal purification; as καθαρισμός signifies in 2 Pet. i. 9: which, however, was closely connected with another on the comparative efficacy of the baptism of John, or that of Jesus, with the Jewish. If the nature of Christ's baptism were duly considered, it might well be thought that that of John was unnecessary.

'The Jews (as Calvin remarks) had many modes of purifying besides those appointed in the Law. Thus that a new rite of this kind, in addition to the abundance of them which they already had, should be introduced by John and by Christ, they thought absurd.'

26. ἦν μετὰ σου.] Namely, for baptism; meaning, 'was baptized by thee.' The words οὐ μεμαρτ. perhaps have reference, not so much to the testimony borne by John to Jesus, as to the increase of Jesus's celebrity, and credit consequent on it. They thought that John, through excess of modesty, had exaggerated the dignity of Jesus; whom it is plain they did not consider as the Messiah. Indeed, they seem (as Mr. Scott observes) to have obliquely censured our Lord, and intimated, that John ought to retract the testimony he had given in his favour.

The οὗτος implies not (as Wetstein imagines) contempt, but rather ill-will. Πάντως, for οἱ πολλοί, very many; by an hyperbole usual in the language of those who speak under the influence of passion and prejudice. Ἐρχονται πρὸς αὐτόν, 'resort to him.'

27—30. John here reproaches their jealous feelings for the honour of their master, by showing that there was no real ground for them. To avoid, however, the impropriety of any seeming comparison, where none could exist, he gets rid of personality, by couching what he has to say under a moral maxim of general application—that all superiority and success comes from God, and therefore ought not to excite envious feelings in those whose progress seems impeded by it. In this it is implied that no one entrusted with a Divine commission must exceed his commission. John then proceeds to show that he has ever acted on this principle; reminding them of his public and private avowal, that he was not the Messiah, but only his Forerunner. And he takes the opportunity of bearing still stronger testimony to Jesus's Messiahship than he had before done.

29. ὁ ἔχων τὴν νύμφην, &c.] The subject is here illustrated by a similitude derived from common life (as in Matt. ix. 15. and Mark ii. 18); in which the Baptist compares Christ to the bridegroom at a marriage feast, and himself to the εὐφραννύμφος, or bridesman, i. e. a friend who had been employed to negotiate the marriage, and had acted as his agent throughout the whole affair. There were indeed two such persons; one on the part of the bridegroom, the other on that of the bride; who, as they at first, before the marriage, acted as agents, so they afterwards served as mediators, to preserve harmony between the new-married pair. The allusion to εὐφραννύμφος χαίρει διὰ τὴν φωνὴν τοῦ νυμφίου is variously traced. But the words are, with most probability, supposed to allude to the ceremony of the famini interview, previous to marriage, of the betrothed pair; who were brought together by the bridegroom into a private apartment, at the door of which they were themselves stationed, so as to be able to distinguish any elevation of voice on the part of the future bridegroom in addressing his intended bride; from which, and from the low of it, they would easily infer his satisfaction at the choice made for him by them, and feel corresponding joy.

The sense, then, may be thus expressed: 'As at a marriage the bridegroom is the principal person, and his bridesman willingly cedes to him the preference, and, rejoicing in his acceptance, is content to play an under part, so do I willingly

 Περλερ, 'is consummate.' An expression
 (as Schoettgen observes) used by the Rabbinical writers to denote the bliss of a future state; ex.
 gr. Sohar Chadasch, p. 42, 2. 'They exercise themselves in the praises of God, and thus is their joy made complete.'

30, 31. The Baptist goes yet further, and, to cut off all future occasion for comparison, shows that there will be less and less room for it; since the celebrity of the one must increase, that of the other decrease; and so resplendent will be the glory of the former, as to cast that of the latter entirely into the shade, and cause it to fade away like the morning star, or the waning moon, at sunrise. (Euthym. and Tittman.) At v. 31.
 is shown the vast difference between Christ and all others, and his infinite superiority to them.

31—36. It has been not a little disputed whether these are to be considered as the words of John the Baptist, or of the Evangelist. The latter is the opinion of many recent Commentators, and is grounded on the style and manner being like that of the Evangelist. But such is surely a precarious sort of argument. And accordingly it is better (with almost all ancient and most modern Commentators) to adopt the former view. For, as Tittman remarks, 'there is a complete connexion of these words with the preceding, without the interposition of any expression, from which it could be inferred that what follows is from the Evangelist.
 Nor is there any reason why he should have subjoined these words, and chosen to confirm by his own judgment the testimony of the Baptist; which must have been to his readers deserving of entire credit. On the other hand, there are obvious reasons why this portion should be from John the Baptist; for in it he seems to have intended to confirm what he had just said,—namely, that the precedence is due, not to him, but to Jesus. Indeed the words cannot be the Evangelist's; since, showing all that can be claimed for the force of the not unfrequent hyperbole in οὐδεὶς, these words 'no man receiveth his witness' would confirm by no means a correct representation of the facts of Christian converts at the time the Evangelist wrote.

31. ὁ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρ. ἐρχόμενος.] Supply καὶ ἐκ
 τοῦ οὐρανοῦ λαλεῖ, to correspond to ἐκ τῆς γῆς λαλεῖ. An antithesis evidently involving the divinity of the Lord Jesus. See Smith's Scripture, vol. ii. p. 118. At δ ἑώρακε καὶ ἤκουσε ἵνα ἴδῃ αὐτοῦ, i. e. ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ. The meaning may be thus expressed: 'A mere man is not endued with that knowledge of divine things, has not that intimate acquaintance with the secret counsels of God, which He possesses who is of celestial origin (to whom God giveth not the Spirit by measure, v. 34.); he therefore teacheth,

 and can teach, only what is earthly, incomplete,
 and imperfect. But he who cometh from God knoweth the counsels and speaketh the words of God; and as he possesses a nature superior to man, so he possesses a knowledge of divine things far above that of the Prophets.'

With the expression ὁ ὢν ἐκ τῆς γῆς Wetstein compares the Classical γηγενής, or γήϊνος, (terrestris) as opposed to οὐράνιος. Very similar are the words of Æschyl. in Stob. Serm. Eth. p. 98.
 τὸ γὰρ βρότειον σπέρμα ἰσχυμείρια φρονεῖ. See also 2 Esdr. iv. 21. 33. Such, however, (he shows)
 as have received this testimony, have no reason to be ashamed of the paucity of their number,
 since they have God as the author of their faith;
 and He is surely abundantly sufficient to them.
 (Calvin.) Our acceptance of God's message by his Son, through an unshaken faith, vouches on our part the faithfulness of God, and the truth of his promises. (Campbell.)

33. ἐσφράγισεν] for ἰδέναι, attests, confirms,
 professes his belief; a metaphor taken from deeds signed and sealed. For as testimonies of contracts were confirmed by the addition of a seal, any confirmation of truth was called σφραγίς; and as,
 by the imposition of a seal, any thing is rendered unsuspected of fraud, hence σφραγίζεω came to mean 'confirm,' as here and in Eph. i. 13. 2 Cor.
 i. 22. Wisd. ii. 5. and in some passages of the Classical writers. Thus the meaning is: 'He who admits this doctrine, doth thereby attest the truth of God in the fulfilment of his promises.'

34. 'What is here said is (as Calvin remarks) confirmatory of the preceding assertion, showing that, in thus receiving Christ, we have in reality
 to do with God, since Christ came from God;
 and God it is who speaks by him.'

— οὐ γὰρ ἐκ μέτρου—Πνεῦμα.] The phrase
 ἐκ μέτρου, with verbs of giving, denotes, by implication, sparingly. And so the Latin ad demen-sum tribuere, or dare. This is said with allusion to the Prophets, the very greatest of whom were allowed by the Jewish Rabbis to have only had the gifts of the Holy Spirit ἐκ μέτρου. Nay, the Law itself they considered as only given *ad
 mensuram*.

35. ἀγαπᾷ τὸν Υἱόν.] Non agitur de vulgari
 amore, quo Deus homines a se condito prosequitur;
 sed de singulari illo qui a Filio incipiens,
 inde ad omnes creaturas manat. (Calvin.)

36. ἔχει.) This is not (as it is commonly supposed) simply for ἔχει; but the Present is used to show the certainty of the thing; q. d. 'it is laid up for him.' Nay, a Present sense may be justified, if we suppose the meaning to be, 'is in possession of that principle, which places him in the pathway of salvation, and which, if it be not his own fault, will terminate in everlasting salvation.' By ὁ ἀπειθῶν is not merely meant 'he who refuseth to yield this faith;' for the expression ἀπειθῶν, instead of μὴ πιστεύων or ἀπιστῶν, was doubtless used to imply disobedience, as well as disbelief; intimating that the faith to which the promise of salvation is here annexed is alone based on a principle of unreserved obedience to Christ. (See Doddridge.) Indeed he who obstinately refuses belief cannot obey. At the same time, even without the antithesis, it would be implied in πιστεύων that his belief was a source of obedience. Upon the whole, the full sense of the passage is well expressed by Bp.
Jebb as follows: 'He who with his heart believeth in the Son, is already in possession of eternal life; he, whatever may be his outward profession, whatever his theoretic or historical belief,
who deceiveth not the Son, not only does not possess eternal life, he does not possess any thing worthy to be called life at all. But this is not the whole;
for as eternal life is the present possession of the faithful, so the wrath of God is the present and permanent lot of the disobedient; it abideth on him, not being removed by the atoning merits of the Redeemer.'

IV. This decided testimony of the Baptist to the exalted character of Jesus, taken in conjunction with the miracles wrought by the latter, had,
it seems, made considerable impression on the minds of the people, and both attracted the notice and excited the displeasure of the rulers, who sought to lay hold of him. Our Lord, however, it is probable, continued for some time yet in the more remote and retired parts of the country, preaching and collecting disciples. At length, so great was the unbrake taken by the Rulers, that,
to avoid anticipating that which should be, our Lord left Judæa to go into Capernaum; and in his way thither, through Samaria, occurred the conversation here recorded with the Samaritan woman; which, and the circumstances attendant on it, tend not a little to illustrate the real character of our Lord.

1. μαθητὰς ποιεῖ καὶ βαπτίζει ἢ Ἰ. 'is making and baptizing more disciples than John.'

4. ἔδει δὲ αὐτόν δ.] It was so far necessary,
as being a much shorter route than through Pereæ. So Joseph. Vit. 52. says, πάντες ἰδοὶ τὴν ταχὺ βουλομένους ἀπελθεῖν (namely, from Jerusalem to Galilee) δι' ἐκείνης (Samaria) περὶεσθαι. He calls it a three-days journey.

5. ἔρχεται εἰς] 'cometh (came) unto,' i. e. so far as; for from v. 6. it appears that he rested outside of the city, while his disciples entered it, to procure provisions, and on returning from thence found Jesus talking with a Samaritan woman.

— Συχάρ.] This, found in many MSS. for Vulg. Συχα, has been received by all the best Editors. The place was originally called Συρία, from the name of the person of whose family
Jacob bought the land, and built an altar. See Gen. xxxiii. 18. The name is supposed to have been altered by the Jews to Συχάρ, to denote the drunkenness or the idolatry of the inhabitants.

6. κεκοπιακῶς.] Neut. in a passive sense;
as 2 Sam. xvii. 2. On the force of οὕτως just after, a difference of opinion exists. Some render it therefore; others, afterwards; for neither of which significations is there any authority. The true sense seems to be that assigned by the ancient and several eminent modern Commentators, who take οὕτως for οὕτως ὥς ἦν, or ὥς ἐπύχθη
ὥς εἶχε, just as he was, just where it happened, without any pitching of a tent. So Acts xvi.
17. οὕτως ἐφύοντο, 'just as it happened, at the mercy of the winds,' and Hor. Od. ii. 11, 12
'Sub alta vel platano, vel hac Pinu jacentis se temere.' Indeed the situation was well suited to this purpose, since wells or fountains, from their coolness (being in the East almost always shaded by trees), are usually chosen by travellers as places for rest and refreshment. So Pindar.
Vit. Apoll. ἀριστοποιουμένων δὲ αὐτῶν ἐπὶ πηγῇ ὕδατος.

7. γυνὴ ἐκ τῆς Σαμ.] scil. οὕσα, equivalent to γυνὴ Σαμαρεῖτις in the next verse.

— ἀντλήσαι ὕδωρ.] An office which has at all times, in the East, fallen to the women.

ῥλῆσαι ὕδωρ. Λέγει αὐτῇ ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Δός μοι πιεῖν. 1. δός μοι πιεῖν.] The verb is here employed a noun, of which examples abound in the Classical writers. So Athen. p. 4. ἔρχαι αὐτοῖς.

2. πῶς σὺ, Ἰουδαῖος ὢν.] That he was such, had inferred from his dress and language; for the Ephraimitish dialect differed from that of the rest of Israel, as the Galilean from the rest of Judea. (Chrysostom and Lampe.) She expressed wonder at any favour, however small, being asked by a Jew from a Samaritan. So much, in his Gloss. on the Gemara, says, 'it is abomination to eat the bread or drink the wine of a Samaritan.' On the origin of this reciprocal hatred between the Jews and the Samaritans I have treated at large in Recens. Synop. a reason why the woman asked this question, the Evangelist subjoins (for the information of the Greek readers) in the words οὐ γὰρ, &c., πῶς συγχρῶνται must be understood of familiar intercourse and society; thus Euthymius explains οὐ κοινωνοῦσιν; for the intercourse of buying and selling was still kept up. Συγχρῶσθαι signifies properly to use any thing in common with another; which implies more or less of society. In last use, however, is only found in the later writers. The earlier ones employ instead of it ἀλλασσεσθαι, as Thucyd. i. 121.

3. 10—13. Here our Lord does not expressly state the woman's narrow prejudices, but directs attention to matters of far greater importance.

4. τὴν δωρεάν τοῦ Θεοῦ] i. e. the favour which God graciously vouchsafes to thee, in this opportunity of knowing the Messiah, and receiving the offer of free salvation from himself. See m. vi. 25. and compare Acts viii. 10. xi. 17. &c. vi. 4.

5. ὕδωρ ζῶν.] The expression properly signifies running water (as that of fountains and streams), in opposition to the dead, i. e. stagnant, water of pools or cisterns. It occurs in Gen. xxvi. and Levit. xiv. 5. The Classical writers, for the use of the epithets ἀεὶρρῶντος, or αἰνναον; nay use the ἑμφύχον ὕδωρ. In this natural sense a woman understood the expression. But our Lord employed it figuratively for ζωοποιούν. 'It is his custom (observes Kuinoel) from things usual to stir up the minds of his hearers to a study and knowledge of things spiritual.' It is, indeed, common in the Scriptures and the Rabbinical writers to liken unto spring water that which refreshes and blesses the souls of men. See infra vii. 38. Rev. xxi. 6. Prov. x. 11. Ecclus. xv. 3. xxiv. 21, and especially Jerem. ii. 13, which seems the origin of the expression. An image most apt and expressive; since, in the hot countries of the East, pure water is even reckoned among the blessings of life.

6. ἀντλημα] 'a bucket,' such as travellers in the East are accustomed to carry with them; and which, by the aid of the rope and wheel, provided as fixtures at public wells, is sufficient to procure water from the deepest wells.

—οὔτε ἀντλημα ἔχεις, καὶ, &c.] This is by Winer, Gr. § 59. brought under the canon, that 'in two parallel propositions we have sometimes οὔτε, or μήτε, followed, not by a negative particle, but by a simple copula, καὶ or τε; though the latter is more frequent.' Of this he adduces as examples the present passage and 3 John 10, and several from the Classical writers. See also Robinson's Lexicon in καὶ, who regards these passages as exceptions to the continuative force of the particle; namely, where it does not carry forward the negative. But in fact there is no exception at all; the two clauses being, one negative, and the other affirmative. Nor is there any irregularity; for the τε ought to be separated from the οὐ, since it is connected with καὶ in the apodosis, and should, as usual, be rendered by both—and; by which the vigour of the sentiment is always much increased. In such cases, however, it would be proper to write οὐ τε.

7. μετ' αὐτῶν] 'a person of more consequence,' or wiser. This has reference to what our Lord had just before said, 'If thou hadst known who it is that speaketh to thee.' The words following are as much as to say, 'It was good enough for our ancestor Jacob, who himself drank of it, &c.; which he would not have done, if he had known a better. If thou canst show us a better, than wilt, in that respect, be greater than Jacob.' Olivot, i. e. the family in general, including the servants, as in Gen. xlv. 11. This, and the mention of the cattle conjoined, is agreeable to the simplicity of early times, especially in the East.

8. 13. Our Lord does not directly answer her enquiry, but intimates something from which the answer may be inferred; showing that he does superior to Jacob.

14. οὐ μὴ διψήσῃ εἰς τὸν αἰ. i. e. 'shall have nothing more ever to desire.' (See Rev. vii. 16.)
Meaning, that such shall be the vivifying effect of the 'word of life,' as to satisfy the most ardent desires of the soul; which, placing its happiness in God and his worship, no other desire will be thought of; and so like that good spoken of by an ancient Philosopher (Seneca, Epist.) 'quod non fiat in dies deterius, quo non melius possit op-tari.' Also, that such is the nature of that truth, that by its purifying and sanctifying influence on the soul, it is, as it were, an ever-springing fountain of holy affections, producing comfort here, and everlasting happiness hereafter.

— πηγὴ ὕδατος ἀλλομένου, &c.] To drink, Lampe observes, signifies to fully imbibe Christ's doctrine. Of which, and of πηγὴ and also ἀλασθαι, as involving the idea of perennial abundance,
he adduces several examples; and I have myself noted the following. Philostr. Vit. Apoll. iv. 24.
λόγων κρατῆρας ἴσταντο, καὶ ἠρύοντο αὐτῶν οἱ διψῶντες. Plutarch, p. 387. διψῶν ἠρύσατο πηγῆς, namely, the wisdom of Socrates.

15. δός μοι, &c.] It is a matter somewhat disputed whether this was spoken in simplicity, or ironically. The best Commentators, however, adopt the former view, which carries with it the stamp of nature and truth; for that a person of this description should have thus taken our Lord's words in a literal sense, was quite probable. Nay, it was no more than what was done by those other ignorant persons, infra vi. 34, who similarly asked, 'Lord, give us evermore of this bread.'

16. φώνησον τὸν ἄνδρα σου.] This might, at first sight, seem little to the present purpose; but upon a nearer inspection, we shall see how admirably, by this sudden transition from what was above her understanding to something immediately appealing to her conscience, our Lord contrived at once to fix the attention of the woman;
and, by the answer which he knew would be returned, give himself an opportunity of displaying such a supernatural knowledge, as would at once prove him to be a 'teacher sent from God.'

prof Deut. xxvii. 4, 12; and, in order to 'make sure doubly sure,' interpolating the text at v. 4 and changing τῷ Ἐλαί, into τῷ Γεριζίμ. Hence they called it 'the blessed mount,' 'the Holy place.' Not only did the Samaritans then worship on Mount Gerizim, but the remnant of them yet subsisting continue to do so three times in the year, with great solemnity. For ἐν τούτῳ τῷ ὄρει very many MSS. and most of the early Editions have ἐν τῷ ὄρει τούτῳ, which is received by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz. I cannot, however, venture to admit it, the old reading being superior in external authority; and I think in internal, for the new reading seems to be (as the character of several of the MSS. which support it would lead us to suppose) an emendation, though ungrounded; for ἐν τούτῳ τῷ ὄρει conveys, I conceive, a stronger sense (namely, 'in this very mountain,') than ἐν τῷ ὄρει τούτῳ, which latter is very suitable at v. 21, since there we have no emphasis. Grotius and Lampe notice and illustrate the custom (probably ante-diluvial) of worshipping the Deity on mountains, as being thought nearer to heaven; or rather, from high mountains being more suited to elevation, by their being removed from the din of men. So Milton's Paradise Lost, i. 'Sing, heavenly Mnæe, that on the secret top of Horeb or of Sinai,' &c.

21. πίστευσόν μοι.] Our Lord here claims, at least, the belief due to a Prophet, such as the woman acknowledged him to be. ἔρχεται, 'is coming;' namely, at the destruction of Jerusalem. Προσκυνήσετε is not for προσκυνήσουσι by Hebrewism, but is a more pointed expression. Wetstein has shown the exact fulfilment of this prediction, in the overthrow both of the Jewish and Samaritan holy places, by numerous citations from Josephus and the early Fathers.

22. ἔμεις προσκυνεῖτε ὁ οὐκ οἶδατε.] There is here somewhat of obscurity, which has occasioned a diversity of interpretation. Most Commentators refer the ὁ to the Deity, by the ellipsis of θεός, or by taking ὁ for ὅν; meaning, that the Samaritans knew not God aright, by confining him to place. Yet this change, as well as that which others suppose here alluded to, of idolatry, as being disproved by the researches of Reland, Wasse, and Gesenius; of whom Lampe rightly accuses our Lord to charge them, not with corruption, but with ignorance. Yet to confine it, he does, to ignorance of the manner of worship, an unjustifiable limitation of the sense. The most recent Commentators, from Bengel and Burkland to Kuinoel and Tittman, are of opinion as ὁ is to be taken for καθ' ὁ, to denote, not the object of the worship, but the form, with reference chiefly to the manner and form of worship, but also, by implication, including place; q. d. 'Ye worship according to your ignorance, we according to our knowledge;' and consequently in the manner and place appointed by Divine command.

In ὅτι ἡ σωτηρία—Ἰουδαίων there is a repetitio suggested why the Jews should best know the mode and the place of the national worship; namely, since from them, and no others, the promised Saviour (σωτηρία being for σωτήρ, as Luke i. 71. et alibi) was confessedly to spring.

23. ἐν πνεύματι καὶ ἀληθείᾳ.] Here I would neither, with some, take πν. of the Holy Spirit, nor, with others, of the human mind. It should rather seem that ἐν πνεύμῳ. and ἐν ἀλ. are adverbial phrases for πνευματικῶς καὶ ἀληθῶς, of which the former involves a tacit contrast to the letter of the Law, with the spirit of the Gospel (see 2 Cor. iii. 6. Rom. ii. 29. Phil. iii. 3, where γράμματι and πνεύματι are opposed, as the λατρεία λογικὴ in Rom. xii. 1, is opposed to the λ. σαρκική). The latter (ἐν ἀληθείᾳ) has reference to the Gospel as opposed to the Law, which was only, as St. Paul says, (Col. ii. 7. Heb. viii. 5. x. 1.) a shadow of good things to come, not the σῶμα or substance. Thus the πνεῦμα. is meant as opposed to mere rites and ceremonies, and all the forms of external worship.

—καὶ γὰρ ὁ Πατὴρ, &c.] Two reasons are here adduced why God is to be so worshipped. 1. From the sovereign will of the Deity, to whom spiritual and internal worship is alone acceptable. 2. From the nature of the Deity, who is far removed from any thing corporeal; and therefore must be worshipped in a spiritual manner, and also in truth, for he is 'a God of truth' and 'requireth truth in the inward parts.'

24. Πνεῦμα ὁ Θεός.] This is an inverse proposition like that of Θεός ἦν ὁ Λόγος in John i. 1. The Article shows that Θεός is the subject, and Πνεῦμα the predicate; see Middleton. By πνεῦμα is here meant an immaterial and invisible nature, without parts or passions, and not circumscribed by space or limits, as every thing corporeal must be. The expression, however, also involves the attributes and perfections of the Deity, His omniscience, omnipotence, infinite goodness, &c. That the wise Jews had tolerably correct ideas of the spirituality of God, and the necessity of correspondent spirituality in His worship, is plain from various passages of the Rabbinical writers adduced by Schoettgen. That the very Heathens were not quite ignorant of this truth appears from the Classical citations in Lampe and Wetstein; ex. gr. Cato, Dist. i. l. 'Si Deus est animus, nobis ut carmina dicunt, Ille tibi præcipue ut verâ mente colendus.'

compass of three verses we have three variations in the government of the verb προσκυνεῖν. In the New Test. it is used with the Dative, except here and at Matt. iv. 10. Luke iv. 8. The Dative is also used by most of the later Greek writers; while the earlier ones invariably have the Accusative; this being, as Matthiæ observes (Gr. Gr. § 407), one of those many verbs that have an Accusative which does not mark the passive object of the action, but that to which an action has only generally an immediate reference. It should, however, seem that the Dative is used with reference to the προς, since verbs which govern an Accusative out of composition, when in composition only direct the Subst. to the Dative.

25. Though not objecting to what has just been said, she seems not to have been fully satisfied, and therefore was disposed to leave the matter undecided till the advent of the Messiah, who would finally determine these controversies, and give them fuller instructions (Scott). The Jews of that age were accustomed to refer the decision of controverted questions to the coming of future prophets, and especially of the Messiah. And so we find it said by Maimonides (cited by Wetstein): 'When the Messiah comes, all secret and hidden things will be disclosed.' And from what has been recently discovered respecting the opinions of the Samaritans of that age (see Dr. Wait, in a paper of his Repertorium Theolog. on the notions entertained by the Samaritans of the Messiah, or the substance of it under the word Samaritans, in Dr. Robinson's Calmet) it should seem that they expected in the Messiah chiefly a great spiritual Ruler and teacher of religion. Dr. Wait, in the above paper, shows, that in expecting a Messiah, and especially with that greater spirituality than did the generality of the Jews, we must infer that the Samaritans did not, as has been supposed, reject the Prophets, but admitted their authority when it did not seem to clash with the Pentateuch.

— ὁ λεγόμενος Χρ.] The most eminent Critics are agreed that these words are those of the Evangelist, not of the woman. Ἀναγγ., which properly denotes the delivering of a message from one person to another, here involves the idea of what we mean by a Revelation from God; see Note infra xvi. 14.

— πάντα.] Meaning all things relative to the matter in question, the nature of God, and the proper mode and place of his worship.

26. ἐγὼ εἰμι, ὁ λαλῶν σοι.] The reasons why our Lord revealed himself so much more unreservedly to the Samaritans than to the Jews, were, we may suppose, 1. Because the Samaritans were a far better disposed sort of people than the Jews, and therefore more worthy of confidence. 2. Because the reason which induced our Lord to use caution with the latter (namely, to avoid exasperating the Rulers, and thereby anticipating what he should eventually suffer from them) did not apply in the case of the former. 3. Because the Samaritans seem to have had more correct ideas of the nature of the Messiah's kingdom, and therefore would not be likely to abuse what he said to the purposes of sedition, besides that they were orderly and quiet in their habits.

27. ἐπὶ τούτῳ.] Supply χρόνῳ; i. e. super.

— μετὰ γυναικός.] Meaning, 'with the woman,' as being a stranger and a Samaritan, and in so public a place. That the Article τῆς is here implied has been shown by Beza, Delbridge, and Bp. Middleton.

— τί ζητεῖς;] A popular expression, meaning, 'What is your purpose, or business?'

28. ἀφῆκεν τὴν ὑδρίαν αὐτῆς.] Struck with astonishment and filled with joy at such a discovery, she hastens to the city to proclaim the good tidings, forgetting her bucket, or leaving it in order to go the quicker. So the disciples, Matt. iv. 20, follow Jesus, 'leaving their nets.'

29. πάντα.] Meaning, by an hyperbole natural to great excitement of mind, the leading events of her life, on which the rest hinged.

— μήτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ Χρ.;] It has been disputed whether the words should be rendered, 'Is this the Christ?' or, 'Is not this the Christ?' The latter version, however, is quite inadmissible; 1. because there is no authority for μήτι in the textus; 2. Because it is less suitable to the case in question. For the woman seems to have meant, courteously, to propose this rather as a question for their consideration, than to affirm it, at least by implication. In short, the sense expressed in full would be, 'Is this the Christ, or is he not?' The latter member being implied and suggested by the τι indefinite, which applies perhaps. So I would understand Matt. xli. 23, μήτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱὸς Δαυὶδ; besides other passages. The context, indeed, can alone, in such cases, decide whether belief or disbelief is ponderated, and thus determine the exact sense.

31. ἐν δὲ τῷ μεταξύ.] Supply χρόνῳ, which is expressed in Herodian iii. 8. 20.

32. Here we trace our Lord's usual endeavour, from things corporeal, to excite the attention of his disciples to things spiritual.

— βρώσιν ἔχω.] The same figure as at βρώμᾳ ἐστίν, ver. 34. In the Scriptural and Rabbinical phraseology that is said to be any one's meat or drink, by which any one is supported, refreshed, or delighted; numerous examples of which may be seen in Schoettgen. The same mode of speaking, too, occasionally occurs in the Classical writers. So Philo, p. 664, δηλονότι τροφὴν ἔχω ἀμείνων—αὐτὸ ἀναθεὶν ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ καταρρέοντες. Soph. Elect. 363, Brunck. ἐμοὶ γὰρ ἵστω τοῦτέ νιν λυπεῖν μόνον βόσκημα, 'Be it alone my food that I may annoy them.'

The ἔγω is here, as often, emphatic.

33. οὖν.] This, not found in very many of the best MSS. and some Versions, is cancelled by almost all the recent Editors.

35. τετράμηνος.] This, instead of the vulg. τετράμηνον, is found in all the best MSS., several Fathers, and all the early Editions, except the Erasmusian, and has been adopted by every ancient Editor from Wetstein to Scholz. Yet the common reading may possibly be the true one, since τρίμηνον is found in the Sept. and at Hebr. xi. 23; and other forms in —ον from derivations of μήν occur in the later writers, especially the Sept.

Here some difference of opinion exists, whether these words, τετράμηνός ἐστι, καὶ ὁ θερισμός ἐρχεται are to be understood literally, or figuratively. According to the former view, the sense will be, 'Are ye not saying it is four months to harvest-time? but the spiritual harvest is already at hand, and must commence forthwith. See (pointing to the Samaritans coming to him) what an Evangelical harvest is approaching!' Since, however, the above sense is somewhat strained, I should prefer the latter view, by which οὐχ ὑμεῖς λέγετε will mean, 'do ye not commonly say (as if not a saying among you), that when your seed is sowing, ye expect a harvest in four months hence? and thus the husbandman is supported by the distant hope, though yet in the δυσ, of reaping a harvest.' [Therefore heed not labour, when reward is at hand.] As to the objections of Doddridge and others, that no example of such a proverb has been adduced, and that the period in question is not four, but six months, they are of no great weight; for it has been proved that in the East scarcely more than four months intervene between the end of seed-time and the beginning of harvest. Not to say that it is of the nature of hope to lessen what lies in the way to the attainment of its object.

Here, then, it should seem, after declaring that it was his meat, his great delight, to accomplish the work of Him who sent him, our Lord sets forth to his disciples the satisfaction he experienced in anticipating the spiritual harvest just about to be reaped, almost immediately with the sowing of the seed. Then, to induce them to follow his example, he uses three arguments as incentives to diligence: 1. That the harvest they have to reap is near; 2. That the fruits to be gathered are abundant; 3. That the accomplishment of the work has been greatly facilitated by others, meaning the Prophets, the Baptist, and himself.

— λευκαὶ εἰσι.] Meaning a white approaching to yellow, such as accompanies maturity in corn. And so we find the Latin writers using the terms albescere and flavescere indifferently of ripe corn. By χώρας we must rather understand cultivated fields; a rare sense, but occurring elsewhere in St. Luke, and occasionally in the Classical writers.

36. ὁ θερίζων.] Meaning one employed in any sort of harvest-work. Here we have (as Rosenmuller observes) a blending of the apodosis with the comparison. The sense being, 'As the agricultural labourer receives his wages, whether for ploughing and sowing, or for reaping and gathering the corn, so shall ye receive your reward for gathering men unto the kingdom of God; and whether your labour be only preparatory, or such as consummates the spiritual harvest, ye shall alike be blessed with an ample recompense.'

37. ἐν τούτῳ.] Supply πράγματι, 'in this case or instance.'

— ἄλλος ἐστὶν ὁ σπείρων, καὶ ἄλλος ὁ θερ.] A proverb found also in the Classical writers. So an anonymous writer: Οὐ τῷ καλῶς ἄγρον φυτευταμένῳ δῆλον, ὅστις καρπώσεται. The application of the proverb is, that as Moses and the Prophets, and finally John the Baptist, prepared the minds of men for receiving the Gospel from Christ, so will the Apostles reap the harvest of converts for which He had prepared.

38. κεκοπίακατε] 'laboured for,' 'worked out.' Κοπίαν is used of severe toil, such as is required in all the agricultural occupations which precede harvest. Κόπον here means the fruit of labour.

40. δύο ἡμέρας.] He abode there so long, that he might not seem to slight persons desirous to learn; and no longer, that he might not give umbrage to the Jews, by seeming to prefer the Samaritans to them. (Grotius.)

41. ἐπίστευσαν] i. e. professed to believe in him as the promised Messiah.

42. σωτὴρ τοῦ κόσμου] and not of the Jews only. So much more correct on this subject were the ideas of the Samaritans than those of the Jews.

44. αὐτὸς γὰρ ὁ Ἰ.] As this can scarcely be meant to offer a reason why our Lord went to Galilee, some would suppose an omission of certain words to the γὰρ might be suitable, as, 'passing by Nazareth,' or, 'but not coming to Nazareth,' for, &c., as if Nazareth were meant to be distinguished from the rest of Galilee. This is, however, too artificial a mode of removing the difficulty, and is rather cutting than untying the knot. It is far better (with Alting, Schleusner, Tittman, and Kuinoel) to take the γὰρ in the somewhat unusual sense, although, by which the meaning will be, that he returned to Galilee, though, or notwithstanding, he had himself borne testimony to, and in his own case afforded evidence of, the truth of the saying, that a prophet,

&c. He went thither, doubtless, because he foresaw that the Galileans would now receive him more readily than before, on account of the miracle lately wrought at Cana.

45. ἐδέξαντο] gave him a favourable reception.

46. πάλιν ὁ Ἰησοῦς.] This, for the verb Ἰησοῦς πάλιν, is found in very many MSS. and the Ed. Princ., and has been received by Griesbach, Matthæi, Vater, and Scholz, of whom Griesbach, on the authority of a few ancient MSS. and Versions, leaves out ὁ Ἰ. After all, however, the common reading is probably the true one.

— βασιλικός.] On the exact sense of this term some difference of opinion exists. It is with most probability taken to denote (by an ellipse of ἐκκλησίας) a person holding some public office of the court, or under the government of the King; a use of the word found in Polyb. iv. 78. 1. Euseb. Vit. Const. i. 16. Joa. vii. 3. 2. Ant. x. 8. 4.

48. εἰ μὴ—πιστεύετε.] This reproof is supposed by Euthymius, Doddridge, Kuinoel, and Tittman, to have been intended for the byssandians rather than the noblemen. But it should seem to have been directed against the Galileans in general, meaning especially the Nazarenes. The term ἰδῃς is, I conceive, put emphatically, and the whole intended as a reproof of those who, like the Nazarenes, refused to believe in the authority of numerous miracles established on the most credible evidence, but demanded to see them with their own eyes. A request nearly reasonable; since the proof by miracles, however necessary as the evidence of a divine mission, could not fairly be demanded to be brought every day.

30. To show that he could do even more than his father hoped for, and could heal the sick as well as present (in order thereby to totally remove any want of faith in the readers), our Lord dismisses him with the answer that his request is granted. Ζῇ, i. e. all live. So the Heb. גַּי in Josh. v. 8, and so in the Rabbinical writers.

31. κομψότερον ἔσχε.] A popular mode of expression for βελτιώτερον or ρασιότερον, &c. κομψῶς ἔχειν in Arrian Epict. iii. 10, and composere in Latin. Ἀφήκεν implies the suddenness of the cure. So Hippocrat. cited by Her. ἀφήκεν αὐτὸν ὁ πυρετός.

32. τοῦτο πάλιν δεύτερον—[ἐλθὼν.] Some write ἐλθὼν with πάλιν; otherwise, they say, the πάλιν will be useless. This, however, is doing violence to the construction, which πάλιν πάλιν to be taken with δεύτερον. Nor here any thing to stumble at in the pleonasm, similar ones might be adduced from the Classical writers. So πάλιν ἐκ δευτέρου, Matt. xxvi. 1; Acts x. 15, and often in the Classical writers, indeed, it be a pleonasm at all. But it should be remembered that there is a blending of two clauses here, for τοῦτο, πάλιν [σημεῖον ποιῶν] δεύτερον σημ. ἐποίησε, &c.

[i. e. ἑορτή.] Which of the feasts this was, commentators are not agreed. Some think it first of Purim, in our March, about a month into the Passover. Others suppose the Encenia, last of eight days, about the middle of December. Others, again, the Feast of Tabernacles. The most general, and indeed the most probable, view is, that the Passover is meant. And it has been shown by Bp. Middleton, that, notwithstanding the absence of the Article, the Passover is to be, and, on other accounts, probably is so. As an example of a similar omission he adduces xix. 14, ἡν δὲ παρασκευὴ τοῦ Πάσχα.

2. ἐπὶ τῇ προβ.] There is here an ellipsis, which some supply by ἀγορᾶ, or χώρα, or πύλη. This last is preferable, as being a very frequent ellipsis in the best writers, from Homer downwards, and is placed beyond doubt by Nehem. iii. 32. xii. 39, who mentions τὴν πύλην τὴν προβυτικὴν; whereas there is no evidence of there being any such place as the Sheep-market. This is confirmed by the testimony of Sandys, who tells us that 'the gate in question (no doubt the gate of St. Stephen) was called in times past the Gate of the Valley, and of the Flock; for that the cattle came in at this gate which were to be sacrificed in the Temple.'

Κολυμβήθρα signifies properly a bathing-pool; but here it is supposed to denote not the pool only, but the buildings which had been erected around it for the accommodation of the bathers. By Ἑβρ. is meant the Syro-Chaldee, then the vernacular tongue in Judea.

— Βηθεσδά.] The MSS. vary; but there is no reason to doubt the accuracy of the common reading, especially as it is confirmed by the derivation from the Hebr. בֵּית and מִצְוָה, 'house of mercy.' That the bath had medicinal properties is plain; but whence it derived them is not so certain. The older Commentators refer them to supernatural agency; the more recent ones in general to natural causes, for which there may be thought some confirmation in the fact, ascertained from Theophylact, that such was the common notion. But as to the causes to which he says the people ascribed it, namely, the effect produced by the washing at this pool of the entrails of the sheep sacrificed at the Temple, or from the blood and washings from the victims being conveyed thither by pipes (which several learned Physiologists think might impart a medicinal property to the water); there is decided evidence against the former notion; and the latter rests on no proof. Hence the most eminent of the later Commentators prefer to account for the effects by supposing that the water was of itself a medicinal one,

θος πολὺ τῶν ἀσθενούντων, τυφλῶν, χωλῶν, ξηρῶν, ἐκδεχομένων τὴν τοῦ ὕδατος κίνησιν. Ἄγγελος γὰρ κατὰ καιρὸν 4

deriving its sanative properties from some mineral with which it was impregnated. 'This would,' says Dr. Mead, 'from the water being perturbed from the bottom by some natural cause (perhaps subterranean heat, or storms) rise upwards and be mingled with it, and so impart a sanative property to those who bathed in it before the metallic particles had subsided to the bottom. That it should have done so, κατὰ καιρὸν, is not strange; since Bartholin has, by many examples, shown that it is usual with many medical baths to exert a singular force and sanative power at stated times, and at periodical but uncertain intervals.' The learned Physician however does not deign to notice the difficulty presented by the words ἄγγελος κατέβαινεν ἐν τῇ κολ. καὶ ἐτάρασσε τὸ ὕδωρ, though he, doubtless, with most recent Commentators, referred it to the opinion entertained by the Jews, who, ignorant of natural philosophy, referred such phenomena to a peculiar Divine operation, to whose agency they, as usual, called in the intervention of angels. The Commentators in question, however, distrusting their own solution, with reference to natural causes, propose to cancel part of this narration. But all, or the greater part of, the words ἐκδεχομένων—τὸ ὕδωρ must be cancelled. And for that there is only the authority of 2 MSS., 2 very inferior Versions, and Nonnus. But Nonnus has here be no authority, since he frequently passes over clauses, and such Versions very slight. Besides the MSS. are, as even Rinck admits, such as abound with all sorts of liberties taken with the text. And even the innovating Lachmann removes the brackets in which Griesbach had included the passage. As to the other varr. lect., they all plainly originated in a desire to get rid of the difficulty. In short, the words seem to have been cancelled by them for the same reason that some Critics of the present day wish to get rid of them. But that is impracticable; since they are plainly alluded to at ver. 7, in the words ὅταν ταραχῇ τὸ ὕδωρ, which cannot be explained without them. The words must therefore be retained, and interpreted in the best manner we are able. Kuinoel's mode of explanation creates more difficulty than it solves. The plain and obvious meaning is, that God had endued the Pool with a preternatural healing quality, and, in the communication of it, employed one of his ministering spirits; not, however, as we have any reason to think, visibly. Certainly, the circumstances of the narration (as that only the first who entered after the commotion of the water was healed, and that all disorders, not those only which medicinal waters heal, were cured, and that instantaneously and invariably) utterly exclude the notion of any thing short of miraculous agency. And if the circumstance of the angel's going down be thought (as it is by Doddridge) to involve the greatest of all difficulties in the Evangelists' (which, however, is far from being the case), we may (with that Commentator and Bps. Pearce and Mann) suppose, that the sanative property was supernatural, and communicated during a short period, as typical of the fountain opened for the purifying of sin by the atonement of the Messiah (the prophecy of Zechariah being thus realized into a type), and that the Evangelist, in thus mentioning the descent of the angel, speaks according to the opinion of the Jews, who ascribed all the operations of God's Providence to the ministry of angels. Yet even Doddridge admits that they and St. John 'had reason so to do, since it was the Scripture scheme that these benevolent spirits had been, and frequently are, the invisible instruments of good to men.' Surely, then, what was right in them cannot but be right in us; and the common view is the more to be adhered to, as giving no countenance to a most unsound and dangerous principle, on which I have inadvertently in my Note on the Demoniac, Matt. iv. 24.

— στοάς.] Meaning porticoes fronting the bath; roofed, but open on the sides, and supported with pillars placed at regular intervals; from which run side-walls, separating them from each other, the whole forming a pentagon. This, in so general a climate as that of Judæa, would be a sufficient shelter by day, and at night the sick were probably removed.

3. Ἀσθενεῖν is a term applicable to any formed disease, as κατακτεῖσθαι is to such chronical disorders as confine any one to his bed or room. Ξηρὸν seems to denote those labouring under 'pining sickness,' such as atrophy or consumption.

— ἐκδεχομένων] 'waiting for.' A sense new in the Classical writers, and probably partaking of the usage of common life rather than of books.

4. κατὰ καιρὸν] i. e. 'at certain unknown periods of time.' Κατείχετο is a stronger term than εἶχετο, and is applied to thoroughly formed and usually chronical disorders. Instead of ἐτάρασσε τὸ ὕδωρ, very many MSS. and several Versions and early Eds. have ἐτάρασσε τὸ ὕδωρ, which was adopted by Bengel and Mann, the latter of whom remarks, 'facile excidit τὸ αὐτοῦ proximum τὸ.' But it was as easy for the αὐτοῦ to have been inadvertently joined with ἐτάρασσε, especially in MSS. written in Uncials, and without any space between the words. Besides, the common reading is more appropriate, and suitable to the context.

5. Ἐχων must be construed with ἦν, not (as is done by many) with τριάκ., as appears from ver. 6. Comp. Luke xiii. 11. viii. 43. John xi. 38. Ἐχων ἐν τῇ ἀσθ. is for ἀσθενεῖς ἢ or ὁσθίον. The disorder was probably paralytic; for not only was such the constant tradition of the primitive ages, but no less than six medical reasons for supposing so are given by Bartholin.

ἦδη χρόνον ἔχει, λέγει αὐτῷ· Θέλεις ὑγιὲς γενέσθαι; Ἄπε-

[^a ἔχει.] Sub. οὕτως ἐν ἀσθενείᾳ from the suffering.

— Θέλεις ὑγ. γ. q. d. 'Is it your purpose?'
as you here with the view of being healed?'

[^b βάλῃ.] This, for βάλλῃ, is found in the outer part of the best MSS., and has been suggested by Wetstein, Griesbach, Matthæi, Vater, d Scholz.

[^c κράββατον.] A small mean couch, sometimes like those portable seats used by persons on board, or elsewhere, and with only a skin, rug, the like, for a covering; see Mark ii. 4. 11. Περιπατεῖν has reference to the man's former inability walk, being bedridden; and the order was no doubt given to evince the reality and completeness of the cure.

It may be observed that our Lord was restored, after having performed a cure, to enjoy some such appendage to it, as should attest its reality; ex. gr. in the miracle of the five loaves, the water changed into wine, and the man cleansed.

[^d εὐθέως ἐγένετο ὑγιὲς.] Thus from suffering under an obstinate and incurable disorder, he was immediately restored to health, without that space which is always observable in those cured
by human art.

[^e οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι.] Not the by-standers, but those who met the healed person on his way home from his bed.

[^f οὐκ ἔξεστι. &c.] This was supposed to be bidden in Jer. xvii. 21; which passage, however, has reference only to what involves great guilt; though the Jewish lawyers interpreted it as bidding to carry even the lightest weight.
The Rabbinical writers recognise some cases in which it was permitted to carry burdens on the Sabbath. And so probably did the Jewish scribes.
Thus, it was lawful for the Jurists, in certain cases to dispense with the observance of the Sabbath, how much more for Christ, the LORD OF SABBATHS! It was, moreover, the intent of God to show that works of necessity and mercy were permitted to be done on that day.

VOL. I.

[^g ὁ ποιήσας, &c.] Meaning, that 'he who had power to work so signal a miracle in his behalf, had a right to interpret the law as he chose,
and to expect obedience from him whom he had so greatly benefited.'

[^h οὐκ ᾔδει τίς ἐστιν.] In ᾗδε there seems to be a significant pregnans for 'he knew not [and had not ascertained] who it was, for Jesus had glided away,' ἐξένηυσε. 'Ἐκνέω signifies properly to swim away, and then, like the Latin emulare and emergere, has the sense evadere, to glide away unobservedly; of which an example occurs in Eurip. Hipp. 471, εἰς δὲ τὴν τύχην Πεσούσ', ὅσῃν οὐ πῶς ἂν ἐκνεύσαι δοκτεῖν, and 825. Jesus had probably done this, partly to avoid the admiration of the well-disposed, and partly to escape the envy of the evil-minded.

[ⁱ μετὰ ταῦτα] 'afterwards.' Probably the next day, or the day after that.

— ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ.] A frequent place of resort to the Jews, and whither the healed man had doubtless gone to return thanks to God for his recovery.

— μηκέτι ἀμάρτανε, &c. It is not necessary to refer this (as many do) to the Jewish notion, that all violent disorders were the punishment of sin; but we may suppose that the man's disorder had been in reality brought on by intemperance and vice, and that our Lord intended by this to afford him a proof of his omniscience, by showing his knowledge of that fact,—engrafting thereon a serious admonition to no longer indulge in sin. For the term ἀμάρτανε need not be understood (as it is by some recent Commentators) of any one sin, as in chastity, but may be taken to denote sin generally. A sense of the word seldom found, except in the Scriptural writers. Yet I have noted it in Aristoph. Lys.
1280, εὐλαβώμεθα τὸ λοιπὸν αὐτὸς μὴ ἐξαμαρτάνειν ἔτι. and Joseph. Ant. xvi. 2, 4, μελέτην τούτων ἀξιούντως εἶναι, δι' ὧν οὐχ ἀμαρτησάμεθα. It were, indeed, but reasonable, that the members restored to their use by the mercy of God, should be no longer 'yielded as instruments of uncleanness unto iniquity, but of righteousness unto holiness.'

15. ἀπῆλθεν, &c.] There is no reason to suppose (as some have done) that the man had any evil intention in going. It was rather, we may imagine, from a wish to justify himself (as, according to the letter of the Law, he could do. See Schoettgen and Lightfoot on v. 8.) for breaking the Sabbath by the command of an undoubted prophet; as also from gratitude to his benefactor and good-will to others, by making known to them the fountain of health.

By τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις may be meant the influential persons among the Jews, i. e. the Sanhedrim and leading Doctors and Jurists, or rather (as Tittman supposes) those Jews whom he met with, as ver. 10.

17. ἀπεκρίνατο.] As an answer implies a question, Grotius, Lampe, Kuinoel, and others regard the words following as a justification of his conduct, pronounced by Jesus before the Rulers, either at a public or private examination. Thus ἀπεκρίνατο will stand for ἀπελογήσατο, as at Matt. xxvi. 62. xxvii. 12, and sometimes in the Classical writers. And ἐδίδωκεν must be taken in a forensic sense, as at Matt. v. 11. It is not necessary, however, to suppose here any previous questions to have gone before. We may take ἀπεκρίνατο simply in the sense addressed. Our Lord, it seems, intended to refute their calumny, by thus addressing them, while standing by at the Temple.

— Ὁ Πατὴρ μου—ἐργάζομαι.] Render, 'My Father is working until now (i. e. is continually working): I also work.' There is great force in the Ayneton, and the ἐγὼ is emphatic.

From the abruptness of this address, and the extreme brevity, tending to obscurity, with which it is expressed, it has been supposed that the Evangelist has not recorded the whole of what was then said. But it should rather seem that our Lord comprehended all that was necessary in one brief but pithy dict—in order to make the greater impression on those whom he addressed; especially as it was customary with the Jews to express things, as much as possible, with apophthegmatical brevity. Nor, indeed, was this saying so obscure, but that the Jews readily comprehended the most material part of it, i. e. his claiming to be equal with God; from which his right to dispense with the Sabbath would, on the authority even of their own traditions, be undoubted. By ἐργάζεσθαι is meant the operation of God, as displayed in the preservation and governance of all parts of his creation; and by ἕως ἄρτι is expressed the perpetuity of that preservation and governance, unremittently exerted for the safety and welfare of his creatures. Something similar occurs in Philo i. 44. 29. (cited by Wetstein): πάντα γὰρ οὐδέποτε ποιῶν ὁ Θεός· ἀλλ', ἡσπικρ ἴδιον τὸ καίειν πυρὸς, καὶ χρίσας τὴν ψυχὴν, οὕτω καὶ Θεοῦ τὸ ποιεῖν. By this example of God, our Lord intends to rebut their crimination, and to teach them that he is like unto God, who hath no Sabbath, but doeth his work perpetually. 'As my Father doth not cease to benefit men on the Sabbath, neither am I impeded by any such observance from benefiting them.' In short, the argument is, that as his Father governs and preserves the world as well on the Sabbath as on other days, so he, as Son, has an equal right so to do. But this surely implied equality with his Father, and consequently essential DIVINITY. Our Lord, moreover, professes to do the same works which the Father doth; and these not only of benevolence, but of omnipotence. He therefore directly equals himself with the Father. 'For (as says Dr. Smith, Scrip. Test., vol. iii. 69.) the subject is works of power. The speaker puts his own work of power, in the miraculous cure which he had effected, on the same footing of consideration as the work of the Deity in the conservation and government of the universe; and upon this parity he grounds his right thus to work on the Sabbath-day.'

18. πατέρα ἴδιον ἴλ.] Meaning, that he called God peculiarly his Father; thus making himself equal with God. See Campbell. For they interpreted his words to mean (as they justly might) that being the Son of God and the Messiah, he could, by his own proper authority, dispense with the observance of the Sabbath. Now this was contrary to their opinion of the power of the Messiah, which they maintained to be only delegated, and in all things subservient, and inferior to that of the Father. Hence they understood him as not claiming to be Messiah in the commonly received sense, but in a peculiar and sublime one, by which he arrogated an authority self-derived. A construction, we observe, which, so far from attempting to remove, our Lord proceeds to confirm and more fully justify.

19. Having stated the extent of his authority, our Lord proceeds to show its source and nature, and to prove to them that what he had said was perfectly true, namely, that he had power, and that by his own authority, to dispense with the observance of the Sabbath. In this justification, pronounced (as appears from v. 18.) some time after the preceding, our Lord supplies the fuller explanation of what he had before said in which he goes on to establish his equality with the Father, by claiming the same Divine attributes. Nor is there (as Whitby has ably shown) any thing contradictory to this in the declaration which prefaces it, that the Son can do nothing himself. Suffice it to say that Christ was a human nature inferior to the Father, but,

καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν· οὐ δύναται ὁ Υἱὸς τοιεῖν ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ οὐδέν, ἐὰν μὴ τι βλέπῃ τὸν Πατέρα ποιούντα· ἵ γὰρ ἂν ἐκεῖνος ποιῇ, ταῦτα καὶ ὁ Υἱὸς ὁμοίως ποιεῖ. ⁱ Ὁ γὰρ Πατὴρ φιλεῖ τὸν Υἱόν, καὶ πάντα δείκνυσιν αὐτῷ· αὐτὸς ποιεῖ· καὶ μείζονα τούτων δείξει αὐτῷ ἔργα, ἵνα ὑμεῖς θαυμάζητε. Ὡςπερ γὰρ ὁ Πατὴρ ἐγείρει τοὺς νεκροὺς καὶ ζῶοποιεῖ, οὕτως καὶ ὁ Υἱὸς οὓς θέλει ζῶοποιεῖ. ^k Οὐδὲ γὰρ ὁ Πατὴρ κρίνει οὐδένα, ἀλλὰ τὴν κρίσιν πᾶσαν δέδωκε τῷ Υἱῷ· ἵνα πάντες τιμῶσι τὸν Υἱόν, καθὼς τιμῶσι τὸν Πατέρα. Ὁ μὴ τιμῶν τὸν Υἱόν, οὐ τιμᾷ τὸν Πατέρα τὸν πέμψαντα αὐτόν. ^m Ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν· ὅτι ὁ τὸν λόγον μου ἀκούων καὶ πιστεύων τῷ πέμψαντί με ἔχει ζωὴν αἰώνιον· καὶ εἰς κρίσιν οὐκ ἔρχεται, ἀλλὰ μεταβίβηκεν ἐκ τοῦ θανάτου εἰς τὴν ζωὴν. ⁿ Ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν· ὅτι ἔρχεται ὥρα, καὶ νῦν ἐστίν, ὅτε οἱ νεκροὶ ἀκούσονται τῆς φωνῆς τοῦ Υἱοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ· καὶ οἱ ἀκούσαντες ζήσονται. ὥςπερ γὰρ ὁ Πατὴρ ἔχει ζωὴν ἐν ἑαυτῷ, οὕτως ἔδωκε καὶ τῷ Υἱῷ ζωὴν ἔχειν ἐν ἑαυτῷ· καὶ ἐξουσίαν ἔδωκεν αὐτῷ καὶ κρίσιν ποιεῖν,

By of a certain pre-eminence in the Father as Fountain of Deity. On this doctrine of the eternal subordination of the Son to the Father, and yet the co-equality of both, see Bp. G. Defensio Fidei Nicenae, Sect. iv. — οὐ δύναται.] The expression here, as in Matt. 9, 12, 39, imports not a physical, but a moral impossibility; q. d. 'alienissimum fuerit Deo.' Ἐὰν μὴ, for ἀλλὰ or ἀλλ' ἢν, as in Matt. 16.

ἵ πάντα δείκνυ.] Δείκνυ literally signifies, show any one how to do a thing; and, by extension, to enable him to do it. Here we express οικονομικῶς, and popularly, that Father, out of love to the Son, communicates him the power of doing 'whatever he doth;' will enable him to achieve greater works. Here we have an implied comparison between love of the Father and the Son with that of earthly parent to an obedient only son, to whom he imparts his whole plans of action. By τὰ πάντα ποιεῖ are meant, in a general sense, the works of creation and providence, including the governance of the universe.

1. The portion from ver. 21. to 31. has been badly interpreted. The question in dispute was, what our Lord meant to be understood by the creation of the dead, and judgment, here mentioned; whether, in a figurative sense, the awakening of the men of that generation to a spiritual life; or, in a natural one, the resurrection of all to eternal life; and whether, by judgment, meant the retribution to succeed this life. The Expositors are in general agreed in adopting the figurative interpretation, which is, indeed, far more agreeable to what precedes, and is doubtless principally intended. See Smith's Scr. L. E. 78. But may it not be here (as in the eternal declarations of our Lord at Matt. 12), that a two-fold sense was intended? so that the natural is couched also a mystical

one. Such a sense, Tittman admits, is allowed by the context and the usus loquendi; nay, in some parts seems to be the prominent one, exactly as in the above Chapter of Matthew. [Comp. infra xi. 25, 26, 43.]

24. αὐς κρίσιν οὐκ ἔρχεται.] Ἐρχ. is for ἀφίσταται, to show the certainty of the event; and κρ. is for κατάκρισιν or κόλασιν.

— μεταβίβηκεν—ζωὴν.] These words yield a good sense on either of the above interpretations; according to the latter of which they will signify, 'he hath as it were passed, or he is to pass, from death to a state of everlasting life and happiness;' the Preterite being used to express the certainty of the thing; or, according to the former, 'he hath passed from a state of death and condemnation unto a state which will terminate in life eternal.' The two senses, however, merge into each other.

25, 26. These verses admit of explanation on either of the foregoing interpretations; and Expositors adopt, some one, some the other; not considering that both might be intended. Indeed, the tropical and mystical should seem to be here more prominent than the literal. Thus by νεκροὶ will be meant 'those who are dead in trespasses and sins' (Eph. v. 14.), and by ζήσονται, 'they shall be put into the way of obtaining eternal life,' namely, by hearkening to the preaching of Christ's Gospel. The full sense of ver. 26. may be thus expressed in paraphrase: 'For as the Father hath in himself, as the Fountain and Author of life, the power of giving (the) life or salvation (which had been forfeited by the fall of man in Adam), so hath he communicated to the Son, in like manner, the power to give this eternal life.'

At ver. 27. there is a transition to the literal sense; κρίσιν ποιεῖν meaning to hold judgment. 'Ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου has already occurred 70 times, and now for the first time without either of the Articles, from which Beza and others contend that the sense is "son of a man." They attempt to defend this on a Syriacism, which is rather against their conclusion. The omission of the Articles must be explained from Greek usage. Now the Articles in the phrase ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου were employed because Christ assumed to himself this appellation, and the very assumption forbade him to use the phrase otherwise than as ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. And the first Article requires the second, for ὁ υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου would offend against regimen. Hence the Article is not materially and essentially necessary, but only accidentally; and consequently it will not be admitted but when regimen requires it, i. e. when ὁ υἱὸς precedes. Now here not ὁ υἱὸς, but υἱὸς follows ἐστὶ, and the phrase could not be otherwise than υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου. Moreover, the sense for which these Commentators contend is equally deducible from the common interpretation; for the title Son of man has everywhere reference to the incarnation of Christ, and therefore implies his acquaintance with human infirmity.' (Bp. Middleton.) In this view of the sense all the ancient Expositors agree, and some of the most eminent modern ones (as Grotius, Lampe, Morus, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, and Tittman), who compare a similar use of Υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου at Matt. xxiv. 30. and elsewhere. Thus the meaning is, that Christ hath committed to him likewise authority to hold judgment at the last day; for his Mediatorial office will not be complete till he hath judged the world. There is here a reference to the incarnation of Christ, which implies his acquaintance with human infirmity, and consequently his fitness to be our Judge. This is strongly confirmed by Hebr. iv. 14, where the Apostle exhorts his converts κρατεῖν τῆς ὁμολογίας, inasmuch as they have a great High-Priest in the heavens, who is at once Son of God and Son of Man.

27. See Smith's Scrip. Test. ii. 73, 83, and comp. Dan. vii. 13, 14. Acts x. 42.

28, 29. We have here a transition, in which the moral entirely gives way to the physical resurrection, and the judgment connected with it. Μὴ θαυμάζετε has reference to what was said at v. 21, 25; yet not in the literal acceptance of those words, as Kuinoel and Tittman imagine (for that would yield a very jejune sense), but the allegorical and mystical; q. d. 'Wonder not at what I have said of this moral renovation, for,'

&c. This physical resurrection, I work greater in itself, yet was, I quences it drew with it, more august.

30. Our Lord here repeats his the entire coincidence of design between the Father and the Son: deduces an argument for the justice of his mission. It was impossible he should in his work as Mediator, or as Jesus, motive, to any end, or by any power from those of the Father. And (as his judgment is just) he is not, as sometimes are, influenced by any partial or selfish views. He came not to ag himself, but to do the will of his Father: what is done by Christ, being done concurrence of the Father, cannot (Grotius, Doddridge, and Scott.)

— Πατρός.] This word, not for of the most ancient MSS., most of and some Fathers, has been (I think reason) cancelled by Griesb., Vater, 31. Having asserted his claims to messiah, our Lord proceeds to proofs of his Divine mission, as the actions, miracles, and the character trines. And first he anticipates (couched in a proverbial saying) that a fit witness in his own case.

— ἰδὼν ἐγὼ μαρτυρῶ, &c.] I were to bear witness of myself (as had no other evidence than mine) my witness would not be trustworthy being for πίστεως. Thus there is a between what is said here and at viii. viii. 17. and see Smith's Scrip. Test.

32. ἄλλος.] Some difference of as to who is here meant. The ancient modern Expositors suppose John whose testimony is mentioned in the whilst some more recent ones, as Lampe, understand God the Father witness our Lord reverts at v. i former interpretation is so strong by what follows, that it may, albeit faintly, be pronounced the true one.

through a desire for the honour which human fame can bestow; for I want—I accept not the testimony of any man. I only appeal to the testimony of John, in order that, believing in me through that testimony, ye may be saved.

35. ὁ λύχνος ὁ καίόμενος.] Render, 'the burning and shining light.' John might well be so termed, since, as Campbell remarks, 'he was the single prophet in whom the old Dispensation had its completion, and by whom the new was introduced; therefore, until our Lord's ministry took place, John may justly be said to have been the light of that generation.' An expression, Bp. Middleton thinks, used with allusion to some phrase then current, to signify an enlightened teacher; which is confirmed by what Lightfoot says, that 'a person famous for light or knowledge was called a candle, the candle of the Law, the lamp of light;' and also by Eccles. xlviii. 1. For is the metaphor unknown in the Classical writers. So Pind. Olymp. xi. 96, ὁ μιν πλοῦτος ἔργατε δαίδαλμηνος—ἀσπὴρ ἀρίζηλος (I say, ἀρίζηλος) ἀλαβιδόν Ἀνδρὶ φηγγος. See also Note on Luke ii. 32.

—ἀλλ. ἀγαλλ.] Meaning, 'Ye were disposed to rejoice greatly in his light, but only for a time' (i. e. until he reproved your vices, when ye said, he had a Devil. See Luke vii. 30, 33).

36. Our Lord now suggests the reason why he needs not human testimony (v. 34.), even the testimony of John; adducing then the infinitely mightier one of the FATHER; appealing to the works which the Father hath given him to accomplish, and adverting to the testimony of the Prophets of the Old Testament. By ἔργα are especially meant miracles; though not to the exclusion of other works suitable to the Messiah. See xiv. 12.

—ἐνὰ τὰ ἔργα.] Render, 'the very works;' not xiv. 11.

37. ὅτι φωνὴν—ἐωράκατε.] These words, from their obscurity, have been somewhat differently understood. The best recent Commentators, as Lampe, Kuin., and Tittman, are agreed in considering the assertion here as suspended on the words immediately preceding, having the sense: 'Although ye have not heard his voice,' &c.; q. d. 'For, the Father himself, who hath sent me, and borne testimony of me (namely, in the prophecies of the Old Test., by its promises and prophecies of a Messiah); although ye have not heard him audibly, nor seen him in visible form offering this testimony of me.' This mode of interpretation, however, on minute examination, I apprehend, be found untenable, on two grounds. 1. From the extreme violence of thus introducing a word ad libitum, to help out the meaning. 2. From the feeble and jejune sense thus arising, by which we lose all the point and significance of the passage, the character of which is (as Calvin and Melancthon remark) dijurgatory,—that of severe invective against the Jews for wilful blindness in rejecting the plain evidence which existed, that Jesus was the Christ, the promised Messiah. With respect to the strong figure employed in ἀκηκόατε and ἐωράκατε, we have only to bear in mind a like mode of speaking in our own language, by which persons similarly disposed are said to be deaf and blind. It is, however, not simple blindness, that is here ascribed to the Jews; but that indisposition to listen or attend to the evidences of truth, which is more plainly asserted of them at v. 40, answering to what St. Paul terms the 'veil upon their hearts.' Compare also Is. i. 3. Accordingly the meaning is: 'Ye have not listened to his voice, nor been disposed to see (i. e. pay attention to) his appearance.' Of ἀκούειν in the sense to listen, examples exist in abundance; nor are there wanting some of ὁρᾶν in this figurative sense, which is required by the ἀκηκόατε with which it is associated. See John iii. 6. Thus it is meant, that they would not recognise this εἶδος as that of the Messiah, would not (to use the words of St. Paul, 2 Cor. iv. 6, which supply the best explanation of this εἶδος) discern 'the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.'

38. καὶ τὸν λόγον, &c.] Render: 'Yea, ye have not his word (meaning the Scriptures) abiding in you; i. e. 'ye suffer not the declarations therein to sink into your minds, so as to understand their true import, or perceive their fulfilment in me,' as is plainly declared in the next verse.

39. ὑπερνάτε τὰς γραφάς, &c.] It has here been a matter of debate, whether ὑπερνάτε should be taken as an Imperative or an Indicative. The former method is adopted by almost all the ancient and a great part of the modern Commentators. But the latter has been preferred by the most eminent among modern Expositors; and with reason; for the Indicative is far more agreeable to the context, and (as Lampe, Tittm., and Campb. have shown) is required by the scope of the passage and the course of argument. Whereas the Imperative would, as Campb. observes, destroy the cogency of the argument,—since the clause subjoined, ὅτι ὑμεῖς δοκιᾶτε, &c. is rather a reason why they did not, than why they should not search the Scriptures. As to what has been urged by τὰς γραφάς, ὅτι ὑμεῖς δοκεῖτε ἐν αὐταῖς ζωὴν αἰώνιον ἔχειν καὶ ἐκεῖναί εἰσιν αἱ μαρτυροῦσαι περὶ ἐμοῦ· καὶ οὐ θέλετε 40 ἔλθειν πρὸς με, ἵνα ζωὴν ἔχητε. VI. META ταῦτα ἀπῆλθεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς πέραν τῆς θαλάσσης 1

Whitby and Wetstein, in favour of the Imperative,—that the Indicative would require ὑμεῖς to be prefixed, and that the admonition to search the Scriptures was necessary,—the first argument has, in the plain unstudied style of a writer like St. John, little or no force; and the second is quite unfounded. For not to say that the character of the context is not admonitory, but oburgatory,—we have, in the ancient Paraphrases and the Rabbinical writers, full proof that the Scriptures were diligently investigated and studied by the Jews—to what purpose, is another affair. Whereas the Indicative is required both by the context and by the verbs immediately following, δοκεῖτε and θέλετε, which are manifestly in the Indicative. And thus an excellent sense arises; according to which our Lord censures not the carelessness, but the unprofitableness of their Bible study. He grants that they searched the Scriptures (and, by implication, commends them for that), but complains that it had not its due effect in bringing them to him as the Christ; q. d. 'Ye indeed search the Scriptures, deeming that in them ye have [revealed to you] the way to attain eternal life; and yet those are they which bear testimony of me; and at the same time ye are not disposed to come unto me, that ye might attain salvation.' Kai at v. 40. has the sense, and yet; of which we have another example at vi. 36. And so kai at v. 39. is, as often, for atque, as it is taken by Grotius, Jansen, and Lampe.

41, 42. Our Lord here, 1. preoccupies any imputation of vain-glory in adverting to his claims, by apprising them that he does not so speak as needing the sanction of their testimony, but solely to protest against their error, and warn them of its awful consequences; 2. he accounts for their rejection of those claims, by intimating that nothing better can be expected from those who are devoid of the first great principle of religion, the love of God.

43. Here we have a further unfolding of the sentiment at v. 41; and the sense is: 'I need not human glory, because I come unto you with Divine authority. Yet (such is your perversity, that) if another should come with only his own

(i. e. human) authority, him ye will admit.' As was literally the case with Baruchabene and other false Christs, predicted in Matt. xxiv. 24. and mentioned in Josephus and other writers; of whom a history was written by John à Lent.

44. Here is traced the reason for their unbelief, by their fostering such passions as stifle the love of God, and consequently the love of truth, for its own sake; especially pride and vain-glory.

— πῶς δύνασθε.] This must, of course, be understood of what is so contrary to the usual order of causes and effects, that it cannot be expected to happen. And δόξαν λαμβ. must be taken with due qualification.

45. The ἐγὼ here is emphatic, and alludes to their accusation of Him as breaking the law of God, v. 16. Our Lord means to intimate, that he need not do this, since there was a sufficient accuser, even Moses; who might be said to be the means of their accusation, by their disobedience of his injunctions as to the Messiah, plainly foretold in his writings both by express predictions and by typical representations.

46. Their pretences for not believing in Jesus were two,—their love to God, and their reverence for the law of Moses. Christ had shown, v. 42, that they could have no true love to God; and in this verse, that they had no real faith in Moses; for if they had, they would have believed on Him. (Whitby and Hammond.)

— περὶ ἐμοῦ ἔγραφεν] 'wrote of me,' who am the Christ; i. e. not only pointed to the Messiah, in numerous types and figures contained in the history of the Patriarchs, and running through the whole of the ceremonial law, but also foretold his coming in various predictions (ex. gr. Deut. xviii. 15. seqq.), showing at the same time by what marks a Divine Legate might be distinguished from a false prophet.

47. πῶς—πιστεύετε.] Meaning: 'If ye [should] refuse to believe the writings of Moses [which ye are accustomed continually to study and reverence], how can ye be expected to give credence to my words?'

αὐτοῦ.] This word, not found in many and Versions, is cancelled by Griesbach Scholz; but, I think, wrongly. External evidence is quite in its favour, and also internal,
 no reason can well be imagined for its insertion, but for its omission a good reason, namely,
 to move a seeming pleonasm, though quite in popular style.

ἡ ἑορτή] 'the [chief] feast.' This was the chief year of Christ's ministry.

τὸν Φίλιππον] who was probably the Prophet, as Judas was the treasurer of the disciples.
 πειράζων] for δοκιμὸν ποιῶν, to try his power, and thereby eventually strengthen it.

παιδάριον] 'a youth,' viz. between boyhood and manhood. This was probably a baker's servant, who had been sent to dispose of bread in a place, where, from the multitude collected, it was necessary to obtain a ready sale.

ἄρτους κριθίνους.] Barley-bread, though considered a mean sort of food among the Greeks and Romans, was, however, general among the Jews, (see 1 Kings vii. 1. xvi. 18. iv. 12.) as it had been, at an earlier date, amongst the ancient nations. It bore one-third of the price of wheat-bread; see vi. 6.

ὄψαρια.] This (a diminutive form from
 ὄψω) signified originally, like our meat, whatever taken with bread; though in the later Classical writers, as here, it means fish, of course cooked. Thus the term is equivalent to the ἰχθύες of the other Evangelists.

10. ἦν δὲ χόρτος—τόπος.] And thus it would be very suitable for the purpose. These incidental and parenthetical circumstances, as Dr.
 Paley observes, mark an eye-witness. I would compare similar ones in Josephus, Ant. iv. 8. 1, φοινικέφυτον δὲ ἵσταντο τὸ χωρίον. Xenoph.
 Anab. i. 4. 9, ἐξελαύνει ἐπὶ τὸν ἅλον ποταμὸν πλήρη ἰχθύων καὶ πραιῶν. See also Æschyl. Pers. 510, and Thucyd. iv. 13.

12. συναγάγετε τὰ περισσέυσα κλάμα.] The injunction is not recorded by the other Evangelists.
 It was, with reason, thought worthy of mention by St. John, as conveying, from the lips of our Lord himself, the important lesson,—that no part, however small, of the bounties of Providence to man are to be wasted, as these fragments would have been, unless gathered up, for the use, we may suppose, of the poorest of the people assembled.
 And it was undoubtedly to enforce this lesson, that our Lord gave the injunction; for even had he not ordered them to gather up the fragments, they would probably have been gathered up, since it was the custom of the country so to do. Nay, to neglect gathering up fragments was regarded by the Rabbins on the same footing as neglect of the Law or religious duty. At the same time a concurrent design of the injunction might be, to evidence the truth and greatness of the miracle.

VI. META ταῦτα ἀπῆλθεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς πέραν τῆς θαλάσσης - 1

Whitby and Wetstein, in favour of the Imperative,—that the Indicative would require ὑμεῖς to be prefixed, and that the admonition to search the Scriptures was necessary,—the first argument has, in the plain unstudied style of a writer like St. John, little or no force; and the second is quite unfounded. For not to say that the character of the context is not admonitory, but ob-jurgatory,—we have, in the ancient Paraphrases and the Rabbinical writers, full proof that the Scriptures were diligently investigated and studied by the Jews—to what purpose, is another affair. Whereas the Indicative is required both by the context and by the verbs immediately following, δοκεῖτε and ἐλθετε, which are manifestly in the Indicative. And thus an excellent sense arises; according to which our Lord censures not the carelessness, but the unprofitableness of their Bible study. He grants that they searched the Scriptures (and, by implication, commends them for that), but complains that it had not its due effect in bringing them to him as the Christ; q. d. 'Ye indeed search the Scriptures, deeming that in them ye have [revealed to you] the way to attain eternal life; and yet those are they which bear testimony of me; and at the same time ye are not disposed to come unto me, that ye might attain salvation.' Kai at v. 40. has the sense, and yet; of which we have another example at vi. 36. And so kai at v. 39. is, as often, for atque, as it is taken by Grotius, Jansen, and Lampe.

41, 42. Our Lord here, 1. preoccupies any imputation of vain-glory in adverting to his claims, by apprising them that he does not so speak as needing the sanction of their testimony, but solely to protest against their error, and warn them of its awful consequences; 2. he accounts for their rejection of those claims, by intimating that nothing better can be expected from those who are devoid of the first great principle of religion, the love of God.

43. Here we have a further unfolding of the sentiment at v. 41; and the sense is: 'I need not human glory, because I come unto you with Divine authority. Yet (such is your perversity, that) if another should come with only his own

(i. e. human) authority, him ye will admit.' As was literally the case with Barchobebas and other false Christs, predicted in Matt. xxiv. 24, and mentioned in Josephus and other writers; of whom a history was written by John à Lent.

44. Here is traced the reason for their unbelief, by their fostering such passions as stifle the love of God, and consequently the love of truth, for its own sake; especially pride and vain-glory.

— πῶς δύνασθε.] This must, of course, be understood of what is so contrary to the usual order of causes and effects, that it cannot be expected to happen. And δόξαν λαμβ. must be taken with due qualification.

45. The ἐγὼ here is emphatic, and alludes to their accusation of Him as breaking the law of God, v. 16. Our Lord means to intimate, that he need not do this, since there was a sufficient accuser, even Moses; who might be said to be the means of their accusation, by their disobedience of his injunctions as to the Messiah, plainly foretold in his writings both by express predictions and by typical representations.

46. Their pretences for not believing in Jesus were two,—their love to God, and their reverence for the law of Moses. Christ had shown, v. 42, that they could have no true love to God; and in this verse, that they had no real faith in Moses; for if they had, they would have believed on Him. (Whitby and Hammond.)

— περὶ ἐμοῦ ἔγραψεν] 'wrote of me,' who am the Christ; i. e. not only pointed to the Messiah, in numerous types and figures contained in the history of the Patriarchs, and running through the whole of the ceremonial law, but also foretold his coming in various predictions (ex. gr. Deut. xviii. 15. seqq.), showing at the same time by what marks a Divine Logos might be distinguished from a false prophet.

47. πῶς—πιστεύετε.] Meaning: 'If ye [thou] refuse to believe the writings of Moses [which ye are accustomed continually to study and reverence], how can ye be expected to give credence to my words?'

VI. 1—14. On this portion see Matt. xiv. 13, 21, and Notes.

15. ἀρπάξαι αὐτόν, &c.] The motives for this eagerness in the multitude to make him a king are easy to be imagined. The prevailing expectation of the advent of the Messiah, in quality of a temporal prince as well as spiritual teacher, who should deliver them from foreign oppression and restore them to their ancient liberty, working with the conviction in many that Jesus was the promised Messiah, set the people upon the measure (which they thought would not be displeasing to him) of forcibly making him accept royalty, a scheme which our Lord wisely frustrated by withdrawing to retirement.

16—19. On the miracle which follows, see Notes on Matt. xiv. 22, sq. and Mark vi. 46, seqq.

17. ἤρχοντο.] Render, 'were going;' as at Acts xxviii. 14. Εἰς Καπ., meaning, 'towards Capernaum,' as the final purpose of their voyage, though they were to stop by the way at Bethsaida and take up Jesus; see Note on Matt. xiv. 22.

18. διηγείρετο] 'was violently agitated.' An appropriate term. So Pollux, i. 9, κύμα ἐγειρόμενον, ὑποκινούμενον.

20. ἤθελον λαβεῖν αὐτόν.] An idiomatical use of ἔλεειν, found also in the Classical writers, by which ἤθελον λαβεῖν is put for ἐθαλόντες ἔλαβον, 'they willingly, or gladly, received.'

22. ὁ ἐστηκὼς] i. e. who had remained there for the purpose, it seems, of deliberating whether they should proclaim Jesus as the Messiah.

26. Our Lord, observing that the multitude which flocked to him were influenced, in the question they put, by idle curiosity, and a desire, not for spiritual improvement, but for worldly advantage, takes occasion, from the natural and earthly bread with which he had supplied them, to advert to their need of spiritual and celestial nutriment; showing how much more anxious they ought to be for the acquisition of the latter than of the former.

Such is the occasion of the Discourse which follows; a portion which, as it involves much of difficulty, so it has been variously interpreted. The obscurity which so largely prevails, is chiefly occasioned by the highly figurative cast of the phraseology, and the more than usual intermixture of literal with metaphorical diction, but in no small degree from the extreme brevity of the writing. These difficulties are only to be overcome by close and patient attention, and especially by considering the occasion, design, tenour, and manner of the discourse. Now the occasion was what has just been stated. The design was to diminish the spell both of low ambition in his disciples, and of sordid carnality in the multitude, and work in their minds a conviction of the spiritual necessity under which they laboured, and to seek to supply by earnest supplication to the throne of grace; ^{vv. 35. 37. 51.} Our Lord's manner of pursuing this design is (to use the words of Dr. Smith, vol. ii. 126) 'by declaring that his own must intervene, as the means of procuring to men those blessings which they so needed; but a participation of those benefits, analogous to its effects on the mind to the use of nutriment or corporal sustenance, was necessary to the inward deliverance from evil, and possession of eternal happiness; and that a preparatory discipline, by a gracious and divine influence, was requisite for the understanding of his doctrine and the enjoyment of his benefits; ^{vv. 53. 55. 57. 14. 45.}

As far as regards the highly figurative cast and obscurity of the discourse, they are well accounted for by Dr. Smith from the circumstance, that 'the declaration, namely, of his bloody death, which is the basis of the discourse, bears on it the character of a prediction, and may therefore be expected to partake of the essential characters of scripture prophecy, which are, 1. the mixture of literal and figurative diction; 2. the envelope of obscurity, which was necessary to guard the public prediction of any future event, and which was to continue till it should be taken off by the event itself; namely, in this case, the cruel death of the Saviour, of which it was our Lord's manner to speak obscurely and darkly to his public and uninitiated auditors; and it was only to his disciples that he foretold it in plain terms.' To the above observations it may be added, that the usual obscurity of predictive matter has in the present case been much increased by the persons addressed being different in different parts of the discourse, though without any distinct intimation being given of any such change. For our Lord sometimes addresses the higher classes, who were, more or less, ill affected to him; at other times the lower classes, who were, upon the whole, well disposed, but exceedingly dull of comprehension, and quite ignorant of His true character as Son of God; see vii. 12. Now this will satisfactorily account for the frequent repetitions of the same sentiment, which might otherwise be thought unnecessary. In such cases either our Lord replies to the objections, or removes the scruples of the two classes in separate addresses; or, in compassion to the ignorance and dulness of the multitude, condescends to repeat the same thing more than once, in order to impress it more strongly on their minds.

Ἔ. ἐργάζεσθε μὴ, &c.] Ἐργάζεσθαι here, as often in the Classical writers, denotes (like the Heb. ^{לָבַח}) together with labour, its effect, in gain or acquirement. So Hesiod, Op. et D. 43, ἐργάζεσθαι. The full sense, then, is, 'labour to acquire.' Ἀπολλ. denotes what terminates merely in animal life.

— μένουσαν.] Meaning, by a metaphor familiar to the Jews, what has a permanent benefit in the strengthening and refreshing of the soul, and the supply of its spiritual wants; and of which the effect shall not, as in the other case, be temporary, but everlasting, and procuring everlasting life, i. e. salvation.

— ἐσφράγισεν] 'hath confirmed, authorized, commissioned, as it were, with the witness of a seal,' with which privileges and orders were sealed; see on John iii. 33.

28. Here the people ask what they are to do, that they may work the works of God, and perform what is enjoined (see Ps. li. 10), so as to obtain his approbation and reward. To this the answer (v. 29) is, that he worketh the works of God, who believeth on Him whom God hath sent, and consequently receives him as the only author of his salvation.

29. τὸ ἔργον τοῦ Θεοῦ] i. e. 'the work which God requires of us, our duty to him.'

30. εἶπον οὖν αὐτῷ· Τί οὖν, &c.] Here the people, rightly understanding Jesus to mean himself by the expression 'Him whom God hath sent,' require of him some additional, and yet more unequivocal, proof of his being the Messiah by some sign, i. e. from heaven, (which the Jews regarded as the only decisive proof of a Divine mission,) such as that of Moses calling down manna from heaven. At τί ἐργάζῃ repeat σημεῖον from the preceding.

31. τὸ μάννα.] Render, 'the manna.' The derivation of this word has been disputed. Some think it is from the Heb. מַנָּה, what is this? the expression of surprise at its first falling; others, from מָצָא, to measure, or prepare. The former is the more probable, and is confirmed by Josephus, Ant. iii. 1. 10. The recent Commentators here enlarge much in describing the common manna, which, in the East, still bedews the ground by night, and is collected in the morning, and made into a kind of cake. The identity, however, of this with the manna of the Israelites is rather taken for granted than proved. There are indeed so many important diversities between the two, (pointed out by Le Clerc, Deyling, in his Obs. 8. iii. 7, Dr. Graves, and others,) as completely to establish the miraculous nature of the transaction, at least with those who admit the credibility of Moses. It was called 'bread from heaven;' bread, because made up into cakes like the natural manna, and from heaven, as being the gift of God.

32. οὐ Μωϋσῆς—οὐρανοῦ.] Meaning, that 'it is in a subordinate sense only that what dropped from the clouds, and was sent for the nourishment of the body, still mortal, could be called the bread of heaven, being but a type of that which hath descended from the heaven of heavens for nourishing the immortal soul unto eternal life, and which is therefore, in the most sublime sense, the bread of heaven.' (Campbell.) It is certain, from various passages of Philo and the Rabbinical writers, that the manna was regarded by the Jews as the symbol of heavenly wisdom, and even a type of everlasting life.

Our Lord, then, means to say, that there is as much difference between the food supplied by Moses and that which his Father would bestow by him (even the bread, the true bread), as between the body and the soul, between temporal and eternal life, earth and heaven.

33. ὁ γὰρ ἄρτος, &c.] Here our Lord more explicitly shows what sort of bread he means, hinting at HIMSELF (the spiritual bread prefigured by the manna) as the author of that Gospel which nourishes the soul, and leads unto everlasting salvation. That Jesus meant himself, and not (as the Unitarians maintain) his doctrine, has been ably shown by Dr. Smith, Scr. Test. vol. iii. 128, seqq.

34. εἰπον.] The persons who now speak seem not to be the same as those (supposed to be of the higher class) who had demanded a sign, but some of the common people, who ignorantly supposed that he was speaking of corporeal bread, such as Moses had procured from heaven for their forefathers. In like manner the Samaritan woman said, iv. 15, Κύριε, δός μοι τοῦτο τὸ ὕδωρ.

The Jews, as appears from the Rabbinical writers, expected that the Messiah would provide his followers with plenty of delicious food; and as Moses had provided for the Jews in the wilderness, so they supposed that Christ would make provision for the temporal wants of his friends.

35. To render his meaning yet clearer, Christ expressly says, I am the bread of life; adding, that whosoever believeth on him shall never hunger or thirst. He reproves them for their unbelief, and declares that every one whom his Father had given to him would come to him and be received by him; that he had come down from heaven not to do his own will, but the will of Him that sent him, whose will it was that he should lose no one whom the Father had given him, but raise him up at the last day; in short, that every one who should believe in the Son should have eternal life. Thus, as Dean Turner observes (p. 67 of his Doctrine of the Eucharist), 'the important truths primarily intended to be inculcated were these; that to hear and believe were the great requisites on the part of men, and that spiritual sustenance, even unto life eternal, would be the correspondent gift on the part of God. And thus, as far at least as the 51st verse, this discourse may be considered as an amplification, by means of a constant allusion to the bread of life, of what Christ had taught on another occasion, John v. 24.'

— ἐγὼ εἰμι ὁ ἄρτος, &c.] Similarly it is said, Eccles. xxiv. 21, οἱ ἰσθίωντές με (scil. τῇ σοφίᾳ) καὶ οἱ πίνοντές με, &c.

36. ἀλλ' εἶπον—πιστεύετε.] Of these briefly-worded, and therefore obscure, words the full meaning may be expressed as follows: 'But as I have already told you (and now tell you again), ye have seen me (and my works) (including miracles) (and known my doctrines), and yet ye believe not on me.'

37. Here we have not only a doctrine propounded, but, by implication, an inference to be deduced from the declaration in the preceding verse. And our Lord proceeds to show that although they did not believe on him, yet his work would not be in vain, for others would come to him and be saved.

— πᾶν ὃ δίδωσί μοι, &c.] 'whomsoever the Father,' &c. The neuter is here usually considered as put for the masculine, πᾶν ὃ for πᾶν ἄνθρωπον. It should, however, seem that our Lord first speaks of the number of those given to him collectively, and then individually. And when taken in conjunction with πᾶν there may be (as some Commentators suppose) an allusion to the calling of the Gentiles; for they, too, according to the ancient promise, Ps. ii. 8, were to be given to Christ. This is confirmed by what is added at the parallel passage, vv. 45, 46, where it is said that the promise is καὶ ἰσχυραὶ πάντας διδάσκει τοῦ Θεοῦ. Synonymous with the πᾶν here is the πᾶν ἐκείνῳ xlvii. 2.

In what sense the Father is here said to give men to Christ has been differently understood by those of different religious opinions. Calvinistic Expositors, as may be imagined, take it to mean being chosen of the Father to eternal salvation by an absolute decree. But to this view see the unanswerable objections of Grotius, Hammond, Whitby, and Macknight, as also of Chrysostom, who ascribes the dogma to the Manicheans. The tem (here and at vv. 39. 65) must surely signify something compatible with the free agency of me. And here our Lord has himself determined a meaning by the expression that is substituted for it in the parallel passage at v. 44, which is persuasive of the present. To give men to Christ is evidently equivalent to draw them to Christ; and how irreconcilable that is with the impulsion implied in the Calvinistic interpretation of giving, is obvious. For ἐλκεῖν (as has been proved by Tittman) like the Hebr. קָצַף denotes a power not compulsory, but strongly moving, meaning to draw (not drag) any one; & to sway the understanding, or incline the will by all moral means and fit motives, as promoued in the Revelation of his will in the Holy Scriptures: see John xii. 32. Phil. ii. 13, 14, and he note; as also a Sermou by Dr. Balguy on that act, and one by Dr. Clarke on the present. However, the above is by no means the whole of what is meant in these words, since both terms undoubtedly point to a most important doctrine—the act of the preventing grace of God by his Holy Spirit, indispensably necessary to any one's being drawn to Christ by God; also the necessity for the co-operating grace of that Spirit after we have been brought to Christ by his preventing grace, proving the truth of what is said in our 10th lecture, that 'we have no power to do works inherent and acceptable to God, without the grace (God preventing us, that we may have a good-will, and working with us when we have that will': see Phil. ii. 12, 13. Thus δίδωσι turns to the thing itself; and ἵνα suggests the time by which it is accomplished. At the same time, we know from other parts of Scripture that grace means are not irresistible: man may receive the grace of God in vain. And when men are not lost, it is not for want of will in God, but for want of their own co-operation with divine grace; 1 xviii. 9.

— πρὸς ἐμὲ ἔξει.] 'shall come unto me,' only, as my disciple; comp. supra v. 40. Luke

vi. 47. Thus the expression is often interchanged with the more familiar one 'to believe in Christ.'

38. ὅτι καταβίβηκα, &c.] Our Lord shows the credibility of what he has said by adverting to the purpose of his coming; q. d. How indeed should I reject any one thus coming unto me; since for this end came I from heaven, that I might save them? On καταβίβηκα ἐκ τ. οὐρ., see Note supra iii. 13.

39. ἐξ αὐτοῦ.] Supply τῇ, as at xvi. 17. Apoc. xi. 9, and elsewhere. Μὴ ἀπολέσω, 'that I should, as far as depends on me, suffer no one to perish.' For the verb is here to be taken permissively. By ἀναστήσω (at which repeat ἵνα, and take ἀναστ. in the Subjunctive) is meant the resurrection of the blessed to eternal happiness; see Schoettgen.

41. We have here a plainer expression of the preceding sentiment, importing that every one who recognises him as the Son of God, and believes in him as such, shall be both raised from the dead, and blessed with everlasting happiness.

Here, instead of δὲ, many MSS., Versions, and Fathers have γὰρ, which is edited by Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. It may, however, be justly suspected to have arisen from a gloss, or rather a marginal explanation. A suspicion rather strengthened by the testimony of the Versions.

41, 42. At this period of the discourse the Jews murmured at Christ's declaration that he was the bread of life which came down from heaven, deeming it irreconcilable with his well-known earthly descent.

41. ἐγγύζον.] Γογγύζω (an onomatopœia, similar to γρύζω, and used instead of the purer Greek term τινάσκειν) denotes indignant complaint, though expressed in an under tone.

44. Having at v. 43 admonished them against sullen and discontented rejection of his claims to heavenly descent, our Lord, without attempting to explain what they were utterly unprepared to receive, much less understand, goes on to reply to their cavils by simply repeating his former assertion, in even stronger terms, that no one could come unto him unless he were drawn of the Father, and that every one who believeth on him shall have everlasting life.

44. τῇ ἐσχάτῃ ἡμέρᾳ.] Here (as also at vv. 54. 40) before τῇ ἐσχ. many MSS. have ἐν, which is with reason received by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz.

45. Here, in order more strongly to impress on their minds these truths, our Lord refers to the testimony of Scripture (Is. liv. 13) on the necessity of this teaching from above; intimating that this Scripture is now, in their own case, likely to be fulfilled by their rejection of him as the Christ.

— ἐν τοῖς προφήταις.] Meaning that part of the sacred Volume called the Prophets. Διδακτοὶ for διδασκάλιοι. There is here an ellipsis of ὑπό. The τοῦ before Θεοῦ, not found in many ancient MSS. and Fathers, is cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, Tittman, and Scholz, who also, for ἀκούσας just after, edit, on good grounds, ἀκούων.

46. οὐχ ὅτι—τὸν Πατέρα.] Said by way of anticipating a possible objection; q. d. 'not that by this teaching of the Father I mean complete and immediate instruction; that pertaineth to Him alone who came down from heaven, who was sent from the Father, or who hath been with Him, and therefore knoweth the Father and his will, as no one can do but He alone;' see supra i. 18, and Note.

47. Here our Lord repeats yet more emphatically his former declaration on the blessed consequences of belief in him, namely, eternal life. The mention of which leads him, in the next verse, to repeat the emphatic declaration, that He is that bread of life. And this again leads him, at vv. 49, 50, to a comparison of its enduring efficacy with the transient effects of the manna which the Jews had eaten in the wilderness.

49. οἱ πατέρες ὑμῶν, &c.] Meaning, 'Your forefathers ate the manna in the wilderness, and [afterwards] died; that is the bread [of life] which descendeth from heaven, in order that if any one eat thereof he may not die, but live.' By ἐξ αὐτοῦ φάγῃ is meant, 'avail himself of that doctrine,' by coming unto Jesus in faith. On ἀποθ.,

as used in the natural and spiritual sense, compare νεκρός similarly employed, Matt. viii. 22.

51. Here our Lord declares, in literal expressions, what he had in the preceding verse couched in figurative ones, and adds something further. For as he had before called himself the bread of life, as being the author and giver of that spiritual nourishment which preserves the soul unto everlasting life, so here he terms himself the life-giving (ζῶν being for ζωοποιῶν) bread, as giving his life for the life of the world, i. e. to obtain that life and salvation for it; namely, by his death and passion; in which it is implied, that there can be no salvation to any one but through the merits of his death. From the use of the figure in the preceding verses it is plain that by eating the flesh of Christ here is metaphorically meant believing in the sacrifice of the death of Christ as the means of salvation.

Here it is a much disputed point whether in this eating of Christ's flesh there is, or is not, a reference to the Eucharist. The former view was maintained by most of the ancients, as it has been by many modern Interpreters, especially those of the Romish Church; while the latter has been adopted by not a few of the most eminent Expositors, both ancient and modern, as Tertullian, Clem. Alex., Origen, Cyril, Cyprian, Augustine, Grotius, Whitby, Walford, Lampe, Calvin, Pearce, Newcome, Tittman, and Kuinoel, who maintain that the context will not permit us to take the words, of the Eucharist. Yet though they successfully show that by eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ must here be meant securing to ourselves the benefits of the sacrifice of Christ by a true and lively faith, yet that will not prove that there is no reference, by anticipative allusion, to the Eucharist, as Dr. Hey and Dean Turtton admit there is.

53. ἰάν μὴ φάγητε, &c.] Our Lord, using that those whom he addressed, by taking his words in a literal sense, either mistook or misrepresented his meaning, now repeats with stronger revelation what he had before said. At the same time, he expresses himself so particularly,

 as to show that by eating the flesh and drinking
 the blood of Christ he means eating and drinking in a figurative and spiritual manner; where the expressions signify to apply to ourselves the sacrifice of his death, by coming unto Him in faith, and thus participating by faith in the benefits produced by that sacrifice.

60. To prevent all further misapprehension of his meaning, our Lord concludes with inculcating
 the same truth that he had before done at vv. 35.
 51; and subjoins the same solemn assurance as at vv. 47, 51.

61. σκληρός.] Some explain this, 'hard to be understood' (and so Stobæus, ἀκηρῆς οὗτος ὁ λόγος καὶ σκληρός); others, 'offensive.' Either may be admitted, and, indeed, both may have place. That it should have appeared so is not strange, if we consider that Christ used such language of himself as no prophet had ever done, and took higher ground than even Moses had ventured to do; which must have made what he said at once unacceptable to some, and, from his touching on the most mysterious and experimental parts of religion, little intelligible to others.

62. In this and the following verses (spoken not in the Synagogue, but elsewhere, and doubtless in private) our Lord condescends to remove the two great stumbling-blocks, which even the well-disposed, notwithstanding his explanations and assurances, still found; namely, 1. that he had said he had come down from heaven, ver. 42;
 and 2. that he was the bread of life, and should give his flesh for the life of the world. In removing the first of these (ver. 62) our Lord employs that energetic form of expression, involving a kind of ellipsis, by apostrophe, suitable to deep emotion, τὸ πνεῦμα being left to be supplied;
 4. (with reference to vv. 41, 42) 'Ye murmured because I said that I was the bread which came down from heaven; ye could not reconcile this with my earthly descent. Will ye still retain your doubts, when ye see me ascending unto heaven where I was before?'

62. What is here said has reference to the objection, ver. 42. On the indirect and hypothetical mode of expression here adopted Dean Turton has the following able remarks: 'Our Lord, as in the instance before us, generally spoke with great reserve of his death, resurrection, and ascension;
 and we may here remark that indirect method of expression—the Son of Man—by which he frequently designated himself, when touching upon these subjects. A remarkable proof of the reserve here mentioned is afforded by St. Mark (ix. 9, 10) in connexion with his account of the transfiguration. Here we find even the three favoured disciples completely at a loss when they heard our Lord speaking of the Son of Man rising from the dead. The connexion between the descent from heaven as treated of in the discourse, and the ascent as intimated in ver. 62, will be strongly confirmed by the passages adduced in the preceding section (pp. 143, 146) relating to our Lord's coming forth from the Father, and going again to the Father. Moreover, in the gradual development to his disciples of events so declaratory of his divine nature, we see how little the minds of people were prepared for such information, and are enabled to account for the hypothetical and indirect mode of expression adopted by our Lord in the 62nd verse.'

63. This verse refers, as Dean Turton shows, to the objection at v. 52, seqq., and in it is removed the second stumbling-block above mentioned.

—τὸ πνεῦμα.] By this many understand the Holy Spirit; others, spiritual views, in contra-distinction to the carnal ones of the Jews; or (as Bp. Middleton explains) the spiritual sense, as opposed to the literal one, as πνεῦμα is opposed to γράμμα at 2 Cor. iii. 6. The interpretation first mentioned seems excluded by the context and the scope of the passage; the second may be considered the true one, and has been ably maintained by Bp. Middleton, who assigns the following sense: 'But it is the spiritual part of Religion which is of avail in opening the understanding; the mere letter is nothing: my words, however, are the spirit and the life of all, which ye have hitherto known only in the literal and carnal sense.'

Upon the whole, then, the general meaning of the passage may be well represented, with Macknight and others, thus: 'Do ye revolt at this declaration, that my flesh is the bread which came down from heaven, and that you must eat my flesh and drink my blood in order to attain salvation? What if ye shall see the Son of Man ascend up into heaven corporeally where he was before? Surely this will convince you that I did really come down from heaven; and I never meant that you should eat my flesh after a corporeal and carnal manner. That would profit you nothing. In so speaking I intended not a literal sense. It is my words taken in a spiritual sense that are the life-giving food of your souls; whereas, in a carnal acceptance, they were unavailing. The life-giving power of my spirit it is that is imparted to my words, by which ye will be quickened and nourished unto life eternal.' So also Dean Turton explains, illustrating the reference to v. 52. thus:—Objection: 'How can this man give us his flesh to eat?' Observation: 'It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words which I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life.' Here, then, 'the spirit' is opposed to 'the flesh.' Life—doubtless eternal life—is communicated by 'the spirit': in that respect 'the flesh' profiteth nothing. These declarations, then, referred, as I think they cannot but be, to the objection recorded in the 52d verse, prove that whatever images might have been derived from the sustentation of the body, the real meaning was, that the spiritual life could only be given and maintained by the spirit of Christ.'

If it be asked, why, then, did our Lord use such dark and enigmatical language? we may answer (with Abp. Newcome), to abate the ardour of those who would have made him a king;

to exercise the faith of temporary proselytes; and to retain in the number of his followers those only who were sincere converts.

65. Here our Lord refers to what he had said at v. 37, 44; and from a comparison of these verses with this, it is clear that by the Father's giving men is meant his drawing them to him by the strong moral motives propounded in his word, and by the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit. See the Notes on those verses.

prise, and coinciding with Peter's unequivocal confession of faith, Matt. xvi. 16. Griesbach, also, instead of ὁ Υἱός, edits, from a few MSS. and Versions, ὁ ἄγιος. But that reading has been, very properly, rejected by Scholz; since, while eternal authority for it is far less, internal evidence is altogether on the side of the common reading; the appellation ἄγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ, as used of our Lord, only occurring in the confession of the demoniacs, Mark i. 24. Luke iv. 34. He is, indeed, called ἄγιος παῖς, Acts iv. 27, but not ἄγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ. Whereas the appellation Χριστός, ὁ Υἱός τοῦ Θεοῦ, frequently occurs in the New Test., and especially in this Gospel, as i. 49. xi. 27. See more in Tittman, who proves that the appellations ὁ Χριστός and ὁ Υἱός τοῦ Θεοῦ were not synonymous, but that the former had reference to the office, the latter to the Divine nature of Christ.

70. οὐκ ἐγὼ—ἐξελέξαμην:] The interrogation terminates at ἔξελ., not at ἐστίν, the καὶ being for καὶ ὅμως; q. d. 'Have I not chosen and appointed twelve of you as my legates [and confidants]; and yet one of you is a betrayer, false accuser, or an adversary,—one disaffected to me.' See Acts xiii. 17. So διαβεβλήσθαι πρὸς τινά, in the sense of being hostile to, is used in the best Classical writers. The καὶ (and yet) points at the strangeness of the thing. For so small a number, out of a large one, and that chosen by Christ himself, might have been expected to be without any failing member.

71. Διὰς] 'he meant. A sense frequent both in the Classical writers and the New Test.

VII. From hence to Ch. x. 2. we have the details of a five journey of our Lord, namely, to Jerusalem, at the Feast of Tabernacles, six months before his death and passion. This the Evangelist has recorded, as especially suited to the purpose of his Gospel, from the evidence it affords of our Lord's anxious endeavours to reclaim the Jews from their pernicious error, and convince them of the exalted character of him whom they had thus blindly rejected. Accordingly, after briefly adverting to the circumstances which led to and accompanied the journey, the Evangelist proceeds to detail various discourses his, and addresses (some shorter and others longer) of our Lord to the Jews, at the festival question.

ἔ. περιεπάτει:] 'vernabatur,' 'went about,' or 'resided.' So Nonnus: παῖον μίμν. This sense, also occurring at xi. 54, is said to be formed on the use of the Heb. ḥan. Οὐκ ἤθελεν, 'was not disposed, did not choose.'

2. σκηνοπηγία.] This feast (on which see Num. xxix. 12. Deut. xvi. 13—15.) was so called from the tents or tabernacles, which on that occasion were erected in and about Jerusalem, and was designed to commemorate their dwelling in tents in the wilderness. Neh. viii. 16—18. It is called by Josephus and Philo the greatest feast, and was one of the three feasts which every male among the Jews was obliged to attend.

3. οἱ ἀδελφοί.] See Note on Matt. xii. 46.
 — οἱ μαθηταί.] Supply ἔκει, 'thy disciples there' [as well as here], namely, the disciples whom Jesus had made in the first year of his ministry.

Without putting too favourable or unfavourable a construction on the motives of this advice (and thus avoiding an extreme, in either case objectionable), we may suppose that his kinsmen merely regarded Jesus as a Prophet, but had no notion that he was the Messiah. Moreover, conceiving him to be chiefly actuated by worldly motives, and themselves looking to personal advantage from his celebrity, they, on finding many disciples in Galilee abandoning him, counselled him to go to Judea, and confirm the attachment of his faithful followers there, and endeavour to increase their number.

4. οὐδεὶς γὰρ—παρήσια.] The general sense here is apparent from the context; but to determine the particular shade of meaning, and show how it exists in the words themselves, is by no means easy. Many eminent Expositors take the καὶ for ἀλλά; thus: 'No one doth any thing considerable in secret;' but he is desirous of coming under the view of the public.' This, however, is straining the sense; and for the above signification of καὶ there is no authority. Preferable is the view adopted by the ancient Expositors and several eminent modern ones (as Grotius, Lampe, Rosenmuller, and Kuinoel), who, regarding the καὶ as, by Hebraism, put for ὅς, and the αὐτός as redundant, suppose an inversion of order, thus: 'For no one, who desires to be famous, does great things in secret.' Yet καὶ can never properly be said to be used for ὅς. And to this silence a word, as they are obliged to do, is most unwarrantable. Nay, so far from the αὐτός being redundant, it rather seems emphatic, and ought to be construed with the καὶ, which may be taken in the usual sense. Render:

'No one doth any thing great in secret, who himself desireth to be in publicity and notoriety;' meaning, that the man who doth great things in secret cannot himself desire to be in publicity (lit. in propatulo); in which sense the expression occurs infra v. 13. and xi. 54, though there it has the physical signification. So also supra ii. 15. and Philo, p. 856. (cited by Rosenmüller) τοῖς τὰ κοινωφελῇ ὁρῶσιν ἴστω παρρησία· καὶ μεθ' ἡμῶν διὰ μίσους ἴτωσαν ἀγοράς.

— εἰ τ. ποιεῖς.] This may mean, 'if thou art doing, art engaged in these things, these great designs.' Yet Xonanus well expresses the general sense thus: εἰ τὰδε ῥέξεις (wouldst do) Ποικίλα θαύματα, δεῖξον ὁρώμενα θαύματα κόσμῳ.

6. ὁ καιρὸς ὁ ἐμὸς.] Not meaning 'the time of his death,' as some understand, but the time of his going up to the feast at Jerusalem, and manifesting himself publicly. See v. 8. Of the words ὁ καιρὸς—ἔτοιμος the sense seems to be: 'Any time and manner will be suitable for you to go there: you have nothing to fear.' The reason is intimated in the verse following, where the natural form of expression (here changed into a gnome generalis) would be, 'I cannot go thus publicly, because of the hatred of a world whose ways and works I have reprov'd; but they have no such reason to hate you.'

8. οὐκ ἀναβαίνω.] Many eminent Commentators and Editors here read, οὐκ, οὐκ; but on very precarious grounds. The external authority for οὐκ is only that of five MSS. and some inferior Versions. And the latter, in a case like this, are of no weight. The reading may, with far greater probability, be regarded as an inadvertent alteration in some, than a purposed alteration in all the other MSS. Indeed, οὐκ in the usual sense of the word cannot here be defended consistently with the truth of facts; and to take it as put for οὐκ, is to assign to the word a sense which rests on no solid foundation, either of custom or propriety of language, and which could scarcely be supposed, in this particular instance, to have been employed, consistently with that open ingenuitiness so conspicuous in the character of the exalted speaker.

The sense, then, seems to be: 'It is not yet (i. e. at present) my intention to go up,' &c. The next words signify, 'My time (for going) is not fully come,' or at hand.

The reason why our Lord did not go at first, was, we may suppose, in order to avoid the course of travellers, with which the roads would then be thronged. And his intention being (as is indicated by the words following, ἀλλὰ ὡς ἐν κρυπτῷ) to go as privately as was possible for one so celebrated, he chose to go at a time when there would be fewest persons on the road; and therefore, it is probable, he set off on the first day of the Feast, and reached Jerusalem in the evening of the third day, not making his appearance till the middle of the Feast, which lasted eight days.

11. οἱ Ἰ. ἐζήτουν.] Some take the sense to be, 'the principal persons among the Jews (the chief priests, &c.) sought him, namely, to put him to death.' A view countenanced by v. 1, 14, 25; but the words following rather require the sense 'Judæi (scil. vulgus) desiderabant eum,' a signification in which the word frequently occurs in the New Test., especially the writings of St. John.

12. γογγυσμός.] The term has here the sense in which grogus is often used in Thucyd. and other writers; namely, the muttering or whispering of private discourse, denoting secrecy and caution, and implying apprehension rather than resentment. See Calvin.

The δὲ, not found in many MSS., early Editions and Fathers, has been cancelled by Matthæi, Griesb., and Scholz; perhaps rightly; internal evidence being strongly against it.

13. οὐδεὶς] i. e. of those who thought favourably of him.

— διὰ τὸν φόβον τῶν Ἰ.] 'through their fear of the Jews;' as xix. 38. and Jer. xxv. 18. The Dative with a preposition would be unclassical Greek. So Thucyd. i. 26, διὰ τὸν φόβον Κερκεραίων.

14. ἱορτῆς μεσοῦσης.] Meaning, by a latitude of sense as to μασώ, found in the best writers, ‘on one of the days between the first and the seventh;’ which were the most solemn days, probably the 3d or 4th day.

—ἀνίβη—ἐδίδασκε.] See Luke ii. 46. and Note. The Gentile philosophers, too, were accustomed to deliver their instructions in the temple, on account of the sanctity of the place, and the number of persons continually resorting thither. So Philostr. Vit. Ap. v. 36, 27, καὶ παρὰ αὐτῶν εἰς τὸ ἱερόν ποί, ἐφη, &c.

15. γράμματα ‘litera, learning.’ Probably meaning that kind of learning which was alone cultivated in Judea, namely, theological. Thus the dispute whether γράμματα here means divine, or human learning, will be rendered nugatory; for learning among the Jews implied nothing more than sacred literature, consisting of a profound acquaintance with the Scriptures, and a knowledge of Divinity in general. That γράμματα cannot of itself signify the Scriptures, is manifest; for such a sense, besides being unsuitable, would require the Article and the adjective ἐκ. Whereas γρ. in the sense of learning occurs in Acts xxvi. 24. and 1s. xxxix. 12, οὐκ ἐπίσταται γράμματα. Indeed, a knowledge of the Scriptures was no more than what was expected from the people. More was required from the learned. So Sota, quoted by Lampo, ‘Etsi quis in Script. et Miachna versatus est, neque tamen sapientibus operam dedit, plebeius est.’

—μὴ μεμαθηκώς.] Mh here seems to be for et; though this may be ranged under that usage of the particle, by which is indicated a softened question. Comp. 2 Cor. xii. 21.

16. ἀπεκρίθη αὐτοῖς.] After ἀπεκρ. very many MSS., some Versions, Theophylact, and the Edit. Princ. have οὐν; which has been received by Griesbach, Matthæi, Tittman, Vater, and Schoiz. Yet internal evidence is not a little against the word; since it was far more likely to have been added, than taken away. And the ἀπάντησις is such as is common in this Gospel; though generally removed in one or other of the MSS., and sometimes in two or three ways. Thus some Versions express οὐν, and others καὶ. The inference is obvious; and indeed Griesbach in his third Edition has expunged the οὐν.

—ἡ ἐμὴ διδαχὴ—ἀλλὰ τοῦ πέμψαντός με] Πατρός, which is indeed found in one of the best MSS.; but evidently from a marginal note. So also Nonnus appears to have read.

The general import of these words is plain; the exact sense is not so clear but that difference of opinion has arisen. See Smith’s Text., vol. ii. 354. To determine this, we consider the context, the scope, and the general import of the terms, especially those on which the sentiment hinges, διδαχὴ and οὐκ—ἀπ’. To advert to the scope, the words were intended to refute the notion of those who, regarding Jesus merely as αὐτομαθὴς and αὐτοδιδάκτος, accounted him (as it appears from the Rabbinical writers, the Jews generally did) utterly undeserving of attention—a mere pretender, and no prophet. To which our Lord replies, that his teaching is not his own, i. e. that he is not αὐτοδιδάκτος, but θεοδιδάκτος. This should seem to be the primary sense of the word. Yet, under it is also couched another and a secondary one, serving to introduce the arguments which follow. Thus διδαχὴ is to be taken for what he teaches, his doctrine, or system of religious instruction. In this sense, too, our Lord declares that his doctrine, though not derived from their schools, is not therefore false, since it was not devised or originated by himself, but came from the Source of all Truth—God himself. Comp. xiv. 10. Thus the argument here is the same as that glanced at by St. Paul, Gal. i. 1, Παῦλος ἀπόστολος οὐκ ἀνθρώπων, οὐδὲ δι’ ἀνθρώπου, ἀλλὰ διὰ ἰ. Χρ. καὶ Θεοῦ.

Our Lord here means to intimate, that the doctrine he taught them was not of human origin, but a revelation from God, which he was commissioned to teach. As much as to say (to use the words of Dr. South), ‘I do not proceed upon any authority or power distinct from that of the Father; my plans and actions are inseparable from his; my doctrine, works, and glory are his, and his are mine: the union is perfect and indissoluble.’ See more in Whitby and Macknight.

17. ἰάν τις θέλῃ, &c.] We have in this and the next verse two arguments in proof of the preceding position (namely, that his doctrine is from God), and anticipative of the contrary objections. 1. internal, and deduced from the nature, qualities, and effects of the doctrine itself (v. 17); the other external; namely, that, in what he is doing, he has in view, not his own honour, but that of God. (Kuinol and Calvin.) The meaning is: ‘He who is disposed to obey the will of God when revealed, however contrary it may be to his preconceived views or carnal affections, shall know,’ &c. Τὸ θέλημα τοῦ Θεοῦ signifies ‘what God would have us to do, both as to belief and practice; and to that will is to believe and do accordingly. Now the will of God, says St. Paul, is our sanctification. This conforming of our will implies the abandonment of all those preconceived views and carnal affections, which obscure the judgment and enslave the will; otherwise what we will to be false, we shall not readily believe to be true. A truth this not unknown to the Heathen Philosophers. So Aristot. Eth. vi. 12. lays it down as a maxim, that the mind’s eye (τὸ ὄμμα τῆς ψυχῆς) is not capable of rightly judging without moral virtue. And Hermes ap. Stob. Eccl. Phys. I. 2. p. 698. says very similarly: ὁ δὲ ἀναβίων εἰσέεται καὶ ποῦ ἐστὶν ἡ ἀλήθεια, καὶ τίς ἐκείνη.

Thus, then, unbelief is more the fault of the heart than the understanding. For (as observes

18. 41. ἔμαντοῦ λαλῶ. 'Ὁ ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ λαλῶν τὴν δόξαν τὴν ἰδίαν ἰζητεῖ· ὁ δὲ ζητῶν τὴν δόξαν τοῦ πέμψαντος αὐτόν, οὗτος ἀληθὴς ἐστὶ, καὶ ἀδικία ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἐστίν. "Οὐ Μωϋσῆς δέδωκεν ὑμῖν τὸν νόμον; καὶ οὐδεὶς ἐξ ὑμῶν ποιεῖ τὸν νόμον. τί με ζητεῖτε ἀποκτείνειν; "Απεκρίθη ὁ ὄχλος καὶ εἶπε· Δαιμόνιον ἔχεις· τίς σε ζητεῖ ἀποκτείνειν; "Απεκρίθη ὁ Ἰησοῦς καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Ἐν ἔργον ἐποίησα, καὶ πάντες θαυμάζετε· διὰ τοῦτο. Μωϋσῆς δέδωκεν ὑμῖν τὴν περικοπὴν (οὐχ ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ Μωϋσέως ἐστίν, ἀλλ' ἐκ τῶν πατέρων)

Dr. South in a Sermon on this text) 'the Gospel has then only a free admission to the assent of the understanding when it brings a passport from a rightly disposed will. If the heart be but well disposed, the natural goodness of any doctrine will be sufficient to vouch for the truth; for the suitableness of it will endear it to the will, and thus it will slide into the assent also.' Then shall a man know from experience (γινώσκειται) that it is of God, by finding that this doing the will of God will conduce to his happiness here and his salvation hereafter, when (as Dr. South says) 'persuasion shall pass into knowledge, and knowledge into assurance; and all be at length completed in the beatific vision and full fruition of those joys which are at God's right hand for evermore.'

18. 41. ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ—ζητεῖ. Here our Lord furnishes another and external criterion from which to judge whether this doctrine be of God. 'The false teacher seeks the praise of men; but the true legate of God seeks the glory of God in the salvation of men.'

—ἀδικία] falsehood, or imposture. So in 2 Thess. ii. 10, 12, ἀδικία is similarly opposed to ἀληθεία.

19. οὐ Μωϋσῆς—νόμον.] There is thought to be a change of subject, and the recent Commentators are in general of opinion that the words have reference to certain remarks (not recorded by the Evangelist) on the part of the rulers present, charging Jesus with violating the Sabbath, by healing on that day. But we may well suppose the reference, if such there be, made, not to any accusation then advanced, but to what had been, and still was occasionally brought forward by them. By τὸν νόμον some understand that part of the Law which enjoins the observance of the Sabbath. But it is better, with others, (as Euthymius, Beza, Lampe, Calvin, and Tittman,) to take it of the Law generally, of which the most important injunctions were violated, either in letter or spirit, by the Pharisees. Of this a signal example is then adduced by our Lord,—namely, that they are plotting his death; q. d. 'You do not even keep the Law of Moses, or why plot against my life, in violation of the 6th commandment?'

20. δαιμόνιον ἔχεις.] This is put, as at John x. 20, for the more Classical term κακοδαίμωνες; and to be taken, in a popular sense, for 'You are out of your senses; various diseases, and especially madness, being by the Jews ascribed to the agency of evil spirits. The words τίς σε ζητεῖ ἀποκτείνειν are, with reason, ascribed to the multitude at large, as opposed to the Priests and Pharisees, and especially the strangers out of country; who, as they had themselves no say on his life, and were ignorant of the designs the Rulers, might therefore naturally feel ignorant at what they conceived a false account Our Lord, however, notices not their unwise reproach, nor removes their mistake, but goes to trace the malignity of the principal part to its true origin, namely, his healing the paralytic on the Sabbath day. He shows that he had no reason to censure him on that score and justifies his actions on their own principle and with reference to their own practice.

21. In reply, our Lord practically refutes the charge of madness, by speaking on the matter question with the words of truth and soberness. He confirms his foregoing assertion by showing that they sought his death, and upon what rational and unjust grounds they condemned him — ἐν ἔργον ἐποίησα] 'one [illustration] I have done.' Namely, the miracle at the pool of Bethesda. Θαυμάζετε is here not to be taken in its ordinary sense, but, as at Mark vi. 6 Gal. i. 6. of that kind of wonder which is allied to a feeling of disapprobation. An also found in the Classical writers; on which see my Note on Thucyd. vi. 56.

—διὰ τοῦτο.] This form is by most commentators construed with the words following thus it admits of no suitable sense, and the best Expositors, both ancient and modern, take it with the preceding, and render rightly, I think: for θαυμάζετε in this sense is rarely, if ever, put absolutely; followed by some case, with or without a preposition. So Mark vi. 6, ἐθαύμαζε διὰ τὴν αὐτῶν.

22. δέδωκεν ὁ τὴν περικοπὴν.] i. e. 'the rite of circumcision.' Such is the sense of the Article. See Middleton.

—οὐχ ὅτι, &c.] Subaud. λέγουσιν. This is a qualification of the sense in which the word was used by Moses, but had been by [Abraham]. It is observed by Euthymius and Bengel, that the dignity of circumcision, as compared with the Sabbath, is meant to be exalted, as of its more ancient institution. The words καὶ ἐν σαββ. περικοπὴν ἀποκτείνει, is, 'and ye circumcise a man-child, though on the Sabbath.' The reason given by the Jews was, that circumcision was an ἁγίασμα of the Sabbath a negative one; and the former vacated the latter.

23. εἰ περιτομήν, &c.] An argumentum à minori ad maius, which is thus traced by Lampe: Illic erat minister Moses, hic Dominus ipse Christus. Illic Lex positiva cedebat positive; tanto magis naturali. Thus intimating that the cure in question was far less at variance with the spirit of the Sabbathical institution than their own practice with respect to circumcision. Χολάτε; 'are ye [justly] angry?' Χολάω properly signifies to be full of bile (χολή); and in the later writers it is used either with a Dative, or an Accusative, with πρός, αὐτόν, denoting the object. 'Ὅλον' is by most taken as if it belonged to ὑγιῇ, and not put adverbially for καθόλου. But the best ancient and modern Expositors are agreed that it should be taken with ἄνθρωπον, 'the whole man,' as opposed to the part which was circumcised. Thus arises a stronger sense, and yet one quite justified by facts; for in a violent paralysis, as Hippocrates says, 'Ὅλος ἄνθρωπος νοσήσας ἐστίν.' And Aretæus says of a virulent chronic disorder, ὅλη τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ νοσεῖ. There may be, too, (as many of those Commentators think) an apposition meant, by allusion to circumcision being confined to a particular part, but the healing in question extending to the whole. So a Rabbinical writer cited by Wetstein says, 'Circumcision, which is performed on one of the 248 members of the body, vacates the Sabbath; how much more the whole body (i. e. the healing of the whole body) of a man (vacates it).' To fully understand which, and the force of our Lord's reasoning, we must suppose that under circumcision is included the medical cure of the wound, and bear in mind that medical or surgical aid in all cases of imminent peril were permitted on the Sabbath by the Jurists. So the same writer elsewhere says, fol. 5. 1. 'Periculum vitæ pellit iudicium; item circumcisio cūmque sanatio.' Our Lord therefore means to argue, that what he had done was justifiable on even stronger ground—inasmuch as circumcision and its medical healing only affected a very small part of the body; his cure, the whole body.

24. The force of the argument is, 'do not condemn in me what you approve of in Moses: if you allow a man to be circumcised on the Sabbath, because Moses ordered it, but do not allow him to be healed, when I do it, you judge κατ' ὄψιν, according to the person, and not according to justice.'

κατ' ὄψιν.] The sense of this expression has been somewhat disputed. The ancient and most only modern Commentators regard it as equivalent to προσωποληπτικῶς, i. e. 'by partiality or preference'; a sense sufficiently apt, but wanting of proof. It is better (with Erasmus, Bp. Sanderson, Wetstein, Kypke, Kuinoel, Schenckmüller, Schlensner, and Tittman) to take it to signify a judging by the outward and first appearance only, without examination, and consequently superficially and precipitately; which, indeed, implies partiality and injustice. Thus in Ia. xi. 3, 4, to judge κατὰ δόξαν is opposed to judging according to truth and equity. And Wetstein adduces a similar use of ἀπ' ὄψεως from a kindred passage of Lysias. Thus, then, they are enjoined to look to the spirit of the law, rather than the letter, and thus judge righteous judgment.

26. μήποτε ἀληθῶς—Χριστός;] It is not without reason that the persons here speaking are just before designated as τινὲς ἐκ τ. 1., as distinguished from the two other classes of hearers,—the Pharisaical party, bitterly hostile to Jesus, and the strangers from the country. The persons here meant were that part of the Jerusalemites who were aware of, and disapproved of, the enmity of the other party (consisting of the Rulers and the Pharisees), and who were themselves well affected to Jesus. Hence the scope of the words is to suggest a probable reason for the Rulers' non-molestation of Jesus; namely, that they have actually ascertained that he is truly the Christ.

The second ἀληθῶς is indeed not found in many ancient MSS. and Versions, and the Ed. Princ., and is rejected by most Editors, and cancelled by Griesbach, Vator, and Scholz, but on insufficient grounds; since the external evidence is far inferior to that for the common reading, and the internal is by no means so strong; for it was more probable that the ancient Critics should stumble at the repetition of ἀληθῶς, and cancel one of the two words (thus in some MSS. and Versions the first ἀληθῶς is omitted), than that any should introduce what might scarcely seem necessary. And yet St. John is so fond of the word, that he uses it as many times as all the other writers of the New Test. put together, and yet never once pleonastically. As to the double use of it here, the latter ἀληθῶς is confirmed by John vi. 14. vii. 40, ἀληθῶς ὁ προφήτης, and Matt. xiv. 33. xxvii. 54; the former by John xvii. 8, ἐγνώσαν ἀληθῶς. Acts xii. 11, οἶδα ἀληθῶς. Hence we see how unfounded is the remark of Bp. Pearce, Dr. Campbell, and Dr. A. Clarke, that the second ἀληθῶς is unnecessary and unsuitable to the usual style of the writer, if not inaccurate. The last mentioned charge is manifestly unfounded, and the second is negated by positive testimony. The first, too, is groundless; for how can the word be unnecessary if it strengthens the sense? and that it does so, is manifest. Besides, the two are evidently meant of two different classes, and the truths themselves are different. That some MSS. and Versions omit both, only strengthens my persuasion that both were originally written by the Evangelist. The truth seems to be, that the Alexandrian Critics, having decided, pro sapientiā suā, that, to prevent tautology, one should be omitted, could not agree which to remove; and the indications of this doubt were probably expressed in the originals of those MSS., where we find both omitted. Thus the scribes were puzzled which to take, and which to leave; and, as might be expected, omitted both.

27. ἀλλὰ τοῦτον, &c.] Tittman regards these words as not coming from the same persons as the preceding, but from others, in reply to those who were inclined to think Jesus was the Messiah. Yet to suppose so sudden a change of persons in the speakers, as it is uncritical, so is it quite unnecessary; for why may we not here suppose the same persons still speaking, but, as it were, correcting their former impression that he might be the Messiah (ἀλλὰ, however, be that as it may), and seeking an excuse for not believing on him.

To advert to the nature of the excuse, there is in the words τοῦτον οἶδαμεν, &c. reference to a notion then prevalent, that the parentage, and consequently birth-place, of the Messiah would be unknown; so that, when he should appear, no one would be able to say whence he had come; for he would appear suddenly and adult. How these vain notions had arisen, is not clear. They were, however, quite opposed to Scripture, and were therefore only entertained by Traditionarii, the Pharisees, and others, not by the Scripturarii. Πόθεν is by the best Commentators interpreted, not so much of place, as (like the Latin unde) of origin. 'The Jews (says Tittman) supposed that the origin of the Messiah would be unknown, and that he would be ἀπάτωρ and ἀμήτωρ, or at least born of a virgin.' Perhaps, however, we may, with Markland and Kuinoel, take the πόθεν of both place and person; which, indeed, seems required by what follows.

28. ἔκραξεν] palam dixit, professus est. So supra i. 15. Rom. ix. 27. Hezech. κέκραγε· φανερώς διαμαρτύρεται.

— καὶ οἴδατε—εἰμί.] These words would seem in direct contradiction to what is said infra viii. 14, 19. To remove which discrepancy, various methods have been devised. Several ancient and some modern Commentators suppose the knowledge here spoken of to be pretended knowledge. But there is nothing in the words themselves to countenance this. Others, with more reason, regard the words as spoken ironically, and consequently to be taken in the opposite sense.

Yet that would here involve no little harshness; and, indeed, unnecessarily; since the same effect (that of reversing the seeming affirmation) may be produced by taking the words (with some ancient Expositors) as an interrogative sentence, having, as often, the force of a negative one, the καὶ signifying utrum? as in Mark x. 26. Actu xxiii. 3; q. d. 'Do ye know me? No! otherwise ye would know that I came not of myself.' Ans. As, however, this sense of καὶ is not established on any certain proof, and such a meaning cannot be extracted from the words without violence, I may be better, with Markland and Tittman, to retain the declarative sense, and suppose this passage one of the many briefly expressed and harshly conceived sentences occurring in the Gospel; of which the sentiment, more fully evolved, is as follows: 'Ye say ye know me, and whence I am descended: and yet that will not prove my claim to be unfounded; for I came not of myself, falsely assuming a Divine mission, but found my claims on self-testimony, but as that of God, who is truly my Father, but whom ye know not, otherwise ye would have believed his testimony concerning me.' On the words ὃν ὑμεῖς οὐκ οἴδατε compare infra viii. 19, 34.

29. ὅτι παρ' αὐτοῦ—ἀπέστειλεν.] Here our Lord asserts his claim to a Divine origin (at least by implication), and to a Divine commission. The ὅτι, not found in very many MSS., Versions, and early Editions, is cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. Internal evidence is certainly against it; and the asyndeton has great force.

30. ἔξήτουν.] The persons here meant are not the same who have been just speaking, but those mentioned at vv. 27, 29, the ἀρχοντες. By ἔξήτουν is meant, 'they sought occasion to lay hold on him,' but, for the present, found none. Πιάζειν was an old Doric form for πιάζω (πιάξω), signifying properly to press upon, and thence in a general way to lay hands on, or lay hold of. Thus it is used both of oppressing men, as here and at vv. 32, 44. viii. 20. x. xi. 57. 2 Cor. xi. 32. Eccles. xxiii. 31, and of catching fish, as John xxi. 3, 10. Rev. xix. 20. It occurs only in the Sept. and the later Greek writers.

— ἡ ὥρα αὐτοῦ.] Meaning the full day appointed by 'the determinate counsel of God' (Acts ii. 23) for his being 'betrayed to be crucified.'

31. ἐπίστευσαν εἰς αὐτόν.] Not, however, with a firm belief, much less a sound and true

him; for it rested on miracles only, without reference to doctrine, and its very profession was made by implication only.

32. οἱ Φαρισαῖοι.] Meaning those rulers of the Sanhedrim who were of the Pharisaical party.

33. αὐτοῖς.] This word, not found in very many MSS., Versions, and early Editions, has been cancelled by almost all the Critical Editors; and with reason; since our Lord is evidently addressing the people at large, who were well disposed to him, not the Pharisees.

— ἔτι μικρὸν χρόνον—με.] These words evidently allude to the designs of the Pharisees against his life, intimating that it was only from their frustration for the present, that his hearers would be enabled a little longer to profit by his instructions.

34. ζητήσατέ με, &c.] Some Expositors regard what is here said as merely a general mode of expression to denote absence from them; while others recognise a denunciation. The latter view is strongly confirmed by what we read infra vii. 21, and is, on several accounts, to be preferred.

Thus the words will be understood as in reality a denunciation, fulfilled partly at the destruction of Jerusalem and partly ever since. Yet much dispute and difference of opinion might have been spared by supposing that as our Lord is admitted to have often spoken somewhat enigmatically, so he seems here, as on some other occasions, to have intended a double sense, according to the class of persons to whom the words might be referred. See Calvin and Tittman. A remark especially applicable to the second sense; for though the words may well apply to his being out of the reach of his persecutors, yet, as applied to the people at large, it may denote, as Calvin says, that they would seek him then in another manner, 'nempe ut miseris suis ac perditis in aliis aliis opibus vel solatii invenirent.' This is confirmed by vii. 21. In xiii. 33, the application is different.

36. It has been a matter of no little debate what is meant by τὴν διασποράν τῶν Ἑλλήνων. Some eminent Commentators take it to mean the place of dispersion, i. e. the place where the Jewish Jews inhabited; an explanation, they think, required by the context. But though it is not required; and it is so un-

ported by the usus loquendi, that it cannot be tolerated. Nor is it necessary to the sense. In fact, διασπορά denotes properly the act of dispersing, and sometimes the effect thereof in the state wherein the persons or things are thereby left. So Deut. xxviii. 15, ἰση ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ, and Judith v. 19, ἀνίβησαν (scil. οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι) ἐκ τῆς διασποράς, οὐ διασπαρήσαν ἐκεῖ. Yet it may also denote, by metonymy, abstract for concrete, the persons so dispersed, as were the Jews dispersed among the Gentiles, which, as the ancients in general and most eminent modern Expositors are agreed, is the sense here. An idiom similar to that in the Classical writers of σπορά for offspring, and found in 2 Macc. i. 27, ἐπισυνάγαγε τὴν διασποράν ἡμῶν, ἐλευθέρωσον τοὺς δουλεύοντας ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι. Pa. cxlvi. 2. Sept., τὰς διασπορὰς τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ ἐπισυνάγει. Moreover, a similar use of the Genitive is found in a kindred passage of Paralip. Jerem. cited by Wetstein, ἐπάτα τοῖς υἱοῖς Ἰσραὴλ—ὁ δὲ Βαρούχ ἀπέστειλεν εἰς τὴν διασποράν τῶν ἰδυνῶν. Also perhaps in 1 Pet. i. 1, ἐκλεκτοῖς περιπατοῦσιν ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ Πόντου, &c.

37. τῇ ἰσχύτῃ ἡμ., &c.] Of which the Jews used to say, that he who had not seen that day had seen no rejoicing. On this day occurred the ceremony of drawing water from the pool of Siloam, of which see a detailed account in Rec. Synop. This solemnity was not of Divine institution, but had been established by their forefathers in memory of the water so bountifully bestowed on the Israelites in the desert; and as the Rabbins testify, was meant to be a symbol of the benefits to be some time poured out and dispensed by the Holy Spirit; see John xvi. 7. Acts ii. 33. The present feast our Lord was pleased to consecrate by a most remarkable discourse, the subject of which was suggested to him by the very solemnity itself. He was in the Temple, standing in a place where he could be seen by every one; and he spoke not only openly but with a loud voice, as if declaring what it was of the utmost consequence should be known by all. (Tittman.)

— ἐάν τις διψᾷ] i. e. 'if any is earnestly desirous of.' All such metaphors as this, from words denoting hunger and thirst, imply need, as well as desire for the things in question.

38. ὁ πιστεύων, &c.] On the construction of these words some recent Commentators needlessly deviate from the common mode, either by connecting ὁ πιστεύων with πινέτω in the preceding sentence, or by taking εἶπε in the sense of 'ordered.' The common construction is well defended by Kuinoel, who shows that it is required by the explanation of these words at verse 39. There is nothing to stumble at in the Nominative ὁ πιστεύων, which involves an anacoluthon, common both in the Scriptural and Classical writers, which may be resolved into quod attinet ad, 'as to him who,' &c. Nor is there any reason to suppose the words after γραφὴ to be the words of Christ, not of Scripture, because they are not found totidem verbis in Scripture. The best Commentators are, indeed, of opinion that no particular text of Scripture is meant, but that the substance is given of several passages of Scripture, which refer to the effusion of the Holy Spirit. Surenh. and Schoettgen have, however, shown that there are only two passages referred to, namely, Is. lv. 1. lviii. 11, which are accommodated to the present purpose.

— ποταμοὶ—ρεύσουσιν.] Ποτ. is a symbol of abundance; and ρεύσουσι alludes to the free communication of the abundant benefits. The metaphor is frequent in the Jewish writings. So Sohar. Chadesch. pp. 40. 4, 'When a man turns to the Lord, he is like a fountain filled with living water, and rivers flow from him to men of all nations and tribes.' Nor is it unexampled in the Classical writers. So Philo, p. 1140, λόγον δὲ συμβολικῶς ποταμὸν εἶναι φαμὶν, &c. Philostr. Vit. ap. iv. 34 (of the Temple of the Muses at Helicon), λόγον τε κρατῆρες ἴσταντο, καὶ ῥύοντο αὐτῶν οἱ διψῶντες. Κοιλία, like the Heb. קַיִל or קַיִל, often, as here, denotes the heart (so Ps. xxxix. 9), meaning the inmost man; as much as to say, that 'the blessings of his piety shall, as water from the centre of a fountain, extend its blessings to others.' On ζῶν in the sense perennial, continually flowing, compare Horat. Ep. i. 2. 43.

39. τοῦτο δὲ εἶπε—αὐτόν.] Here we have, as it were, a key to the allegory of the preceding verse. To advert to the words themselves, there is no reason to omit, with some Critics, ἄγιον and insert δαδόμενον, since the latter reading is plainly from the margin, and the former, if not expressed, would be understood; for there is no ground to suppose (with some recent commentators) that πνεῦμα merely denotes the Christ, and the knowledge imparted is clear that we must understand it, in the personal sense, but as denotation and influence (see Lampe and T from the adjunct, intimating the gift of Spirit, by which must be meant (as and context alike require) those and supernatural gifts which were the Apostles and first converts for the Christianity (see Acts ii. 3); those be included those ordinary ones, who and are still, given to every man to By ἰδοξάσθη is meant Christ's ascension, and final reception to the God; see xvii. 5. xii. 16. 28. xiii. 3 compare Acts ii. 33.

40—53. Here is represented the foregoing circumstances, in the of both on the multitude (vv. 40. 44) hedrim itself (vv. 45. 53). By ὁ meant that particular prophet, whoever, whether Elijah, or (as some said who, they supposed, would usher in of the Messiah; see Matt. xvi. 14.

41, 42. See Matt. ii. 4. 6.
41. μὴ γάρ, &c.] 'an ergo,' 'Wh Christ,' &c. The same use of γὰρ Matt. xxvii. 23.

42. ἡ γραφὴ εἶπεν.] There is here by a mode of citation, familiar to several passages of Scripture which of the Messiah and his birth, as Is. : xxiii. 5. Micah v. 2. Ps. lxxxix. 3 — ὅπου ἦν Δ.] 'where David re Sam. xvi. 1. 4. It has been prove that the earlier Jews acknowledged was to be of the family of David; authority the Talmudists maintain must be born at Bethlehem. The question here gave unwittingly a money to the lineage of Jesus, since, observes, they were quite unaware the born there.

43. σχίσμα.] The word proper rent in a garment, or a fissure in metaphorically a total dissent in opinion and at ix. 16. x. 19, and sometimes in cal writers. So scindere in Latin; so ii. 39.

 1 VIII. Ἰησοῦς δὲ ἐπορεύθη εἰς τὸ ὕψος τῶν Ἐλαιῶν.

46. οὐδέποτε—ὁ ἄνθρωπος.] A strong, though probably involuntary, confession of his supernatural power to move the heart.

48. τῶν ἀρχόντων.] Meaning the Sanhedrim, whose duty it was to take care that no false doctrines should be promulgated, and to hold inquiries concerning those who were making innovations in the Church. (Kuinoel.) Thus they argue from the example of the two-fold authority, both judicial and magistral.

49. ἀλλ' ὁ ὄχλος—εἰσι.] On the exact force of ἐπικατάρατοι some difference of opinion exists. Lampe thinks that as the word is used in the Sept. to denote those who, by transgression of the Law, are doomed to punishment temporal and eternal, it means execrable. Kuinoel takes it to mean excommunicated; but on no sufficient grounds. It is better interpreted by Schleusner, 'nullius sunt pretii,' as in Plutarch de Educ. ἀθρόοις δόσιμον καὶ καταράτους. So our word wretched means 1. cursed and abominable; 2. vile and refuse. It may be observed, however, that ἐπικατάρ. is a stronger term than καταρ., and the sense seems to be, 'As to this rabble, who are ignorant of the Law, they are a parcel of poor wretches, worthy only of utter contempt.' The Scribes and Pharisees, it seems, entertained the same profound contempt for the multitude, which the Heathen Philosophers so liberally indulged in. So Sappho ap. Athen. ix. ὁ δῆμος οὐδὲν εὖδ' ἀκούων οὐδ' ὄρων, and Horace, 'Odi profanum vulgus et arceo.'

50. εἰς ὧν ἐξ αὐτῶν.] Being one of the Sanhedrim, he was authorized to speak; and he speaks as one neither justifying nor condemning Jesus, but only objecting to his being condemned unheard. Here there is usually supposed to be a reference to those passages of the Old Test. which require that every person accused should have a fair and impartial hearing, namely, Exod. xxiii. 1. Lev. xix. 15. Deut. xvi. 1. xix. 15. But it would rather seem (as Dr. A. Clarke supposes), that the reference is to the practice in the Courts of Judicature, founded on the law of Scripture.

51. τὸν ἄνθρωπον.] The Translators render man. But this does not represent the force of the Article, which involves an ellipsis of κρινόμενον, '[the accused] person,' to be taken out of κρίνει.

52. ἐκ τῆς Γαλ.] i. e. of the Galilean party.

—ὅτι προφῆτης, &c.] Commentators are perplexed to reconcile this with the fact, that Galilee had produced, it is said, four great Prophets. And most of them resort to the expedient of ascribing this to the ignorance and forgetfulness of the Priests, or the exaggeration of anger. But ignorance of the common details of Scripture, or the birth-place of its writers, cannot, with any probability, be imputed to the Sanhedrim; and the other method is not quite satisfactory. Perhaps the difficulty may be best removed by availing ourselves of that latitude in which the Preterite admits of being taken, and which sometimes refers to what is customary during a period not very long past. The Prophets of the Old Test. in question had all lived upwards of 500 years before. Now the Pharisees, we may suppose, merely advert to what had been usually the case at a comparatively recent date; namely, since the country had borne the name of Galilee. This sense is well expressed by the gloss (for such it is) ἐγίγερται, found in many MSS. and Versions and Nonnus, and the expression in E. V.

VIII. 1—11. For a full discussion of the perplexed question as to the authenticity of this paragraph the reader is referred to the Recens. Syr., where he will find an ample statement of all the objections to its genuineness, together with their answers, wherein the evidence is carefully stated, and the decision to be made therefrom suggested. The following is a brief summary of the evidence, external and internal, together with some remarks on the nature of that evidence, and an ἐπικρίσις on the whole question.

EXTERNAL EVIDENCE AGAINST THE PARAGRAPH.—It is not found in 56 MSS. (in some of which, however, a space is left for it), in 33 Evangelistaria, and several MSS. of the Syr., Copt., Sahidic, Armenian, and Italic Versions; nor is it treated on by Origen, Apollinar., Theod., Mops., Chrys., Basil, Cosmas., Theophyl., Catene, Tertull., Cyr., and Juvenius; nor is it expressed by Nonnus.

External evidence FOR the paragraph.—It is found in 284 MSS. and 6 Evangelistaria. In 40 others it is found, but obelized. In 15 others it is found with an asterisk; and again in 8 others is placed at the end of the Gospel. Of the remainder of the MSS., not ranged under either head, 13 MSS. have been examined by Scholz on purpose for this paragraph, and 75 (including 13 Uncial ones) are found mutilated in this part, by the abstraction of a leaf, or otherwise. And as to its not being contained in Nonnus's Version, that proves nothing; for many other omissions there occur equally long and far less easy to be accounted for. Thus we have a large chasm at vi. 40, and at xi. 55.

Internal evidence AGAINST the paragraph.—This is any thing but decisive; for though the variety of readings in those MSS. which have it is great, yet it is scarcely greater than that which exists on some other passages, where there was any thing particularly to stumble at in the matter; as, for instance, part of the 2d, 3d, and 4th verses of the 5th Chapter of this Gospel, where some Critics cut out the whole, some a part, and others contented themselves with endeavouring to alter the words to which objection is chiefly attached. This is, in some measure, the case here. Thus, instead of κατακρίνω at ver. 11, some MSS. have κοίνω. In short, the arguments against the paragraph from internal evidence resolve themselves into a series of objections (or rather surmises) founded on misconception; many of them such as might be advanced against any passage, even whose authenticity is undisputable. These may be found, together with, I trust, satisfactory answers, in Rec. Syn. Suffice it here to notice two of the most specious objections; one, that the paragraph is but little noticed by the Fathers and ancient Commentators. But this, we may imagine, arose partly because there was no occasion to advert to it, or because it could not strengthen their arguments or dissuaves against adultery, and partly because many persons, however causelessly, did stumble at one circumstance of the narration,—wondering why our Lord did not pass a more decided and severe condemnation. Thus the Fathers were apprehensive lest any persons, induced by the seeming impunity of the offence, should be encouraged to the commission of this crime. And, accordingly, Augustin de Conj. Adult. ii. 7, says, that ‘from a mistaken notion that the portion gave countenance to immorality, or from an ill-founded apprehension lest its tendency should be misunderstood by the ignorant and ill-inclined, many removed it from their copies;’ just as they removed vv. 43, 44 of Luke xxii. and some other passages, from similar motives. Hence, too, it was generally passed over in the Homilies and Theological Treatises, and omitted in the Lectionaries. And yet there is nothing in the paragraph, when properly understood, that militates against the character of Christ, or gives the least encouragement to crime. On the contrary, the whole is perfectly consistent with the gentleness and benevolence of our Lord, while, at the same time, the censure itself is sufficient for the purpose. And if it be objected, that he suffered a guilty woman to go unpunished, it should be remembered, 1. that (according to our Lord's own declarations, John iii. 17. x. 11. 17) he came not to exercise the office of a judge; and 2. that any such exercise of judicial authority would have been at variance with that deference which he ever inculcated, both by precept and example, to the civil magistrate. As a sinner he virtually condemned her, when he bid her ‘go and sin no more.’

In short, all the arguments put together, founded on internal evidence, against the authenticity of this paragraph are inconclusive, and will not counterbalance one that may be adduced FOR it; namely, that, while we can easily imagine why it should have been omitted, no tolerable reason can be assigned why the story should have been fabricated at all, or if so, why fabricated with the present circumstances; and how it could, amidst so many objections, have found its way into five-sixths of the MSS. The fabricated stories found in the apocryphal Gospels are quite of a different character, and almost always founded on the most ascetic views. And had this paragraph been of that character, it would, I will venture to say, never have been omitted, or removed by any. To advert to another powerful argument, from internal evidence, in favour of its authenticity; the paragraph is not denied, by any competent judge, to bear upon it the stamp and impress of truth, in the profound wisdom of the reply, ‘Let him that is without sin cast a stone at her.’ Inasmuch that the most eminent of the Critics who dispute its authenticity (namely, whether it was recorded by St. John) are constrained to admit the truth of the narration itself, which they think was introduced into the Gospel by Papias, or the disciples of St. John; or else was, at a later period, expressed in the margin of some ancient MS., and from thence found its way into the text. But nothing can be imagined more improbable than the latter supposition. For there were surely many reasons why such a story should not have been introduced into the Text; but not one reason why it should. And as to the former it is very difficult to imagine how even Papias himself could have been enabled, had he wished it, to foist in an interpolation, especially of this nature; or, if he had wished to interpolate, why he should have chosen this alone of all the many narrations which must then have been preserved by tradition, namely, those πολλὰ ἄλλα, which St. John speaks of at xx. 30, and which he had chosen not to record, on the principle that those he had recorded were sufficient for the purpose of showing that Jesus was the Messiah. Such being the case, how would Papias dare to introduce any more! This argument applies yet more strongly against any disciple of St. John.

4. κατελήθη ἐν' αὐτοφύρῳ μοιχῇ. Καταλαμβάνεσθαι ἐν' αὐτῷ. is a phrase properly used of thieves caught in the act of theft, or with the stolen property upon them; but more frequently ισιν.] This, for the vulg. λιθοβολεῖ- een adopted on the authority of a great be best MSS., by Matthæi, Griesbach, ; and with reason, since internal evi- nce in its favour.

r difference of opinion may exist as to er manner in which this punishment l, there can be little doubt but that the is was that in use among the Greeks, rrians, and others, by which the crise- verwhelmed and covered up with the n assembled multitude; or, as Rom. 7, expressly terms it, was 'clothed mic.' This is confirmed by what we xvi. 40 (with reference to adultery), l bring a company against thee, and tone thee with stones, which passage the practice was to stone them. And l punishment, though mentioned in as, might be interpreted of a special as stoning, is plain from Exod. xxxi. l, compared with Numb. xv. 32. 34.

πρώτος ἔγραφεν εἰς τ. γ.) In many editions there is added μὴ προσποιού- δικούσαι. Yet this, though approved r., Grotius, and others, and adopted sized Version ('as though he heard can only be regarded as a very ancient and plainly appears from Euthymius. is indeed an elegant one, and occurs fil. 47.

many strange notions which have been as to what Christ here wrote, and ne,—all founded on frivolous conje- cture speculation,—the best mode of for the action is (with many eminent to suppose that our Lord traced no rily speaking, or at least not with any what was passing at the time; but as merely intimated his desire to have with the matter in question, employ- is purpose, an action which was fre- quently to by those who did not choose to proper question, or be engaged in a ey disapproved of. So Ælian, V. H. sakes mention of a philosopher who disinclination to answer a certain question proposed to him, by writing on the wall. And similar instances are adduced from the Rabbinical writers.

Thus our Lord's action was merely a symbolical one, signifying that he cared not to show any attention to what they were saying, or to answer their insidious question. Or it may have implied contempt or censure, as if they did not deserve that he should take the trouble to repeat what he had so often before inculcated, that with juridical questions he had nothing to do, intimating that they merited no other answer, than what they had themselves suggested by appealing to the Mosaic precept.

7. ἐπίμενον 'persevered in, continued to.' So Acts xii. 16, ἐπίμενον κρούων.

—ὁ ἀναμάρτητος ὑμῶν.] The exact meaning here of ἀναμάρτητος has been disputed. Some take it to denote freedom from adultery; others, freedom from any notorious sin, such as adultery; others, again, freedom from sin in general. The sense first mentioned seems alone the true one; namely, freedom from the sin in question, which may, however, very well include fornication, concubinage, and lasciviousness of every kind. To the extreme corruption of morals in his countrymen Josephus bears ample testimony; and that the priests and scribes deeply participated in this corruption there is no reason to doubt; for the Rabbinical writers supply abundant proofs of the immorality of even the most eminent Rabbis. That ἀμαρτάνειν and ἀμαρτία are in the Greek writers often used of adultery and fornication, is well known. If the word be taken with the extent of signification above laid down, (which is fully warranted by Scripture usage,) there will be no reason to doubt but that every one of the persons present was more or less guilty. As to the objection urged by Le Clerc and others, that no law demands perfect innocence in its judges, &c., it may be answered, that our Lord is here speaking not juridically, but popularly, and considers the thing in foro conscientie, as in the passages of Cicero and Synesius here cited by Grotius. Thus the reply was well adapted to produce the effect intended, as pointing at a moral maxim founded in justice, and recognised by the philosophers and sages of the Heathens, that he who accuses others ought himself to be free from the vices of which he impeaches them; comp. Rom. ii. 1; and therefore our Lord so speaks as by no means to absolve the accused, but to smite the consciences of the accusers. He neither acquits nor condemns the woman, but tempers his answer with such prudence, as that it shall be neither at variance with justice, nor inconsistent with mercy.

—πρῶτος τὸν λίθον ἐπ' αὐτῇ βαλ.) Render, 'let him first cast the stone at her.' By the stone is meant the fatal stone, which was first cast, in form, by one of the accusers or witnesses, and served as a signal to the by-standers to commence the stoning.

8. καὶ πάλιν—τὴν γῆν.] The best reason that has been supposed for the repetition of this symbolical action, the counterpart to the former, is, that it was intended to give the priests and scribes an opportunity of withdrawing with less confusion.

9. καὶ ὑπὸ—ἐλεγχόμενοι.] These words, not found in many MSS. and early Editions, may have come, as Matthæi suspects, from the margin, though it is more probable that they are from the Evangelist, as being so much in his manner, such ἐπικρίσεις being frequent in his writings.

—εἰς καθ' εἷς.] See Note on Mark xiv. 19. By πρεσβυτέρων is here meant 'the more honourable,' as by ἐσχάτων the lowest in degree or station; see Mark ix. 35. It is not meant that they went out each in seniority, but that they all went out, one after another, of every station and age, from first to last.

—κατελείφθη μόνος—ἐν μέσῳ οὕσα.] Namely, of those present, the Apostles and followers of Christ; comp. ver. 3. Instead of the common reading ἐστῶσα, very many MSS., Versions, and Editions, have οὕσα; which I have, with Matthæi and Scholz, adopted, since internal as well as external evidence is in its favour.

10. κατίκρινε] 'pronounced sentence on thee.'

11. οὐδὲ ἐγὼ σε κατακρίνω] 'neither do, or will, I pass sentence on thee, or adjudge thee to punishment.' We are not to take this as a remission of her sins (which, as supreme Lord, he might have pronounced), but simply as a declaration that, since his kingdom was not of this world, so he would not assume the office of temporal magistracy. False, therefore, is the conclusion of some, who hence infer that our Lord did not approve of adultery being punished with death. For, upon the same principle, they might argue that, when our Lord declined to act as judge between the brothers disputing about an inheritance, (see Luke xii. 15,) he did not approve of inheritances being divided, and did not care that the disputes thence arising should be amicably settled. (Lampe.) To prevent any mistake of his meaning, our Lord added μηκέτι ἀμάρτανε.

12. Now follow, to the end of the Chapter, certain discourses pronounced by our Lord in the

Temple on some other occasion, though what that was, and at what time, is uncertain. The view, indeed, of Commentators as to that matter varies according to their admission or rejection of the disputed portion in the former part of the Chapter. Those who adopt the latter view, suppose this first discourse, vv. 12—20, to have been delivered on the great day of the feast, referring it to the same occasion as vii. 37, 38; while those who adopt the former view, either think that it was delivered at some other time (though at what time is uncertain) after the feast in question; or take the πάλιν to intimate the resumption of the discourse at ver. 2, which had been interrupted by the occurrence just before narrated. Upon a matter of such doubtful disputation it is impossible to speak decisively; but really it should seem that there is no reason why we should not, while maintaining the authority of viii. 2—11, yet suppose the present discourse to be closely connected with that at vii. 37, 38, of which the narrative was interrupted by various other matter intervening. But though closely connected in subject the discourses were separate, and pronounced on two different occasions; the first at the Feast, the second on the day after it. And as it was on the same subject, and addressed to the same persons, it may be regarded as resumptive of the former. Indeed, this seems to be intimated by the particle πάλιν οὖν, which are confirmative and resumptive. The scope of the present address is the same; namely, to declare that Jesus is the Christ, though the imagery employed is different. In τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου there is an allusion to the Sun, the great natural light of the world, that rules the day. The expression was a frequent designation of the Messiah, as the great Moral Teacher, as well as Saviour, of the human race. Thus it is used of the Messiah, Ia. xlii. 6. xlix. 6. Mal. ii. 2, and there is allusion to it infra i. 4, 9, vide see Notes. Indeed, by this designation Jesus may be supposed to declare himself God as well as Christ, since there is reason to think that the Jews applied it to the Deity also; the Rabbinical writers often speaking of God as 'the Light of the world.' In ἔξει τὸ φῶς τῆς ζωῆς there is an allusion to the other character of Christ, namely, that of Saviour of the human race. 13. σὺ περὶ σταντοῦ μέρους.] Here the Phar-

first do not openly reject this high claim, but put it aside, by such a sort of argument as they thought Jesus could not rebut; namely, that self-commendation has no force, and that no one can bear witness in his own case: a fundamental canon of the Jewish Teachers; see Mischna Berenhuai, t. iii. p. 63. This our Lord had before admitted, supra v. 31. But he removes the objection by arguing at ver. 14, that though in common life the rule holds good, yet an exception of it must be admitted in his own person, who had come down from heaven endued with the fullest Divine knowledge (see vi. 46) for the purpose of imparting it to men ignorant of celestial things, or what was the true nature of His office. Accordingly the words οἶδα πόθεν ἦλθον, καὶ ποῦ ὑπάγω contain a periphrasis of Divine mission. The sense may be thus expressed: ‘My testimony is altogether true; for I know with what authority I act, and what injunctions have been given to me. You cannot ascertain, except you learn of me; or, you do not know them unless I testify them to you.’ Meaning, that his testimony alone is true, and worthy to be received, inasmuch as it was Divine, though their prejudiced minds could not discern its truth (ver. 14. 16); and 2dly, that, on the principles of their own Law, his record must be regarded as true; for two witnesses being, by that Law, considered sufficient to establish the truth of any allegation, he has the concurrent testimony of himself and of his Father to the truth of his pretensions.

‘Here (says Dr. A. Clarke) our Lord speaks exactly in the character of an ambassador. Such a person does not bring a second with him to vouch his truth; his credentials from his king ascertain his character. So our Lord represents the Father as bearing witness with him. The miracles which he wrought were the proof from heaven that he was the promised Messiah; these were the great seal of his pretensions.’

14. καὶ ποῦ ὑπάγω.] For καὶ many MSS. and Versions have ἢ, which has been adopted by Griesbach and Scholz, while Matthæi and Vater retain the common reading; and rightly; since external evidence is quite in its favour (Versions in a case like this having little weight); and internal scarcely less so; for, as Matthæi observes, ‘Græci in his libentius dicunt ἢ.’ Accordingly this would seem to be an emendation of the Alexandrian Critics, who were not aware that though ἢ is more usual, καὶ is also thus used by the best Attic writers; ex. gr. Thucyd. i. 2. 140. 143. τοιαῦτα καὶ παραπλήσια.

15. ὑμεῖς κατὰ τὴν σάρκα κρίνετε.] Meaning, ‘that they are used to judge and account of any one according to the external appearance, warped by passion and prejudice, and thus account him a mere man, not the Christ, the promised Messiah.’ — οὐ κρίνω οὐδένα] scil. οὐτως. For it should seem the assertion is to be taken in a qualified sense, to mean, that ‘he judges no man [as they do] in a biased or prejudiced manner.’

16—18. Here our Lord employs the same kind of argument as at ver. 37, seqq., and the general sense may be thus expressed, with Tittman: ‘But even were I to bear the highest testimony of myself, yet it would be true, unbiassed, and worthy to be received; for neither do I stand alone, nor is my testimony solitary,—but my Father also, who sent me, hath testified of me (namely, by the Prophets). Nay, it is ordained by your law, that the testimony of two witnesses is worthy of credit. [Therefore ought also my testimony of myself to be thought worthy of credit]; since it is not that of myself only, but likewise of my Father, who hath sent me.’ Meaning, that if the testimony of two men were sufficient to establish any ordinary fact, his own testimony and that of his Father ought surely to be such in the case of a religious doctrine.

The δὲ at ver. 16 means tamen. On this unusual junction of δὲ to καὶ at the beginning of a sentence, see Steph. Thes. Κρίνω has here the rare sense of μαρτυρεῖω; and κρίσις, of μαρτυρία; and ἀληθής here means veracious, worthy of credit. After ἐγὼ, in the latter part of the sentence, I have, with R. Stephens and the Latin Vulgate, placed a comma,—as propriety and perspicuity alike require, the καὶ being not a copula uniting words, but joining two clauses, instead of two verbs κρίνω or μαρτυρεῖω, and κρίνει or μαρτυρεῖ.

Ver. 18 is explanatory of the briefly expressed words preceding.

19. ποῦ ἵστιν ὁ πατήρ σου.] These words were, doubtless, (as Lampe, Kuinoel, and Tittman have shown) spoken not from ignorance, but in derision and insult; q. d. ‘Where is this father of yours, that we may interrogate him? we do not see this other witness.’ To which our Lord indignantly replies, that their very question betrays the malignity of their hearts, and shows that they neither truly know, nor care to know, either him or his Father. If they knew him, as

21. It is a disputed point whether the following discourse was held at the same time, and in the same place, with the preceding, or at some time afterwards. Those Expositors who maintain the latter opinion found it on the nature of the preceding verse, and the use of πάλιν here. The former reason, however, is invalid, since the verse may be regarded as, in some measure, parenthetical. And the use of πάλιν will not prove it to have been held at another time; since it may only denote repetition, namely, of the same warning as had been before given, vii. 34. And not only is there no apparent separation, but the contrast may be proved by the οὖν; for its use here seems to be that which Hoogev. p. 509, calls continuative, either after a digression, or a parenthesis, as here, and which may thus be termed resumptive. That this is a use very agreeable to St. John's style is certain, inasmuch as the two examples adduced by Hoogeven are both of them from this Gospel; namely, vi. 22. 24. xviii. 5, 6, Λέγει αὐτοῖς, Ἐγὼ εἰμι. (Εἰσπήκει δὲ καὶ Ἰούδας, ὁ παραδίδους αὐτόν, μετ' αὐτῶν.) Ὡς οὖν εἶπεν αὐτοῖς, &c. We may, therefore, safely regard this portion as a continuation of the foregoing, addressed, it should seem, to the same persons. And thus the extreme severity of the expressions in the subsequent verses may be well accounted for. Seeing that he had hitherto made no impression on them, our Lord even more seriously warns them of their guilt and danger.

— ἐγὼ ὑπάγω, καὶ, &c.] Meaning that 'he is about to leave them, and they shall seek the Messiah, and desire his coming; but the Messiah that they expect will not come: and as they have rejected him who is the true and only Messiah, there remains no other salvation.' Ἐν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ ὑμῶν ἀποθ. is a mode of expression formed on that of Ezek. iii. 19. xviii. 26. xxxiii. 9. 18, 'shall die in his iniquity.' And ἁμαρτία may be here understood in a general way of that fountain and cause of all other sins and miseries, obdurate unbelief; which, in their case, shortly led to the crucifixion of their Saviour, and carried with it the Divine vengeance so soon to overtake them in this world, and abide upon them for ever in the next; for here by ἀποθ. is denoted not so much temporal death (namely, at the destruction of their city and people), as eternal death, a state of everlasting woe, reserved for 'the vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction.' Comp. Heb. x. 26, 27.

22. μήτι ἀποκτενεῖ ἑαυτόν, &c.] This seems to have been a wilful perversion of our Lord's meaning; q. d. 'What! will he make away with himself, to get away from this our pretended persecution?' see vii. 20. Thus imputing to him what involved, even according to the opinion of the Jews, great criminality; for we find from Josephus, Bell. iii. 14, that the Pharisees supposed the lowest pit of Hell to be reserved for self-murderers.

23. ὑμεῖς ἐκ τῶν, &c.] Our Lord deigns not to notice so absurd and malignant an imputation; but glances at the origin of this their malice, in the total dissimilarity between themselves and himself; the one being of earth, and earthly-minded, the other of heaven, and heavenly-minded. Comp. supra iii. 31.

24. ὅτι ἐγὼ εἰμι] scil. ἐκείνους, meaning that personage so long expected and predicted by the Patriarchs and Prophets. An ellipsis found also in a kindred passage at Mark xiii. 6. See also Acts xiii. 25.

25. σὺ τίς εἶ;] A question, it should seem, not of simple ignorance seeking information, but of scornful reproach; q. d. 'Who art thou, that thou speakest so loftily of thyself, and rebukingly to us?' So Aristoph. Av. 961, σὺ τίς εἶ; Philem. σὺ γὰρ τίς εἶ; (for ἄν); Liliu. 798, τίς γὰρ εἶ σὺ; Terent. Andr. iv. 1, M. 'impudentissima eorum oratio est, Quis es tu? Our Lord, however, was pleased to answer as if the question had been one of simple ignorance.

— τὴν ἀρχὴν ὅτι καὶ λαλῶ ὑ.] The sense of these words depends upon that which is assigned to τὴν ἀρχὴν, which some take as standing for omnis; q. d. 'I am altogether the person whom I profess myself to be.' But it has been truly observed that in this sense the expression is almost always used with a negation. It is therefore better, with the generality of Commentators, to suppose an ellipsis of κατὰ, and take the phrase as put for ἔρχεται. By this some understand the beginning of office; others, the beginning of the pre-discourse; which latter opinion is preferable. the expression may simply mean dudum, or as in Gen. xliii. 18. So Plant. Capt. 2. 'Quis ille est? Quem dudum dixi a meo tibi.' And λαλῶ will mean, 'I have telling you.'

πολλὰ ἔχω, &c.] These words are, from ty, somewhat obscure. The difficulty is in ὁ πέμψας με ἀληθής, &c. which some meant to prove the justice of his accusa-

But it is better, with others, to regard as intimating the ground of his claims, and at ceases which their refusal to acknowledge involved; q. d. 'I could say much in reference to you, and in reproof of your inf; but I shall content myself with de, that as I am sent from the great Father me, so what I openly aver is from Him, and here cannot but be true, and the refusal to is it highly criminal.'

οὐκ ἔγνωσαν·—λέγου.] Meaning, 'they not to know that he spake unto them of ment his Father in heaven, God.'

ἔταν ὑψώσῃτε, &c.] These words could of course, be understood by the hearers; but were, we may suppose, expressed thus ob- ly, partly from the reserve which our Lord, wisdom, thought fit then to maintain on subject, (though, indeed, some obscurity in ing of events yet in the womb of futurity unavoidable.) and partly in order that what is enigmatical, being afterwards explained ment, there might arise that confirmation th which results from the fulfilment of pro- ph. The same remark applies to our Lord's is to Peter, respecting John, xxi. 22, ἐὰν ἢ ἔλθῃ μένειν ἵνα ἔρχομαι. See also is. Here there is an obscure allusion (though is plain by the event) to the circumstances ing the crucifixion, and to the events sub- is to it; namely, the resurrection and as- is of Christ, the coming of the Holy Ghost, is the working of miracles in the name of is—circumstances which would so demon- is him to be the Christ, that they would all is abundant evidence to see, and many would is consequence believe, that he was indeed the promised Messiah. On this expression ὑψώσῃτε see Note supra iii. 14.

—ἐγὼ εἰμι.] Supply ἐκείνου.

29. This verse is closely connected with the preceding one; the sense being: 'who, having sent me, leaves me not alone, but succours and supports me, because I perform his will in all things,' meaning especially with respect to the work of redemption.

31. ἐὰν ὑμεῖς μένητε, &c.] Meaning, 'If ye adhere with constancy to what I have taught you, and act thereupon by a holy obedience in your lives.' Comp. xiv. 21. 1 John ii. 24. Indeed the words ἀληθῶς μαθηταὶ plainly intimate that it was by their moral qualities, rather than their external profession, that the true disciples of Christ would be recognised. Thus it is said, 'by their fruits shall ye know them.'

32. γνώσεσθε τὴν ἀλήθειαν, &c.] Meaning, 'Ye shall experimentally find the truth, and prove the blessed effects of my word, and know of a truth that I came from God.' See v. 28. vii. 17.

—καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια.] Meaning, 'the truth as it is in Jesus,' Gospel truth, or the Christian religion. Ἐλευθ. signifies, 'will free you from the bondage to sin and Satan,' and place you in 'the glorious liberty of the children of God.' See Rom. viii. 2. 15. Similar sentiments are adduced, both from the Rabbinical writers and the Classical ones; of which the most apposite are the following:—Arrian, Epict. iv. 7, εἰς ἐμὴ οὐδεὶς ἔχουσιν ἔχει· ἡλευθέρωμαι γὰρ ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἔγνωκα αὐτοῦ τὰς ἐντολάς, οὐκ ἔτι οὐδεὶς δου- λαγωγῆσαι με δύναται where, however, we need not, as in the other passages cited, suppose an allusion to the Stoical dogma, that the wise man is alone free, and that every fool is a slave: for it may be noticed, that Arrian had, like the other later Philosophers, been much indebted to the truths of Revelation in the New Testament. Of this the passage in question affords a remarkable example, as containing allusion to four clauses of Scripture, namely, 1 Cor. vii. 37. 1 Cor. vii. 22, ἀπαλεύθερος Κυρίου ἐστίν. 2 John i. 1. and Ps. cxix. 125. 2 Pet. ii. 19. 1 Cor. ix. 27.

33. ἀπεκρίθησαν.] Not those just before mentioned, who 'believed on him,' but some by-standers, who perversely misrepresented his mean-

38. ὁ πιστεύων, &c.] On the construction of these words some recent Commentators needlessly deviate from the common mode, either by connecting ὁ πιστεύων with πινέτω in the preceding sentence, or by taking εἶπε in the sense of 'ordered.' The common construction is well defended by Kuinoel, who shows that it is required by the explanation of these words at verse 39. There is nothing to stumble at in the Nominative ὁ πιστεύων, which involves an anacoluthon, common both in the Scriptural and Classical writers, which may be resolved into quod attinet ad, 'as to him who,' &c. Nor is there any reason to suppose the words after γραφή to be the words of Christ, not of Scripture, because they are not found totidem verbis in Scripture. The best Commentators are, indeed, of opinion that no particular text of Scripture is meant, but that the substance is given of several passages of Scripture, which refer to the effusion of the Holy Spirit. Surenh. and Schoettgen have, however, shown that there are only two passages referred to, namely, Is. lv. 1. lviii. 11, which are accommodated to the present purpose.

— ποταμοὶ—ρέουσιν.] ΠΟΤ. is a symbol of abundance; and ρέουσιν alludes to the free communication of the abundant benefits. The metaphor is frequent in the Jewish writings. So Sohar. Chadesch. pp. 40. 4, 'When a man turns to the Lord, he is like a fountain filled with living water, and rivers flow from him to men of all nations and tribes.' Nor is it unexampled in the Classical writers. So Philo, p. 1140, λόγου δὲ συμβολικῶς ποταμὸν εἶναι φαμὶν, &c. Philostr. Vit. ap. iv. 34 (of the Temple of the Muses at Helicon), λόγων τε κρατῆρες ἴσταντο, καὶ ῥέοντο αὐτῶν οἱ διψῶντες. Κοιλία, like the Heb. קַיִן or קֶפֶן, often, as here, denotes ψυχὴ, the heart (so Pa. xxxix. 9), meaning the inmost man; as much as to say, that 'the blessings of his piety shall, as water from the centre of a fountain, extend its blessings to others.' On ζῶν in the sense perennial, continually flowing, compare Horat. Ep. i. 2. 43.

39. τοῦτο δὲ εἶπε—αὐτόν.] Here we have, as it were, a key to the allegory of the preceding verse. To advert to the words themselves, there is no reason to omit, with some Critics, ἀγίου and insert δεδομένον, since the latter reading is plainly from the margin, and the former, if not expressed, would be understood; for there is no ground to suppose (with some recent Commentators) that πνεῦμα merely denotes the doctrine of Christ, and the knowledge imparted by him. It is clear that we must understand it, not, indeed, in the personal sense, but as denoting His operation and influence (see Lampe and Tittman), and from the adjunct, intimating the gifts of the Holy Spirit, by which must be meant (as the occasion and context alike require) those extraordinary and supernatural gifts which were conferred on the Apostles and first converts for the founding of Christianity (see Acts ii. 3); though there may be included those ordinary ones, which were then, and are still, given to every man to profit withal. By ἐδοξάσθη is meant Christ's resurrection, ascension, and final reception to the right hand of God; see xvii. 5. xii. 16. 28. xiii. 31. xiv. 2, and compare Acts ii. 33.

40—53. Here is represented the result of the foregoing circumstances, in the effect produced both on the multitude (vv. 40. 44) and the Sadducees (vv. 45. 53). By ὁ προφήτης is meant that particular prophet, whoever he should be, whether Elijah, or (as some said) Jeremiah, who, they supposed, would usher in the coming of the Messiah; see Matt. xvi. 14.

41, 42. See Matt. ii. 4. 6.

41. μὴ γὰρ, &c.] 'an ergo,' 'What then, does Christ,' &c. The same use of γὰρ is found in Matt. xxvii. 23.

42. ἡ γραφή εἶπεν.] There is here a reference, by a mode of citation, familiar to the Jews, to several passages of Scripture which they explained of the Messiah and his birth, as Is. xi. 1. Jerem. xxiii. 5. Micah v. 2. Pa. lxxxix. 36.

— ὅπου ἦν Δ.] 'where David resided?' see 1 Sam. xvi. 1. 4. It has been proved by Lampe that the earlier Jews acknowledged that Christ was to be of the family of David; upon whose authority the Talmudists maintain that Christ must be born at Bethlehem. The passage in question here gave unwittingly a decided testimony to the lineage of Jesus, since, as Markland observes, they were quite unaware that Jesus was born there.

43. σχίσμα.] The word properly signifies a rent in a garment, or a fissure in a rock, and metaphorically a total dissent in opinion, as here and at ix. 16. x. 19, and sometimes in the Classical writers. So scindere in Latin; see Virg. Æn. ii. 39.

χειρας. Ἦλθον οὖν οἱ ὑπηρέται πρὸς τοὺς Ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ Φαρισαίους· καὶ εἶπον αὐτοῖς ἐκεῖνοι· Διὰ τί οὐκ ἠγάγετε αὐτόν; Ἀπεκρίθησαν οἱ ὑπηρέται· Οὐδέποτε οὕτως ἐλάλησεν ἄνθρωπος ὡς οὗτος ὁ ἄνθρωπος. Ἀπεκρίθησαν οὖν αὐτοῖς οἱ Φαρισαῖοι· Μὴ καὶ ὑμεῖς πεπλάνησθε; ᾧ μὴ τις ἐκ τῶν ἰσχυόντων ἐπίστευσεν εἰς αὐτόν, ἢ ἐκ τῶν Φαρισαίων; ἀλλ' ὁ ὄχλος οὗτος ὁ μὴ γινώσκων τὸν νόμον ἐπικατάρατοί εἰσι. Ἀλέγει Νικοδήμους πρὸς αὐτούς, (ὁ ἐλθὼν νυκτὸς πρὸς αὐτόν) ἢς ἂν ἐξ αὐτῶν· Μὴ ὁ νόμος ἡμῶν κρίνει τὸν ἄνθρωπον, ἂν μὴ ἀκούσῃ παρ' αὐτοῦ πρότερον, καὶ γινῶ τί ποιεῖ; Ἀπεκρίθησαν καὶ εἶπον αὐτῷ· Μὴ καὶ σὺ ἐκ τῆς Γαλιλαίας εἶ; ἐρευνήσον καὶ ἴδε, ὅτι προφῆτης ἐκ τῆς Γαλιλαίας οὐκ γήγερται. Καὶ ἐπορεύθη ἕκαστος εἰς τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ.

VIII. Ἰησοῦς δὲ ἐπορεύθη εἰς τὸ ὕψος τῶν Ἐλαιῶν.

[τῶν ἰσχυόντων.] Meaning the Sanhedrim, a duty it was to take care that no false doctrine should be promulgated, and to hold inquiries concerning those who were making innovations in the Church. (Kuinoel.) Thus they from the example of the two-fold authority—judicial and magistral.

[ἀλλ' ὁ ὄχλος—αἰσι.] On the exact force ἐπικατάρατοι some difference of opinion is. Lampe thinks that as the word is used in script. to denote those who, by transgression of law, are doomed to punishment temporal or eternal, it means excommunicable. Kuinoel takes excommunicated; but on no sufficient idea. It is better interpreted by Schleusner, hinc sunt prelii, as in Plutarch de Educ. ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀσέμιοις καὶ καταράτοις. So our unwashed means 1. cursed and abominable; 2. and refuse. It may be observed, however, ἐπικατάρατος is a stronger term than κατάρατος, the sense seems to be, 'As to this rabble, who ignorant of the Law, they are a parcel of unwashed, worthy only of utter contempt.' Scribes and Pharisees, it seems, entertained some profound contempt for the multitude, the Heathen Philosophers so liberally judged in. So Sappho ap. Athen. ix. ὁ δὲ ὄχλος 'ὅστις ἀκούων οὐδ' ὀρῶν, and Horace, 'Odi nam vulgus et arceo.'

[εἰς ἂν ἐξ αὐτῶν.] Being one of the Sanhedrim, he was authorized to speak; and he speaks as neither justifying nor condemning Jesus, only objecting to his being condemned unlawfully. Here there is usually supposed to be a reference to those passages of the Old Test. which shew that every person accused should have a full and impartial hearing, namely, Exod. xxiii. 1. xix. 15. Deut. xvi. 8. xix. 15. But it is rather seem (as Dr. A. Clarke supposes), the reference is to the practice in the Courts of Justice, founded on the law of Scripture.

[τὸν ἄνθρωπον.] The Translators render him, a man. But this does not represent the sense of the Article, which involves an ellipsis of κρινόμενον, '[the accused] person,' to be taken out of κρίναι.

52. ἐκ τῆς Γαλ.] i. e. of the Galilean party.

—ὅτι προφῆτης, &c.] Commentators are perplexed to reconcile this with the fact, that Galilee had produced, it is said, four great Prophets. And most of them resort to the expedient of ascribing this to the ignorance and forgetfulness of the Priests, or the exaggeration of anger. But ignorance of the common details of Scripture, or the birth-place of its writers, cannot, with any probability, be imputed to the Sanhedrim; and the other method is not quite satisfactory. Perhaps the difficulty may be best removed by availing ourselves of that latitude in which the Preterite admits of being taken, and which sometimes refers to what is customary during a period not very long past. The Prophets of the Old Test. in question had all lived upwards of 500 years before. Now the Pharisees, we may suppose, merely advert to what had been usually the case at a comparatively recent date; namely, since the country had borne the name of Galilee. This sense is well expressed by the gloss (for such it is) ἐγγίγεται, found in many MSS. and Versions and Nonnus, and the expression in E. V.

VIII. 1—11. For a full discussion of the perplexed question as to the authenticity of this paragraph the reader is referred to the Recens. Syn., where he will find an ample statement of all the objections to its genuineness, together with their answers, wherein the evidence is carefully stated, and the decision to be made therefrom suggested. The following is a brief summary of the evidence, external and internal, together with some remarks on the nature of that evidence, and an exposition on the whole question.

ἤρχετο πρὸς αὐτόν· καὶ καθίσας ἐδίδασκεν αὐτούς. Ἄγουσι 3
δὲ οἱ Γραμματεῖς καὶ οἱ Φαρισαῖοι πρὸς αὐτὸν γυναῖκα ἐν μοιχείᾳ κατελημμένην, καὶ στήσαντες αὐτὴν ἐν μέσῳ,

External evidence for the paragraph.—It is found in 284 MSS. and 6 Evangelistaria. In 40 others it is found, but obelized. In 15 others it is found with an asterisk; and again in 8 others is placed at the end of the Gospel. Of the remainder of the MSS., not ranged under either head, 13 MSS. have been examined by Scholz on purpose for this paragraph, and 75 (including 13 Uncial ones) are found mutilated in this part, by the abstraction of a leaf, or otherwise. And as to its not being contained in Nonnus's Version, that proves nothing; for many other omissions there occur equally long and far less easy to be accounted for. Thus we have a large chasin at vi. 40, and at xi. 55.

Internal evidence AGAINST the paragraph.—This is any thing but decisive; for though the variety of readings in those MSS. which have it is great, yet it is scarcely greater than that which exists on some other passages, where there was any thing particularly to stumble at in the matter; as, for instance, part of the 2d, 3d, and 4th verses of the 5th Chapter of this Gospel, where some Critics cut out the whole, some a part, and others contented themselves with endeavouring to alter the words to which objection is chiefly attached. This is, in some measure, the case here. Thus, instead of κατακρίνω at ver. 11, some MSS. have κοίνω. In short, the arguments against the paragraph from internal evidence resolve themselves into a series of objections (or rather surmises) founded on misconception; many of them such as might be advanced against any passage, even whose authenticity is undisputable. These may be found, together with, I trust, satisfactory answers, in Rec. Syn. Suffice it here to notice two of the most specious objections; one, that the paragraph is but little noticed by the Fathers and ancient Commentators. But this, we may imagine, arose partly because there was no occasion to advert to it, or because it could not strengthen their arguments or dissuaves against adultery, and partly because many persons, however causelessly, did stumble at one circumstance of the narration,—wondering why our Lord did not pass a more decided and severe condemnation. Thus the Fathers were apprehensive lest any persons, induced by the seeming impunity of the offence, should be encouraged to the commission of this crime. And, accordingly, Augustin de Conjug. Adult. ii. 7, says, that ‘from a mistaken notion that the portion gave countenance to immorality, or from an ill-founded apprehension lest its tendency should be misunderstood by the ignorant and ill-inclined, many removed it from their copies;’ just as they removed vv. 43, 44 of Luke xxii. and some other passages, from similar motives. Hence, too, it was generally passed over in the Homilies and Theological Treatises, and omitted in the Lectionaries. And yet there is nothing in the paragraph, when properly understood, that militates against the character of Christ, or gives the least encouragement to crime. On the contrary, the whole is perfectly consistent with the gentleness and benevolence of our Lord,

while, at the same time, the censure itself is sufficient for the purpose. And if it be objected, that he suffered a guilty woman to go unpunished, it should be remembered, 1. that (according to our Lord's own declarations, John iii. 17. x. 11. 17) he came not to exercise the office of a judge; and 2. that any such exercise of judicial authority would have been at variance with that deference which he ever inculcated, both by precept and example, to the civil magistrate. As a sinner he virtually condemned her, when he bid her ‘go and sin no more.’

In short, all the arguments put together, founded on internal evidence, against the authenticity of this paragraph are inconclusive, and will not counterbalance one that may be adduced for it; namely, that, while we can easily imagine why it should have been omitted, no tolerable reason can be assigned why the story should have been fabricated at all, or if so, why fabricated with the present circumstances; and how it could, amidst so many objections, have found its way into six-sixths of the MSS. The fabricated stories found in the apocryphal Gospels are quite of a different character, and almost always founded on the most ascetic views. And had this paragraph been of that character, it would, I will venture to say, never have been omitted, or removed by any. To advert to another powerful argument, from internal evidence, in favour of its authenticity; the paragraph is not denied, by any competent judges, to bear upon it the stamp and impress of truth, in the profound wisdom of the reply, ‘Let him that is without sin cast a stone at her.’ Insured that the most eminent of the Critics who dispute its authenticity (namely, whether it was recorded by St. John) are constrained to admit the truth of the narration itself, which they think was introduced into the Gospel by Papias, or the disciples of St. John; or else was, at a later period, expressed in the margin of some ancient MS., and from thence found its way into the text. But nothing can be imagined more improbable than the utter supposition. For there were surely many reasons why such a story should not have been introduced into the Text; but not one reason why it should. And as to the former it is very difficult to imagine how even Papias himself could have been enabled, had he wished it, to foist in an interpolation, especially of this nature; or, if he had wished to interpolate, why he should have chosen this alone of all the many narrations which must then have been preserved by tradition, namely, those πολλὰ ἄλλα, which St. John speaks of at xx. 30, and which he had chosen not to record, on the principle that those he had recorded were sufficient for the purpose of showing that Jesus was the Messiah. Such being the case, how would Papias dare to introduce any more? This argument applies yet more strongly against any disciple of St. John.

4. κατελήφθη ἐν' αὐτοφώρῳ μοιχῇ. Καταλαμβάνεσθαι ἐν' αὐτῷ is a phrase properly used thrice caught in the act of theft, or with the stolen property upon them; but more frequently

4 λέγουσιν αὐτῇ· Διδάσκαλε, αὕτη ἡ γυνὴ κατελήφθη ἐπ'

^a those detected in the commission of any other crime, especially such as is committed furtively. ἐπ' αὐτῇ may be construed either with κατελήφθη, or with μοιχευομένη; but the former method is preferable, as being confirmed by several passages of the Classics we adduced, of which the most apposite are the following: Ælian, Hist. An. xi. 3, μοιχευομένην παῖσκα ἐπ' αὐτοφώρῳ καταλαβών, κ. τ. λ. Strach, de Fluvio, Φάσις τὴν μητέρα μοιχευομένην ἐπ' αὐτοφώρῳ καταλαβών, κ. τ. λ. The expression, however, need not be understood in the literal sense, but be taken to denote positive proof of her guilt.

Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the particular manner in which this punishment is inflicted, there can be little doubt but that the chief mode was that in use among the Greeks, Romans, Persians, and others, by which the criminal was overwhelmed and covered up with the mass of an assembled multitude; or, as Hom. I. 56, 57, expressively terms it, was 'clothed in a stony tunic.' This is confirmed by what we read, Ezek. xvi. 40 (with reference to adultery), and I will bring a company against thee, and they shall stone thee with stones,' which passage shows that the practice was to stone them. And in capital punishment, though mentioned in general terms, might be interpreted of a special one, such as stoning, is plain from Exod. xxxi. 2, xxxv. 2, compared with Numb. xv. 32, 34.

To omit many strange notions which have been propounded as to what Christ here wrote, and by he wrote,—all founded on frivolous conjectures and mere speculation,—the best mode of accounting for the action is (with many eminent expositors) to suppose that our Lord traced no words, properly speaking, or at least not with any reference to what was passing at the time; but that he thus merely intimated his desire to have nothing to do with the matter in question, employing, for this purpose, an action which was frequently resorted to by those who did not choose to answer an improper question, or be engaged in a business they disapproved of. So Ælian, V. H. ix. 19, makes mention of a philosopher who showed his disinclination to answer a certain question proposed to him, by writing on the wall. And similar instances are adduced from the Rabbinical writers.

Thus our Lord's action was merely a symbolical one, signifying that he cared not to show any attention to what they were saying, or to answer their insidious question. Or it may have implied contempt or censure, as if they did not deserve that he should take the trouble to repeat what he had so often before inculcated, that with juridical questions he had nothing to do, intimating that they merited no other answer, than what they had themselves suggested by appealing to the Mosaic precept.

—ὁ ἀναμάρτητος ὑμῶν.] The exact meaning here of ἀναμάρτητος has been disputed. Some take it to denote freedom from adultery; others, freedom from any notorious sin, such as adultery; others, again, freedom from sin in general. The sense first mentioned seems alone the true one; namely, freedom from the sin in question, which may, however, very well include fornication, concubinage, and lasciviousness of every kind. To the extreme corruption of morals in his countrymen Josephus bears ample testimony; and that the priests and scribes deeply participated in this corruption there is no reason to doubt; for the Rabbinical writers supply abundant proofs of the immorality of even the most eminent Rabbis. That ἀμαρτάνειν and ἀμαρτία are in the Greek writers often used of adultery and fornication, is well known. If the word be taken with the extent of signification above laid down, (which is fully warranted by Scripture usage,) there will be no reason to doubt but that every one of the persons present was more or less guilty. As to the objection urged by Le Clerc and others, that no law demands perfect innocence in its judges, &c., it may be answered, that our Lord is here speaking not juridically, but popularly, and considers the thing in foro conscientie, as in the passages of Cicero and Synesius here cited by Grotius. Thus the reply was well adapted to produce the effect intended, as pointing at a moral maxim founded in justice, and recognised by the philosophers and sages of the Heathens, that he who accuses others ought himself to be free from the vices of which he impeaches them; comp. Rom. ii. 1; and therefore our Lord so speaks as by no means to absolve the accused, but to smite the consciences of the accusers. He neither acquits nor condemns the woman, but tempers his answer with such prudence, as that it shall be neither at variance with justice, nor inconsistent with mercy.

—πρῶτος τὸν λίθον ἐπ' αὐτῇ βαλ.] Render, 'let him first cast the stone at her.' By the stone is meant the fatal stone, which was first cast, in form, by one of the accusers or witnesses, and

8. καὶ πάλιν—τὴν γῆν.] The best reason that has been supposed for the repetition of this symbolical action, the counterpart to the former, is, that it was intended to give the priests and scribes an opportunity of withdrawing with less confusion.

9. καὶ ὑπὸ—ἐλεγχόμενοι.] These words, not found in many MSS. and early Editions, may have come, as Matthæi suspects, from the margin, though it is more probable that they are from the Evangelist, as being so much in his manner, such ἐπικρίσεις being frequent in his writings.

—εἰς καθ' εἰς.] See Note on Mark xiv. 19. By πρεσβυτέρων is here meant 'the more honourable,' as by ἱσχάτων the lowest in degree or station; see Mark ix. 35. It is not meant that they went out each in seniority, but that they all went out, one after another, of every station and age, from first to last.

—κατελείφθη μόνος—ἐν μέσῳ οὐσα.] Namely, of those present, the Apostles and followers of Christ; comp. ver. 3. Instead of the common reading ἑστώσα, very many MSS., Versions, and Editions, have οὐσα; which I have, with Matthæi and Scholz, adopted, since internal as well as external evidence is in its favour.

10. κατέκρινε] 'pronounced sentence on thee.'

11. οὐδὲ ἐγὼ σε κατακρίνω] 'neither do, or will, I pass sentence on thee, or adjudge thee to punishment.' We are not to take this as a remission of her sins (which, as supreme Lord, he might have pronounced), but simply as a declaration that, since his kingdom was not of this world, so he would not assume the office of temporal magistracy. False, therefore, is the conclusion of some, who hence infer that our Lord did not approve of adultery being punished with death. For, upon the same principle, they might argue that, when our Lord declined to act as judge between the brothers disputing about an inheritance, (see Luke xii. 15,) he did not approve of inheritances being divided, and did not care that the disputes thence arising should be amicably settled. (Lampe.) To prevent any mistake of his meaning, our Lord added μηκέτι ἀμάρτανε.

12. Now follow, to the end of the Chapter, certain discourses pronounced by our Lord in the Temple on some other occasion, though what that was, and at what time, is uncertain. The view, indeed, of Commentators as to that matter vary according to their admission or rejection of the disputed portion in the former part of the Chapter. Those who adopt the latter view, suppose this first discourse, vv. 12—20, to have been delivered on the great day of the feast, referring it to the same occasion as vii. 37, 38; while those who adopt the former view, either think that it was delivered at some other time (though at what time is uncertain) after the feast in question; or take the πάλιν to intimate the resumption of the discourse at ver. 2, which had been interrupted by the occurrence just before narrated. Upon a matter of such doubtful disputation it is impossible to speak decisively; but really it should seem that there is no reason why we should not, while maintaining the authority of vii. 2—11, yet suppose the present discourse to be closely connected with that at vii. 37, 38, of which the narrative was interrupted by various other matter intervening. But though closely connected in subject the discourses were separate, and pronounced on two different occasions; the first at the Feast, the second on the day after it. And as it was on the same subject, and addressed to the same persons, it may be regarded as resumptive of the former. Indeed, this seems to be intimated by the particle πάλιν οὖν, which are continuatives and resumptions. The scope of the present address is the same; namely, to declare that Jesus is the Christ, though the imagery employed is different. In τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου there is an allusion to the Sun, the great natural light of the world, that rules the day. The expression was a frequent designation of the Messiah, as the great Moral Teacher, as well as Saviour, of the human race. Thus it is used of the Messiah, Ia. xlii. 6. xlix. 6. Mal. ii. 2, and there is allusion to it infra i. 4, 9, where see Notes. Indeed, by this designation Jesus may be supposed to declare himself God as well as Christ, since there is reason to think that the Jews applied it to the Deity also; the Rabbinical writers often speaking of God as 'the Light of the world.' In ἔξει τὸ φῶς τῆς ζωῆς there is an allusion to the other character of Christ, namely, that of Saviour of the human race.

13. σὺ περὶ σιαντοῦ μαρτυρῇ.] Here the Pas-

we do not openly reject this high claim, but it aside, by such a sort of argument as they ought Jesus could not rebut; namely, that self-recommendation has no force, and that no one can be a witness in his own case: a fundamental tenet of the Jewish Teachers; see Mischna Sanhedrin, t. iii. p. 63. This our Lord had just admitted, supra v. 31. But he removes the objection by arguing at ver. 14, that though common life the rule holds good, yet an exception of it must be admitted in his own person, who had come down from heaven endued with fullest Divine knowledge (see vi. 46) for the purpose of imparting it to men ignorant of celestial things, or what was the true nature of His mission. Accordingly the words οἶδα πόθεν ἦλθον, καὶ ποῦ ὑπάγω contain a periphrasis of Divine mission. The sense may be thus expressed: 'My mission is altogether true; for I know with authority I act, and what injunctions have been given to me. You cannot ascertain, except I learn of me; or, you do not know them unless I testify them to you.' Meaning, that his mission alone is true, and worthy to be received, inasmuch as it was Divine, though their prejudiced minds could not discern its truth (ver. 14. 15; and 2dly, that, on the principles of their Law, his record must be regarded as true; two witnesses being, by that Law, considered sufficient to establish the truth of any allegation, hence the concurrent testimony of himself and his Father to the truth of his pretensions.

Here (says Dr. A. Clarke) our Lord speaks not in the character of an ambassador. Such a person does not bring a second with him to attest his truth; his credentials from his king attest his character. So our Lord represents his Father as bearing witness with him. The reason which he wrought was the proof from heaven that he was the promised Messiah; these were the great seal of his pretensions.

14. καὶ τοῦ ἑ. For καὶ many MSS. and versions have &, which has been adopted by Tischendorf and Scholz, while Matthæi and Vater retain the common reading; and rightly; since internal evidence is quite in its favour (Versions in a case like this having little weight); and internal scarcely less so; for, as Matthæi observes, even in his libentius dicunt &. Accordingly it would seem to be an emendation of the Alexandrian Critics, who were not aware that such & is more usual, καὶ is also thus used by the best Attic writers; ex. gr. Thucyd. i. 2. 140. 143. τοιαῦτα καὶ παραπλήσια.

15. ὑμεῖς κατὰ τὴν σάρκα κρίνετε.] Meaning, 'that they are used to judge and account of any one according to the external appearance, warped by passion and prejudice, and thus account him a mere man, not the Christ, the promised Messiah.'

— οὐ κρίνω οὐδένα] scil. οὐτως. For it should seem the assertion is to be taken in a qualified sense, to mean, that 'he judges no man [as they do] in a biased or prejudiced manner.'

16—18. Here our Lord employs the same kind of argument as at ver. 37, seqq., and the general sense may be thus expressed, with Tittman: 'But even were I to bear the highest testimony of myself, yet it would be true, unbiassed, and worthy to be received; for neither do I stand alone, nor is my testimony solitary,—but my Father also, who sent me, hath testified of me (namely, by the Prophets). Nay, it is ordained by your law, that the testimony of two witnesses is worthy of credit. [Therefore ought also my testimony of myself to be thought worthy of credit]; since it is not that of myself only, but likewise of my Father, who hath sent me.' Meaning, that if the testimony of two men were sufficient to establish any ordinary fact, his own testimony and that of his Father ought surely to be such in the case of a religious doctrine.

The δὲ at ver. 16 means tamen. On this unusual junction of δὲ καὶ at the beginning of a sentence, see Steph. Thes. Kρίνω has here the rare sense of μαρτυρεῖν; and κρίσις, of μαρτυρία; and ἀληθής here means veracious, worthy of credit. After ἐγὼ, in the latter part of the sentence, I have, with R. Stephens and the Latin Vulgate, placed a comma,—as propriety and perspicuity alike require, the καὶ being not a copula uniting words, but joining two clauses, instead of two verbs κρίνω or μαρτυρεῖν, and κρίνει or μαρτυρεῖ.

Ver. 18 is explanatory of the briefly expressed words preceding.

19. ποῦ ἐστιν ὁ πατήρ σου;] These words were, doubtless, (as Lampe, Kuinoel, and Tittman have shown) spoken not from ignorance, but in derision and insult; q. d. 'Where is this father of yours, that we may interrogate him? we do not see this other witness.' To which our Lord indignantly replies, that their very question betrays the malignity of their hearts, and shows that they neither truly know, nor care to know, either him or his Father. If they knew him, as οὔτε τὸν Πατέρα μου· εἰ ἐμὲ ᾔδειτε, καὶ τὸν Πατέρα μου ᾔδειτε ἄν. ⁸ Ταῦτα τὰ ῥήματα ἐλάλησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἐν τῷ 20 γαζοφυλακίῳ, διδάσκων ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ· καὶ οὐδεὶς ἐπίασεν αὐτὸν, ὅτι οὐπὼ ἐληλύθει ἡ ὥρα αὐτοῦ. ^b Εἶπεν οὖν πάλιν αὐτοῖς 21 ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Ἐγὼ ὑπάγω, καὶ ζητήσετέ με, καὶ ἐν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ ὑμῶν ἀποθανεῖσθε· ὅπου ἐγὼ ὑπάγω, ὑμεῖς οὐ δύνασθε ἐλθεῖν. Ἔλεγον οὖν οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι· Μήτι ἀποκτενεῖ ἑαυτὸν ὅτι λέγει 22 Ὅπου ἐγὼ ὑπάγω, ὑμεῖς οὐ δύνασθε ἐλθεῖν; Καὶ εἶπεν 23 αὐτοῖς· Ὑμεῖς ἐκ τῶν κάτω ἐστέ, ἐγὼ ἐκ τῶν ἄνω εἰμὶ· ὑμεῖς ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου τούτου ἐστέ, ἐγὼ οὐκ εἰμὶ ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου τούτου. a Teacher sent from God, they would know that it is God who beareth witness of him, though not in a visible way, yet 'by signs and wonders and mighty deeds.'

21. It is a disputed point whether the following discourse was held at the same time, and in the same place, with the preceding, or at some time afterwards. Those Expositors who maintain the latter opinion found it on the nature of the preceding verse, and the use of πάλιν here. The former reason, however, is invalid, since the verse may be regarded as, in some measure, parenthetical. And the use of πάλιν will not prove it to have been held at another time; since it may only denote repetition, namely, of the same warning as had been before given, vii. 34. And not only is there no apparent separation, but the contrast may be proved by the οὖν; for its use here seems to be that which Hoogev. p. 509, calls continuative, either after a digression, or a parenthesis, as here, and which may thus be termed resumptive. That this is a use very agreeable to St. John's style is certain, inasmuch as the two examples adduced by Hoogev. are both of them from this Gospel; namely, vi. 22. 24. xviii. 5, 6, Αἶγι αὐτοῖς, Ἐγὼ εἰμι. (Εἰσθήκαι δι καὶ Ἰούδας, ὁ παραδίδου αὐτόν, μετ' αὐτῶν.) Ὡς οὖν εἶπαν αὐτοῖς, &c. We may, therefore, safely regard this portion as a continuation of the foregoing, addressed, it should seem, to the same persons. And thus the extreme severity of the expressions in the subsequent verses may be well accounted for. Seeing that he had hitherto made no impression on them, our Lord even more seriously warns them of their guilt and danger.

— ἐγὼ ὑπάγω, καὶ, &c.] Meaning that 'he is about to leave them, and they shall seek the Messiah, and desire his coming; but the Messiah that they expect will not come: and as they have rejected him who is the true and only Messiah, there remains no other salvation.' Ἐν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ ὑμῶν ἀποθ. is a mode of expression formed on that of Ezek. iii. 19. xviii. 26. xxxiii. 9. 18, 'shall die in his iniquity.' And ἁμαρτία may be here understood in a general way of that fountain and cause of all other sins and miseries, obdurate unbelief; which, in their case, shortly led to the crucifixion of their Saviour, and carried with it the Divine vengeance so soon to overtake them in this world, and abide upon them for ever in the next; for here by ἀποθ. is denoted not so much temporal death (namely, at the destruction of their city and people), as eternal death, a state of everlasting woe, reserved for the vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction.' Comp. Heb. x. 26, 27.

22. μήτι ἀποκτενεῖ ἑαυτόν, &c.] This seems to have been a wilful perversion of our Lord's meaning; q. d. 'What! will he make away with himself, to get away from this our pretended persecution?' see vii. 30. Thus imputing to him what involved, even according to the opinion of the Jews, great criminality; for we find from Josephus, Bell. iii. 14, that the Pharisees supposed the lowest pit of Hell to be reserved for self-murderers.

23. Ὑμεῖς ἐκ τῶν, &c.] Our Lord deigns not to notice so absurd and malignant an imputation; but glances at the origin of this their malice, in the total dissimilarity between themselves and himself; the one being of earth, and earthly-minded, the other of heaven, and heavenly-minded. Comp. supra iii. 31.

24. ὅτι ἐγὼ εἰμι] scil. ἐκείνου, meaning that personage so long expected and predicted by the Patriarchs and Prophets. An ellipsis found also in a kindred passage at Mark xiii. 6. See also Acts xiii. 25.

25. σὺ τίς εἶ;] A question, it should seem, not of simple ignorance seeking information, but of scornful reproach; q. d. 'Who art thou, that thou speakest so loftily of thyself, and rebukingly to us?' So Aristoph. Av. 961, σὺ τίς εἶ; Philem. σὺ γὰρ τίς εἶσσι (for εἶ); Liliu. 798, τίς γὰρ εἶ σὺ; Terent. Andr. iv. 1, M. 'impudentissima eorum oratio est, Quis es tu?' Our Lord, however, was pleased to answer as if the question had been one of simple ignorance.

— τὴν ἀρχὴν ὅτι καὶ λαλῶ &c.] The sense of these words depends upon that which is assigned to τὴν ἀρχὴν, which some take as standing for omnisio; q. d. 'I am altogether the person whom I profess myself to be.' But it has been truly observed that in this sense the expression is almost always used with a negation. It is therefore better, with the generality of Commentators, to suppose an ellipsis of κατὰ, and take the phrase as put for

Πολλὰ ἔχω περὶ ὑμῶν λαλεῖν καὶ κρίνειν· ἀλλ' ὁ πέμψας ^{1 supra 7. 26 & 2. 32. infra 15. 15.} αὐτὴν ἀληθὴς ἐστὶ, καὶ γὰρ ἃ ἤκουσα παρ' αὐτοῦ, ταῦτα λέγω ἰς τὸν κόσμον. Οὐκ ἔγνωσαν ὅτι τὸν Πατέρα αὐτοῖς ἔλεγεν. ἔπεν οὖν αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· ^{1 supra 8. 14. infra 12. 32.} Ὅταν ὑψώσῃτε τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, τότε γνώσεσθε ὅτι ἐγὼ εἰμι, καὶ ἀπ' ἐμαυτοῦ τοῦ οὐδέν· ἀλλὰ, καθὼς ἐδίδαξέ με ὁ Πατήρ μου, ταῦτα λέλω. ^{1 supra 7. 26 & 4. 34. & 5. 20.} καὶ ὁ πέμψας με μετ' ἐμοῦ ἐστίν· οὐκ ἀφήκε μένον ὁ Πατήρ, ὅτι ἐγὼ τὰ ἀρεστά αὐτῷ ποιῶ πάντοτε.

Ταῦτα αὐτοῦ λαλοῦντος, πολλοὶ ἐπίστευσαν εἰς αὐτόν. Ἐλεγεν οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς πρὸς τοὺς πεπιστευκότας αὐτῷ Ἰουδαίους· Ἐὰν ὑμεῖς μένητε ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τῷ ἐμῷ, ἀληθῶς μαθηταὶ μου ἐστέ· καὶ γνώσεσθε τὴν ἀλήθειαν, καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια λευθερώσει ὑμᾶς. Ἀπεκρίθησαν αὐτῷ· Σπέρμα Ἀβραάμ

ἰσχυρῶς. By this some understand the beginning of office; others, the beginning of the prosecution; which latter opinion is preferable, the expression may simply mean dudum, or as in Gen. xliii. 18. So Plaut. Capt. 2. 'Quis ille est? Quem dudum dixi a meo tibi.' And ἀλῶ will mean, 'I have telling you.'

πολλὰ ἔχω, &c.] These words are, from γ, somewhat obscure. The difficulty is in ὁ πέμψας με ἀληθὴς, &c. which some meant to prove the justice of his accusa-

But it is better, with others, to regard as intimating the ground of his claims, and as censure which their refusal to acknowledge involved; q. d. 'I could say much in reference to you, and in reproof of your inf; but I shall content myself with de, that as I am sent from the great Father αὐτὸς, so what I openly aver is from Him, and see cannot but be true, and the refusal to u it highly criminal.'

οὐκ ἔγνωσαν· ἔλεγεν.] Meaning, 'they not to know that he spake unto them of meant) his Father in heaven, God.'

ἔπεν ὑψώσῃτε, &c.] These words could of course, be understood by the hearers; but were, we may suppose, expressed thus ob-, partly from the reserve which our Lord, wisdom, thought fit then to maintain on subject, (though, indeed, some obscurity in ing of events yet in the womb of futurity unavoidable,) and partly in order that what now enigmatical, being afterwards explained now, there might arise that confirmation in which results from the fulfilment of pro-. The same remark applies to our Lord's to Peter, respecting John, xxi. 22, ὅταν ὁ υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου ἔλθῃ. See also Here there is an obscure allusion (though and plain by the event) to the circumstances ing the crucifixion, and to the events sub to it; namely, the resurrection and as of Christ, the coming of the Holy Ghost, the working of miracles in the name of the—circumstances which would so demon- him to be the Christ, that they would all abundant evidence to see, and many would sequence believe, that he was indeed the promised Messiah. On this expression ὑψώσῃτε see Note supra iii. 14.

—ἐγὼ εἰμι.] Supply ἐκείνου.

29. This verse is closely connected with the preceding one; the sense being: 'who, having sent me, leaves me not alone, but succours and supports me, because I perform his will in all things,' meaning especially with respect to the work of redemption.

31. ὅταν ὑμεῖς μένητε, &c.] Meaning, 'If ye adhere with constancy to what I have taught you, and act thereupon by a holy obedience in your lives.' Comp. xiv. 21. 1 John ii. 24. Indeed the words ἀληθῶς μαθηταὶ plainly intimate that it was by their moral qualities, rather than their external profession, that the true disciples of Christ would be recognised. Thus it is said, 'by their fruits shall ye know them.'

32. γνώσεσθε τὴν ἀλήθειαν, &c.] Meaning, 'Ye shall experimentally find the truth, and prove the blessed effects of my word, and know of a truth that I came from God.' See v. 28. vii. 17.

—καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια.] Meaning, 'the truth as it is in Jesus,' Gospel truth, or the Christian religion. Ἐλευθ. signifies, 'will free you from the bondage to sin and Satan,' and place you in 'the glorious liberty of the children of God.' See Rom. viii. 2. 15. Similar sentiments are adduced, both from the Rabbinical writers and the Classical ones; of which the most apposite are the following:—Arrian, Epict. iv. 7, εἰς ἐμὴ οὐδεὶς ἐξουσίαν ἔχει· ἡλευθέρωμαι γὰρ ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἔγνωκα αὐτοῦ τὰς ἐντολάς, οὐκίτι οὐδεὶς δουλαγωγῆσαι με δύναται where, however, we need not, as in the other passages cited, suppose an allusion to the Stoical dogma, that the wise man is alone free, and that every fool is a slave: for it may be noticed, that Arrian had, like the other later Philosophers, been much indebted to the truths of Revelation in the New Testament. Of this the passage in question affords a remarkable example, as containing allusion to four clauses of Scripture, namely, 1 Cor. vii. 37. 1 Cor. vii. 22, ἀπαλειψάμενος Κυρίου ἐστίν. 2 John i. 1. and Ps. cxix. 125. 2 Pet. ii. 19. 1 Cor. ix. 27.

33. ἀπεκρίθησαν.] Not those just before mentioned, who 'believed on him,' but some bystanders, who perversely misrepresented his meaning; and, in order to draw censure on him, interpreted of temporal, what he had meant of spiritual liberty.

33. οὐδενὶ δεδουλ. π.] As the Hebrews had been in slavery not only under the Egyptians and Babylonians, but were then subject to the Romans (so Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 8, τὴν ἰλευθριαν ἀποβάλλομεν, καὶ ἰπῆκοι Ῥωμαίων κατέστημεν), many regard this as a false assertion, uttered in the heat of disputation. Perhaps, however, it may be better, with others, to take δεδουλ. in such a restricted sense as the truth of history will justify, and (with most recent Interpreters) regard the words as spoken of themselves only, and their own generation. And assuredly the Jews, even after they became subject to the Roman empire, were left in the enjoyment of no inconsiderable portion of liberty, political as well as religious.

34. Our Lord now shows that he meant, not political, but moral and spiritual liberty; here inculcating a truth frequent in the New Test. (see Rom. vi. 17.) i. e. that a habit of sin (for such is the import of the expression ὁ ποιῶν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν) is a sort of slavery; as indeed was acknowledged by the heathen sages. So Pythagor. ap. Stob. (cited by Wetstein) Οὐδαίε ἐλεύθεροι ἑαυτοῦ μη κρατῶν. Plato, Phæd. τῶν ταῖς αἰσχροῖς ἐπιθυμίαις ἐπιχειρούντων ἐλευθεροὺ μηδὲνα νόμιζε· τῶν γὰρ τοῦς τῇ τύχῃ δούλους κερτημάτων πολὺ βρυτίτεροι οὗτοι δισπότης τοῖς καταναγκάζουσιν ταῦτα, δουλεύουσιν.

35. ὁ δὲ δούλος—αἰῶνα.] Here we have an illustration drawn from what is usual in common life; q. d. 'The Slave has no claim to remain continually in the same family; but may, at the pleasure of his owner, be sold unto another. Not so the son; he cannot be alienated from the family. Thus it is with the servants of sin, who may, at any time, be excluded from God's house and favour, and cast into outer darkness. Whereas those who have the liberty of the sons of God will abide in it for ever.' Ver. 36 contains another view, engrafted on the former; the comparison being the same, but the application different. And as, in the foregoing verse, there is a comparison between the state of a slave and that of the son and heir, so in this there is one between the freedom communicated by the master and that by his son, with the concurrence of his father. For as there were cases in which a proprietor could not manumit without the consent of the son and heir, or at least a manumission in which the son concurred with the father, might be regarded as being doubly effectual; so the freedom and salvation produced by the conjoint manumission of both Father and Son is most truly effectual. Ὅντως ἐλεύθεροι has reference, not merely, as Wetstein, Rosenmuller, and Kuinoel imagine, to the freedom from the tyranny of evil passions, but that freedom accomplished by Divine grace from 'the dominion of sin' (see Rom. vi. 17.), which implies an introduction into 'the glorious liberty of the children of God,' (Rom. vii. 21.) 'the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our bodies,' Rom. viii. 23. ix. 4.

37. οἶδα.] The word must, as Calvin observes, be here taken in the sense of concession. Our Lord admits their assertion, but makes use of it to show the inconsistency between their boasted claims of ancestry and their present conduct, and to evince that they must indeed be degenerate descendants of Abraham, who, in a spirit so totally unlike that of their illustrious progenitor, plot the death of Him to whom both the Patriarchs and Prophets bore witness.

—ὅτι ὁ λόγος ὁ ἐμὸς οὐ χωρεῖ ἐν ὑμῖν.] Here is suggested the reason for that rejection of his doctrine, which made them plot against his person. On the exact import, however, of χωρεῖ some difference of opinion exists. The sense 'has place, adored by many eminent ancient and modern Expositors, is destitute of authority, and not sufficiently definite or significant. The true interpretation seems to be that of Nonnus, Grotius, De Dieu, Camerac, Lampe, Rosenmuller, Kuinoel, and Wahl, 'does not penetrate into your hearts,' by being received and believed. 'Ἐν here, as often, stands for eis, the proper construction, as Matt. xv. 17.

38. The scope of this verse is to draw a contrast between the conduct pursued by him, and that by them; as serving to account for their rejection of Him. 'He faithfully delivers the doctrine which he hath learnt from and with his Father, GOD; they do the works which they have learnt from their father, the Devil, as is more plainly signified further on. How fully this language was justified by facts, will sufficiently appear from the account given by Josephus of the Jews of his age. See Bell. v. 10.

—εἰώρακα.] Ὁρᾶν has here, as often, not the physical sense to see, but the moral sense to perceive, i. e. understand, know, learn.

39. ὁ πατὴρ ἡμῶν, &c.] The Jews, not knowing that by their father, Jesus had meant the Devil, and not quite understanding the other words of Jesus, ὁ ἐωράκατε παρὰ τῷ πατρὶ ὑμῶν; and regarding what was said as disrespectful to Abraham, take refuge in their former allegation, simply repeating that 'Abraham is their son, in whom they trust.' To which our Lord has, that they are not Abraham's sons in the moral and spiritual sense, namely, those who walk in his footsteps, and do his works. A figurative use of the word son familiar to the Jews. Lightfoot.

The an after ἐποιεῖτε, not found in many good B. and some Versions and Fathers, together with the early Editors, is perhaps rightly cancelled Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz.

6. οὖν.] Meaning, 'but as things actually are.' sense of the particle frequent in Scripture; as a ix. 41. xviii. 36. and Thucyd. iii. 43. In which passages there is the same use as anti- in ἀντί.

— οὐκ ἐποίησεν.] Render, 'would not have done.'

1. ὅμαινε ποιεῖτε τὰ ἔργα τ. π. ὑ.] 'Yes, do the works of your father.' Our Lord repeats the charge, and yet repeats it as if unwilling to name Satan as their father. That he repeats it is inferred.

— πορεύεσθαι.] The best Commentators are of opinion that the word here, as often, signifies idolatry; which was considered by the Jews as a spiritual adultery; since so close was the union of the people of Israel with God, that as compared to the conjugal union. Compare Is. ii. 17. 1 Chron. v. 25. Is. i. 21. Hos. i. 2. 12. Their meaning, therefore, is: 'If thou now speaking of our natural Father, know that we recognise no other Father than God. To us we are dear and beloved, like children; but only do we worship.' This argument our Lord rebuts, by again adverting to the spiritual sense of Father.

2. ἐξῆλθον καὶ ἤκω.] The full sense is: 'I came forth (from God), and am come into the world (as his Legate).' A sense of ἤκω found in the Greek Tragedians. The former term ἐξῆλθον has reference to the character of Jesus as the eternal Son of God; the latter, his character as Legate and Mediator. Comp. vi. 46. vii. 28. 2. xvi. 27, 28. xvii. 7.

3. Here our Lord accounts for the obscurity which they found in his words, from their own disposition to attend to what he said.

— ἀπὸ τῆς λαλίας, &c.] Meaning: 'How is it that [as ye say] ye do not understand my speech? even because ye cannot (or, are not disposed to) hearken and give heed to my words.' Δύνασθαι is here (as often) used of moral inability, arising from any one's being indisposed to do a thing. So Gen. xxvii. 4, οὐκ ἠδύνατο λαλεῖν αὐτῷ οὐδὲν εἰρημικόν, and Jerem. vi. 16, (of the Jews) 'they cannot hear.' So also John vii. 7, οὐ δύναται ὁ κόσμος μισεῖν ὑμᾶς. The reason of this indisposition to hearken to the truth will appear from 1 Cor. ii. 14. The expression λαλία, meaning loquela, has reference to the peculiarity of our Lord's manner of speaking, and its remoteness from the λαλιά κόσμου. (See Lampe.) Which may account for the combined inability and indisposition of the persons in question.

44. ὅμαινε ἐκ πατρὸς, &c.] Our Lord now speaks more plainly, pointing to their true Father, and indicating two of the principal characteristics in which their similarity to their Diabolical father consists; namely, man-slaying and lying. Θάτετε, 'ye will,' i. e. ye are resolved, or bent. Ἐπιθυμίας may here mean behests. Ἀπ' ἀρχῆς denotes here, as often, 'from the beginning of the world.' Compare i. 1. and 1 John iii. 8. The expression, however, includes a notion of continuance and perseverance in. In ἀνθρωποκτόνος there is not, I conceive, a reference (as some imagine) to the murder of Abel, committed at the instigation of Satan; neither, however, must the proper sense of the word (with others) be explained away. It may be taken in its proper acceptance, and be referred to the seduction of our first parents; which might be called ἀνθρωποκτονία, as 'bringing death into the world, and all our woe'; the thing being brought about by Satan's machinations. Thus a Rabbinical writer cited by Schoettgen speaks of 'the children of the old Serpent, who killed Adam and all his posterity.' The same is also ascribed to the Devil, Wisd. ii. 24. and in Irenæus, ii. 8, and other Fathers.

The words καὶ ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ οὐχ ἔστηκε contain a strong affirmation, by a negation of the contrary. And as to stand in any action is to steadfastly practise it, so the sense here is: 'he has perpetually fallen away from the truth.' A sentiment which is then strengthened by an em-

αὐτῷ. ὅταν λαλῇ τὸ ψεῦδος, ἐκ τῶν ἰδίων λαλεῖ· ὅτι ψεύστης ἐστὶ καὶ ὁ πατὴρ αὐτοῦ. Ἐγὼ δὲ ὅτι τὴν ἀλήθειαν λέγω οὐ πιστεύετε μοι. Τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν ἐλέγχει με περὶ ἀμαρτίας; εἰ δὲ ἀλήθειαν λέγω, διατί ὑμεῖς οὐ πιστεύετε μοι;

phatic mode of expression (occurring also in 1 John i. 8. 1 Macc. vii. 18, and often in the Rabbinical writers) importing that there is no principle of truth in him.

— ὅταν λαλῇ τὸ ψεῦδος, &c.] The sense of these words mainly depends upon that assigned to the αὐτοῦ; which some ancient and a few modern Translators render, according to the more usual signification of the word, ipseus, his. Yet this produces so odd a sense, ('for he is a liar, and so is his father,') that almost all Expositors of any eminence, from Erasmus to Tittman, take αὐτοῦ as a neuter, rendering it ejus, it; and they refer it either to the remote antecedent ψεῦδος, or consider that word as inherent in the verbal ψεύστης. As, however, this would seem to involve a pleonasm in the article, Bp. Middleton, after affirming that the article is never pleonastic, ventures to pronounce that 'all the great scholars who have espoused the common version were in error.' And, as might be expected, he adopts the masculine sense of αὐτοῦ. But, in order to avoid the insuperable objection arising from the strange sense thus produced, he changes the subject in αὐτοῦ, rendering, not 'the Devil,' but his son, the Liar. This he does by supposing the person at λαλεῖ to be not Διάβολος, but τις understood. And he renders, 'when any of you speak that which is false, he speaks after the manner of his kindred; for he is a liar, and so also is his father.' But to this it is, with reason, objected by Professor Scholefield, that, after describing the man as a liar, it was superfluous to add, 'for he is a liar.' There is also a still more formidable objection; for (not to mention that such a sense as 'after the manner of his kindred' is very harsh and improbable) this changing the subject ad libitum, and supplying a nominative, τις at λαλῇ, is surely too arbitrary a method to be justified. The ellipsis in question is, indeed, frequent in the Classical writers; but it is almost confined to the Attic ones, being very rarely found in the Alexandrian writers, or those of later times, and never in the New Test. or the Sept. Upon the whole, there is no reason to depart from the common rendering; for though it may seem to involve something uncouth and obscure, yet that is no more than may occasionally be observed in all ancient writers. Moreover, the sense thus arising is both apposite and natural, and such as suggests matter for serious reflection. And, after all, there is here little that can be called irregular. This use of αὐτοῦ in the neuter, though rare, is not unexampled, being found at Eph. ii. 10, ὡς ἐν αὐτοῖς περιπατ., for neither is αὐτοῖς confined to the masculine, but, like the Genit. here, is sometimes a neuter. Nor is the use of the Article here to be called anomalous. It might, indeed, have been dispensed with; but it is not without its force, as suggesting the sense, 'and the originator of it by the deception of our first parents,' Gen. iii. 5. So in Sophocl. Œd. Tyr. 868, Jupiter is called πατὴρ νόμων, and Plato, Menex. C. 10, has πατέρες τῆς ἐλευθερίας, 'authors or originators of the truth.' Instances, too, are abundant of nouns being left to be supplied from a verb preceding; and thus there is no great harshness in a noun being left to be supplied from a verbal, if we consider its true nature, especially as the sense of the verb itself has just preceded.

Finally, the above method of exposition is supported by the suffrage of the earliest antiquity; being adopted by the Pesch. Syriac Translator in the middle of the second century, who renders by ܡܠܟܐ with the feminine affix, which therefore cannot be referred to the Devil, and must belong to the preceding feminine noun ܡܠܟܐ ܥܕܝܐ! Τὸ ψεῦδος should be rendered so as to express the force of the Article, 'what is false.' And so also at Eph. iv. 25. 2 Theas. ii. 11. Rom. i. 23. The very phrase λαλεῖν τὸ ψεῦδος occurs at Ps. v. 6.

These words, then, are meant to show how it is, that nought but falsehood comes from him;—namely, that is natural to him; ἐκ τῶν ἰδίων being (as the Pesch. Syr. Translator also takes it) for ἐκ τοῦ ἰδίου, and that for ἐξ ἰδιώματος, 'from natural disposition;' probably a popular form of expression, since it is not found in the Classical writers. Remarkably similar to what is here said of the Devil, is what Porphyry de Abst. ii. § 42. says of demons, τὸ ψεῦδος (lying) τοῦτοις οἰκτιῶν.

45. Here ἐγὼ is, as often, emphatic, and the δὲ is antithetic, with reference to ὑμεῖς at v. 44; v. 44. being hypo-parenthetical and illustrative. Render: 'But as for me, it is because I speak the truth, that ye believe not what I say.' Inasmuch that, as Christ declares on a similar occasion (v. 43.), 'if another should come in his own name only (without that Divine authority which he possesses), him they would receive.' Then, then, it is meant that they can no more believe the truth, than the Devil can speak it; both actions being respectively contrary to their nature.

46. τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν—ἀμαρτίας.] The scope of this address is to convince them of the credibility of what he asserts, by another and a popular kind of argument, in which he traces unbelief to its true source. In τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν the interrogative, as Calvin remarks, has the force of condemning appeal.

Ἀμαρτία is here by the best Commentators rightly taken to mean, not sine, according to the common acceptance of the word, but error or falsehood in doctrine, as opposed to the truth spoken of in the next clause. Of this explanation the following examples will suffice. Michl. Agam. 489, φραζέω ἀμαρτία. Thucyd. i. 2, δοῦτε ἀμαρτία. and 78, ἐν ἀμαρτίᾳ ὄντα. Ἐλέγχει must be rendered, not 'convicts,' but contradicts; as supra v. 9. And so in a similar passage of Aristoph. Plut. 574, we have καὶ οὐκ ἐλέγχει μ' ὅπως δύνασαι παρὶ τούτου.

Our Lord appeals to his hearers whether they can make out any such charge against him, of error or falsehood in doctrine, as to warrant disregard of his pretensions; which may remind us of a similar appeal of Moses to the Israelites, Num.

Now such an appeal of course involves the
 of a strong negation. Thus, in the words following, the hearers are supposed to have answered,
 'no!' The inference is manifest. In v. 47. the point is followed up thus: 'If ye were really, boast, sons of God, ye would hearken to the word of God [from me, whom He hath sent].
 The very reason why ye hearken not to them is, ye are not of God;' i. e. sons of God. See John iii. 10. iv. 4, 6. v. 18, 19.

Not being able to answer these arguments,
 the Jews are fain to have recourse to reviling.

Σαμαρεῖτης—ἔχεις; Of these two expressions the latter has been explained at vii. 20. The former appears from the Rabbinical writers to have been a term of bitter reproach, equivalent to saying any one a heathen or a heretic; and the gentiles were accounted both, as well in doctrine as in practice. See Horne's Introd. vol. iii. 371.

Here our Lord, with mild dignity, rebuts
 the insulting charge. Τιμῶν τὸν Πατέρα denotes honouring, the executing his Father's injunctions, and carrying his message and doctrine. Comp. xvii.
 This honour to God, he argues, would not be done by one under the influence of the Devil.
 Ἐγὼ δὲ οὐ ζητῶ, &c.] The full sense is:
 'I seek, it is not my part to vindicate my cause [nor need I]; there is a Being who will judge it, and hold judgment on men as to the reception of me.'

Ἵ ἄν τις τὸν λόγον, &c.] Here our Lord fully adverts to the happy lot of those who have received his covenant of grace, and observe its requisite, i. e. that they shall never θάνατον, i. e. death spiritual. The ἰδέω θάνατον at Luke ii. 26, signifies to experience death; i. e. a death spiritual eternal, the second death spoken of in Rev. ii.
 and in St. Paul's Epistles. Yet, though it has been proved that the phrase as well as the doctrine are unknown to the Jews, the hearers misunderstand or pervert our Lord's words, and endeavour thereby to fasten on him the charge of being possessed with a demon. Moreover, as this claim to confer immortality implied the possession of it himself, the Jews justly interpreted this as virtually an arrogation of superiority over Abraham and the Prophets.

53. καὶ οἱ προφῆται, &c.] Abraham, indeed, was also a Prophet; and so he is called by Jehovah, Gen. xx. 7. But that appellation was, it should seem, merged in the, to them, more endearing term of Father; he being called Father of the faithful. Γεύσεται, for vulg. γεύσεται, rus obit, decurso lumine vitam.' Horat. Od. i. 28. 7.

The Jews only stumbled at these pretensions because they refused to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah; for they did not deny that the MESSIAH was to be far superior to all the Patriarchs, Prophets, and even angels. See Lampe.

54. In reply to the objections of the Jews, our Lord now observes, that if he claimed this honour
 for himself, upon his own testimony alone, 'it was nothing, or a vain glory like that of ambitious worldly men; but his Father had conferred it on him, and testified in various ways that it belonged to him. (Scott.) Thus showing that this glory is not sought by him, but freely given him of the Father.

truly know Him, because ye refuse to acknowledge me; the keeping of God's commandments being the only sure proof that we know Him.

56. Ἀβραὰμ ὁ πατὴρ, &c.] Our Lord now contrasts their feelings towards God with those of Abraham, of whom they so boast; and that by way of adverting to his exalted nature, and consequently infinite superiority to Abraham.

— ἡγαλλίασατο ἵνα ἴδῃ.] The version 'rejoiced' is not sufficiently significant to express the full sense of the term ἡγαλλ., which is pregnant with meaning; not to say that it involves a tautology, or at least an identical proposition in the words following. To avoid this difficulty, many, from Grotius to Abp. Newcome, take it to mean, 'earnestly desired to see.' But for such a sense no authority exists; nor, indeed, is there any necessity to adopt it. Render, 'he exceedingly rejoiced that he should see my day (i. e. the time of my appearing on earth); exulted at seeing it, namely, in anticipation.

— καὶ εἶδε καὶ ἐχάρη] 'nay, he saw it, and with delight; namely, as most recent Commentators explain, in Orcus, or the seat of the righteous dead (see Luke xvi. 23, and Notes). For, they observe, the Jews and the ancients in general, supposed departed spirits to take an interest in what concerned their posterity. And they refer to Is. xxix. 22, sq. Phil. Jud. ii. 10, and several passages from ancient writers. After all, however, the meaning may rather be (as the older Commentators interpret), that he mentally saw it—partly by the eye of faith, so strong as to be compared to sight (see Heb. xi. 13. 1 Pet. i. 10. 12), and partly by a revelation (supposed to be made to him on being commanded to offer up his son Isaac) of the advent of the future Saviour. Nor need we stumble at the second term (ἐχάρη) seeming to be the weaker one, instead of being, as we might expect, the stronger; for it may be doubted whether that does not express as much, or even more; ἀγαλλ., denoting, as Bp. Warburton, Div. Leg., observes, 'the tumultuous pleasure, which the certain expectation of an approaching good occasions; and χαίρω, that calm and settled joy, which arises from our knowledge that we are in possession of it.' On which same principle Dr. Jortin, Sermon. iv., accounts for the greater joy among the angels over a repenting sinner, than over ninety-nine just persons, &c., by the observation that 'in this greater joy there is something like human perturbation, not so much sedate happiness.'

57. πενήκοντα ἔτη, &c.] The number fifty seems to be here used, not (as Grotius supposes) from its being a round number, but because among the ancients fifty was considered as the age when any one was past his vigour, and beginning to grow old. Thus, then, it is meant, that he was still young (not even πρεσβύτης, much less γέρων); how, then, should he have seen Abraham?

58. πρὶν Ἀβραὰμ—ἐγὼ εἰμι.] Render, 'before Abraham existed, I was; the Present being here used to denote continued existence. So infra xiv. 9, we have τοσούτου χρόνου μεθ' ἡμῶν εἰμι. Add (what is especially to the purpose here) Ps. xc. 2, πρὶν τὰ ὄρη γυνηθῆναι, &c. Compare also i. 1, 2. iii. 13. vi. 46. 62. vii. 28. xvii. 5.

These words, then, showing the pre-existence of Christ long before his birth in this world, plainly set forth his supreme majesty, and, by the assumption which they involve, of the name and attribute of Jehovah, his DIVINITY. And so it is evident the Jews understood Jesus; otherwise they would not have attempted to stone him for blasphemy.

As to the interpretation of those who (not admitting the divinity of Christ) would explain this existence not of nature, but of destination, rendering, 'Before Abraham was [Abraham, the Father of many nations, in a mystical sense] I already was destined to be the Messiah,' it has been unanswerably refuted by Whitby, Lampe, Kuinoel, Tittman, and Dr. Pye Smith.

59. ἦσαν λίθους, ἵνα βάλωσιν.] That stoning was a punishment inflicted for blasphemy among the Greeks as well as the Jews, is shown by several examples adduced by Lampe.

— ἐκρύβη, &c.] In ἐκρ. we have an example of Passive for Middle in a reciprocal sense, as which see Winer's Gr. Gr. Most recent Commentators suppose an hendiadys in ἐκρύβη καὶ ἐξῆλθεν, or refer it to the rule by which, of two verbs in connexion, one is to be rendered as an adverb. It is not, however, necessary to resort to that principle here. He hid himself, it should seem, for the moment, and soon afterwards went out of the temple. We need not, with the older Commentators, suppose this concealment miraculously effected, by vanishing from the sight of the multitude. Not only is nothing said to that effect, but the words following rather discountenance such a view: see Note on Luke iv. 30. Indeed, the words διελθὼν—οὕτως have been rejected by many of the best Commentators, and are cancelled by Griesbach. But there is scarcely evidence sufficient to warrant even any strong suspicion; for they are only omitted in one MS., two or three very recent and inferior Versions, and two or three Fathers. And as the words are not at all essential to the sense of the passage, the testimony of Fathers cannot have any weight. All the most ancient Versions have it; and the Fathers adduced have it in other citations. It is moreover expressed in the metrical version of Nott.

τὸ τίς ἡμ., οὗτος, ἢ οἱ γον.] Some think that he is here a reference to the doctrine of the παρὰ γενετῆς, or pre-existence of souls; others, of μετεμψυχῶσεως, or μεταμψύχωσης, transposition of souls into other bodies, by which what he had sinned in one body might be punished in another. Others, as Lightfoot, Lampe, and Isaac, deny any such reference; maintaining that it cannot be proved that the Jews in the age of Christ held any such doctrine. But granting that the affirmative cannot be fully proved, yet he can the negative. And indeed Josephus, l. xviii. 1. 3, and Bell. ii. 8. 14. iii. 8. 3, positively affirms, that the Pharisees (whose tenets he generally received by the people, and well known, at least, if not favourably regarded by the masses) did hold the Pythagorean doctrine of μετεμψυχῶσεως. Though, it must be conceded, the Pharisees confined it to the souls of the dead alone. Moreover, the language is not that of positive belief seeking for confirmation, but of not seeking for information. And the common people may have held a metempsychosis both of good and bad souls. Be that as it may, their question as to what caused this natural blindness and on the common notion (prevalent also among the Heathen), that all dangerous diseases, previous calamities, must have been produced by the intervention of some heinous sin, which they were meant to punish. A notion likely to be held by those who lived under a dispensation which dealt much in temporal and corporeal punishment. Now, in applying this to the case of any disease which befel a person in the course of his life, it was no wonder they should feel perplexity; since it might be referred either to his own sin, or the sin of his parents; for the Jews widely held, that the sin of parents, when not atoned for by themselves, was visited upon their children in the form of disease or calamity; see Isa. xi. 28. But how to apply this to the case of any disease born with a person, occasioned no perplexity. And accordingly for a solution of this difficulty the disciples apply.

ὅτι οὗτος—αὐτοῦ.] Repeat ἵνα τυφλὸς γεννηθῇ, 'This blindness is from no sin, either in parents or in himself.'

— ἀλλ' ἵνα φανερωθῇ, &c.] At ἀλλὰ supply ἵνα ἀποδείχθῃ from ἵνα τυφλὸς γεννηθῇ. Lord did not vouchsafe to give any answer to the inquiry which seems to have been concealed in this interrogatory; but (as when asked,

Luke xiii. 23, 'Are there few that be saved?') he fixed their attention on a matter of far greater moment; namely, the truth that God permits diseases to afflict men for His own wise purposes; in this instance, for the manifestation of His own glory in the miracle worked by His Messiah; one of whose characteristic works, (see Isa. xxxv. 5) it was prophesied, would be 'giving sight to the blind.'

4. ἐγὼ δὲ ἰργάζεσθαι, &c.] Meaning, that 'such works as these must be done by him now, while there is yet time and opportunity; for the night is coming.' Thus intimating that his continuance with men would be short, and that he should not long either convince them by his miracles, or enlighten them by his doctrines. The words may also have been intended to inculcate the important lesson, that we have all a work to do, even the work of Him who sent us into the world; that we have our day, or time, to do it in; and that as that day is at the best short, and we know not how short, (as it is said by Antiphan. ap. Stob. tom. i. 96, τὸ ζῆν βίου φρουρὰ ἡφαιμέριον· τό τε μήκος τοῦ βίου ἡμέρα μία,) so it behoves us to use all diligence, lest the night that must close our day, or opportunity, should find us with our work undone.

5. ὅταν ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ᾧ.] 'as long as I am,' &c. When ὅταν denotes duration of time, it requires the verb following to be in the Subjunctive. By φῶς τοῦ κόσμου is meant one who both enlightens and blesses mankind,—light being a metaphor to denote both knowledge and happiness; see Ezra. viii. 16. Ps. xcvi. 11. cxii. 4. John i. 5. The sentiment was doubtless suggested by the case of the blind man about to be restored to sight.

6. ἔπτυσσε—τοῦ τυφλοῦ.] It has been thought strange that clay should be here used, since that would seem more likely to injure than benefit the eye. Yet such was sometimes prescribed among the ancients as a cure for certain disorders of that organ. So Serenus Samonicus, xiii. 2:5 (cited by Wetstein), 'Si tumor insolitus tippo se tollat inani, Turgentes oculos vili circumcine casso.' The spittle was used (as Euthymius and Grotius point out) simply to make the earth fit for the use in question; and the intent of the thing was to suggest the idea of collyrium, eye-salve, or ointment. So Hor. Sat. i. 3. 25, 'oculis male lippus insanatis,' and comp. Rev. iii. 18.

The action itself could, of course, contribute nothing to the cure,—but is to be considered as a symbolical one, such as the spitting in the eye, Mark viii. 23. See also vii. 33, and Note. In imitation of this the early Christians used, by a similar symbolical action, to anoint the eyes of καὶ τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ τηρῶ. * Ἀβραάμ ὁ πατὴρ ἡγαλλίασάτο ἵνα ἴδῃ τὴν ἡμέραν τὴν ἐμὴν καὶ ἐχάρῃ. truly know Him, because ye refuse to acknowledge me: the keeping of God's commandments being the only sure proof that we know Him.

56. Ἀβραάμ ὁ πατὴρ, &c.] Our Lord now contrasts their feelings towards God with those of Abraham, of whom they so boast; and that by way of adverting to his exalted nature, and consequently infinite superiority to Abraham.

— ἡγαλλίασάτο ἵνα ἴδῃ.] The version 'rejoiced' is not sufficiently significant to express the full sense of the term ἡγαλλ., which is pregnant with meaning; not to say that it involves a tautology, or at least an identical proposition in the words following. To avoid this difficulty, many, from Grotius to Abp. Newcome, take it to mean, 'earnestly desired to see.' But for such a sense no authority exists; nor, indeed, is there any necessity to adopt it. Render, 'he exceedingly rejoiced that he should see my day (i. e. the time of my appearing on earth); exulted at seeing it, namely, in anticipation.

— καὶ εἶδε καὶ ἐχάρῃ] 'nay, he saw it, and with delight;' namely, as most recent Commentators explain, in Orca, or the seat of the righteous dead (see Luke xvi. 23, and Notes). For, they observe, the Jews and the ancients in general, supposed departed spirits to take an interest in what concerned their posterity. And they refer to la. xxix. 22, sq. Phil. Jud. ii. 10, and several passages from ancient writers. After all, however, the meaning may rather be (as the older Commentators interpret), that he mentally saw it — partly by the eye of faith, so strong as to be compared to sight (see Heb. xi. 13. 1 Pet. i. 10. 12), and partly by a revelation (supposed to be made to him on being commanded to offer up his son Isaac) of the advent of the future Saviour. Nor need we stumble at the second term (ἐχάρῃ) seeming to be the weaker one, instead of being, as we might expect, the stronger; for it may be doubted whether that does not express as much, or even more; ἀγαλλ. denoting, as Bp. Warburton, Div. Leg., observes, 'the tumultuous pleasure, which the certain expectation of an approaching good occasions; and χαίρειν, that calm and settled joy, which arises from our knowledge that we are in possession of it.' On which same principle Dr. Jortin, Sermon. iv., accounts for the greater joy among the angels over a repenting sinner, than over ninety-nine just persons, &c., by the observation that 'in this greater joy there is something like human perturbation, not so much sedate happiness.'

57. πενήκοντα ἐτη, &c.] The number fifty seems to be here used, not (as Grotius supposes) from its being a round number, but because among the ancients fifty was considered as the age when any one was past his vigour, and beginning to grow old. Thus, then, it is meant, that he was still young (not even πρὸς γέρον); how, then, should Abraham?

58. πρὶν Ἀβραάμ—ἐγὼ εἰμι.] fore Abraham existed, I was; the here used to denote continued existence xiv. 9, we have τοσούτων χρόνῳ εἰμι. Add (what is especially to be here) Ps. xc. 2, πρὶν τὰ ὄρη γῆσιν. Compare also i. 1, 2. iii. 13. vi. 4 xvii. 5.

These words, then, showing the of Christ long before his birth & plainly set forth his supreme majesty assumption which they involve, of attribute of Jehovah, his DIVINITY, evident the Jews understood Jesus; would not have attempted to blasphemy.

As to the interpretation of the admitting the divinity of Christ) & this existence not of nature, but of rendering, 'Before Abraham was (i. Father of many nations, in a way already was destined to be the He been unanswerably refuted by Wh Kuinoel, Tittman, and Dr. P. E. S. 59. ἵνα λίθους, ἵνα βάλῳσιν.] was a punishment inflicted for blaspheming the Greeks as well as the Jews, is also examples adduced by Lampe.

— ἐκρῦβη, &c.] In ἐκρ. we have of Passive for Middle in a reciprocal which see Winer's Gr. Gr. Most commentators suppose an hendiadys in ἐξῆλθεν, or refer it to the rule by v verbs in connexion, one is to be v adverb. It is not, however, necessary to that principle here. He hid himself, for the moment, and soon came out of the temple. We need not, if Commentators, suppose this concealment effected, by vanishing from the multitude. Not only is nothing said; but the words following rather of such a view: see Note on Luke 8. the words διελθὼν—οὕτως have by many of the best Commentators called by Griesbach. But there is sufficient to warrant even for they are only omitted three very recent and or three Fathers.

the catechumens with clay. See Bingham's Eccl. Ant. x. 2. 14. Finally, by thus introducing what the Rabbins accounted servile work (namely, making clay) in effecting the miracle, our Lord may have intended to encounter the false notion of the Pharisees, that it was unlawful to do good on the Sabbath-day.

7. νίψαι] 'wash thyself,' probably the eyes only; for νίπασθαι denotes to wash a part only of the body, while λούειν means to wash or bathe the whole body. This distinction is strongly marked infra xiii. 10, where λελουμένος is used of him whose whole body is washed, and νιψασθαι is joined with τοὺς πόδας. (Markl. and Campbell.) Cotovicus, Itiner. Hieros. p. 292, attests that the fountain of Siloam is much revered by both Christians and Turks, who use the water to wash the eyes in certain disorders of that organ. On κολυμβήθρα see Note supra v. 2. This order (like that of Elijah to Naaman, 2 Kings v. 10, to wash seven times in Jordan) was doubtless given to try his faith.

The words ὃ ἐρμηνεύεται, ἀπεσταλμένος are by Wassenburgh and Kuinoel considered as a gloss. But there is every reason to think that they are genuine; for such etymological interpretations of names were then very usual; as might be shown by many examples, both from the Scriptural and the Classical writers, especially Thucydides; though such passages have usually proved traps into which ignorant or unwary Critics have fallen.

8. τυφλός.] The reading is here uncertain; several ancient MSS. and Versions, and some Fathers having προσαίτης; this is preferred by most Critics, and received by almost every Editor from Griesbach to Scholz; but, I conceive, on insufficient grounds. Whichever be the true reading, one must be an intentional alteration; for neither could be a gloss on the other. Now it seems more probable that τυφλ. should be altered into προσαίτης, than προσ. into τυφλ. And I suspect that the former alteration was made by those who took the ὅτι for a causative conjunction. Thus it is in the Versions rendered quia or quod. And if that were the right interpretation, the sense would rather require προσαίτης than τυφλός. But thus ol Σιωπ. αὐ. τὸ πρ. would yield a feeble sense; and ὁρῶντες would be required, not θεωροῦντες. In short, there can be little doubt but that ignorance, or inattention to the Hellenism in ol θεωροῦντες αὐτὸν ὅτι ἦν for ol Σιωπ. ὅτι αὐτὸς ἦν, led to the mistake and alteration in question. And surely τυφλ. is far more suitable in sense than προσαίτης; since the man's blindness, as connected with this miracle, would be far more obvious to public observation than his mediocrity. The full sense is: 'And those who had seen, ascertained, and known him to be blind.' This is mentioned in order to place in a strong point of view the evidence which existed for the miracle, and to show that deception or collusion was impossible. The Evangelist might, indeed, have written τυφλός καὶ προσαίτης, which is actually found in a few MSS. and Latin Versions; but it was not necessary; for the latter circumstance comes out in the subsequent narration. The Critics who formed the text of those MSS. were, I suspect, induced to concoct the reading τυφλός καὶ προσαίτης, because πτωχὸς τυφλός was a common phrase in Greek as caecus regalis in Latin; the blind being almost always beggar.

11, 12. The simple statement of the fact here, without any observations on it, is worthy of notice. (Scott.) See also Doddridge.

11. ἀνέβλεψα] 'I received my sight;' Luke xv. 18. The term may, indeed, seem rather to denote the recovery of sight. But it admits of the present sense; since ἀνέ is often used for ἀνω, upward, and consequently may mean to look up; the peculiar faculty of the human mind, 'quibus os sublime dedit;' scil. Deus.

13. τοὺς Φαρ.] Meaning the Sanhedrin, the far greater part of whom were Pharisees. That these were the rulers, is plain from v. 23 & 24.

οὐ Φαρισαῖοι πῶς ἀνέβλεψεν. Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· obvious reasons may be adduced in favour

 is the Article; but a prophet, θεῖος ἀνθρ., as Euthymius explains. It is plain from

 v. 31, 36, that the man considered Jesus only as a prophet, or rather, a man of God, Θεοσεβής;
 certainly not as the Son of God.

18. Ἰουδαῖοι] i. e. the Φαρισαῖοι before mentioned. Ἐφώνησαν, 'had summoned,' καὶ ἥρατ.,
 'and had asked.'

19. οὗτός ἐστιν—ἐγεννήθη:] Lampe, Markl., Kuinoel, and Tittman think that two questions are here blended into one, i. e. 'Is this your son?
 Do ye say he was born blind?' Such would, indeed, be the more regular manner of expression;
 but the present is the more simple, natural, and characteristic of the persons; for, in their haste to proceed from interrogation to imputation of fraud, they blurt out the latter (which is implied in λέγεις), together with the former. In their answer, the parents pass over the imputation, and consider the words as comprehending two questions, to which they reply.

21. ἡλικίαν ἔχει.] Meaning, 'He is of an age sufficient to enable him to give testimony. He is come to years of discretion.' Of this idiom examples have been adduced from Xen. and Isaus.

22. συνετίθειντο] 'de communi consilio decre-verunt,' as in Acts xxiii. 20. On this use of the Pluperf. Pass. in the Deponent sense, the reader is referred to Buttm. Gr. p. 234. and Win. Gr.
 Gr. Ὁμολογήσῃ Χριστόν. Sub. ἵσται.

—ἀποσυνάγωγος γίνεσθαι] 'should be excommunicated.' There were three sorts of excommunication (see Horne's Introd.), the second of which is supposed to be here meant.

nify,—what it might seem to import,—‘ Give the praise of thy cure to God [and not to this man]’. For the absence of the Article will scarcely permit such a sense; and what is more, the words are a form of expression, often employed in the Old Test., to seriously adonish any one to speak the truth (see Josh. vii. 18, 19. 1 Sam. vi. 5. Jer. xii. 16): ‘a lie being (as Lampe observes) a denial of the omniscience, holiness, truth, and justice of God. Consequently he who wilfully conceals the truth, or declares a falsehood, insults all those attributes of the Deity.’ Thus the form was used when a confession of crime was to be wrung from any one. The sense, then, is: ‘Confess the truth: hast thou been really blind from thy birth, and been healed by this man?’ They hoped thus to detect some fraud or collusion; but being disappointed, they resolved to excommunicate the man immediately.

25. εἰ ἀμαρτωλὸς—οἶδα.] The Commentators are not agreed as to the scope and character of these words, in which some recognise disimulation, others irony; neither of which views seems well founded. It is better (with Brug., Camer., Grot., and Whitby) to take these words to mean, that ‘he has no knowledge of what they allege;’ q. d. ‘That Jesus is a sinner, I know not;’ εἰ being put for ὅτι. But as the authority for this signification of εἰ is precarious, we must retain the usual sense whether, and take οὐκ οἶδα in a popular sense to denote, ‘I give no opinion: I have nothing to do with that.’ This view is confirmed by the words following, ἐν οἶδα, which do not imply knowledge of nothing besides, but of one thing especially. So Aristoph. Av. 1176, τίς τῶν θεῶν; Αἰ. οὐκ ἴσμεν ὅτι δ’ εἴχε πατέρα, τοῦτ’ ἴσμεν. Arist. Pax, 227, οὐκ οἶδα πλὴν ἐν, ὅτι (which words are also an answer to a question). Eurip. El. 752, οὐκ οἶδα, πλὴν ἐν—φόνιον οἰμωγῇ κλύω. Soph. (Ed. Col. 1161, τί προσχρῆζοντα τῷ βασιλεῖ; Οὐκ οἶδα, πλὴν ἐν, σου γὰρ κ. τ. λ. Eurip. Iph. Taur. ποδοπαῖ; Ἑλληνες, ἐν τοῦτ’ οἶδα, κοῦ παραιτήσομαι.

26, 27. The Sanhedrim now repeat the same question before proposed. A crafty device, by which they hoped to detect some discrepancy in his testimony, which might stamp falsehood on the whole; or they hoped that some additional circumstances would transpire, from which they might plausibly reason that the blindness was not real,—or, at least, not from his birth. The man, however, now perceives their aim; and, no longer able to suppress his indignation, impatiently exclaims, εἶπον, &c.

27. οὐκ ἠκούσατε] ‘attended not to what I said.’ The next words are ironical.

28. ἐλοιδόρησαν καὶ εἶπον] put for ἐλεεινώντες; for they thought it abuse enough to call him the disciple of an impostor.

29. οὐκ οἶδα—ἴστίην.] A popular expression, importing, ‘We know not his Divine mission, whether his doctrine and miracles proceed from Divine origin, or demoniacal agency.’ (See vii. 27, Note.)

30. ἐν τούτῳ] scil. μέλει, ‘in this circumstance.’ Γὰρ has here, like the Heb. 2, the sense of and. Ὑμεῖς is emphatical. Καὶ, ‘and yet.’ The sense is: ‘This truly is strange, that you, who pretend to distinguish true from false prophets, should not be able to discern with what power he comes who gives sight to those born blind.’

31. οἶδαμεν] ‘it is well known.’ The following is a sentiment frequent in Scripture (m. Pl. lxvi. 18. Is. i. 15.), and also found in Rom. ii. a. 218, “Ὅσκα θεοῖς ἐπιτιμῶνται, μὴ εἴ[?] conjecture γ’] ἔκλυον αὐτοῦ. This and that is the next clause are intended to be especially applied to the case of false prophets making ostentation from God.

32. ἐκ τοῦ αἰῶνος] ‘from the beginning of the world.’ See Note on Luke i. 70. Τε, scil. ὁ θεὸς, any mere man. Though communication of sight, in some cases, to those born blind, has of late been effected by the improvements of modern surgical art, yet that does not affect the present case; for the operation in question demands the intervention of the most consummate skill and labour, and it would be equally a miracle to restore such persons to sight without those means.

34. ἐν ἁμαρτίαις σὺ ἐγεννήθης ὅλος! This may, as some think, be said on the same principle which prompted the question of the disciples, v. 2. Though it should rather seem to be, as the best Commentators, ancient and modern, regard it, as hyperbolical phrase, equivalent to scilicet peccatus. Perhaps it is a blending of two phrases, ὅλος ἁμαρτωλὸς εἷς, and ἐν ἁμαρτίαις ἐγεννήθης, formed on Ps. li. 5, which would form the most opprobrious speech that can well be imagined.

— ἐξέβαλον αὐτὸν ἔξω. The Commentators are not agreed whether this means 'thrust him out of the council-chamber,' or 'excommunicated him.' The expression must signify the former; but the latter may be implied; the turning him out being a kind of symbolical action.

35. πιστεύεις—Θεοῦ. Almost all Commentators regard these words as only importing, 'Dost thou believe in the coming of the Messiah?' as all pious Jews did. But the mode of address seems to be directed to the state of the man's mind; who, though at the time the miracle was worked upon him, and even when brought before the Sanhedrim, seems to have regarded Jesus as only a prophet; yet, on reflection, and consideration of the wonderful works Jesus had done, began to think that he must be more than a prophet, and to wish to be his disciple. Indeed his answer seems to comprehend two things: 1st, 'Yea, Sir, I have that belief;' and 2dly, 'Canst thou tell me where, or who, that personage is, that I may believe in him, and commit myself to his teaching?' The words seem to express a sort of expectation that the extraordinary person whom he was addressing, could tell him who and where the Messiah was, or perhaps might himself be that personage. In this view, the words of his answer may be regarded as a delicate way of saying, 'Art thou that personage? dost thou sustain that character?'

36. καὶ. This I have, with Griesbach, Matthæi, Vater, and Scholz, introduced into the text, on the authority of many of the best MSS., Versions, Fathers, and early Editions. The omission of which other instances occur infra xiv. 22) appears to have arisen from the verse just below.

37. These words were spoken for the sake of the by-standers, since the very act of worshipping would be likely to draw a crowd of persons about them.

— εἰς κρίμα, &c. Some understand κρίμα here in the sense of condemnation; while others pronounce that of judgment and declaration; i. e. 'for the purpose of judging [concerning men],

showing their condition and pointing out their duties.' Yet that, besides being a sense not well established, deprives the words of the joint and significance, which, from what follows, it is evident they were intended to convey. Far more probable in itself, and agreeable to the proper signification of the word, is the sense assigned by Chrysostom and Euthymius, and adopted by some eminent modern Commentators, who take εἰς κρίμα as put for εἰς διάκρισιν καὶ διαχωρισμὸν, for distinction and separation (and consequently discrimination), i. e. 'that men's real characters may be put to the proof as to their use or abuse of their opportunities.' So it is elsewhere said of Christ (Luke ii. 35), that he 'came for the falling and rising up of many in Israel, that the thoughts of many hearts might be revealed.' This sense, indeed, is quite agreeable to the primitive signification of κρίνειν, which is to winnow, and, in a general way, to separate, divide, as an army into ranks. So Xenoph. Mem. iii. 1. 9, κρίναι τοὺς ἀγαθοὺς καὶ τοὺς κακοὺς. See also Hom. Il. β. 362. We may, however, retain the usual sense judgment, meaning condemnation; such as that spoken of supra iii. 18, that 'he who believeth not, is condemned already.' An idea, indeed, which seems contained both in the text and the context. For what but this is it that is implied in the words just after, 'If ye were blind (meaning, in any other sense but wilfully blind), ye would have no sin; but ye say, We see: therefore your sin remaineth;' evidently meaning, that thus they are condemned, and that out of their own mouth. So it is said, iii. 19, 'This is the judgment (αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ κρίσις), that light is come into the world, and men have loved darkness rather than light.'

In the next words the ἵνα is not causal, but eventual, or rather consequential. The general meaning being, 'Thus while I make some to see (as this man whose eyes I have opened), others I am the means of making blind (comp. 2 Cor. ii. 16); i. e. the effect or consequence of his coming into the world will be, that those who are blind, through simple ignorance, will see (namely, by the light of the Gospel, and the illumination of the Holy Spirit); and those who have the use of sight (i. e. have knowledge), but are blinded by passion and prejudice, will not see what is before their eyes, but be left judicially to their own blindness. By the οἱ βλέποντες are meant the οἱ δοκῶντες βλέπειν, those who were thought to have, and thought they had, a knowledge of God's word; inasmuch that οἱ βλέποντες, 'those who see,' was an unusual appellation given by the Jews to their more eminent Doctors of the law.

41. εἰ τυφλοὶ ἦτε.] Our Lord hints that they labour under a more incurable blindness than those whom they despised. The full sense is, 'If ye were [simply] ignorant, your unbelief might be excusable; but, since ye profess to be wise, your unbelief remains [inexcusable].' They had every advantage of coming at the truth, and recognising Jesus as the Messiah; but they resisted conviction, were wilfully blind, and therefore their sin of unbelief could not but rest upon them unexpiated, and sink them in perdition; comp. viii. 24. Ἀμαρτίαν ἔχειν is a phrase signifying to be guilty of any crime, and be liable to punishment for it. It is not a mere Hellenistic idiom, since I find it in Plato iv. p. 70. Bip. ὁ μὴ ἔχων κακίαν, καὶ ὁ ἔχων ἀδικίαν.

X. 1. seqq. Some Commentators and Harmonists think that the discourse in vv. 1—22 was delivered at another time, and after an interval of two months. But it is so closely connected in subject with the preceding, that it must have followed after it; otherwise, indeed, the parable would be very abruptly brought in; whereas, taken in connexion with the foregoing, it is very apposite. See Scott. Moreover, the introductory ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν is never used at the beginning of a discourse, but is employed to introduce some further remark or admonition; see John v. 24, 25. vi. 26. 32. viii. 34, &c. And the Evangelist seldom commences any new narrative without some kind of preface, however brief. Besides, ver. 21 may be supposed to have reference to the blind man. And, indeed, the imputation lately cast upon our Lord, ix. 24, of being an impostor, would induce him to take the first opportunity of retorting the charge on his calumniators, and showing that he sought nothing but the benefit of the people; that he was the true Shepherd, the Messiah; and that they who called themselves the shepherds of the people, and excommunicated those who acknowledged the Messiah, were the false teachers and impostors: that he himself, so far from seeking, as an impostor would, his own interest, sought nothing but the benefit of the people, and would lay down his life for them. In illustration our Lord borrows an image from pastoral life. He shows that those teachers alone were worthy of the name of shepherds, who, having learnt of Him, should preach his doctrine. In this, and other of his discourses recorded by St. John, our Lord was pleased to employ expressions highly figurative, in order to show the nature of his person and office. Why he was pleased to do this, will appear from what is said in the Note on Parabolical instruction at Matt. xiii. 3. Here it will be proper to be more than usually attentive to the precaution there suggested, as to the application of Parables; namely, not to press too much on particular terms or circumstances, such being but ornamental, and forming, as it were, the drapery to the figure in the pictures. Thus here by the sheepfold is evidently meant Christ's kingdom on earth; by the door, Christ himself; and by the thieves and robbers, the chief priests and Pharisees. Respecting the other terms the correspondence is either very slight, or does not exist at all.

But to advert to the scope of the present portion, vv. 1—21, most of the ancient and earlier modern Commentators supposed the subject of it to be the entering upon ecclesiastical offices without being authorized by a commission from those who have such commission regularly transmitted down from the Apostles, and derived consequently from Christ himself. But that such a sense can be deduced from the present passage, neither the nature of the context, nor the import of the words will, I think, permit us to suppose. The purpose here in view is undoubtedly (according to the opinion of the most eminent of the more recent Commentators) that which has been above detailed. It therefore has reference not to teachers, but to Christians in general.

1. αὐλῆν.] The word means an open house, formed by hurdles and wickerwork. By αὐλῆ τῶν προβάτων is here designated the Jewish people, the Church of God and Christ, who needed the food of spiritual instruction; see Ezek. xxxiv. 11. Jerem. xxiii. 4, sq. To enter in by the door was a proverbial expression, to denote making a regular ingress. So Arrian in Epict. ii. 11, ἀπὸ φιλοσοφίας, παρὰ γὰρ τοῖς ὡς δεῖ, καὶ κατὰ τὴν θύραν, ἀπτομῶναι αὐτῆς, συναλεῖσθαι τῇ αὐτοῦ δόξαι. Christ is called the door, since by him ('the way, the truth, and the life') we have 'an entrance ministered unto us into the everlasting kingdom' (2 Pet. i. 11). Κλέπτης καὶ ληστής properly differ, as our thief (or pilferer) and robber (or highwayman), the one referring to private stealing, the other to public and violent robbery. Here, however, they have little or no difference, but, being united, exert a force greater than either would bear separately.

3. ὁ θυρωρὸς] i. e. one of the under-shepherds in attendance at the door of the αὐλή. To properly understand this, we must bear in mind that the Jewish sheepfolds were strong, substanbuildings, guarded and secured, both within and without, surrounded by a wall to prevent invasion, except by the regular entrance, and closed with a door, kept by a porter, and fortified by bars and bolts; see Mr. Greswell, Parab. — τῆς φωνῆς αὐ. ἀκούει) i. e. attend to, obey orders. Φωνή denotes either those inarticulate sounds, as whistling, &c., or certain words, as were addressed to the animals, on which Aristot. Hist. An. vi. 19. The calling them their names is illustrated by what Wolf and Estlin adduce, who prove that anciently names were given not only to horses, oxen, dogs, &c., also to goats and sheep; see Hartley's Journal, where he says he tried it in Greece, and found the custom still to exist. Finally, the fact of sheep recognizing the shepherd's voice is corroborated by Eastern travellers and writers; and Polybius states that, in the island of Cyprus, off the Ionian coast, the surface of the country being strewed with woods, and very rocky, the flocks were taught to obey and attend their keepers by sound of a horn.

ἐκβάλῃ) 'putteth forth'; for force is not meant to be implied. So ἐξάγειν and ἐκβάλλειν are differently used by the LXX. to express the same Hebrew word.

ἐμπροσθεν αὐτῶν πορεύεται.) Contrary to the custom which prevails in the West, the Eastern shepherds precede their flocks, and lead them by peculiar sounds of the voice; see Pa. E. 2. lxxvii. 20. lxxx. 1. The custom (not yet introduced by the Moors) still continues in Spain. Yet how ancient was the practice, at least in the West, for the sheep to go before, and the shepherd follow, may be inferred from the suggestion by the Greek word πρόβατον. All this is here meant by ἐμπρ. αὐ. πορ. is leading, herding, and taking care of them. Comp. Pa. xxiii. 1. μὴ ἀκολουθήσωσιν. Several of the most ancient MSS. and Fathers have ἀκολουθήσουσιν, but only an alteration for adaptation to the next verse; yet unnecessary; the sense being, 'but a stranger they would by no means follow,' namely, those who were to lead them.

παροιμίαν) for παραβολήν; for though the Jews are distinguished in the Classical writers, they were confounded by the Hellenists.

In this and the following passage we have a mere repetition, but an explanation or application of the foregoing (Kuinoel and Tittman). That by way of intimating the purport of the parable. Greswell, however, considers it as only a continuation and an enlargement of the same topic, though with this difference, that the former is allegory throughout, the latter is not. Indeed amidst a profusion of figurative images Christ has distinctly appropriated to their true sense only the personal character of the shepherd and owner of the flock, and the personal character of those opposed to him, whether as robbers or hired attendants on the sheep.

Θύρα, like the Heb. רֶמֶז, denotes not only door, but access; also, as here, the medium thereof, he who gives it. To which purpose Wetstein appositely cites a passage of Ignat. ad Philadelph. § 9. αὐτοὶ οὖν θύρα τοῦ Πατρὸς, δι' ἧς εἰσέρχονται Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Ἰσαὰκ καὶ Ἰακώβ καὶ οἱ προφῆται, see Eph. ii. 18. Taken in conjunction with what precedes, the primary import of the words must be, that Christ is the only way through which mankind can obtain salvation (see ver. 9. xiv. 6); though it may include, in an under sense, that as a man must observe and pass through the door, in order to his making a regular and unsuspected entrance into a sheep-fold, so any one must maintain a proper regard to Christ, in order to his being a true teacher in the Church, and must pass, as it were, through him, or by his authority, into his office.

8. πρὸ ἐμοῦ.) These words, which have perplexed Interpreters of every age, are not found in very many MSS., Versions, Fathers, and early Editions, and are rejected by Grotius and Campbell, and cancelled by Matthæi; but wrongly; for it is one of the most certain of Critical canons that an omission of words, which have occasioned perplexity to Commentators, is always to be regarded as suspicious. And there are reasons which make this Canon stronger in the Scriptures than in the Classical writers. The omission might here be purposely made, to save the honour of Moses and the Prophets, especially as the Manichæans denied their Divine legation. Internal evidence, therefore, is so strong in favour of these words, as to balance even a superiority of external, which, however, does not exist. Besides, the words are almost necessary to make any tolerable sense. They must, then, be regarded as genuine. And the only question is, what is their true import? Many ancient and modern Commentators take πρὸ for ante, and suppose an ellipsis of ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ Πατρὸς μου; understanding it of fulan Christ, as Theudas, and Judas of Galilee. A view also maintained by those who take πρὸ in the usual sense before. Of these two interpretations, however, the former supposes a sense by no means authorized by use, and introduces an inadmissible ellipsis; nay, involves an anachronism; for, as the best Expositors

phatic mode of expression (occurring also in 1 John i. 8, 1 Macc. vii. 18, and often in the Rabbinical writers) importing that there is no principle of truth in him.

— ὅταν λαλῇ τὸ ψεῦδος, &c.] The sense of these words mainly depends upon that assigned to the αὐτοῦ; which some ancient and a few modern Translators render, according to the more usual signification of the word, ipsius, his. Yet this produces so odd a sense, ('for he is a liar, and so is his father,') that almost all Expositors of any eminence, from Erasmus to Tittman, take αὐτοῦ as a neuter, rendering it ejus, it; and they refer it either to the remote antecedent ψεῦδος, or consider that word as inherent in the verbal ψεύστης. As, however, this would seem to involve a pleonasm in the article, Bp. Middleton, after affirming that the article is never pleonastic, ventures to pronounce that 'all the great scholars who have espoused the common version were in error.' And, as might be expected, he adopts the masculine sense of αὐτοῦ. But, in order to avoid the insuperable objection arising from the strange sense thus produced, he changes the subject in αὐτοῦ, rendering, not 'the Devil,' but his son, the Liar. This he does by supposing the person at λαλεῖ to be not Διάβολος, but τις understood. And he renders, 'when any of you speak that which is false, he speaks after the manner of his kindred; for he is a liar, and so also is his father.' But to this it is, with reason, objected by Professor Scholefield, that, after describing the man as a liar, it was superfluous to add, 'for he is a liar.' There is also a still more formidable objection; for (not to mention that such a sense as 'after the manner of his kindred' is very harsh and improbable) this changing the subject ad libitum, and supplying a nominative, τις at λαλῇ, is surely too arbitrary a method to be justified. The ellipsis in question is, indeed, frequent in the Classical writers; but it is almost confined to the Attic ones, being very rarely found in the Alexandrian writers, or those of later times, and never in the New Test. or the Sept. Upon the whole, there is no reason to depart from the common rendering; for though it may seem to involve something uncouth and obscure, yet that is no more than may occasionally be observed in all ancient writers. Moreover, the sense thus arising is both apposite and natural, and such as suggests matter for serious reflection. And, after all, there is here little that can be called irregular. This use of αὐτοῦ in the neuter, though rare, is not unexampled, being found at Eph. ii. 10, ὡς ἐν αὐτοῖς περιπατεῖ, for neither is αὐτοῖς confined to the masculine, but, like the Genit. here, is sometimes a neuter. Nor is the use of the Article here to be called anomalous. It might, indeed, have been dispensed with; but it is not without its force, as suggesting the sense, 'and the originator of it by the deception of our first parents,' Gen. iii. 5. So in Sophocl. Œd. Tyr. 868, Jupiter is called πατὴρ νόμων, and Plato, Menex. C. 10, has πατέρας τῆς λευτερίας, 'authors or originators of the truth.' Instances, too, are

Finally, the above method of exposition is supported by the suffrage of the earliest antiquity; being adopted by the Pesch. Syriac Translator in the middle of the second century, who renders by ܣܕܐ with the feminine affix, which therefore cannot be referred to the Devil, and must belong to the preceding feminine noun ܠܥܕܐ, a fi! Τὸ ψεῦδος should be rendered so as to express the force of the Article, 'what is false.' And so also at Eph. iv. 25. 2 Thess. ii. 11. Rom. i. 23. The very phrase λαλεῖν τὸ ψεῦδος occurs at Ps. v. 6.

These words, then, are meant to show how it is, that nought but falsehood comes from him;—namely, that is natural to him; ἐκ τῶν ἰδίων being (as the Pesch. Syr. Translator also takes it) for ἐκ τοῦ ἰδίου, and that for ἐξ ἰδιώματος, 'from natural disposition;' probably a popular form of expression, since it is not found in the Classical writers. Remarkably similar to what is here said of the Devil, is what Porphyry de Abst. ii. § 42. says of demons, τὸ ψεῦδος (lying) τοῖς αὐτοῖς οἰκτιῶν.

45. Hoc ἔγωγ is, as often, emphatic, and the δε is antithetic, with reference to ὑμεῖς at v. 44; v. 44. being hypo-parenthetical and illustrative. Render: 'But as for me, it is because I speak the truth, that ye believe not what I say.' Inasmuch that, as Christ declares on a similar occasion (v. 43.), 'if another should come in his own name only (without that Divine authority which he possesses), him they would receive.' Then, then, it is meant that they can no more believe the truth, than the Devil can speak it; both scilicet being respectively contrary to their nature.

46. τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν—ἁμαρτίας.] The scope of this address is to convince them of the credibility of what he asserts, by another and a popular kind of argument, in which he traces unbelief to its true source. In τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν the interrogation, as Calvin remarks, has the force of confident appeal.

Ἀμαρτία is here by the best Commentators rightly taken to mean, not sin, according to the common acceptance of the word, but error or falsehood in doctrine, as opposed to the truth spoken of in the next clause. Of this signification the following examples will suffice. Eccl. Agam. 489, φρονέων ἁμαρτία. Thucyd. i. 8, δόξην ἁμαρτία, and 78, ἐν ἁμαρτία ὄντα. Ἐλέγχει; must be rendered, not 'convicts,' but convicts; as supra v. 9. And so in a similar passage of Aristoph. Plut. 574, we have καὶ αὐτὸν ἐλέγχει μὲν ὅτι δύνανται περὶ τούτων.

Our Lord appeals to his hearers whether they can make out any such charge against him, of error or falsehood in doctrine, as to warrant disregard of his pretensions; which may remind us of a similar appeal of Moses to the Israelites, Num.

Now such an appeal of course involves the use of a strong negation. Thus, in the words following, the hearers are supposed to have answered, ‘no!’ The inference is manifest. In v. 47. the point is followed up thus: ‘If ye were really, honest, sons of God, ye would hearken to the word of God [from me, whom He hath sent]. Every reason why ye hearken not to them is, ye are not of God;’ i. e. sons of God. See Matt. iii. 10. iv. 4. 6. v. 18, 19.

Not being able to answer these arguments, the Jews are fain to have recourse to reviling.

Σαμαρεῖτης—ἔχεις; Of these two expressions the latter has been explained at vii. 20. The first appears from the Rabbinical writers to have been a term of bitter reproach, equivalent to saying any one a heathen or a heretic; and the persons were accounted both, as well in doctrine as in practice. See Horne’s Introd. vol. iii. 371.

Here our Lord, with mild dignity, rebuts the insulting charge. Τιμᾶν τὸν Πατέρα denotes respecting, the executing his Father’s injunctions, obeying his message and doctrine. Comp. xvii. 14. This honour to God, he argues, would not be paid by one under the influence of the Devil. ἐγὼ δὲ οὐ ζητῶ, &c.] The full sense is: never, it is not my part to vindicate myself [nor need I]; there is a Being who will judge it, and hold judgment on men as to the deception of me.

Ἐάν τις τὸν λόγον, &c.] Here our Lord fully adverts to the happy lot of those who are the covenant of grace, and observe its requirements; i. e. that they shall never experience death, like ἰδέν θάνατον at Luko ii. 26, signifying to experience death; i. e. death spiritual eternal, ‘the second death’ spoken of in Rev. ii. 11. and in St. Paul’s Epistles. Yet, though it has proved that the phrase as well as the doctrine is unknown to the Jews, the hearers misheard or pervert our Lord’s words, and VOL. I.

endeavour thereby to fasten on him the charge of being possessed with a demon. Moreover, as this claim to confer immortality implied the possession of it himself, the Jews justly interpreted this as virtually an arrogation of superiority over Abraham and the Prophets.

53. καὶ οἱ προφῆται, &c.] Abraham, indeed, was also a Prophet; and so he is called by Jehovah, Gen. xx. 7. But that appellation was, it should seem, merged in the, to them, more endearing term of Father; he being called Father of the faithful. Γεύσεται, for vulg. γύσεται, Griesb., Matth., and Scholz.

—ἀπέθανον] q. d. ‘Even the most eminent and most faithful servants of God were not exempt from death.’ Comp. Hom. II. φ. 107 (cited by Wets.), κάτθανε καὶ Πάτροκλος, ὑπερσίο πολυλόν ἀμείνων. So also Lucret. iii. 1055, ‘Ipse Epicurus obit, decurso lumine vita.’ Horat. Od. i. 28. 7.

The Jews only stumbled at these pretensions because they refused to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah; for they did not deny that the MESSIAH was to be far superior to all the Patriarchs, Prophets, and even angels. See Lampe.

54. In reply to the objections of the Jews, our Lord now observes, that if he claimed this honour for himself, upon his own testimony alone, ‘it was nothing,’ or a vain glory like that of ambitious worldly men; but his Father had conferred it on him, and testified in various ways that it belonged to him. (Scott.) Thus showing that this glory is not sought by him, but freely given him of the Father.

—ἐάν ἐγὼ δοξάζω ἑαυτὸν.] ‘If I take glory or honour to myself,’ equivalent to ζητῶ τὴν δόξαν μου, supra v. 50.

—ὅτι Θεὸς ὑμῶν ἐστι] for Θεὸν ὑμῶν εἶπαι, i. e. ‘whose worshippers ye profess to be:’ examples of which idiom are adduced by Raphael and Kypke.

truly know Him, because ye refuse to acknowledge me; the keeping of God's commandments being the only sure proof that we know Him.

56. Ἀβραὰμ ὁ πατὴρ, &c.] Our Lord now contrasts their feelings towards God with those of Abraham, of whom they so boast; and that by way of adverting to his exalted nature, and consequently infinite superiority to Abraham.

— ἡγαλλίασατο ἵνα ἴδῃ.] The version 'rejoiced' is not sufficiently significant to express the full sense of the term ἡγαλλ., which is pregnant with meaning; not to say that it involves a tautology, or at least an identical proposition in the words following. To avoid this difficulty, many, from Grotius to Abp. Newcome, take it to mean, 'earnestly desired to see.' But for such a sense no authority exists; nor, indeed, is there any necessity to adopt it. Render, 'he exceedingly rejoiced that he should see my day (i. e. the time of my appearing on earth); exulted at seeing it,' namely, in anticipation.

— καὶ εἶδε καὶ ἐχάρη] 'nay, he saw it, and with delight;' namely, as most recent Commentators explain, in Orcus, or the seat of the righteous dead (see Luke xvi. 23, and Notes). For, they observe, the Jews and the ancients in general, supposed departed spirits to take an interest in what concerned their posterity. And they refer to Is. xxix. 22, sq. Phil. Jud. ii. 10, and several passages from ancient writers. After all, however, the meaning may rather be (as the older Commentators interpret), that he mentally saw it—partly by the eye of faith, so strong as to be compared to sight (see Heb. xi. 13. 1 Pet. i. 10. 12), and partly by a revelation (supposed to be made to him on being commanded to offer up his son Isaac) of the advent of the future Saviour. Nor need we stumble at the second term (ἐχάρη) seeming to be the weaker one, instead of being, as we might expect, the stronger; for it may be doubted whether that does not express as much, or even more; ἀγαλλ. denoting, as Bp. Warburton, Div. Leg., observes, 'the tumultuous pleasure, which the certain expectation of an approaching good occasions; and χαίρω, that calm and settled joy, which arises from our knowledge that we are in possession of it.' On which same principle Dr. Jortin, Sermon. iv., accounts for the greater joy among the angels over a repenting sinner, than over ninety-nine just persons, &c., by the observation that 'in this greater joy there is something like human perturbation, not so much sedate happiness.'

57. πενήκοντα ἔτη, &c.] The number fifty seems to be here used, not (as Grotius supposes) from its being a round number, but because among the ancients fifty was considered as the age when any one was past his vigour, and beginning to grow old. Thus, then, it is meant, that he was still young (not even πρεσβύτης, much less γέρων); how, then, should he have seen Abraham?

58. πρὶν Ἀβραὰμ—ἐγὼ εἰμι.] Render, 'before Abraham existed, I was;' the Present being here used to denote continued existence. So infra xiv. 9, we have τοσούτων χρόνων μεθ' ἡμῶν εἰμι. Add (what is especially to the purpose here) Ps. xc. 2, πρὶν τὰ ὄρη γεννηθῆναι, ἐγὼ εἰ. Compare also i. 1, 2. iii. 13. vi. 46. 62. vii. 22. xvii. 5.

These words, then, showing the pre-existence of Christ long before his birth in this world, plainly set forth his supreme majesty, and, by the assumption which they involve, of the name and attribute of Jehovah, his DIVINITY. And so it is evident the Jews understood Jesus; otherwise they would not have attempted to stone him for blasphemy.

As to the interpretation of those who (not admitting the divinity of Christ) would explain this existence not of nature, but of destination, rendering, 'Before Abraham was [Abraham, the Father of many nations, in a mystical sense] I already was destined to be the Messiah,' it has been unanswerably refuted by Whitby, Lampe, Kuinoel, Tittman, and Dr. Pye Smith.

59. Ἦραν λίθους, ἵνα βάλῃσιν.] That stoning was a punishment inflicted for blasphemy among the Greeks as well as the Jews, is shown by several examples adduced by Lampe.

— ἐκρύβη, &c.] In ἐκρ. we have an example of Passive for Middle in a reciprocal sense, in which see Winer's Gr. Gr. Most recent Commentators suppose an hendiadys in ἐκρύβη καὶ ἐξῆλθεν, or refer it to the rule by which, of two verbs in connexion, one is to be rendered as an adverb. It is not, however, necessary to resort to that principle here. He hid himself, it should seem, for the moment, and soon afterwards went out of the temple. We need not, with the older Commentators, suppose this concealment miraculously effected, by vanishing from the sight of the multitude. Not only is nothing said to that effect, but the words following rather discountenance such a view: see Note on Luke iv. 30. Indeed, the words διελθὼν—οὕτως have been rejected by many of the best Commentators, and are cancelled by Griesbach. But there is scarcely evidence sufficient to warrant even any strong suspicion; for they are only omitted in one MS., two or three very recent and inferior Versions, and one or three Fathers. And as the words are not at all essential to the sense of the passage, the testimony of Fathers cannot have any weight. All the most ancient Versions have it; and the Fathers adduced have it in other citations. It is moreover expressed in the metrical version of Nott.

IX. 1. παράγων] 'as he was passing by,' or in [the streets] in his way from the Temple; Matt. xx. 30. Mark ii. 14. xv. 21.
 — τυφλὸν ἐκ γεν.] And consequently incur-
 : by any human art.

2. τίς ἡμ., οὗτος, ἢ οἱ γον.] Some think that we is here a reference to the doctrine of the ὑπαρξίς, or pre-existence of souls; others, of μετεμψυχώσεις, or μετεμψύχσεις, transmigration of souls into other bodies, by which what soul had sinned in one body might be punished in another. Others, as Lightfoot, Lampe, and itman, deny any such reference; maintaining it cannot be proved that the Jews in the age of Christ held any such doctrine. But granting the affirmative cannot be fully proved, yet they can the negatives. And indeed Josephus, Ant. xviii. 1. 3, and Bell. ii. 8. 14. iii. 8. 3, possibly affirms, that the Pharisees (whose tenets were generally received by the people, and well known, at least, if not favourably regarded by the scribes) did hold the Pythagorean doctrine of μετεμψυχώσεις. Though, it must be confessed, the Pharisees confined it to the souls of the dead alone. Moreover, the language is not that of positive belief seeking for confirmation, but of inquiry seeking for information. And the common people may have held a metempsychosis both of good and bad souls. Be that as it may, their question as to what caused this natural blindness led on the common notion (prevalent also among the Heathen), that all dangerous diseases, grievous calamities, must have been produced by the intervention of some heinous sin, which were meant to punish. A notion likely to be held by those who lived under a dispensation which dealt much in temporal and corporeal punishment. Now, in applying this to the case of a disease which befel a person in the course of his life, it was no wonder they should feel perplexity; since it might be referred either to his own sin, or the sin of his parents; for the Jews widely held, that the sin of parents, when not atoned for by themselves, was visited upon their children in the form of disease or calamity; see Gen. xi. 28. But how to apply this to the case of a disease born with a person, occasioned no less perplexity. And accordingly for a solution this difficulty the disciples apply.

3. Ἐγὼ δὲ οὗτος—αὐτοῦ.] Repeat ἵνα τυφλὸς γεννηθῇ, 'This blindness is from no sin, either in parents or in himself.'

4. Ἐγὼ δὲ οὗτος—αὐτοῦ.] At ἀλλὰ supply φῶς ἐγεννηθῇ from ἵνα τυφλὸς γεννηθῇ. Lord did not vouchsafe to give any answer to the inquiry which seems to have been concealed in this interrogatory; but (as when asked,

Luke xiii. 23, 'Are there few that be saved?') he fixed their attention on a matter of far greater moment; namely, the truth that God permits diseases to afflict men for His own wise purposes; in this instance, for the manifestation of His own glory in the miracle worked by His Messiah; one of whose characteristic works, (see Is. xxxv. 5) it was prophesied, would be 'giving sight to the blind.'

4. Ἐγὼ δὲ εἶπα ἔργάζεσθαι, &c.] Meaning, that 'such works as these must be done by him now, while there is yet time and opportunity; for the night is coming.' Thus intimating that his continuance with men would be short, and that he should not long either convince them by his miracles, or enlighten them by his doctrines. The words may also have been intended to inculcate the important lesson, that we have all a work to do, even the work of Him who sent us into the world; that we have our day, or time, to do it in; and that as that day is at the best short, and we know not how short, (as it is said by Antiphan. ap. Stob. tom. i. 96, τὸ ζῆν ἵσκει φρουρὰ ἐφ' ἡμέραν· τό τε μήκος τοῦ βίου ἡμέρα μία,) so it behoves us to use all diligence, lest the night that must close our day, or opportunity, should find us with our work undone.

5. ὅταν ᾖ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ὧ.] 'as long as I am,' &c. When ὅταν denotes duration of time, it requires the verb following to be in the Subjunctive. By φῶς τοῦ κόσμου is meant one who both enlightens and blesses mankind,—light being a metaphor to denote both knowledge and happiness; see Eph. viii. 16. Ps. cxvii. 11. cxii. 4. John i. 5. The sentiment was doubtless suggested by the case of the blind man about to be restored to sight.

6. ἔπτυσσε—τοῦ τυφλοῦ.] It has been thought strange that clay should be here used, since that would seem more likely to injure than benefit the eye. Yet such was sometimes prescribed among the ancients as a cure for certain disorders of that organ. So Serenus Sammonicus, xiii. 2.5 (cited by Wetstein), 'Si tumor insolitus tippo se tollat inani, Turgentibus oculis vili circumlita comas.' The spittle was used (as Euthymius and Grotius point out) simply to make the earth fit for the use in question; and the intent of the thing was to suggest the idea of collyrium, eye-salve, or ointment. So Hier. Sat. i. 3. 25, 'oculis male lippus inunctis,' and comp. Rev. iii. 18.

The action itself could, of course, contribute nothing to the cure,—but is to be considered as a symbolical one, such as the spitting in the eye, Mark viii. 23. See also vii. 33, and Note. In imitation of this the early Christians used, by a similar symbolical action, to anoint the eyes of the catechumens with clay. See Bingham's Eccl. Ant. x. 2. 14. Finally, by thus introducing what the Rabbins accounted servile work (namely, making clay) in effecting the miracle, our Lord may have intended to encounter the false notion of the Pharisees, that it was unlawful to do good on the Sabbath-day.

7. νίψαι] 'wash thyself,' probably the eyes only; for νίπτασθαι denotes to wash a part only of the body, while λούειν means to wash or bathe the whole body. This distinction is strongly marked infra xiii. 10, where λελουμένοις is used of him whose whole body is washed, and νιψασθαι is joined with τοὺς πόδας. (Markl. and Campbell.) Cotovicus, Itiner. Hieros. p. 292, attests that the fountain of Siloam is much revered by both Christians and Turks, who use the water to wash the eyes in certain disorders of that organ. On κολυμβήθρα see Note supra v. 2. This order (like that of Elijah to Naaman, 2 Kings v. 10, to wash seven times in Jordan) was doubtless given to try his faith.

The words ὁ ἐρμηνεύεται, ἀπεσταλμένος are by Wassenburgh and Kuinoel considered as a gloss. But there is every reason to think that they are genuine; for such etymological interpretations of names were then very usual; as might be shown by many examples, both from the Scriptural and the Classical writers, especially Thucydides; though such passages have usually proved traps into which ignorant or unwary Critics have fallen.

8. τυφλός.] The reading is here uncertain; several ancient MSS. and Versions, and some Fathers having προσαίτης, which is preferred by most Critics, and received by almost every Editor from Griesbach to Scholz; but, I conceive, on insufficient grounds. Whichever be the true reading, one must be an intentional alteration; for neither could be a gloss on the other. Now it seems more probable that τυφλ. should be altered into προσαίτης, than προσ. into τυφλ. And I suspect that the former alteration was made by those who took the ὅτι for a causative conjunction. Thus it is in the Versions rendered quia or quod. And if that were the right interpretation, the ante would rather require προσαίτης than τυφλός. But thus οἱ Σιων. αὐ. τὸ πρ. would yield a feeble sense; and ὁρῶντες would be required, not θεωροῦντες. In short, there can be little doubt but that ignorance, or inattention to the Hellenism in οἱ θεωροῦντες αὐτὸν ὅτι ἦν for οἱ Σιων. ὅτι αὐτὸς ἦν, led to the mistake and alteration in question. And surely τυφλ. is far more suitable in sense than προσαίτης; since the man's blindness, as connected with this miracle, would be far more obvious to public observation than his mendacity. The full sense is: 'And those who had seen, ascertained, and known him to be blind.' This is mentioned in order to place in a strong point of view the evidence which existed for the miracle, and to show that deception or collusion was impossible. The Evangelist might, indeed, have written τυφλός καὶ προσαίτης, which is actually found in a few MSS. and Latin Versions; but it was not necessary; for the latter circumstance comes out in the subsequent narration. The Critics who formed the text of those MSS. were, I suspect, induced to concoct the reading τυφλός καὶ προσαίτης, because πτωχὸς τυφλός was a common phrase in Greek as caecus regular in Latin; the blind being almost always beggar.

11, 12. The simple statement of the fact here, without any observations on it, is worthy of notice. (Scott.) See also Doddridge.

11. ἀνέβλεψα] 'I received my sight;' infra xv. 18. The term may, indeed, seem rather to denote the recovery of sight. But it admits of the present sense; since ἀνά is often used for ἀνω, upward, and consequently may mean to look up; the peculiar faculty of the human eye, 'quibus se sublime dedit;' scil. Deus.

13. τοὺς Φαρι.] Meaning the Sanhedrin, the far greater part of whom were Pharisees. That these were the rulers, is plain from v. 23 & 24.

καὶ οἱ Φαρισαῖοι πῶς ἀνέβλεψεν. Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Πηλὸν ἐπέθηκέ μου ἐπὶ τοὺς ὀφθαλμούς, καὶ ἐνέβλεψα, καὶ ἔβλεπον. ^{f vrr. 31, 33. supra 8. 2. & 7. 12.} "Ἐλεγον οὖν ἐκ τῶν Φαρισαίων τινές· Οὗτος ὁ ἄνθρωπος οὐκ ἐστὶ παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ὅτι τὸ σάββατον οὐ τηρεῖ. Οὐκ ἐπίστευσαν οὖν οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι περὶ αὐτοῦ, ὅτι τυφλὸς ἦν καὶ ἀνέβλεψεν, ἕως ὅτου ἐφώνησαν τοὺς γονεῖς αὐτοῦ τοῦ ἀναβλέψαντος, καὶ ἠρώτησαν αὐτούς, λέγοντες· Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱὸς ὑμῶν, ὃν ὑμεῖς λέγετε ὅτι τυφλὸς ἐγεννήθη; πῶς οὖν ἄρτι βλέπει; Ἀπεκρίθησαν αὐτοῖς οἱ γονεῖς αὐτοῦ καὶ εἶπον· Οἶδαμεν ὅτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱὸς ἡμῶν, καὶ ὅτι τυφλὸς ἐγεννήθη· πῶς δὲ νῦν βλέπει, οὐκ οἶδαμεν· ἢ τίς ἥνοιξεν αὐτοῦ τοὺς ὀφθαλμούς, ἡμεῖς οὐκ οἶδαμεν. αὐτὸς ἡλικίαν ἔχει, αὐτὸν ἐρωτήσατε· αὐτὸς περὶ αὐτοῦ λαλήσει. ^{h infra 12. 42. v. 34.} Ταῦτα εἶπον οἱ γονεῖς αὐτοῦ, ὅτι ἐφοβούντο τοὺς Ἰουδαίους· ἥδη γὰρ συνετίθειντο οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, ἵνα εἰάν τις αὐτὸν ὁμολογήσῃ Χριστὸν, ἅπασυνάγωγος γένηται. Διὰ τοῦτο οἱ γονεῖς αὐτοῦ εἶπον· Ὅτι ἡλικίαν ἔχει, αὐτὸν ἐρωτήσατε. ^{i Josh. 7. 19. i Sam. 6. 5. ver. 16.} Ἐφώνησαν οὖν ἐκ δευτέρου τὸν ἄνθρωπον ὃς ἦν τυφλός, καὶ εἶπον αὐτῷ· Δός

ἡ μου.] This position of μου, before instead of ἐφ' ὃ, is found in most of the best MSS. early Editions, and has been, with reason, used by almost all Editors from Wetstein to the present.

1. παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ] scil. ἀποσταλμένος, commissioned from God.
πῶς δύναται ἀνθ. ἀμαρτ.] By ἀμαρτ. acc., as at v. 25, simply meant a sinner, by an impostor. See 2 Thess. ii. 3. The argument is, that an impostor would not be endowed with the power of working miracles; or if (as the Jewish doctors admitted) any one so endowed, he was plainly commissioned from high, and could therefore dispense with ritual observances.

2. σὺ τί λέγεις—δὲ τι ἥνοιξε, &c.] There is confusion (with some) to break up the sentence into two interrogations: 'What sayest thou of—that he hath opened thine eyes?' For specious reasons may be adduced in favour of this method, yet thus the second question will be futile, because it had before been put, when the man had manifestly recovered his sight. Whence, with all the ancient and most modern commentators, to assign the sense: 'What sayest thou (i. e. what opinion hast thou) of him, in (quoting) he hath opened thine eyes?' or, 'of his opening thine eyes.' Moreover, δὲ τι ἡ καθεύδει, as Luke i. 7, καθεύδει ἡ Ἐλ. ἦν ἡμερ., &c.

3. ἐπ' ἀφ' ὃ.] Not meaning, 'the Prophet told by Moses' (as some understand); for that will require the Article; but a prophet, θεῖος

ἀνθρ., as Euthymius explains. It is plain from v. 31, 36, that the man considered Jesus only as a prophet, or rather, a man of God, θεοσεβής; certainly not as the Son of God.

18. Ἰουδαῖοι] i. e. the Φαρισαῖοι before mentioned. Ἐφώνησαν, 'had summoned,' καὶ ἥρωτ., 'and had asked.'

19. οὗτός ἐστιν—ἐγεννήθη:] Lampe, Markl., Kuinoel, and Tittman think that two questions are here blended into one, i. e. 'Is this your son? Do ye say he was born blind?' Such would, indeed, be the more regular manner of expression; but the present is the more simple, natural, and characteristic of the persons; for, in their haste to proceed from interrogation to imputation of fraud, they blurt out the latter (which is implied in λέγετε), together with the former. In their answer, the parents pass over the imputation, and consider the words as comprehending two questions, to which they reply.

21. ἡλικίαν ἔχει.] Meaning, 'He is of an age sufficient to enable him to give testimony. He is come to years of discretion.' Of this idiom examples have been adduced from Xen. and Isæus.

22. συνετίθειντο] 'de communi consilio decreverant,' as in Acts xiii. 20. On this use of the Pluperf. Pass. in the Deponent sense, the reader is referred to Buttm. Gr. p. 234. and Win. Gr. Gr. 'Ὁμολογήσῃ Χριστόν. Sub. εἶναι.

—ἀπασυνάγωγος γίνηται] 'should be excommunicated. There were three sorts of excommunication (see Horne's Introd.), the second of which is supposed to be here meant.

24. δὸς δόξαν τῷ Θεῷ.] This does not sig-

21. It is a disputed point whether the following discourse was held at the same time, and in the same place, with the preceding, or at some time afterwards. Those Expositors who maintain the latter opinion found it on the nature of the preceding verse, and the use of πάλιν here. The former reason, however, is invalid, since the verse may be regarded as, in some measure, parenthetical. And the use of πάλιν will not prove it to have been held at another time; since it may only denote repetition, namely, of the same warning as had been before given, vii. 34. And not only is there no apparent separation, but the contrast may be proved by the οὖν; for its use here seems to be that which Hoogev. p. 509, calls continuative, either after a digression, or a parenthesis, as here, and which may thus be termed resumptive. That this is a use very agreeable to St. John's style is certain, inasmuch as the two examples adduced by Hoogevreen are both of them from this Gospel; namely, vi. 22. 24. xviii. 5, 6, Λίγει αὐτοῖς, Ἐγὼ εἰμι. (Εἰστήκει δὲ καὶ Ἰούδας, ὁ παραδίδους αὐτόν, μετ' αὐτῶν.) Ὡς οὖν εἶπεν αὐτοῖς, &c. We may, therefore, safely regard this portion as a continuation of the foregoing, addressed, it should seem, to the same persons. And thus the extreme severity of the expressions in the subsequent verses may be well accounted for. Seeing that he had hitherto made no impression on them, our Lord even more seriously warns them of their guilt and danger.

— ἐγὼ ὑπάγω, καὶ, &c. Meaning that 'he is about to leave them, and they shall seek the Messiah, and desire his coming; but the Messiah that they expect will not come: and as they have rejected him who is the true and only Messiah, there remains no other salvation.' Ἐν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ ὑμῶν ἀποθ. is a mode of expression formed on that of Ezek. iii. 19. xviii. 26. xxxiii. 9. 18, 'shall die in his iniquity.' And ἁμαρτία may be here understood in a general way of that fountain and cause of all other sins and miseries, obdurate unbelief; which, in their case, shortly led to the crucifixion of their Saviour, and carried with it the Divine vengeance so soon to overtake them in this world, and abide upon them for ever in the next; for here by ἀποθ. is denoted not so much temporal death (namely, at the destruction of their city and people), as eternal death, a state of everlasting woe, reserved for 'the vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction.' Comp. Heb. x. 26, 27.

22. μήτι ἀποκτενεῖ ἑαυτόν, &c. This appears to have been a wilful perversion of our Lord's meaning; q. d. 'What! will he make away with himself, to get away from this our pretended persecution?' see vii. 20. Thus imputing to him what involved, even according to the opinion of the Jews, great criminality; for we find from Josephus, Bell. iii. 14, that the Pharisees supposed the lowest pit of Hell to be reserved for self-murderers.

23. ὕμεῖς ἐκ τῶν, &c. Our Lord deigns not to notice so absurd and malignant an imputation; but glances at the origin of this their malice, is the total dissimilarity between themselves and himself; the one being of earth, and earthly-minded, the other of heaven, and heavenly-minded. Comp. supra iii. 31.

24. ὅτι ἐγὼ εἰμι scil. ἐκείνος, meaning that personage so long expected and predicted by the Patriarchs and Prophets. An ellipsis found also in a kindred passage at Mark xiii. 6. See also Acts xiii. 25.

25. σὺ τίς εἶ; A question, it should seem, not of simple ignorance seeking information, but of scornful reproach; q. d. 'Who art thou, that thou speakest so loftily of thyself, and rebukingly to us?' So Aristoph. Av. 961, σὺ δὲ τίς; Philem. σὺ γὰρ τίς εἶ; (for εἶ); Liliu. 798, τίς γὰρ εἶ σὺ; Terent. Andr. iv. 1, 14, 'impudentissima eorum oratio est, Quis es tu?' Our Lord, however, was pleased to answer as if the question had been one of simple ignorance.

— τὴν ἀρχὴν ὅτι καὶ λαλῶ v. The sense of these words depends upon that which is assigned to τὴν ἀρχὴν, which some take as standing for omnino; q. d. 'I am altogether the person whom I profess myself to be.' But it has been truly observed that in this sense the expression is almost always used with a negation. It is therefore better, with the generality of Commentators, to suppose an ellipsis of κατά, and take the phrase as put for

Πολλὰ ἔχω περὶ ὑμῶν λαλεῖν καὶ κρίνειν· ἀλλ' ὁ πέμψας ^{1 supra 7. 26. & 8. 32. infra 15. 16.} με ἀληθὴς ἐστὶ, καὶ γὰρ ἃ ἤκουσα παρ' αὐτοῦ, ταῦτα λέγω εἰς τὸν κόσμον. Οὐκ ἔγνωσαν ὅτι τὸν Πατέρα αὐτοῖς ἔλεγεν. Σίπεν οὖν αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· ^{1 supra 8. 14. infra 12. 22.} Ὅταν ὑψώσῃτε τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἰνθρώπου, τότε γνώσεσθε ὅτι ἐγὼ εἰμι, καὶ ἀπ' ἐμαυτοῦ ραίω οὐδέν· ἀλλὰ, καθὼς ἐδίδαξέ με ὁ Πατήρ μου, ταῦτα λαλῶ. ^{1 supra 7. 26. & 8. 32. & 9. 30.} καὶ ὁ πέμψας με μετ' ἐμοῦ ἐστίν· οὐκ ἀφῆκέ με ὥνιον ὁ Πατήρ, ὅτι ἐγὼ τὰ ἀρεστὰ αὐτῷ ποιῶ πάντοτε.

Ταῦτα αὐτοῦ λαλοῦντος, πολλοὶ ἐπίστευσαν εἰς αὐτόν. Ἐλεγεν οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς πρὸς τοὺς πεπιστευκότας αὐτῷ Ἰουδαίους· Ἐὰν ὑμεῖς μένητε ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τῷ ἐμῷ, ἀληθῶς μαθηταὶ μου ἐστέ· καὶ γνώσεσθε τὴν ἀλήθειαν, καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια λευθερώσει ὑμᾶς. Ἀπεκρίθησαν αὐτῷ· Σπέρμα Ἀβραάμ

ἐρχομαι. By this some understand the beginning of office; others, the beginning of the preludium; which latter opinion is preferable. the expression may simply mean dudum, or as yet, as in Gen. xliii. 18. So Plaut. Capt. 2. 'Quis ille est? Quem dudum dixi a seipso tibi.' And λαλῶ will mean, 'I have telling you.'

πολλὰ ἔχω, &c.] These words are, from εἶναι, somewhat obscure. The difficulty is in ὁ πέμψας με ἀληθὴς, &c. which some meant to prove the justice of his accusation. But it is better, with others, to regard as intimating the ground of his claims, and as answering which their refusal to acknowledge them involved; q. d. 'I could say much in reference to you, and in reproof of your self; but I shall content myself with de, that as I am sent from the great Father himself, so what I openly aver is from Him, and here cannot but be true, and the refusal to re it highly criminal.'

οὐκ ἔγνωσαν—ἔλεγεν.] Meaning, 'they did not know that he spake unto them of meant his Father in heaven, God.'

Ὅταν ὑψώσῃτε, &c.] These words could of course, be understood by the hearers; but were, we may suppose, expressed thus obliquely, partly from the reserve which our Lord, in wisdom, thought fit then to maintain on subject, (though, indeed, some obscurity in the of events yet in the womb of futurity unavoidable), and partly in order that what now enigmatical, being afterwards explained in event, there might arise that confirmation in which results from the *fulfilment of prop-*hecy. The same remark applies to our Lord's allusion to Peter, respecting John, xxi. 22, ὅταν ὁ υἱὸς ἰδοὺ μίνωι ἴσως ἔρχομαι. See also infra 12. Here there is an obscure allusion (though not plain by the event) to the circumstances *sur-*rounding the crucifixion, and to the events *sub-*sequent to it; namely, the resurrection and *as-*sumption of Christ, the coming of the Holy Ghost, the working of miracles in the name of the Christ—circumstances which would so demon- strate him to be the Christ, that they would all abundant evidence to see, and many would *con-*sequence believe, that he was indeed the promised Messiah. On this expression ὑψώσῃτε see Note supra iii. 14.

—ἐγὼ εἰμι.] Supply ἐκείνου.

29. This verse is closely connected with the preceding one; the sense being: 'who, having sent me, leaves me not alone, but succours and supports me, because I perform his will in all things,' meaning especially with respect to the work of redemption.

31. ὅταν ὑμεῖς μένητε, &c.] Meaning, 'If ye adhere with constancy to what I have taught you, and act thereupon by a holy obedience in your lives.' Comp. xiv. 21. 1 John ii. 24. Indeed the words ἀληθῶς μαθηταὶ plainly intimate that it was by their moral qualities, rather than their external profession, that the true disciples of Christ would be recognised. Thus it is said, 'by their fruits shall ye know them.'

32. γνώσεσθε τὴν ἀλήθειαν, &c.] Meaning, 'Ye shall experimentally find the truth, and prove the blessed effects of my word, and know of a truth that I came from God.' See v. 28. vii. 17.

—καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια.] Meaning, 'the truth as it is in Jesus,' Gospel truth, or the Christian religion. Ἐλευθ. signifies, 'will free you from the bondage to sin and Satan,' and place you in 'the glorious liberty of the children of God.' See Rom. viii. 2. 15. Similar sentiments are adduced, both from the Rabbinical writers and the Classical ones; of which the most apposite are the following:—Arrian, Epict. iv. 7, εἰς ἐμὴ οὐδεὶς ἐξουσίαν ἔχει· ἡλευθέρωμαι γὰρ ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἔγνωκα αὐτοῦ τὰς ἐντολάς, οὐκ εἶμι οὐδεὶς δουλαγωγῆσαι με δύναται where, however, we need not, as in the other passages cited, suppose an allusion to the Stoical dogma, that the wise man is alone free, and that every fool is a slave: for it may be noticed, that Arrian had, like the other later Philosophers, been much indebted to the truths of Revelation in the New Testament. Of this the passage in question affords a remarkable example, as containing allusion to four clauses of Scripture, namely, 1 Cor. vii. 37. 1 Cor. vii. 22, ἀπελευθέρωσεν Κυρίου ἰσχύϊν. 2 John i. 1. and Ps. cxix. 126. 2 Pet. ii. 19. 1 Cor. ix. 27.

33. ἀπεκρίθησαν.] Not those just before mentioned, who 'believed on him,' but some bystanders, who perversely misrepresented his meaning; and, in order to draw censure on him, interpreted of temporal, what he had meant of spiritual liberty.

33. οὐδενὶ δεδουλ. π.] As the Hebrews had been in slavery not only under the Egyptians and Babylonians, but were then subject to the Romans (so Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 8, τὴν ἐλευθερίαν ἀποβάλλομεν, καὶ ὑπὸ τοῦ Ῥωμαίων κατέστημεν), many regard this as a false assertion, uttered in the heat of disputation. Perhaps, however, it may be better, with others, to take δεδουλ. in such a restricted sense as the truth of history will justify, and (with most recent Interpreters) regard the words as spoken of themselves only, and their own generation. And assuredly the Jews, even after they became subject to the Roman empire, were left in the enjoyment of no inconsiderable portion of liberty, political as well as religious.

35. ὁ δὲ δούλος—αἰῶνα.] Here we have an illustration drawn from what is usual in common life; q. d. 'The Slave has no claim to remain continually in the same family; but may, at the pleasure of his owner, be sold unto another. Not so the son; he cannot be alienated from the family. Thus it is with the servants of sin, who may, at any time, be excluded from God's house and favour, and cast into outer darkness. Whereas those who have the liberty of the sons of God will abide in it for ever.' Ver. 36 contains another view, engrafted on the former; the comparison being the same, but the application different. And as, in the foregoing verse, there is a comparison between the state of a slave and that of the son and heir, so in this there is one between the freedom communicated by the master and that by his son, with the concurrence of his father. For as there were cases in which a proprietor could not manumit without the consent of the son and heir, or at least a manumission in which the son concurred with the father, might be regarded as being doubly effectual; so the freedom and salvation produced by the conjoint manumission of both Father and Son is most truly effectual. Ὅντως ἐλεύθεροι has reference, not merely, as Wetstein, Rosenmuller, and Kuinoel imagine, to the freedom from the tyranny of evil passions, but that freedom accomplished by Divine grace from 'the dominion of sin' (see Rom. vi. 17.), which implies an introduction into 'the glorious liberty of the children of God,' (Rom. viii. 21.) 'the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our bodies,' Rom. viii. 23. ix. 4.

37. οἶδα.] The word must, as Calvin observes, be here taken in the sense of concession. Our Lord admits their assertion, but makes use of it to show the inconsistency between their boasted claims of ancestry and their present conduct, and to evince that they must indeed be degenerate descendants of Abraham, who, in a spirit so totally unlike that of their illustrious progenitor, plot the death of Him to whom both the Patriarchs and Prophets bore witness.

—ὅτι ὁ λόγος ὁ ἐμὸς οὐ χωρεῖ ἐν ὑμῖν.] Here is suggested the reason for that rejection of his doctrine, which made them plot against his person. On the exact import, however, of χωρεῖ some difference of opinion exists. The sense 'has place, adapted by many eminent ancient and modern Expositors, is destitute of authority, and not sufficiently definite or significant. The true interpretation seems to be that of Nonnus, Grotius, De Dieu, Camerac, Lampe, Rosenmuller, Kuinoel, and Wahl, 'does not penetrate into your hearts,' by being received and believed. 'Es here, as often, stands for sin, the proper construction, as Matt. xv. 17.

38. The scope of this verse is to draw a contrast between the conduct pursued by him, and that by them; as serving to account for their rejection of Him. 'He faithfully delivers the doctrine which he hath learnt from and with his Father, God; they do the works which they have learnt from their father, the Devil, as is more plainly signified further on. How fully this language was justified by facts, will sufficiently appear from the account given by Josephus of the Jews of his age. See Bell. v. 10.

—ἐώρακα.] Ὁρᾶν has here, as often, not the physical sense to see, but the moral sense to perceive, i. e. understand, know, learn.

39. ὁ πατὴρ ἡμῶν, &c.] The Jews, not knowing that by their father, Jesus had meant the Devil, and not quite understanding the other words of Jesus, ὁ ἐώρακατε παρὰ τῷ πατρὶ ὑμῶν, and regarding what was said as disrespectful to Abraham, take refuge in their former allegation, simply repeating that 'Abraham is their

 B's, and some Versions and Fathers, together

 Origenbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz.

 sense of the particle frequent in Scripture; as m ix. 41. xviii. 36. and Thucyd. iii. 43. In which passages there is the same use as ἀντίως as here.

— οὐκ ἐποίησαν.] Render, 'would not have do.'

[B. ὁμοῖς ποιεῖτε τὰ ἔργα τ. π. ὑ.] 'Yes, do the works of your father.' Our Lord re-to the charge, and yet repeats it as if unwilling to name Satan as their father. That he res to be inferred.

— πορνείας.] The best Commentators are sed that the word here, as often, signifies ido-ry; which was considered by the Jews as a t of spiritual adultery; since so close was the nexion of the people of Israel with God, that was compared to the conjugal union. Compare
 Is. ii. 17. 1 Chron. v. 25. Is. i. 21. Hos. i. 2.
 12. Their meaning, therefore, is: 'If thou now speaking of our natural Father, know t we recognise no other Father than God. To m we are dear and beloved, like children;
 m only do we worship.' This argument our rd rebuts, by again adverting to the spiritual as of Father.

[B. ἐξῆλθον καὶ ἤκω.] The full sense is: 'I eeded forth [from God], and am come into 'world [as his Legate].' A sense of ἤκω found the Greek Tragedians. The former term ἔλθω] has reference to the character of Jesus
 the eternal Son of God; the latter, his characer Legate and Mediator. Comp. vi. 46. vii.
 xiii. 8. xvi. 27, 28. xvii. 7.

[B. Here our Lord accounts for the obscurity ish they found in his words, from their own lposition to attend to what he said.

— διὰ τὴν λαλίαν, &c.] Meaning: 'How is it that [as ye say] ye do not understand my speech? even because ye cannot (or, are not disposed to) hearken and give heed to my words.'

Δύνασθαι is here (as often) used of moral inability, arising from any one's being indisposed to do a thing. So Gen. xxviii. 4, οὐκ ἠδύνατο λαλεῖν αὐτῷ οὐδὲν εἰρημικόν. and Jerem. vi. 16, (of the Jews) 'they cannot hear.' So also John
 vii. 7, οὐ δύναται ὁ κόσμος μισεῖν ὑμᾶς. The reason of this indisposition to hearken to the truth will appear from 1 Cor. ii. 14. The expression λαλία, meaning loquela, has reference to the peculiarity of our Lord's manner of speaking, and its remoteness from the λαλία κόσμου. (See Lampe.) Which may account for the combined inability and indisposition of the persons in question.

44. ὑμεῖς ἐκ πατρὸς, &c.] Our Lord now speaks more plainly, pointing to their true Father,
 and indicating two of the principal characteristics
 in which their similarity to their Diabolical father consists; namely, man-slaying and lying. Θέλειτε,
 'ye will,' i. e. ye are resolved, or bent. Ἐπιθυ-μίας may here mean behests. Ἀπ' ἀρχῆς denotes here, as often, 'from the beginning of the world.' Compare i. 1. and 1 John iii. 8. The expression, however, includes a notion of continuance and perseverance in. In ἀνθρωποκτό-νος there is not, I conceive, a reference (as some imagine) to the murder of Abel, committed at the instigation of Satan; neither, however, must the proper sense of the word (with others) be explained away. It may be taken in its proper acceptation, and be referred to the seduction of our first parents; which might be called ἀνθρω-ποκτονία, as 'bringing death into the world, and all our woe;' the thing being brought about by Satan's machinations. Thus a Rabbinical writer cited by Schoettgen speaks of 'the children of the old Serpent, who killed Adam and all his posterity.' The same is also ascribed to the Devil, Wisd. ii. 24. and in Ireneus, ii. 8. and other Fathers.

The words καὶ ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ οὐχ ἔστηκε contain a strong affirmation, by a negation of the contrary. And as to stand in any action is to steadfastly practise it, so the sense here is: 'he has perpetually fallen away from the truth.' A sentiment which is then strengthened by an em-

αὐτῷ. ὅταν λαλῇ τὸ ψεῦδος, ἐκ τῶν ἰδίων λαλεῖ· ὅτι ψεύστης ἐστὶ καὶ ὁ πατὴρ αὐτοῦ. Ἐγὼ δὲ ὅτι τὴν ἀλήθειαν 45 λέγω οὐ πιστεύετε μοι. Τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν ἐλέγχει με περὶ ἁμαρτίας; εἰ δὲ ἀλήθειαν λέγω, διατί ὑμεῖς οὐ πιστεύετε μοι;

phatic mode of expression (occurring also in 1 John i. 8. 1 Macc. vii. 18, and often in the Rabbinical writers) importing that there is no principle of truth in him.

— ὅταν λαλῇ τὸ ψεῦδος, &c.] The sense of these words mainly depends upon that assigned to the αὐτοῦ; which some ancient and a few modern Translators render, according to the more usual signification of the word, ipseius, his. Yet this produces so odd a sense, ('for he is a liar, and so is his father,') that almost all Expositors of any eminence, from Erasmus to Tittman, take αὐτοῦ as a neuter, rendering it ejus, it; and they refer it either to the remote antecedent ψεῦδος, or consider that word as inherent in the verbal ψεύσσης. As, however, this would seem to involve a pleonasm in the article, Bp. Middleton, after affirming that the article is never pleonastic, ventures to pronounce that 'all the great scholars who have espoused the common version were in error.' And, as might be expected, he adopts the masculine sense of αὐτοῦ. But, in order to avoid the insuperable objection arising from the strange sense thus produced, he changes the subject in αὐτοῦ, rendering, not 'the Devil,' but his son, the Liar. This he does by supposing the person at λαλεῖ to be not Διάβολος, but τις understood. And he renders, 'when any of you speak that which is false, he speaks after the manner of his kindred; for he is a liar, and so also is his father.' But to this it is, with reason, objected by Professor Scholefield, that, after describing the man as a liar, it was superfluous to add, 'for he is a liar.' There is also a still more formidable objection; for (not to mention that such a sense as 'after the manner of his kindred' is very harsh and improbable) this changing the subject ad libitum, and supplying a nominative, τις at λαλῇ, is surely too arbitrary a method to be justified. The ellipsis in question is, indeed, frequent in the Classical writers; but it is almost confined to the Attic ones, being very rarely found in the Alexandrian writers, or those of later times, and never in the New Test. or the Sept. Upon the whole, there is no reason to depart from the common rendering; for though it may seem to involve something uncouth and obscure, yet that is no more than may occasionally be observed in all ancient writers. Moreover, the sense thus arising is both apposite and natural, and such as suggests matter for serious reflection. And, after all, there is here little that can be called irregular. This use of αὐτοῦ in the neuter, though rare, is not unexampled, being found at Eph. ii. 10, ὡς ἐν αὐτοῖς περιπατῶν, for neither is αὐτοῖς confined to the masculine, but, like the Genit. here, is sometimes a neuter. Nor is the use of the Article here to be called anomalous. It might, indeed, have been dispensed with; but it is not without its force, as suggesting the sense, 'and the originator of it by the deception of our first parents,' Gen. iii. 5. So in Sophocl. Ced. Tyr. 868, Jupiter is called πατὴρ νόμου, and Plato, Menex. C. 10, has πατέρες τῆς ἐλευθερίας, 'authors or originators of the truth.' Instances, too, are

Finally, the above method of exposition is supported by the suffrage of the earliest antiquity; being adopted by the Pesh. Syriac Translator in the middle of the second century, who renders by ܣܕܐ with the feminine affix, which therefore cannot be referred to the Devil, and must belong to the preceding feminine noun ܠܥܕܢܐ, a lie! Τὸ ψεῦδος should be rendered so as to express the force of the Article, 'what is false.' And so also at Eph. iv. 25. 2 Thess. ii. 11. Rom. i. 23. The very phrase λαλεῖν τὸ ψεῦδος occurs at Ps. v. 6.

These words, then, are meant to show how it is, that nought but falsehood comes from him,—namely, that is natural to him; ἐκ τῶν ἰδίων being (as the Pesh. Syr. Translator also takes it) for ἐκ τοῦ ἰδίου, and that for ἐξ ἰδιώματος, 'from natural disposition;' probably a popular form of expression, since it is not found in the Classical writers. Remarkably similar to what is here said of the Devil, is what Porphyry de Abst. ii. § 42. says of demons, τὸ ψεῦδος (lying) τοῦτοις οἰκίῳ.

45. Here ἐγὼ is, as often, emphatic, and the δι is antithetic, with reference to ὑμεῖς at v. 44; v. 44. being hypo-parenthetical and illustrative. Render: 'But as for me, it is because I speak the truth, that ye believe not what I say.' Inasmuch that, as Christ declares on a similar occasion (v. 43.), 'if another should come in his own name only (without that Divine authority which he possesses), him they would receive.' Then, then, it is meant that they can no more believe the truth, than the Devil can speak it; both actions being respectively contrary to their nature.

46. τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν—ἁμαρτίας.] The scope of this address is to convince them of the probability of what he asserts, by another and a popular kind of argument, in which he traces unbelief to its true source. In τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν the interrogative, as Calvin remarks, has the force of conditio appeal.

Ἀμαρτία is here by the best Commentators rightly taken to mean, not sin, according to the common acceptation of the word, but error or falsehood in doctrine, as opposed to the truth spoken of in the next clause. Of this definition the following examples will suffice. Lucy. Agam. 489, φρεσὶν ἁμαρτία. Thucyd. i. 2, δόξῃ ἁμαρτία. and 78, ἐν ἁμαρτίᾳ ὄντα. 'Ελέγχει must be rendered, not 'convicts,' but corrects; as supra v. 9. And so in a similar passage of Aristoph. Plut. 574, we have καὶ οὐδ' ἐλέγχει μ' οὐκ ἔδουσαι περὶ τούτου.

Our Lord appeals to his hearers whether they can make out any such charge against him, of error or falsehood in doctrine, as to warrant disregard of his pretensions; which may remind us of a similar appeal of Moses to the Israelites, Num.

xvi. Now such an appeal of course involves the force of a strong negation. Thus, in the words following, the hearers are supposed to have answered, 'No one!' The inference is manifest. In v. 47, the argument is followed up thus: 'If ye were really, as ye boast, sons of God, ye would hearken to the words of God [from me, whom He hath sent]. The very reason why ye hearken not to them is, that ye are not of God;' i. e. sons of God. See 1 John iii. 10. iv. 4, 6, v. 18, 19.

48. Not being able to answer these arguments, the Jews are fain to have recourse to reviling.

— Σαμαρεῖτης—ἔχεις; Of these two expressions the latter has been explained at vii. 20. The former appears from the Rabbinical writers to have been a term of bitter reproach, equivalent to calling any one a heathen or a heretic; and the Samaritans were accounted both, as well in doctrine as in practice. See Horne's Introd. vol. iii. 371.

49. Here our Lord, with mild dignity, rebuts the insulting charge. Τιμῶν τὸν Πατέρα denotes honours, the executing his Father's injunctions, by delivering his message and doctrine. Comp. xvii.

50. This honour to God, he argues, would not be rendered by one under the influence of the Devil.

51. ἐγὼ δὲ οὐ ζητῶ, &c.] The full sense is: 'However, it is not my part to vindicate my honour [nor need I]; there is a Being who will vindicate it, and hold judgment on men as to their reception of me.'

51. ἐάν τις τὸν λόγον, &c.] Here our Lord especially adverts to the happy lot of those who accept his covenant of grace, and observe its requirements; i. e. that they shall never θεωρεῖν θάνατον, which, like ἰδεῖν θάνατον at Luke ii. 26, signifies, 'to experience death;' i. e. death spiritual and eternal, 'the second death' spoken of in Rev. ii. 22, and in St. Paul's Epistles. Yet, though it has been proved that the phrase as well as the doctrine was not unknown to the Jews, the hearers misunderstood or pervert our Lord's words, and endeavour thereby to fasten on him the charge of being possessed with a demon. Moreover, as this claim to confer immortality implied the possession of it himself, the Jews justly interpreted this as virtually an arrogation of superiority over Abraham and the Prophets.

53. καὶ οἱ προφῆται, &c.] Abraham, indeed, was also a Prophet; and so he is called by Jehovah, Gen. xx. 7. But that appellation was, it should seem, merged in the, to them, more endearing term of Father; he being called Father of the faithful. Γεύσεται, for vulg. γύσεται, Griesb., Matth., and Scholz.

— ἀτίθανον] q. d. 'Even the most eminent and most faithful servants of God were not exempt from death.' Comp. Hom. II. φ. 107 (cited by Wets.), κάθ' ἑνα καὶ Πάτροκλος, ὕπὸ σιό πολὺ λὸν ἀμύνων. So also Lucret. iii. 1055, 'Ipse Epicurus obit, decurso lumine vite.' Horat. Od. i. 28. 7.

The Jews only stumbled at these pretensions because they refused to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah; for they did not deny that the ΜΕΣΣΙΑΣ was to be far superior to all the Patriarchs, Prophets, and even angels. See Lampe.

54. In reply to the objections of the Jews, our Lord now observes, that if he claimed this honour for himself, upon his own testimony alone, 'it was nothing,' or a vain glory like that of ambitious worldly men; but his Father had conferred it on him, and testified in various ways that it belonged to him. (Scott.) Thus showing that this glory is not sought by him, but freely given him of the Father.

— ἐάν ἐγὼ δοξάζω ἐμ.] 'If I take glory or honour to myself,' equivalent to ζητῶ τὴν δόξαν μου, supra v. 50.

— ὅτι Θεὸς ὑμῶν ἐστί] for Θεὸν ὑμῶν εἶπαι, i. e. 'whose worshippers ye profess to be:' examples of which idiom are adduced by Raphael and Kypke.

truly know Him, because ye refuse to acknowledge me; the keeping of God's commandments being the only sure proof that we know Him.

56. Ἀβραὰμ ὁ πατὴρ, &c.] Our Lord now contrasts their feelings towards God with those of Abraham, of whom they so boast; and that by way of adverting to his exalted nature, and consequently infinite superiority to Abraham.

— ἡγαλλίασατο ἵνα ἴδῃ.] The version 'rejoiced' is not sufficiently significant to express the full sense of the term ἡγαλλία, which is pregnant with meaning; not to say that it involves a tautology, or at least an identical proposition in the words following. To avoid this difficulty, many, from Grotius to Abp. Newcome, take it to mean, 'earnestly desired to see.' But for such a sense no authority exists; nor, indeed, is there any necessity to adopt it. Render, 'he exceedingly rejoiced that he should see my day (i. e. the time of my appearing on earth); exulted at seeing it,' namely, in anticipation.

— καὶ εἶδε καὶ ἔχάρη] nay, he saw it, and with delight; namely, as most recent Commentators explain, in Orcus, or the seat of the righteous dead (see Luke xvi. 23, and Notes). For, they observe, the Jews and the ancients in general, supposed departed spirits to take an interest in what concerned their posterity. And they refer to Is. xxix. 22, sq. Phil. Jud. ii. 10, and several passages from ancient writers. After all, however, the meaning may rather be (as the older Commentators interpret), that he mentally saw it—partly by the eye of faith, so strong as to be compared to sight (see Heb. xi. 13. 1 Pet. i. 10. 12), and partly by a revelation (supposed to be made to him on being commanded to offer up his son Isaac) of the advent of the future Saviour. Nor need we stumble at the second term (ἐχάρη) seeming to be the weaker one, instead of being, as we might expect, the stronger; for it may be doubted whether that does not express as much, or even more; ἀγαλλ. denoting, as Bp. Warburton, Div. Leg., observes, 'the tumultuous pleasure, which the certain expectation of an approaching good occasions; and χαίρω, that calm and settled joy, which arises from our knowledge that we are in possession of it.' On which same principle Dr. Jortin, Serm. iv., accounts for the greater joy among the angels over a repenting sinner, than over ninety-nine just persons, &c., by the observation that 'in this greater joy there is something like human perturbation, not so much sedate happiness.'

57. πενήκοντα ἔτη, &c.] The number fifty seems to be here used, not (as Grotius supposes) from its being a round number, but because among the ancients fifty was considered as the age when any one was past his vigour, and beginning to grow old. Thus, then, it is meant, that he was still young (not even πρεσβύτης, much less γέρων); how, then, should he have seen Abraham?

58. πρὶν Ἀβραὰμ—ἐγὼ εἰμι.] Render, 'before Abraham existed, I was;' the Present being here used to denote continued existence. So infra xiv. 9, we have τοσούτου χρόνου μετ' ἡμῶν εἰμι. Add (what is especially to the purpose here) Ps. xc. 2, πρὶν τὰ ὄρη γεννηθῆναι, &c. Compare also i. 1, 2. iii. 13. vi. 46. 62. vii. 23. xvii. 5.

These words, then, showing the pre-existence of Christ long before his birth in this world, plainly set forth his supreme majesty, and, by the assumption which they involve, of the name and attribute of Jehovah, his DIVINITY. And so it is evident the Jews understood Jesus; otherwise they would not have attempted to stone him for blasphemy.

As to the interpretation of those who (not admitting the divinity of Christ) would explain this existence not of nature, but of destination, rendering, 'Before Abraham was [Abraham, the Father of many nations, in a mystical sense] I already was destined to be the Messiah,' it has been unanswerably refuted by Whitby, Lampe, Kuinoel, Tittman, and Dr. Pye Smith.

59. ἦσαν λίθους, ἵνα βάλωσιν.] That stoning was a punishment inflicted for blasphemy among the Greeks as well as the Jews, is shown by several examples adduced by Lampe.

— ἐκρύβη, &c.] In ἐκρ. we have an example of Passive for Middle in a reciprocal sense, as which see Winer's Gr. Gr. Most recent Commentators suppose an hendiadys in ἐκρύβη and ἐξῆλθεν, or refer it to the rule by which, of two verbs in connexion, one is to be rendered as an adverb. It is not, however, necessary to resort to that principle here. He hid himself, it should seem, for the moment, and soon afterwards went out of the temple. We need not, with the older Commentators, suppose this concealment miraculously effected, by vanishing from the sight of the multitude. Not only is nothing said to that effect, but the words following rather discountenance such a view: see Note on Luke iv. 30. Indeed, the words διελθὼν—οὕτως have been rejected by many of the best Commentators, and are cancelled by Griesbach. But there is scarcely evidence sufficient to warrant even any strong suspicion; for they are only omitted in one M.S., two of three very recent and inferior Versions, and two or three Fathers. And as the words are not at all essential to the sense of the passage, the testimony of Fathers cannot have any weight. All the most ancient Versions have it; and the Fathers adduced have it in other citations. It is moreover expressed in the metrical version of Nott.

τὴν ἡμ., οὗτος, ἢ οἱ γον.] Some think that τὴν ἡμ. is here a reference to the doctrine of the παρὰ, or pre-existence of souls; others, of μετεμψυχώσεως, or μετεμψύχωσης, transmigration of souls into other bodies, by which what a man had sinned in one body might be punished in another. Others, as Lightfoot, Lampe, and beza, deny any such reference; maintaining that it cannot be proved that the Jews in the age of Christ held any such doctrine. But granting that the affirmative cannot be fully proved, yet they can the negative. And indeed Josephus, l. xviii. 1. 3, and Bell. ii. 8. 14. iii. 8. 3, possibly affirm, that the Pharisees (whose tenets were generally received by the people, and well known, at least, if not favourably regarded by the scribes) did hold the Pythagorean doctrine of μετεμψυχώσεως. Though, it must be conceded, the Pharisees confined it to the souls of the dead alone. Moreover, the language is not that of positive belief seeking for confirmation, but of inquiry seeking for information. And the common people may have held a metempsychosis both of good and bad souls. Be that as it may, their question as to what caused this natural blindness led on the common notion (prevalent also among the Heathen), that all dangerous diseases, previous calamities, must have been produced by the intervention of some heinous sin, which were meant to punish. A notion likely to be held by those who lived under a dispensation which dealt much in temporal and corporeal retribution. Now, in applying this to the case of a disease which befel a person in the course of his life, it was no wonder they should feel perplexity; since it might be referred either to his own sin, or the sin of his parents; for the Jews were held, that the sin of parents, when not atoned for by themselves, was visited upon their children in the form of disease or calamity; see Gen. xi. 28. But how to apply this to the case of a disease born with a person, occasioned no perplexity. And accordingly for a solution of this difficulty the disciples apply.

Ἐγὼ δεῖ οὗτος—αὐτοῦ.] Repeat ἵνα τυφλὸς γεννηθῇ, 'This blindness is from no sin, either in parents or in himself.'

Ἐγὼ δεῖ ἵνα φανερωθῇ, &c.] At ἀλλὰ supply ἵνα ἐγερσθῇ from ἵνα τυφλὸς γεννηθῇ. The Lord did not vouchsafe to give any answer to the inquiry which seems to have been concealed in this interrogatory; but (as when asked,

Luke xiii. 23, 'Are there few that be saved?') he fixed their attention on a matter of far greater moment; namely, the truth that God permits diseases to afflict men for His own wise purposes; in this instance, for the manifestation of His own glory in the miracle worked by His Messiah; one of whose characteristic works, (see Is. xxxv. 5) it was prophesied, would be 'giving sight to the blind.'

4. ἐγὼ δεῖ ἐργάζεσθαι, &c.] Meaning, that 'such works as these must be done by him now, while there is yet time and opportunity; for the night is coming.' Thus intimating that his continuance with men would be short, and that he should not long either convince them by his miracles, or enlighten them by his doctrines. The words may also have been intended to inculcate the important lesson, that we have all a work to do, even the work of Him who sent us into the world; that we have our day, or time, to do it in; and that as that day is at the best short, and we know not how short, (as it is said by Antiphan. ap. Stob. tom. i. 96, τὸ ζῆν ἔσκε φρονεῖν ἐφ' ἡμέραν· τό τε μήκος τοῦ βίου ἡμέρα μία,) so it behooves us to use all diligence, lest the night that must close our day, or opportunity, should find us with our work undone.

5. ὅταν ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ᾧ.] 'as long as I am,' &c. When ὅταν denotes duration of time, it requires the verb following to be in the Subjunctive. By φῶς τοῦ κόσμου is meant one who both enlightens and blesses mankind,—light being a metaphor to denote both knowledge and happiness; see Ezth. viii. 16. Ps. xcvi. 11. cxii. 4. John i. 5. The sentiment was doubtless suggested by the case of the blind man about to be restored to sight.

6. ἔπτυσσε—τοῦ τυφλοῦ.] It has been thought strange that clay should be here used, since that would seem more likely to injure than benefit the eye. Yet such was sometimes prescribed among the ancients as a cure for certain disorders of that organ. So Serenus Samonicus, xiii. 2:5 (cited by Wetstein), 'Si tumor insolitus tippo se tollat inani, Turgentes oculos vili circumdante casso.' The spittle was used (as Euthymius and Grotius point out) simply to make the earth fit for the use in question; and the intent of the thing was to suggest the idea of collyrium, eye-salve, or ointment. So Hor. Sat. i. 3. 25, 'oculis male lippus insuetis,' and comp. Rev. iii. 18.

The action itself could, of course, contribute nothing to the cure,—but is to be considered as a symbolical one, such as the spitting in the eye, Mark viii. 23. See also vii. 33, and Note. In imitation of this the early Christians used, by a similar symbolical action, to anoint the eyes of the catechumens with clay. See Bingham's Eccl. Ant. x. 2. 14. Finally, by thus introducing what the Rabbins accounted servile work (namely, making clay) in effecting the miracle, our Lord may have intended to encounter the false notion of the Pharisees, that it was unlawful to do good on the Sabbath-day.

7. νίψαι] 'wash thyself,' probably the eyes only; for νίπτσθαι denotes to wash a part only of the body, while λούειν means to wash or bathe the whole body. This distinction is strongly marked infra xiii. 10, where λειλουμένος is used of him whose whole body is washed, and νίψασθαι is joined with τοὺς πόδας. (Markl. and Campbell.) Cotovicus, Itiner. Hieros. p. 292, attests that the fountain of Siloam is much revered by both Christians and Turks, who use the water to wash the eyes in certain disorders of that organ. On κολυμβήθρα see Note supra v. 2. This order (like that of Elijah to Naaman, 2 Kings v. 10, to wash seven times in Jordan) was doubtless given to try his faith.

The words δ ἐρμηνεύεται, ἀπεσταλμένος are by Wassenburgh and Kuinoel considered as a gloss. But there is every reason to think that they are genuine; for such etymological interpretations of names were then very usual; as might be shown by many examples, both from the Scriptural and the Classical writers, especially Thucydides; though such passages have usually proved traps into which ignorant or unwary Critics have fallen.

8. τυφλός.] The reading is here uncertain; several ancient MSS. and Versions, and some Fathers having προσαιτῆς, which is preferred by most Critics, and received by almost every Editor from Griesbach to Scholz; but, I conceive, on insufficient grounds. Whichever be the true reading, one must be an intentional alteration; for neither could be a gloss on the other. Now it seems more probable that τυφλ. should be altered into προσαιτῆς, than προσ. into τυφλ. And I suspect that the former alteration was made by those who took the εἶπεν for a causative conjunction. Thus it is in the Versions rendered quia or quod. And if that were the right interpretation, the sense would rather require προσαιτῆς than τυφλός. But thus οἱ Σαυρ. αὐ. τὸ πρ. would yield a double sense; and ὁρῶντες would be required, not θεωροῦντες. In short, there can be little doubt but that ignorance, or inattention to the Hellenism in οἱ θεωροῦντες αὐτὸν εἶπεν ἦν for οἱ Σαυρ. εἶπεν αὐτὸς ἦν, led to the mistake and alteration in question. And surely τυφλ. is far more suitable in sense than προσαιτῆς; since the man's blindness, as connected with this miracle, would be far more obvious to public observation than his mendacity. The full sense is: 'And those who had seen, ascertained, and known him to be blind.' This is mentioned in order to place in a strong point of view the evidence which existed for the miracle, and to show that deception or collusion was impossible. The Evangelist might, indeed, have written τυφλός καὶ προσαιτῆς, which is actually found in a few MSS. and Latin Versions; but it was not necessary; for the latter circumstance comes out in the subsequent narration. The Critics who formed the text of those MSS. were, I suspect, induced to concoct the reading τυφλός καὶ προσαιτῆς, because πτωχὸς τυφλός was a common phrase in Greek as caecus regalis in Latin; the blind being almost always beggar.

11, 12. The simple statement of the fact here, without any observations on it, is worthy of verities. (Scott.) See also Doddridge.

11. ἀνέβλεψα] 'I received my sight;' anale xv. 18. The term may, indeed, seem rather to denote the recovery of sight. But it admits of the present sense; since ἀνά is often used for ἀνω, upward, and consequently may mean to look up; the peculiar faculty of the human eye, 'quibus os sublime dedit,' scil. Deus.

13. τοὺς Φαρ.] Meaning the Sanhedrin, the far greater part of whom were Pharisees. That these were the ruisers, is plain from v. 23 & 24.

καὶ οἱ Φαρισαῖοι πῶς ἀνέβλεψεν. Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Πηλὸν ἐπέθηκε μου ἐπὶ τοὺς ὀφθαλμούς, καὶ ἐνψάμην, καὶ βλέπω. ^{f ver. 31, 32. supra 5. 2. & 7. 13.} Ἔλεγον οὖν ἐκ τῶν Φαρισαίων τινές· Οὗτος ἄνθρωπος οὐκ ἐστὶ παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ὅτι τὸ σάββατον οὐ τηρεῖ. Διὰ τοῦτο οἱ γονεῖς αὐτοῦ εἶπον· Ὅτι ἡλικίαν ἔχει, αὐτὸν ἐρωτήσατε. ^{i Josh. 7. 19. i Sam. 6. 5. ver. 16.} Ἐφώνησαν οὖν ἐκ δευτέρου τὸν ἄνθρωπον ὃς ἦν τυφλός, καὶ εἶπον αὐτῷ· Δός

ἡ μου.] This position of μου, before instead of ἐφ' ὧν, is found in most of the best MSS. early Editions, and has been, with reason, fixed by almost all Editors from Wetstein to scil. ἀπισταλμένος, omitted from God.

πῶς δύναται ἀπὸ ἀμαρτ.] By ἀμαρτ. are, as at v. 25, simply meant a sinner, by an impostor. See 2 Thess. ii. 3. The argument is, that an impostor would not be endowed with the power of working miracles; or if (as the Jewish doctors admitted) any one so endowed, he was plainly commissioned on high, and could therefore dispense with ritual observances.

ὅτι τί λέγεις—ὅτι ἡνοιξέ, &c.] There is passion (with some) to break up the sentence into two interrogations: 'What sayest thou of—that he hath opened thine eyes?' For specious reasons may be adduced in favour of this method, yet thus the second question is but futile, because it had before been put, the man had manifestly recovered his sight. Better, with all the ancient and most modern commentators, to assign the sense: 'What sayest (i. e. what opinion hast thou) of him, in (supposed) he hath opened thine eyes?' or, 'of his opening thine eyes.' Moreover, ὅτι ἐκ καθότι, as Luke i. 7, καθότι ἡ Ἐλ. ἦν ἡ, &c.

προφήτης.] Not meaning, 'the Prophet said by Moses' (as some understand); for that

ἀνθρ., as Euthymius explains. It is plain from v. 31, 36, that the man considered Jesus only as a prophet, or rather, a man of God, Θεοσεβής; certainly not as the Son of God.

18. Ἰουδαῖοι; i. e. the Φαρισαῖοι before mentioned. Ἐφώνησαν, 'had summoned,' καὶ ἥρωτ., 'and had asked.'

19. οὗτός ἐστιν—ἐγεννήθη;] Lampe, Markl., Kuinoel, and Tittman think that two questions are here blended into one, i. e. 'Is this your son? Do ye say he was born blind?' Such would, indeed, be the more regular manner of expression; but the present is the more simple, natural, and characteristic of the persons; for, in their haste to proceed from interrogation to imputation of fraud, they blurt out the latter (which is implied in λέγεις), together with the former. In their answer, the parents pass over the imputation, and consider the words as comprehending two questions, to which they reply.

21. ἡλικίαν ἔχει.] Meaning, 'He is of an age sufficient to enable him to give testimony. He is come to years of discretion.' Of this idiom examples have been adduced from Xen. and Isæus.

22. συνετίθειντο] 'de communi consilio decreverunt,' as in Acts xxiii. 20. On this use of the Pluperf. Pass. in the Deponent sense, the reader is referred to Buttm. Gr. p. 234. and Win. Gr. Gr. Ὁμολογήσῃ Χριστόν. Sub. εἶπας.

—ἀποσυνάγωγος γίνεσθαι] 'should be excommunicated.' There were three sorts of excommunication (see Horne's Introd.), the second of which is supposed to be here meant.

nify,—what it might seem to import,—‘Give the praise of thy cure to God [and not to this man]’. For the absence of the Article will scarcely permit such a sense; and what is more, the words are a form of expression, often employed in the Old Test., to seriously admonish any one to speak the truth (see Josh. vii. 18, 19. 1 Sam. vi. 5. Jer. xii. 16): ‘a lie being (as Lampe observes) a denial of the omniscience, holiness, truth, and justice of God. Consequently he who wilfully conceals the truth, or declares a falsehood, insults all those attributes of the Deity.’ Thus the form was used when a confession of crime was to be wrung from any one. The sense, then, is: ‘Confess the truth: hast thou been really blind from thy birth, and been healed by this man? They hoped thus to detect some fraud or collusion; but being disappointed, they resolved to excommunicate the man immediately.

25. εἰ ἁμαρτωλὸς—οἶδα.] The Commentators are not agreed as to the scope and character of these words, in which some recognise dissimulation, others sarcasm; neither of which views seems well founded. It is better (with Brug., Camer., Grot., and Whitby) to take these words to mean, that ‘he has no knowledge of what they allege;’ q. d. ‘That Jesus is a sinner, I know not;’ εἰ being put for ὅτι. But as the authority for this signification of εἰ is precarious, we must retain the usual sense whether, and take οὐκ οἶδα in a popular sense to denote, ‘I give no opinion: I have nothing to do with that.’ This view is confirmed by the words following, ἐν οἶδα, which do not imply knowledge of nothing besides, but of one thing especially. So Aristoph. Av. 1176, τίς τῶν θεῶν; Αἰ. οὐκ ἴσμεν ὅτι δ’ εἶχε περὰ, τοῦτ’ ἴσμεν. Arist. Pax, 227, οὐκ οἶδα πλὴν ἐν, ὅτι (which words are also an answer to a question). Eurip. El. 752, οὐκ οἶδα, πλὴν ἐν—φύμιον οἰμωγῇ κλύω. Soph. Œd. Col. 1161, τί προσχρῆζοντα τῷ δακτύλῳ; Οὐκ οἶδα, πλὴν ἐν, σου γὰρ κ. τ. λ. Eurip. Iph. Taur. ποδοπαῖ; Ἕλληνες, ἐν τοῦτ’ οἶδα, κού περαιτέρω.

26, 27. The Sanhedrim now repeat the same question before proposed. A crafty device, by which they hoped to detect some discrepancy in his testimony, which might stamp falsehood on the whole; or they hoped that some additional circumstances would transpire, from which they might plausibly reason that the blindness was not real,—or, at least, not from his birth. The man, however, now perceives their aim; and, no longer able to suppress his indignation, impatiently exclaims, εἰπον, &c.

27. οὐκ ἠκούσατε] ‘attended not to what I said.’ The next words are ironical.

28. ἐλοιδόρησαν καὶ εἶπον] put for ἐλεῖ εἰπόντες; for they thought it abuse enough to call him the disciple of an impostor.

29. οὐκ οἶδ’—ἴσμεν.] A popular expression, importing, ‘We know not his Divine mission, whether his doctrine and miracles proceed from Divine origin, or demoniacal agency.’ (See vi. 27, Note.)

30. ἐν τούτῳ] scil. μέρι, ‘in this circumstance.’ Γὰρ has here, like the Heb. 7, the sense of quod. Ὑμεῖς is emphatical. Καὶ, ‘and yet.’ The sense is: ‘This truly is strange, that you, who pretend to distinguish true from false prophets, should not be able to discern with whom power as comes who gives sight to those born blind.’

31. οἶδαμεν] ‘it is well known.’ The following is a sentiment frequent in Scripture (see Ps. lxxvi. 18. Is. i. 15.), and also found in Rom. ii. a. 218, “Ὅσκι θεοῖς ἐπιτελεῖσθαι, μέγα γ’ (I conjecture Γ’) ἔκλυον αὐτοῦ. This and that in the next clause are intended to be especially applied to the case of false prophets asking countenance from God.

32. ἐκ τοῦ αἰῶνος] ‘from the beginning of the world.’ See Note on Luke i. 70. Τς, scil. ἄθροπος, any mere man. Though communication of sight, in some cases, to those born blind, is of late been effected by the improvements of modern surgical art, yet that does not affect the present case; for the operation in question demands the intervention of the most consummate skill and labour, and it would be equally a miracle to restore such persons to sight without those means.

34. ἐν ἁμαρτίαις σὺ ἐγεννήθης ὅλος!] This may, as some think, be said on the same principle which prompted the question of the disciples, v. 1. Though it should rather seem to be, as the ant Commentators, ancient and modern, regard it, an hyperbolic phrase, equivalent to scilicet scelus. Perhaps it is a blending of two phrases, ὅλος ἁμαρτωλὸς εἶμι, and ἐν ἁμαρτίαις ἐγεννήθην, formed on Ps. li. 5, which would form the most opprobrious speech that can well be imagined.

— ἐξέβαλον αὐτόν ἔξω.] The Commentators are not agreed whether this means 'thrust him out of the council-chamber,' or 'excommunicated him.' The expression must signify the former; at the latter may be implied; the turning him out being a kind of symbolical action.

35. πιστεύεις—Οὐοῦ;] Almost all Commentators regard these words as only importing, Dost thou believe in the coming of the Messiah? as all pious Jews did. But the mode of address seems to be directed to the state of the man's mind; who, though at the time the miracle was worked upon him, and even when brought before the Sanhedrim, seems to have regarded Jesus as only a prophet; yet, on reflection, and consideration of the wonderful works Jesus had done, began to think that he must be more than prophet, and to wish to be his disciple. Indeed an answer seems to comprehend two things: 1st, Yes, Sir, I have that belief; and 2dly, 'Canst thou tell me where, or who, that personage is, that I may believe in him, and commit myself to his teaching?' The words seem to express a sort of expectation that the extraordinary person whom he was addressing, could tell him who and where the Messiah was, or perhaps might himself be that personage. In this view, the words of his answer may be regarded as a delicate way of saying, 'Art thou that personage? dost thou sustain that character?'

35. καί.] This I have, with Griesbach, Matthei, Vater, and Scholz, introduced into the text, as the authority of many of the best MSS., Versions, Fathers, and early Editions. The omission of which other instances occur infra xiv. 22) appears to have arisen from the verse just below.

39. These words were spoken for the sake of the by-standers, since the very act of worshipping could be likely to draw a crowd of persons about him.

— eis κρίμα, &c.] Some understand κρίμα in the sense of condemnation; while others signify that of judgment and declaration; i. e. for the purpose of judging (concerning men),

showing their condition and pointing out their duties.' Yet that, besides being a sense not well established, deprives the words of the point and significance, which, from what follows, it is evident they were intended to convey. Far more probable in itself, and agreeable to the proper signification of the word, is the sense assigned by Chrysostom and Euthymius, and adopted by some eminent modern Commentators, who take eis κρίμα as put for eis διάκρισιν καὶ διαχωρισμόν, for distinction (and consequently discrimination), i. e. 'that men's real characters may be put to the proof' as to their use or abuse of their opportunities. So it is elsewhere said of Christ (Luke ii. 35), that he 'came for the falling and rising up of many in Israel, that the thoughts of many hearts might be revealed.' This sense, indeed, is quite agreeable to the primitive signification of κρίνειν, which is to winnow, and, in a general way, to separate, divide, as an army into ranks. So Xenoph. Mem. iii. 1. 9, κρίνειν τοὺς ἀγαθοὺς καὶ τοὺς κακοὺς. See also Hom. II. β. 362. We may, however, retain the usual sense judgment, meaning condemnation; such as that spoken of supra iii. 18, that 'he who believeth not, is condemned already.' An idea, indeed, which seems contained both in the text and the context. For what but this is it that is implied in the words just after, 'If ye were blind (meaning, in any other sense but wilfully blind), ye would have no sin; but ye say, We see: therefore your sin remaineth;' evidently meaning, that thus they are condemned, and that out of their own mouth. So it is said, iii. 19, 'This is the judgment (αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ κρίσις), that light is come into the world, and men have loved darkness rather than light.'

In the next words the ἵνα is not causal, but eventual, or rather consequential. The general meaning being, 'Thus while I make some to see (as this man whose eyes I have opened), others I am the means of making blind (comp. 2 Cor. ii. 16); i. e. the effect or consequence of his coming into the world will be, that those who are blind, through simple ignorance, will see (namely, by the light of the Gospel, and the illumination of the Holy Spirit); and those who have the use of sight (i. e. have knowledge), but are blinded by passion and prejudice, will not see what is before their eyes, but be left judiciously to their own blindness. By the οἱ βλέποντες are meant the οἱ δοκοῦντες βλέπειν, those who were thought to have, and thought they had, a knowledge of God's word; inasmuch that οἱ βλέποντες, 'those who see,' was an unusual appellative given by the Jews to their more eminent Doctors of the law.

41. εἰ τυφλοὶ ἦτε.] Our Lord hints that they labour under a more incurable blindness than those whom they despised. The full sense is, 'If ye were [simply] ignorant, your unbelief might be excusable; but, since ye profess to be wise, your unbelief remains [inexcusable].' They had every advantage of coming at the truth, and recognising Jesus as the Messiah; but they resisted conviction, were wilfully blind, and therefore their sin of unbelief could not but rest upon them unexpiated, and sink them in perdition; comp. viii. 24. Ἀμαρτίαν ἔχειν is a phrase signifying to be guilty of any crime, and be liable to punishment for it. It is not a mere Hellenistic idiom, since I find it in Plato iv. p. 70. Bip. ὁ μὴ ἔχων κακίαν, καὶ ὁ ἔχων ἀδικίαν.

X. 1. seqq. Some Commentators and Harmonists think that the discourse in vv. 1—22 was delivered at another time, and after an interval of two months. But it is so closely connected in subject with the preceding, that it must have followed after it; otherwise, indeed, the parable would be very abruptly brought in; whereas, taken in connexion with the foregoing, it is very apposite. See Scott. Moreover, the introductory ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν is never used at the beginning of a discourse, but is employed to introduce some further remark or admonition; see John v. 24, 25. vi. 26. 32. viii. 34, &c. And the Evangelist seldom commences any new narrative without some kind of preface, however brief. Besides, ver. 21 may be supposed to have reference to the blind man. And, indeed, the imputation lately cast upon our Lord, ix. 24, of being an impostor, would induce him to take the first opportunity of retorting the charge on his calumniators, and showing that he sought nothing but the benefit of the people; that he was the true Shepherd, the Messiah; and that they who called themselves the shepherds of the people, and excommunicated those who acknowledged the Messiah, were the false teachers and impostors: that he himself, so far from seeking, as an impostor would, his own interest, sought nothing but the benefit of the people, and would lay down his life for them. In illustration our Lord borrows an image from pastoral life. He shows that those teachers alone were worthy of the name of shepherds, who, having learnt of Him, should preach his doctrine. In this, and other of his discourses recorded by St. John, our Lord was pleased to employ expressions highly figurative, in order to show the nature of his person and office. Why he was pleased to do this, will appear from what is said in the Note on Parabolical instruction at Matt. xiii. 3. Here it will be proper to be more than usually attentive to the precaution there suggested, as to the application of Parables; namely, not to press too much on particular terms or circumstances, such being but ornamental, and forming, as it were, the drapery to the figure in the pictures. Thus here by the sheepfold is evidently meant Christ's kingdom on earth; by the door, Christ himself; and by the thieves and robbers, the chief priests and Pharisees. Respecting the other terms the correspondence is either very slight, or does not exist at all.

But to advert to the scope of the present portion, vv. 1—21, most of the ancient and earlier modern Commentators supposed the subject of it to be the entering upon ecclesiastical offices without being authorized by a commission from those who have such commission regularly transmitted down from the Apostles, and derived consequently from Christ himself. But that such a sense can be deduced from the present passage, neither the nature of the context, nor the import of the words will, I think, permit us to suppose. The purpose here in view is undoubtedly (according to the opinion of the most eminent of the more recent Commentators) that which has been above detailed. It therefore has reference not to teachers, but to Christians in general.

1. αὐλῆν.] The word means an open level, formed by hurdles and wickerwork. By αὐλῆ τῶν προβάτων is here designated the Jewish people, the Church of God and Christ, who needed the food of spiritual instruction; see Ezek. xxxiii. 11. Jerem. xxiii. 4, sq. To enter in by the door was a proverbial expression, to denote making a regular ingress. So Arrian in Epict. ii. 11, ἀρχὴ φιλοσοφίας, παρὰ γὰρ τοῦ ἐν δαί, καὶ ἐν τῇ θύρᾳ, ἀπτομῶναι αὐτῇ, συνελθῆναι τῇ αὐτοῦ δασθαλίᾳ. Christ is called the door, since by him ('the way, the truth, and the life') we have 'an entrance ministered unto us into the everlasting kingdom' (2 Pet. i. 11). Κλέπτης and ληστής properly differ, as our thief (or pilferer) and robber (or highwayman), the one referring to private stealing, the other to public and violent robbery. Here, however, they have little or no difference, but, being united, exert a force greater than either would bear separately.

3. ὁ θυρωρὸς] i. e. one of the under-shepherds in attendance at the door of the αὐλή. To properly understand this, we must bear in mind that the Jewish sheepfolds were strong, substanbuildings, guarded and secured, both within without, surrounded by a wall to prevent access, except by the regular entrance, and closed with a door, kept by a porter, and fortified with bars and bolts; see Mr. Greswell, Parab. τῆς φωνῆς αὐ. ἀκούει) i. e. attend to, obey id est. Φωνή denotes either those inarticulate sounds, as whistling, &c., or certain words, as were addressed to the animals, on which Aristotle. Hist. An. vi. 19. The calling them by their names is illustrated by what Wolf and Stein adduce, who prove that ancient names given not only to horses, oxen, dogs, &c., but to goats and sheep; see Hartley's Journal, says he tried it in Greece, and found the same still to exist. Finally, the fact of sheep hearing the shepherd's voice is corroborated by modern travellers and writers; and Polybius tells us, that in the island of Cyrrus, off the coast, the surface of the country being open with woods, and very rocky, the flocks taught to obey and attend their keepers by sound of a horn.

2. lxxvii. 20. lxxx. 1. The custom (not introduced by the Moors) still continues in the West. Yet how ancient was the practice, at least in the West, for the sheep to go before, and the shepherd follow, may be inferred from the suggestion by the Greek word πρόβατον. All is here meant by ἔμπρ. αὐ. πορ. is leading, going, and taking care of them. Comp. Ps. xxiii. πρὶν ἀκολουθήσωσιν.] Several of the most ancient MSS. and Fathers have ἀκολουθήσουσιν, only an alteration for adaptation to the next; yet unnecessary; the sense being, 'but as far as they would by no means follow,' namely, were to lead them.

In this and the following passage we have anaphora, but an explanation or application of the foregoing (Kuinoel and Tittman). That by way of intimating the purport of the story. Greswell, however, considers it as by a continuation and an enlargement of the story, though with this difference, that the former is allegory throughout, the latter is not. Indeed amidst a profusion of figurative images Christ has distinctly appropriated to their true sense only the personal character of the shepherd and owner of the flock, and the personal character of those opposed to him, whether as robbers or hired attendants on the sheep.

Θύρα, like the Heb. פֶּתַח, denotes not only door, but access; also, as here, the medium thereof, he who gives it. To which purpose Wetstein appositely cites a passage of Ignat. ad Philadelph. § 9, αὐτὸς ὁν θύρα τοῦ Πατρὸς, δι' ἧς εἰσέρχονται Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Ἰσαὰκ καὶ Ἰακώβ καὶ οἱ προφῆται, see Eph. ii. 18. Taken in conjunction with what precedes, the primary import of the words must be, that Christ is the only way through which mankind can obtain salvation (see ver. 9. xiv. 6); though it may include, in an under sense, that as a man must observe and pass through the door, in order to his making a regular and unsuspected entrance into a sheep-fold, so any one must maintain a proper regard to Christ, in order to his being a true teacher in the Church, and must pass, as it were, through him, or by his authority, into his office.

8. πρὸ ἐμοῦ.] These words, which have perplexed Interpreters of every age, are not found in very many MSS., Versions, Fathers, and early Editions, and are rejected by Grotius and Campbell, and cancelled by Matthæi; but wrongly; for it is one of the most certain of Critical canons that an omission of words, which have occasioned perplexity to Commentators, is always to be regarded as suspicious. And there are reasons which make this Canon stronger in the Scriptures than in the Classical writers. The omission might here be purposely made, to save the honour of Moses and the Prophets, especially as the Manichæans denied their Divine legation. Internal evidence, therefore, is so strong in favour of these words, as to balance even a superiority of external, which, however, does not exist. Besides, the words are almost necessary to make any tolerable sense. They must, then, be regarded as genuine. And the only question is, what is their true import? Many ancient and modern Commentators take πρὸ for ἀπὸ, and suppose an ellipsis of ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ Πατρὸς μου; understanding it of false Christs, as Theodas, and Judas of Galilee. A view also maintained by those who take πρὸ in the usual sense before. Of these two interpretations, however, the former supposes a sense by no means authorized by use, and introduces an inadmissible ellipsis; nay, involves an anachronism; for, as the best Expositors

tors are agreed, it cannot be proved that there were any false Christs previous to that time. And if even one such could be found, it would not justify the πάντες ὅσοι. One thing is plain, that our Lord could not have meant to include Moses and the Prophets, of whom he everywhere speaks in terms of the highest reverence. The best solution of this difficulty is supposed to be that of Bengel, Rosenmuller, Campbell, and Kuinoel, who think that ἦλθον is to be taken of time recently past, and up to the present; i. e. and that by the term 'have come,' is meant 'have lately come' in the character of teachers of God's people. Now our Lord (say they) throughout this discourse considers himself, viz., as the supreme spiritual Shepherd, through whose instruction and grace the under shepherds must be admitted into his fold, the Church. 'In this view (says Campbell) the words are directed chiefly against the Scribes and Pharisees, considered as teachers, whose doctrine was far from breathing the same spirit with his, and whose chief object was not, like that of the good Shepherd, to feed and protect the flock, but like that of the robber, or of the wolf, to devour them.' Yet in this there is something not a little harsh; 1. in arbitrarily taking ἦλθον as a kind of Preterite-present; 2. in understanding ἦλθον to mean 'have come, as teachers;' for (not to mention that this is inconsistent with the πρὸ ἐμοῦ) our Lord is here not representing himself as a teacher, but as the good Shepherd; which, as is shown at ver. 11, must principally involve the idea of governing. But how, then, will the parallel hold good between the Messiah and the Scribes and Pharisees? In order to remove this difficulty, many have understood ὅσοι πρὸ ἐμοῦ of false Christs. This however (as we have seen) is at variance with facts. After full and repeated consideration of the words, I am persuaded that the only way to arrive at the truth is to suppose the parallel to be perfect, and to keep in view the leading idea in ποιμὴν ὁ καλός. In short, by ὅσοι πρὸ ἐμοῦ ἦλθον are, I conceive, meant those who before Christ had come in the character of supreme Shepherd of the people, and promising access to salvation, as Mediator of the Mosaic covenant. So Gal. iii. 19, the Law is said to have been διαταγὴ δι' ἀγγέλων ἐν χειρὶ μεσίτου. And at Hebr. viii. 6. ix. 15. xii. 24, the mediator of the new and better covenant is tacitly compared with that of the old and imperfect one. Now that this Mediator under the old covenant could be no other than the High Priest is plain, and is proved by the parallel drawn by St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Hebrews, between Christ and the Mediator of the first covenant, the High Priest; first, between Moses, the original Mediator, and Christ, chap. iii.; and then between the successive High Priests, the High Priests for the time being, ch. iv. 15, οὗ γὰρ ἔχοντες ἀρχιερεῖα μὴ δυνάμεν, &c. ἀλλὰ, &c. Again, ch. v. 1, it is said, πᾶς γὰρ ἀρχιερεὺς ἐξ ἀνθρώπων λαμβανόμενος, which is exemplified by Aaron, the first High Priest. So also at ch. vii. he continues the parallel between these mediators, the High Priests who die, and he who is a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec, ἀπάτωρ, ἀμήτωρ, ἀγενεαλόγητος: who οὐ κατὰ νόμον ἐντολῆς σαρκικῆς γίγνεται, ἀλλὰ κατὰ δύναμιν ζωῆς ἀκαταλύτου, ver. 16. So also at ver. 23 he contrasts the High Priests and the Messiah thus: καὶ οἱ μὲν πλείονες εἰσι γιγνόμενοι ἱερεῖς, διὰ τὸ θανάτου κολλῆσθαι παραμύνην ὁ δὲ, &c., and ver. 26, τοιοῦτος γὰρ ἡμῖν ἱερεὺς ἀρχιερεὺς, ὅσιος, ἀκακος, ἀμίαντος, &c.; see also vv. 27, 28. At chapters viii. and ix. he proceeds in the parallel, instituting a minute comparison. Thus it is evident that the expression in question, ὅσοι πρὸ ἐμοῦ ἦλθον may very well mean those who before Christ had sustained the office of temporary mediators between God and man, but who were now disannulled by the disannulling of the old covenant, and the coming of a new and better Mediator, the Lord of the Temple himself. But how, it may be asked, does this character of κλέπται καὶ λ. correspond to the High Priests? I answer, 1. it has been admitted by almost every Commentator that πάντες may very well be taken to denote πολλοί. 2. It is almost universally agreed, that by κλέπται καὶ ληστοὶ we are only to understand rapacious persons, chiefly intent on gain. And that most of the High Priests under the second Temple at least were such, the History of Josephus will abundantly testify; nay, it is clear that almost all of them for the last 60 or 70 years had been such: persons who bought their office, and then made as much of it as they could, for the short time they were allowed to hold it. The traits of their characters, as delineated by Josephus, exactly correspond to those adverted to in the present comparison, vv. 10, 12, 13, namely, avarice and avarition, united with the utmost timidity and neglect of protecting those under their governance. That our Lord meant chiefly the High Priests of a recent period, is plain from the use of the present tense εἰσι. Now that the sheep should not listen to their spiritual admonitions might be expected; and that they did not is attested by what we find in Josephus.

9. ἡ θύρα.] Meaning, the [only] Mediator, through whom access is given to the Father, see Rom. v. 2. Eph. ii. 18, compared with Hebr. ix. 15.

— εἰάν τις εἰσέλθῃ—αὐρήσει.] Commentators are not agreed whether these words are to be referred to shepherds (i. e. spiritual pastors), or the sheep, their flock. Some suppose the former; some the latter; and Tittmann both. But if the view above taken of the foregoing verses be correct, they can only refer to the people: indeed, they could not be referred to pastors without great harshness. Σωθ. may thus be interpreted: 'shall be placed in a state of salvation.' And the word εἰσελεύσεται forms a pastoral image expressive of undisturbed enjoyment of the blessing in question. Comp. Ps. xxiii. 1, 2.

10. ὁ κλέπτης.] 'The false teacher,' i. e. 'the false teachers;' for this is (as appears from ver. 1) put in the sing., as being taken for a genus; on which see Middleton, Gr. Art. The terms θύρα and ἀπολίσση are graphic (signifying respectively 'butcher and destroy'), and describe what our often done by the roving bands of marauders who then infested Judea, and who used to destroy what they could not carry off: see Note on Acts xx. 29. Thus the sense is: 'For whereas their purpose is but to destroy the sheep for their own selfish ends, mine is to preserve and feed them.'

— καὶ περισσὸν ἔχωσι.] Those words serve to strengthen the sense of the preceding clause. The words should be translated, 'and that they might have it superabundantly.' Sheep, in order to thrive, must have not merely sufficient, but exuberant pasturage; see Lucret. ii. 317. i. 258. Thus is intimated the infinite richness of that salvation, unto which believers attain through Christ; see 1 Cor. ii. 9. 2 Pet. i. 11. 2 Cor. iv. 15. 1 Tim. i. 14.

11. The image is here changed, and (in order to introduce some points connected with his mediatorial office), instead of the door of the fold, our Lord represents himself under the emblem of the shepherd, hereby contrasting his own conduct with that of the false shepherds.

— ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ καλός.] By ποιμὴν many think is simply meant 'teacher.' But to this it has been justly objected by Tittman, that the word has no where else that sense, but usually involves the idea of governing, protecting, taking care of. Thus, in the Old Test. kings are often called shepherds; as also in Homer and Æschylus. And in the New Test.: ποιμὴν is the name given to the Curatees ecclesiae, otherwise called ἐπίσκοποι, as Eph. iv. 11; and in 1 Pet. ii. 25, our Lord is called ποιμὴν καὶ ἐπίσκοπος τῶν ψυχῶν ἐμῶν. And as in Hebr. xiii. 20, our Lord is called ὁ ποιμὴν τῶν προβάτων ὁ μέγας, so was he foretold under that character in the prophecies of the Old Test.; see Is. xl. 11. Ezek. xxxiv. 12. 23. Zech. xiii. 7. Mic. v. 4. Hence there is no doubt but that by this expression (meaning the person who is the real owner and true lover of the sheep) our Lord meant to represent himself as the spiritual head of his Church.

— ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ καλὸς τὴν ψυχὴν, &c.] The expression ψυχὴν τιθεῖν answers to the Hebr. נַפְשׁוֹ תַתֵּן, which literally denotes profoundere vitam, but in use generally, only to hazard one's life; a sense here adopted by several eminent Expositors; while the ancient and most modern ones more properly assign the former: for though the restricted sense is very agreeable to the natural import of the expression, yet the full sense is demanded by the figurative one as applied to the Redeemer. Our Lord, indeed, here only intimates what at ver. 17 he plainly expresses. His meaning is, 'As the good shepherd hazards, or even lays down, his life for his flock (see Nil. Ital. iii. fin.), so does the Messiah, represented by the Prophets under that character, lay down his life for his spiritual flock, the human race;' words strongly inculcating the great doctrine of the Atonement.

12. ὁ μισθωτὸς δὲ, &c.] This is intended to illustrate the character of the good shepherd by contrast with the bad, who is called a hireling (i. e. one hired to feed the sheep), not because all such hirelings are unfaithful, but that they are generally, more or less, such. Ὁ μισθωτὸς must, like ὁ κλέπτης and ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ καλός before, denote a whole class of persons. And we may suppose (with Lampe, Kuinoel, and Tittman) that the Ecclesiastical rulers of that time are here meant, as at v. 8. So that the term μισθωτὸς perhaps also intimates their avarice, and preference of the honours and emoluments of their office, to discharging its duties. Here Wetstein compares a passage of Themist. I. p. 10. ποιμῶν ἐκείνο εὐκόλουν τοῖς λύκοις, ὅτι ὁ ποιμὴν ἀπεχθαίνοιτο — κακὸς βουκόλος — αὐτοὺς δὲ ἵσται μισθωτὸς ἀντὶ βουκόλου — ὁ δὲ ἀγαθὸς νομῶς πολλὰ μὴ δύναιται ἐκ τοῦ ἔργου, πλεῖον δὲ ἔχει ἀνταφελῆν, θηρία δὲ ἀπερύκων, καὶ πᾶσι ὑγιεινῇ προορώμενος, καὶ μὴ δὴ ἀντιφλοῦσι μάλιστα βόες μὴ ἀγαπῶντα βουκόλον.

— οὐ οὐκ εἰσὶ τὰ πρόβατα.] These words show that the shepherd is supposed to be likewise the owner of the sheep; such as in Hom. Odys. iv. 87, is called indifferently ἀναξ (master) and ποιμὴν. So also Sil. Ital. iii. fin. 'stabulique gregisque magister.'

14. γινώσκω — ἐμῶν.] These words figuratively designate the mutual love and attachment of the great Shepherd and his spiritual flock. Comp. v. 15. with 17. So Heb. 57. See Amos iii. 2.

15. καθὼς γινώσκει — Πατέρα.] These words are closely connected with the preceding verse (from which they are unnaturally disjoined by the division of verses), being an illustration by similitude of what was there said; q. d. 'I both know my sheep, and am known of them, even as the Father knoweth me, and I know the Father.' See Smith's Scrip. Test., vol. ii. 61. Similarly it is said, 1 Cor. xiii. 12, τότε δὲ ἐγινώσκειμαι καθὼς καὶ ἐγινώσθη, 'even as I am known.'

On the deep doctrine involved in this reciprocity of knowledge between the Father and the Son, see Smith's Scrip. Test., I. iii. § 4, and on the evidence to the Divinity of Christ in this whole context, see L. ii. ch. 4. § 23, as headed, 'Jehovah the Saviour and Shepherd.'

15. τὴν ψυχὴν—προβάτων.] Our Lord here applies what he had already said of a good shepherd, to himself; and openly declares, that he shall offer up his life for men, and for their salvation. By what means and how that death is available to the salvation of men, we are not clearly informed. We may, however, suppose it to be as follows. Our Lord describes the sheep for whom he lays down his life as being in extreme peril (see v. 10, 12); and St. Paul calls those for whom Christ died, weak, sinful, &c., but to be preserved from wrath. Thus in Matth. xx. 28, where our Lord is said δοῦναι τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ λύτρον ἂντι πολλῶν. Now λύτρον denotes the price of redemption, i. e. the money given, or the sacrifice offered, by which any one shall be redeemed from peril and punishment,—and what is given, 1. for another, in his place and in his stead; 2. that the other should be liberated from punishment; 3. that it should be sufficient, and not require any other price. See Is. liii. 10. Hence it is plain what was the purpose of the death of Christ, and for what causes he laid down his life. He died, 1. in the place and stead of men; 2. to obtain their liberation from the punishment of sin, or to obtain pardon of their sin; 3. that his death should be sufficient to obtain the pardon of sin. Those therefore are in grievous error who maintain that Christ died only to confirm the truth of his doctrines, or the certainty of the promises respecting the grace of God and the pardon of sin; since for neither of these purposes would the death of Christ have been necessary. Nay, the truth and certainty of both are sufficiently established from other proofs; neither does our Lord say that he lays down his life for his doctrine, but for his sheep. Hence it is clear that our Lord called himself ποιμὴν, not inasmuch as he was an enlightened and holy teacher of religion; but in a far sublimer sense, namely, inasmuch as by his death he obtained the pardon of sins and the salvation of men. (Tittman.) With the lax dogmas of some recent heresiarchs we may contrast the uncontaminated orthodoxy of an Apostolic Father, as follows: 'Ἐν ἀγάπῃ προσελάβετο ἡμᾶς ὁ Δισπότης, διὰ τὴν ἀγάπην ἣν εἶχεν πρὸς ἡμᾶς, τὸ αἷμα αὐτοῦ ἰδὼκεν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ὁ Χριστὸν ὁ Κύριος ἡμῶν, ἢ θελήματι Θεοῦ, καὶ τὴν σάρκα ὑπὲρ τῆς σαρκὸς ἡμῶν, καὶ τὴν ψυχὴν ὑπὲρ τῶν ψυχῶν τῶν ἡμῶν. Clemens Rom. Epist. I. ad Cor. § 48.

16. ἄλλα πρόβατα—ταύτης.] The Jews and Gentiles are here represented under the image of two different flocks, inclosed in separate folds. Ἀγαγεῖν is for προσαγαγεῖν, 'bring to (this fold).'^h Ἀγειν and its derivatives are frequently employed as pastoral terms. Our Lord calls the Gentiles his sheep, by anticipation, because he had marked them as his own, was about to lay down his life for their salvation, and foresaw that many would shortly embrace his religion, which he expresses in the words τῆς φωνῆς μου ἀκούσουσι. 'Thus (says Tittman) our Lord predicts the future admission of the Gentiles to the Christian flock, and the joint participation of them and the Jews in the blessings obtained by him, under one and the same Lord, so that he might be the author of salvation not to one only, but to all the nations of the universe.' Here especially comp. Is. lvi. 8.

17. ἵνα πάλιν λάβω αὐτήν.] The best Commentators are agreed, that the ἵνα is not causal, or denoting end and purpose, but declarative of the future, or the event, and may be rendered its tamen &c., 'yet so that.'

18. οὐδείς αἶρει αὐτὴν ἀπ' ἐμοῦ] 'no one taketh it from me' (by force). We may paraphrase the passage thus: 'No one [not even the Father] compelleth me to die for my flock. I have, of my own will, undertaken to lay down my life for it. By the same will I shall return again to life.'

—ταύτης—Πατρὸς μου.] 'This charge, or commission, received I from my Father.' In this whole passage our Lord affirms that he is about to undergo death spontaneously; that the making of those who may plot against his life could avail nothing, even were it not decreed that he should undergo death for the salvation of his people; that no force could take away his life, if he were unwilling to part with it; that he freely laid down that life for the salvation of his flock; and that if they shall kill him, it will not be without his own consent. He asserts, moreover, that he lays down his life,—so, however, as to receive it back; and therefore that his death is not to be considered as coming under the common law of mortality, by which all that go down to the tomb return to the dust; but that it is altogether peculiar to itself; since, after a few days, he will rise from the sepulchre, and return to life. He then affirms that his death happens, not by any fate or necessity, but by the eternal counsels of his Father. (Tittman.)

On the strong and irrefragable proof supplied by this passage to the Divinity of Christ, see Dr. Whitby, Abp. Magee, Dr. P. Smith, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Greswell. The point of our Lord's argument is, as Dr. Smith observes, the spontaneity of the act, which he performs in obedience to his Father's will, and for which the Father loves

The ἐντολή, commission, of the Father not only to the resuming of life, but to his transaction, the laying down and re-again; and this is a repetition of the fundamental doctrine of Christianity, that 'all things of the Father, and through the Son; that loved the world, that he gave his only-Son, and sent him into the world, that eld through him might be saved.' So it is of him, Rom. iv. 25, that he 'was de- for our offence, and was raised again for justification.' Dr. Smith ably refutes the him gloss by which ἐξουσία is supposed to a delegated authority; showing its incon- y, both with the rest of Scripture (see Luke Rom. ix. 21. and Acts i. 7.) and especially he context here.

τὰ ἑκαταία.] The word answers in the the Heb. חַסְדִּי, handselling or initiation; the New Test. denotes the encomium, or of eight days, occurring in the month, instituted by Judas Maccabeus in com- mation of the purifying of the Temple from m pollution, and the renewal of the Tem- ship, after three years' desuetude and pro- m. Unlike all other festivals,—which were mly at Jerusalem,—this was celebrated bout the whole of Judæa. And as lights got burning in every house throughout each of the festival, it is called by Josephus, 2. 7. 7, φῶτα.

κερὴν.] Meaning, as the best Commen- are agreed, 'stormy wintry weather,' as in gvi. 3. Acts xxvii. 20. Ezra x. 9. And so m Latin. This suggests a reason for his g in Solomon's Portico.

τοῦ Σολ.] The τοῦ, not found in some and early Editions, has been cancelled by all Editors from Matthæi to Scholz; but As little reason is there, with some, to the τοῖς before Ἱεροσ., in the former part verse.

since this Portico had its name, is a point hat disputed. The opinion of the older mators was, that it was so called, as being m of the Temple of Solomon, which had st undestroyed by the Chaldeans, and was ne allowed to remain, though in a dilapi- state. And they suppose the Portico to be hich Josephus, Antiq. x. 9. 7, calls ἡ ἀνα-) στρον, and which he there expressly says ἦν Σολομώνος τοῦ βασιλέως πρώτου ἱερῶν (I conjecture βασιλ. τοῦ πρώτου as in Bell. v. 4. 1.) τὸ σύμπαν ἱερὸν. Josephus had before related that this Portico s been restored by Herod, which favours position in question; for thus it might more easily preserve the name of its builder; since the Southern Portico, which was the great- est, was called the Royal Portico, as having been especially adorned by the kings, and particularly Herod. Indeed, it can hardly be imagined why this, of all the Porticoes, should be called Solo- mon's, unless from its having been in a great measure the building left by Solomon. It should seem, then, to have been built by Solomon, and afterwards restored, from a dilapidated state, by Zorobabel. This corresponds to what is said in Josephus of that Portico, by which it appears to have needed pulling down and rebuilding; for that is implied in the expression ἀνιγχεῖται.

Far more probable is this than the supposition of many Commentators from Grotius downwards, and most recent ones, that it was called Solomon's Portico, as occupying the place of the Portico built by Solomon on the Eastern side of the hill, and of which mention is made in Joseph. Bell. v. 5. 1; from which passage it appears that this was the only side on which a Portico was then erected; the others, he says, being left without; κατὰ γὰρ τὰ λοιπὰ μέρη γυμνὰ ὁ ναὸς ἦν. There were afterwards porticoes erected all round the Temple.

Porticoes were common in the Heathen temples likewise, being erected for the accommodation of the priests and the worshippers in general, both for walking in inclement weather (so Cebes, cited by Wetstein: ἐνυγχεόμενον περιπατοῦντας ἐν τῷ τοῦ Κρόνου ἱερῷ) and for the purpose of teachers communicating oral instruction, while walking, to their followers; from which circum- stance, indeed, two principal sects of Philosophers, namely, the Stoics and the Peripatetics, derived their names.

24—32. On the scope and character of this important portion, see Smith's Scrip. Test. L. iii. 3. 3, who gives the following summary of the substance of the doctrine therein:—'We have here, 1. the avowal of his official subordination to the Father, in having been designated, com- missioned, sent, and endowed with a peculiar property in his people, and in exercising miracu- lous powers by the authority of the Father. 2. The assertion of his own power to confer the blessings of salvation; namely, holy character, immortal happiness, deliverance from moral dan- ger, and security against all possible hostility. Let it be observed that, in the evident nature of the case, and according to the uniform tenour of Scripture, the bestowment of such gifts im- plies the attribute of All-sufficiency in the Donor. 3. This assurance of security is repeated, with a confirmatory declaration, that the Omnipotence of the Almighty Father is pledged to the same ob- ject. 4. These two assurances are consolidated into the proposition, I and my Father ARE ONE.'

24. αἵρεις] for αἰμαῖς or ἀναρτᾷς. The full sense being, 'keepest us in suspense between hope and fear, belief and disbelief.' So Philostr. Vit. Ap. ii. 4. (cited by Lampe) καὶ πάντων αἵρει ὁ λόγος ὃν εἰρηκε. So in Soph. (Ed. Tyr. 924, ὅφου αἵρειν is used for μεταφριζεσθαι. And in this sense we find suspendere in Latin.

— παρρησίᾳ.] On this expression see Note supra vii. 4. Ὁ Χριστός. This he had by implication claimed to be, by having applied to himself the predictions of the Prophets respecting the Great Shepherd.

25. εἶπον ὑμῖν.] Meaning, 'I have already told you who I am.'

— τὰ ἔργα—ἐμοῦ.] The sense is: '[Nay,] the works (i. e. the miracles) which I do by the authority of my Father, these bear witness of me [that I am sent by Him].' Of this figurative use of μαρτυρεῖν Wetstein adduces an example from Heraclid. de Deo: Ἔργα δὲ μαρτυρεῖν, οἷα ἡλίου· νύξ αὐτῷ καὶ ἡμέρα μαρτυροῦσιν, αὐρα αὐτῷ μαρτυρεῖ, γῆ ὅλη καρποφοροῦσα μάρτυς—οὐρανὸς μαρτυρία. So Ps. xix. 'The Heavens declare the glory of God,' &c. This authority from God, however, our Lord had, not as a mere legate, but as being partaker of the Divine nature and attributes. See v. 17, sq.

26. οὐ γὰρ ἐστε, &c.] This suggests the cause of their unbelief; namely, that they are not of his flock, will not suffer themselves to be brought into it, nor are willing to acquire the proper dispositions for it. With the words καθὼς εἶπον ὑμῖν Commentators are somewhat perplexed, since Christ had no where before told them that they were not his sheep. To remove this difficulty, it seems, some ancient Critics cancelled the clause; for to no other cause can we well ascribe the omission of it in several ancient, but altered, MSS. and some Versions. Nor is it easy to believe (what some modern Critics aver) that the words were foisted in by the scribes; nay, it is incredible that such a clause, by no means necessary to the sense, should have crept into nearly all the MSS. As to Versions, they are not good authority for omissions, and especially of what is perplexing. There can be no doubt that the clause is genuine; and though we find nothing of this kind said in our Lord's preceding discourses, yet may it not have reference to something said by Christ, but not recorded by St. John? This is preferable to supposing, with some, that it was indirectly expressed; i. e. implied in our Lord's words. However, as there is plainly a reference to the preceding discourse of the good shepherd, (for our Lord now proceeds to resume the allegory,) and since, though our Lord does not there use these words, but does, in fact, say (v. 3.) that 'his sheep hear his voice,' so it is probable that καθὼς, &c. belong to those words, and should therefore be joined with the following verse, as they have been, on the authority of some MSS., Versions, and Euthymius, by Pearce, Campbell, Knapp, Vater, and Tittman; whom I have here followed.

27. In this verse our Lord proves, by an argumentum e contrariis, that they are not his sheep, because they obey not the Gospel. (Calvin.)

— τῆς φωνῆς μου &c.] Meaning, 'give heed to obey my commands.' By τὰ πρόβατα τὰ ἐμὰ are meant such of the sheep as acknowledge their shepherd. Γινώσκω, 'I acknowledge them as mine, provide for their welfare.' See v. 14. Ἀκολουθοῦσί μοι, i. e. in faith and obedience.

28. οὐ μὴ ἀπόλωνται εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα.] Meaning: 'At no time, neither in life, nor in death, nor after death, to all eternity, shall any thing happen to them that shall deprive them of salvation.' (Tittman.) Comp. John viii. 51. The words following, καὶ οὐχ ἀρπάσει—μου are confirmatory of the promise; and in the next verse is suggested the reason why no one can snatch these faithful disciples from him; namely, that the Father hath delivered them to him, in order to be preserved and redeemed; that omnipotent Being in whom are the issues of life and death, both temporal and spiritual. The whole passage bears strong attestation to the Divinity of Christ, but gives, as Whitby shows, when properly understood, no countenance to the doctrine (replied by Hebr. xii. 15.) that the elect can never fall away from grace and perish; having, in truth, no relation to personal election, or final perseverance.

30. ἐγὼ καὶ ὁ Πατὴρ ἐν ἑσμεν.] Some ancient and many modern Commentators understand this expression ἐν ἑσμεν of unity of will, purpose, counsel, and words. A view which they support from John xvii. 21—23, and especially from the verse preceding. Yet, so sudden are the transitions, and so discursive the thoughts in our Lord's discourses, as recorded in this Gospel, that any such argument drawn from thence is σαν οὖν πάλιν λίθους οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, ἵνα λιθάσωσιν αὐτόν.

ecarious. By others the expression is taken to note physical unity, namely, of essence and nature, including moral unity. And this Lampe is shown was the view adopted by almost every one of the Orthodox Fathers. Tittman, however, while he rejects the first-mentioned interpretation, declines embracing the latter, and takes the words (as Calvin did) of union of energy and power; a view, indeed, supported by the preceding context. For (as Tittman argues) 1. our Lord at v. 28 attributes the same to himself as his Father. 2. He shows the reason why nothing can be taken from the Father; namely, because he is all-mighty. 3. A reason is added by nothing can be taken from Him any more than from his Father, because they are one, viz. in a work of power, &c. This, Tittman argues, implies union of attributes; and where there is one and the same Divine power and attributes, there must be one and the same Divine nature. Euthymius explains it of power, and consequently of essence and nature; and Dr. Smith, sup. Text., shows at large that 'it must, from the circumstances of the case, be chiefly interested of power, or union of power;' q. d. 'No one can snatch them out of my hand: no one can snatch them out of my Father's hand. I and my Father are ONE.' Whichever interpretation is adopted, the words can import no less than a claim to equality with the Father (and consequently prove the Deity of our Lord), exactly the passage at viii. 58, which, and the present, the Jews evidently so understood. A construction that, had it been false, he would have been used to correct and disavow.

31. ἔβλεψαν] 'took up.' This signification thought to be Hellenistic; but that it is not really such, I have in Recens. Synop. shown, by examples from a Greek writer. On atoning, the punishment inflicted for blasphemy, see iv. xxiv. 14—16.

32. πολλὰ καλὰ ἔργα ἔδειξα ὑμῖν] With reference not only to the wonderful miracles which Jesus wrought, but to his whole course of action promulgating the Gospel of grace. ἔδειξα ὑμῖν, indeed, seem to relate most to the former; & it has often in the Classical writers simply a sense of adere, præstare, to perform. So ibid. Ellip. 512, πολλὰ καὶ καλὰ ἔργα σοφίας ἐδείξατο (where, for ἀπέδ., I conjecture ἔδειξε). Appian, p. 487, ἔργα μέγιστα ἐπέδειξε. Theomist. O. 13, ἔργον καλὸν ἐπέδειξε.

34. οὐκ ἔστι γεγραμμένον, &c.] In repelling the above charge, our Lord was pleased not fully to explain the nature of that union which he had claimed with the Deity, and the grounds on which he had called God his Father, and himself the Son of God; but contented himself with using a sort of argument quite in the Jewish style (and therefore adapted to make an impression on his hearers), reasoning with them on the ground of what they themselves admitted,—namely, that he was a Prophet sent from God,—and showing that, even on that supposition, he had a right to the title which they refused him; alluding to Psalm lxxxii. 6, where judges and magistrates are called Elohim, sons of the most high God. 'Argumentum (says Calvin) autem quo utitur non a paribus sumptum est, sed a minori ad majus.'

35. πρὸς οὓς ὁ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ ἔγ.] Meaning, 'to whom was delivered the command mentioned just before,' namely, to plead the cause of the destitute, &c.

—καὶ οὐ δύναται λυθῆναι ἡ γρ.] Meaning, 'And the Scriptures cannot be taken exception to, or set aside as wrong.' Λύειν, indeed, when used of a law, or other authoritative writing, signifies to abrogate, and also (as here) in a restricted sense, to contravene, or take exception to.

36. ἡγίασε] Here the expression simply means, 'has set apart,' as the τὸν ἅγιον τοῦ Θεοῦ; for ἀγιάζειν, like the Heb. קדשׁ, signifies to set apart from common use, and apply to a sacred purpose. Our Lord did not argue thus, to signify that he was to be called God, and Son of God, in no other sense than that in which those judges were so styled; namely, with respect to office; much less to decline the application of the word in the same sense as of the Father. He merely uses an argument ad exemplum (what the Philosophers call an instance), and argues ab concessis: q. d. Magistrates are called divine, and sons of God, without injury to the Deity; nay, God himself hath so called them. May not I, then, by a similar right, be so called, whom God hath sent into the world, and to whom he hath committed an office far above theirs to whom that name was given?

That the Heathens likewise used to bestow on their kings and princes the title of gods, is proved from various passages of ancient writers cited by Lampe and Wetstein; especially one from Mod. Sic. i. 90, where the cause of this is well pointed out; namely, from their being thought to require a divine inspiration, to discharge their important duties.

37, 38. εἰ οὐ ποιῶ, &c.] Meaning, 'If I had not done the same works which my Father doth, ye might refuse to believe my words; but since they bear the same stamp and impress, you should at least believe them, if you will not believe my words; and then would you understand that the Father is in me, and I in the Father.' (Tittman.)

The words ἐν ἐμοὶ ὁ Πατὴρ—αὐτῷ denote, in a general way, union of the closest kind; and here, by the force of the context, conjunction of one and the same Divine energy. The Father was in the Son, the Son in the Father; inasmuch as the Son hath the same as the Father, and can do, and doth, the same with the Father. Comp. v. 17. In order to understand the true scope and full sense of this passage, see the admirable explanation of Bp. Bull, Judic. Eccl. Cath., p. 42.

39. ἐξῆλθεν ἐκ τῆς χειρὸς αὐ.] Simply meaning, 'withdrew himself from their power,' 'escaped out of their hands.' See Note on viii. 59.

40. πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδ.] Meaning Bethany, or Bethabara, on the other side of the Jordan. See Note on i. 28.

—ἔμεινεν ἐκεῖ] 'abode there;' which, however, does not preclude the supposition of some (as Lampe and Tittman), that he took, during the four months of his sojourn there, some journeys into Perea, but returned in time to receive the message of Mary and Martha respecting the sickness of Lazarus.

41. ἔλεγον, &c.] They reasoned thus: 'John worked no miracle, yet we believed in his divine mission. And now we see it amply proved, by the miracles worked by Him to whom John professed to be but a forerunner.'

XI. The Evangelist now proceeds to narrate the closing scenes of our Lord's life; what is related in this Chapter having taken place only a few days before the Passover on which he suffered death. The raising of Lazarus being a work of all that Christ had hitherto done the most stupendous, was studiously recorded by the Evangelist, as illustrating the majesty of our Lord, and indeed the truth of the Christian religion; inasmuch that Spinoza confessed, that if he could persuade himself that Lazarus was really recalled to life, he would destroy his whole system. No wonder, therefore, that infidels and semi-infidels should have used every endeavour to destroy the credibility of the miracle. Their cavils, however, have been triumphantly refuted by Lardner and others, whom see in Kuinzel and Horne's Introduct.

The genuineness of the present portion rests on the strongest evidence, not only external, but internal. For 'whether (as Tittman observes) we consider the thing itself, or the manner in which it was done, and the effects which resulted from it; or finally, the simplicity and beauty of the narration, we cannot entertain a doubt as to its genuineness.' It bears, in fact, the same stamp of truth as the one, Ch. viii. 1—11.

1. ἀσθενῶν.] The word is used not only of indisposition, but of dangerous sickness, whether acute or chronic; as Acts ix. 37. Xen. Anab. i. 1. Matt. x. 8. Luke iv. 40, vii. 10. The exact representation sent by the two sisters shows that Lazarus was in imminent danger.

—ἀπὸ Βηθ.] 'of Bethany.' The ἐκ following is not tautologous; since ἀπὸ may denote place (like the Welsh ap) and be meant to distinguish this Lazarus from others of the same name (which was a not uncommon one); while the ἐκ may be supposed to denote residence. The latter clause was doubtless added by way of distinguishing the village in question from others of the same name.

2. ἡ ἀλείψασα.] Said, by anticipation, of 'who [afterwards] anointed.' A figure not infrequent, where the action (as in the present case) follows soon after, and is one well known. On the circumstance itself, see Note on Matt. xxvi. 6.

4. οὐκ ἔστι πρὸς θάνατον.] Meaning, 'will not terminate in death' properly so called, i. e. ultimate privation of life, will not be fatal. Such the best interpretation of this dubious mode of expression, which it is better to consider as a peculiar form of speaking, than to understand by with the decretory death by which all must return to dust. The Classical writers express this ἡ ἐνὶ θανάτῳ.

— ἀλλ' ὑπὲρ, &c.] 'but is meant for the manifestation of the glory of God;' namely, by the man being thereby glorified. See ix. 3.

The most eminent Commentators are agreed considering the words of this verse as addressed to the messengers, and intended as an answer to the sisters. 'Our Lord (says Euthymius) sent his predictive answer in order to comfort them.
 as he himself stayed some time longer, not from want of affection for his friend, but as waiting till Lazarus should be actually dead and staid; that it might not be said he had raised him when not yet dead, but only in a faintingor trance.'

6. ἔμεινεν—δύο ἡμέρας.] So that he did not go to Bethany till Lazarus had been dead four days, when corruption must have commenced, and consequently his actual death be placed beyond doubt.

7. ἔπειτα μετὰ τοῦτο.] A sort of pleonasm,
 of which several examples from the best Greek have been adduced by Wetstein and others. In which, however, we have only αἶμα καὶ ταῦτα, never ἔπειτα, which was probably confined to the popular phraseology.

8. καὶ πάλιν ὑπάγεις ἐκεῖ:] The words are the expression of wonder) strongly disjunctive;
 as in so speaking, the disciples were influenced by fear for their Master (notwithstanding his conviction of his divine power to save himself), and partly by some apprehension for their safety.

9. οὐχὶ δώδεκα—ἡμέρας:] A sort of adagio
 such as that at ix. 4, where see Note.
 The Jews (by a computation of time adopted from the Greeks) divided their day, or the time from sunrise to sunset, into twelve hours, of
 VOL. I.

course varying a little, according to the season of the year.

On the sense intended to be conveyed by the next words, ἴαν τις—αὐτῷ, some difference of opinion exists. It seems best to consider them, according to the view taken by Cameron, Pearce,
 and Doddridge (and further unfolded by Morus, Rosenmuller, Kuinoel, and Tittman), as a parabolical ænigma, in the Eastern manner, of which the application is left to be supplied by the hearers; as in Virg. Ecl. ii. 18. 'Alba ligustra cadunt, vaccinia nigra leguntur.' The meaning being: 'There is a certain and stated time for labour; the day is that time. Now is my day!
 Now my business must be done, while alone it can be done at all. And as the traveller is in no danger of stumbling while guided by the light of the sun, so the powers of darkness will not prevail against me until my day has closed.'

With respect to the phraseology itself, at προσκύπτει is to be supplied πόδα (which word is expressed in Matt. iv. 6.) and also τινα λῖθον or some other Dative, which is found supplied in Aristoph. Vesp. 275, ἡ προσέκρουσε, τῷ σκότῳ, τὸν δακτυλὸν που, where for που I conjecture
 τῷ; which is confirmed by a passage of Xenoph.
 Eq. vii. 6, σκληρὸν μὲν γὰρ ἔχων σέλιος, εἰ προσκρούσῃ τῷ, &c. The gradations of corruption being τῷ, πα, που.

Τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου is usually regarded as a periphrasis for τὸν ἥλιον. But the expression may rather be said to denote the light which is shed abroad in the world, for τὸ φῶς τὸ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ. "Ὅτι τὸ φῶς οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν αὐτῷ seems to be a popular expression for τὸ φῶς οὐκ ἔστιν αὐτῷ, 'he is destitute of the light;' as xii. 35.

11. κεκοίμηται—ἐξυπνίσω αὐτόν.] In saying why he must go, our Lord expresses himself first figuratively, and then in plain terms. In κεκοίμ. there is an euphemism to denote death, common to all languages (so נָפַח in Hebrew, to lie down to sleep), but which was especially employed by the sacred writers to denote the death of the righteous. The disciples, however, (partly misled by their wishes,) misunderstood our Lord.

12. εἰ κεκοίμηται, σωθ. Meaning, 'if he has gone to sleep, he will recover.' A sort of popular κεκoίμηται, σωθήσεται. Ειρήκει δὲ ὁ Ἰησοῦς περὶ τοῦ 13

θανάτου αὐτοῦ· ἐκεῖνοι δὲ ἔδοξαν ὅτι περὶ τῆς κοιμήσεως τοῦ ὑπνου λέγει. Τότε οὖν εἶπεν αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς παρ- 14
ρησίᾳ· Λάζαρος ἀπέθανε· καὶ χαίρω δι' ὑμᾶς, ἵνα πιστεύσῃτε, 15
ὅτι οὐκ ἦμην ἐκεῖ· ἀλλ' ἄγωμεν πρὸς αὐτόν. Εἶπεν οὖν 16
Θωμᾶς, ὁ λεγόμενος Δίδυμος, τοῖς συμμαθηταῖς· Ἀγωμεν καὶ ἡμεῖς, ἵνα ἀποθάνωμεν μετ' αὐτοῦ.

Ἐλθὼν οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, εὗρεν αὐτὸν τέσσαρας ἡμέρας ᾗδη 17
ἔχοντα ἐν τῷ μνημείῳ. Ἦν δὲ ἡ Βηθανία ἐγγὺς τῶν Ἱερο- 18
σολύμων, ὡς ἀπὸ σταδίων δεκαπέντε· καὶ πολλοὶ ἐκ τῶν 19
Ἰουδαίων ἐληλύθεισαν πρὸς τὰς περὶ Μάρθαν καὶ Μαρίαν, ἵνα παραμυθῶσιν αὐτὰς περὶ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτῶν. Ἡ οὖν 20
Μάρθα, ὡς ἤκουσεν ὅτι [ὁ] Ἰησοῦς ἐρχεται, ὑπήντησεν αὐτῷ· Μαρία δὲ ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ ἑκαθίζετο. Εἶπεν οὖν ἡ Μάρθα 21
πρὸς τὸν Ἰησοῦν· Κύριε, εἰ ἦς ὧδε, ὁ ἀδελφός μου οὐκ ἂν adagio founded on experience. Thus the Rabbins mention sleep among the six good symptoms in sickness; and many passages are adduced by Wetstein from the Classical writers, lauding its beneficial effects. The disciples seem to have intended to hint, that as Lazarus was likely to recover, there was no occasion for their Lord to hazard himself in Judea.

14. Λάζαρος ἀπέθανε.] The knowledge of this circumstance can be ascribed to nothing but omniscience.

15. χαίρω δι' ὑμᾶς—ἐκεῖ.] The words ἵνα πιστεύσῃτε are poi, as many Commentators suppose, parenthetical; but there is a transposition in the construction, for καὶ χαίρω, ὅτι οὐκ ἦμην ἐκεῖ, δι' ὑμᾶς, ἵνα πιστεύσῃτε. Ἦμην for ἦν is a form found only in the later writers. Πιστ. is here used of that completeness of faith in Christ, which the disciples had not yet all attained.

16. ὁ λεγόμενος Δ.] Most Commentators take this as an interpretation of Θωμᾶς, i. e. ἰσχυρὸς. But some, as Tittman, think it expresses a cognomen, as Σίμων ὁ λεγόμενος Πέτρος.

—ἀγωμεν—αὐτοῦ.] Some would take these words interrogatively. But that is doing no little violence to the construction. The only question is, whether αὐτοῦ is to be referred to Lazarus, or to Jesus. Now most modern Commentators adopt the former method, though it does not yield so natural a sense as the latter; which is supported by the ancient and some eminent modern Interpreters, as Calvin, Maldonati, Lampe, Doddridge, Tittman, and Kuinoel. Thomas, keenly alive to the danger both Jesus and themselves would incur by going into Judea, exclaims, with characteristic but well-meant bluntness: 'Since our Master will expose himself to such peril, let us accompany him, if it be only to share his fate!'

17. ἔλθων] 'having arrived;' not, however, at Bethany itself, but at the vicinity; whither Martha, hearing of his approach, had gone to meet him; and had met with him, it seems, not far from the burying-ground, which was always outside of a city or town. Ἐχον, when used, as here, of time past, signifies agere, transigere; an idiom frequent in the Classical writers. The four days (observes Lampe) seem to be reckoned from the burial of Lazarus; though at ver. 19 the reckoning is made from his death. The interval, however, between death and burial among the Jews was very short, generally only a few hours. The fourth day was probably only begun, not completed.

18. ἀπὸ σταδίων δ.] Sub. γενομένη, 'it being at about 15 stadia off.' The word is expressed in Appian, p. 793. Of this absolute use of ἀπὸ Kypke adduces examples from several of the later writers.

19. Ἰουδαίων.] Chiefly, we may suppose, the Jerusalemites from the vicinity. The best Commentators are agreed that πρὸς τὰς περὶ Μ. καὶ Μ. is simply for πρὸς Μάρθαν καὶ Μ. The idiom is common in the Classical writers; but it does not always mean the person only, but sometimes includes his relations or near friends. And as at Acts xiii. 13, οἱ περὶ τὸν Παῦλον denotes 'Paul and his companions,' so here it might mean, as some think, Martha and Mary with their family relations; but that this seems excluded by the added words περὶ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτῶν, which can only apply to Martha and Mary. These visits of condolence were usual among the Jews, and continued for seven days after the three days of weeping which succeeded the day of death. The number of persons going thither became the means of making the miracle generally known, and thereby establishing its reality.

20. ὡς ἤκουσεν] 'as soon as she had heard;' probably from some travellers on horseback, who had passed Jesus on the road.

—ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ ἑκαθίζετο] 'sat at home.' Campbell renders, 'remained at home.' But see v. 30. This was a posture suitable to grief; as is shown at large by Lampe. See Geier de laet. Hebr. C. 18.

22—24. Hence it appears that Martha had a persuasion that Jesus could, and an expectation, though faint, that he would raise her brother from the dead.

ἔτεθνήκει. Ἀλλὰ καὶ νῦν, οἶδα ὅτι, ὅσα ἂν αἰτήσῃ τὸν Θεόν, δώσει σοι ὁ Θεός. Λέγει αὐτῇ ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Ἀναστήσεται ὁ ἀδελφός σου. Λέγει αὐτῇ Μάρθα· Οἶδα ὅτι ἀναστήσεται ἐν τῇ ἀναστάσει ἐν τῇ ἐσχάτῃ ἡμέρᾳ. 22. οἶδα ὅτι.] By thus pointing off the phrase I have done) the necessity of transposition is so away. This idiom falls under the rule in sibis's Gr. Gr. § 624, a, of phrases inserted in positions, such as εἰδ' οἶδ' ὅτι, οἶδ' ὅτι, &c. The or is, indeed, the more expressive; yet it is several times in Xenophon; as Cyrop. iii. 2, παρὶ ἡμῶν, ἐγὼ οἶδ' ὅτι, οὐδὲν παύονται. 15, ἐγὼ εἰμι ἡ ἀνάστασις, &c. Here our id (by a common figure of the effect for the cause, as 1 Cor. i. 30) professes that He is the cause of the resurrection of the dead; and intimes that as he shall at some time raise all the id, so he can and will now bring back Lazarus to life. 'We have, in this and the next verse (as Dr. Kim observes), in a few words, the summary of the Gospel; and the sublimity of the language is less remarkable than the great truths contained in the words. Jesus is the resurrection to us believers who are departed hence in the id; and he is the life to those who are still on earth; and he will finally be the resurrection and the life to them both.' Comp. iii. 36. Id. vi. 58. 28.

—ζήσεται.] Meaning, 'shall be raised to a life of everlasting happiness.' Κἀν ἀποθάνῃ id be rendered (as it is done by Newcome) though he die, 'must die'; as Hebr. ix. 27, πάντες ἀποθάνουσιν.

23. πᾶς ὁ ζῶν—τὸν αἰῶνα.] This seems not to engraft on the foregoing assurance another and further one; namely, that the gift shall not only of life in a figurative sense, but in a literal one, and that never-ending. Ὁ ζῶν καὶ νῦν may (as some eminent Expositors explain) be taken to signify (by an Hendiadys) 'every man living, who believeth.' Since, however, that is a somewhat forced sense, it may be better, with Theodor. Mops., Calvin, Lampe, and others, to suppose ζῶν here used emphatically, and meant of spiritual life, the life St. Paul speaks of, Galat. ii. 20, even that which the saints live, ἐν πίστει τῇ τοῦ Υἱοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ. Thus the expression stands for πᾶς ὁ διὰ (or μετὰ) τῆς πίστεως εἰς ἐμὲ ζῶν.

27. In the ardour of her devotion Martha employs both the titles, which in Scripture designate the promised Messiah, of which the former was merely one of office, the latter, of nature, and consequently far more exalted; namely, as denoting one united in the Godhead, and in whom are centred all the essential attributes of God.

—ὁ ἐρχόμενος] 'who is to come.'

28. λάθρα.] In thus calling her apart, it appears she had our Lord's directions, though the Evangelist has not recorded the circumstance.

29. ὁ διδάσκαλος.] This use of the address, 'the master,' or teacher, instead of the name of the instructor, was very frequent among the Jews to their Rabbins. See Schoettg. on John xiii. 13.

—ἐγείρεται ταχὺ.] Not only out of respect to her exalted Teacher, but from her faith being strengthened by the alacrity of her sister.

31. ἵνα κλαύσῃ ἐκεῖ.] According to the custom among both Jews and Gentiles, to repair to the cemeteries, to weep at the tombs of their relatives.

32. αὐτοῦ εἰς τοὺς π.] This, for the common reading ἐπὶ τοὺς πόδας αὐτοῦ, is found in many of the best MSS., and is received by Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz.

33. ἰναβριμήσατο.] This term would, according to its usual acceptation, both in the Scriptural and the Classical writers, signify indignatus est; as, indeed, it is here explained by many emphatically.

εἶδεν αὐτὴν κλαίουσαν, καὶ τοὺς συνελθόντας αὐτῇ Ἰουδαίους κλαίοντας, ἐνεβριμήσατο τῷ πνεύματι καὶ ἐτάραξεν ἑαυτὸν, καὶ εἶπε· Ποῦ θεύκατε αὐτόν; Λέγουσιν αὐτῷ 34 Κύριε, ἔρχου καὶ ἴδε. Ἐδάκρυσεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς. Ἐλεγον 35, 36 οὖν οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι· Ἴδε, πῶς ἐφίλει αὐτόν! Commentators. Yet as no ground can here be imagined for censure, we may better understand the word (with Calvin, Campbell, Rosenmüller, Schleusner, and Tittman) of the violent internal perturbation of sorrow; as the Hebr. פני is used in Gen. xl. 6. 1 Sam. xv. 11. Indeed βρίμω (from which the word is derived) like its cognate frenno simply denotes only the commotion of any one of the violent passions, anger, sorrow, &c. The sense assigned by Euthymius and Maldonati, 'he repressed his spirit or emotion,' might deserve attention, were it not for πάλιν ἐμβριμώμενος ἐν ἑαυτῷ at ver. 38, which admits of no other interpretation than the one which I have adopted, and which is much confirmed by the words following καὶ ἐτάραξεν ἑαυτόν which are exegetical of the foregoing, and in which we have an example of reciprocal for passive, as 2 Pet. ii. 8. Thus τῷ πνεύματι will signify 'in his spirit,' or mind, as it is explained by Middleton, Gr. Art.

35. ἰδάκρυσεν ὁ Ἰ.] This is the shortest verse in the New Testament, but one of the most consolatory, as proving (by this action, not unworthy the dignity of our exalted Redeemer) that we have indeed a High Priest who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities. (Heb. iv. 15.)

38. We are not to infer from the expression ἐπέκειτο, that the entrance was from above,—since the researches of antiquaries show that it was, in the case of Jewish tombs, at the side. Hence we may see the suitableness of the Hebrew term, to denote the stone which closed up the entrance, namely, לְחָוִי, 'the roller.' The same view is to be taken of ἀρατε.

— τεταρταῖος γάρ ἐστι] 'he has been four days dead.' For the Jews generally buried their dead on the day of death; see Acts v. 6, 10. Of this idiom in Greek, by which what properly belongs to the person is applied to the day, many examples are adduced by Raphael and Westein. So Polyb. iii. 52. 3, ἡδὴ δὲ τετ. ἡμέρ.

41. οὗ ἦν ὁ ταῦν κείμενος.] These words, not found in several MSS. and some Versions, have been cancelled by Griesbach and Scholz; but wrongly; the external authority for their omission being very slender, and the internal quite the other way; for it may very well be supposed (as Kuinoel remarks) that the Librarii excluded them, because they stumbled at the somewhat harsh ellipsis of μνημεῖον.

— Πάτερ, εὐχαριστῶ, &c.] The full sense of this address (from high-wrought passions extremely brief, and consequently involving some obscurity) is only to be expressed in a paraphrase, as follows: 'Father, I thank thee that thou hast ever to hear my prayers. I know (as to myself) that thou dost continually hearken unto me when I call upon Thee [either in uttered prayer or secret aspiration]; but I now thus address Thee because of the multitude present,—that they, seeing that thou hast granted my desire, may believe and be persuaded that Thou hast sent me.'

In ἤκουσας the best Commentators are agreed that the Aorist expresses, as often, what is notomy. 'Hic enim in a Present sense is common. And the ellipsis after ἀλλὰ is such as is frequent.

43. δεῦρο.] A particle of exclamation, involving an ellipsis of some verb in the Imperative, as ἐλθὲ (so Acts vii. 3, δεῦρο εἰς τὴν γῆν), which has a highly authoritative effect, suggesting (as Tittman observes) Vult, et fit; Jubet, et adit.

44. δεδεμένος—κυρίαις.] It is not necessary to suppose (as many have done) that the whole body was involved in the bandages; for that would imply a second miracle; and as the exertion of miraculous agency is not to be called in without sufficient cause, we may imagine that the sheet (σουδῶν) in which the body was wrapped was not so tightly brought together by the κειρίας (or bandages whereby the aromatics for preserving the body from corruption were kept in their place), but that Lazarus was enabled to creeper forth. This, of course, proceeds upon the supposition of most Commentators, that the body had been embalmed. But if (as, from the shortness of the period, is far more probable) such was not the case, the difficulty is much lessened; and we have thus only to suppose that the body was wrapped in a winding-sheet, girt about with two belts, one at the hands, the other at the feet.

—σουδαρίῳ] ‘kerchief;’ which probably did not cover the face, but was brought under the chin.

—λύσατε αὐτόν] i. e. ‘loosen the bandages.’

47. τί ποιούμεν;] ‘What are we doing?’ A popular phrase suited to deliberation, and implying also, ‘What are we to do?’

—σημεῖα.] They admitted, it seems, Christ’s miracles, but yet refused to believe in him; probably on some such pretence as that elsewhere mentioned, that they were effected by the agency of the Devil; so classing them with the wonders performed by the Magicians in Egypt, Exod. vii. viii., or those adverted to in Matt. xxiv. 24.

48. τόπον.] Meaning, not the Temple, as some explain (for that would require τοῦτον τὸν τόπον), but the city of Jerusalem, the destruction of which would involve that of the country. Ἄρῶν, like the Hebr. מור, is used of destroying either a city or country.

49. ὅμειν οὐκ οἰδατε οὐδέν.] These words, and the counsel afterwards given, correspond so little to the foregoing ones, that many of the best Commentators are of opinion that something, which immediately preceded them in the deliberations, has been omitted by the Evangelist. This, however, is a principle always precarious, and is here unnecessary. May we not consider the words of the Evangelist, τί ποιούμεν—ἔθνος, as containing two opinions pronounced by two different parties of the Sanhedrim; τί ποιούμεν

—ποιεῖ by those who were inclined to think well of Jesus, and ἔθνος—ἔθνος by those who troubled not themselves about the truth or the falsehood of Jesus’s pretensions, but, viewing the thing solely in a political point of view, were alive to the danger of letting him go on, and thought he must be put down, but scrupled at the means. Against these the rebuke of Caiaphas seems to be directed: q. d. ‘Ye are foolish and raw!’ (for such is the meaning of οὐκ οἰδατε οὐδέν) namely, in state policy, by seeing what is expedient to be done, and yet scrupling at the means to bring it about.

50. συμφέρει—ἀπόληται.] With allusion to a maxim of state policy, that the safety of the whole nation is to be preferred to that of one individual. Of which many examples are adduced; ex. gr. Xenoph. p. 193, πολὺ κρείττον καὶ δικαιότερόν ἐστιν, ἵνα ὑπὲρ πάντων, ἢ πολλοὺς ὑπὲρ ἑνὸς ἀπολίσθαι.

51. προεφῆτευσεν.] On the exact sense of this term in the present passage some difference of opinion exists. To the ordinary signification, and that generally assigned, prophecy, it has been objected, that the words of Caiaphas contain nothing of prediction, but merely a political counsel. Hence most recent Interpreters take it to mean only that, ‘under Divine Providence he uttered a most important truth, which was made good in the death of Christ for the sins of the world.’ Thus the Evangelist is supposed to have accommodated the counsel of Caiaphas to the purpose of impressing on the minds of his readers the great doctrine of the Atonement. Yet this view of the sense, besides being too artificial to be probable, is quite at variance with, and contradicted by, the antithesis between ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ εἶπας and προεφῆτευσας, and also what is implied in the words ἀρχιερεὺς ὢν τοῦ ἱναυτοῦ ἐκείνου. Inasmuch that something more than Divine direction, by God’s providence, is required.

Far preferable to the above is the view of those who, adopting the ordinary and full sense of προφητεύειν, understand the meaning to be, that ‘in saying what he did, Caiaphas unwittingly uttered a prediction, afterwards fulfilled, 'that one, even Jesus, should die for the nation;' and so, while intending to utter a sentiment according to his own meaning, he pronounced an oracle, according to God's meaning. Now here there is nothing to stumble at in the fact that Caiaphas was a bad man, since, as in the case of Balaam, his office (as High Priest), not his personal character, is to be considered; and there is reason to think that the gift of prophecy was occasionally communicated to the High Priest, especially when giving counsel in matters of national moment; see Josephus, Bell. i. 2. 8, and Ant. iii. 8. 1, and Philo.

This view, however, lies open to the great and insuperable objection (above adverted to), that the words of Caiaphas were any thing but a prophecy; and the idea of a quasi-prophecy involves an absurdity. It may be best, then, with Calvin, Gomar, Lampe, Tittman, Kypke, and Oldhansen, to take προεφήτευσεν in the sense 'spoke [as he did] under Divine impulse' (as the High Priest was supposed to do). This signification of προφῆτευσεν occurs at Luke i. 67, and elsewhere. The words might, indeed, be thought to partake of the prophetic character, in having reference to what was so shortly to happen; similarly as the words of Abraham, Gen. xxii. 8, 'My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering.' An opinion which would seem confirmed by προεφήτευσεν being so closely connected with the words following, ὅτι ἔμελλεν, &c. Yet it need not be thus closely connected; for a colon may and ought (as is done by Lampe, Kuinoel, and Tittman) to be placed after προεφ., by which the following ὅτι will have the sense quoniam, since; as it is rightly rendered in the Arabic and Æthiopic Versions; the force of the clause being, as Lampe says, explicative of the preceding. Ἐμελλεν ἀποθ. means, 'was shortly about to die'; as in Luke vii. 2, ἐμελλε τελευτᾶν, 'was at the point of death' (with which compare Thucyd. i. 135, μέλλ. ἀποθνήσκειν), and John iv. 47, ἡμελλε ἀποθνήσκειν. Rev. iii. 2, μέλλει ἀποθάνειν. Of ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ εἰπεῖν or λέγειν, to 'speak of oneself,' as opposed to what is dictated or suggested by others, several examples are adduced by Lampe and Kypke.

52. καὶ οὐχ ὑπὲρ—εἰς ἓν.] These words are meant to explain and mark the extent of the foregoing assertion. And here there is an ellipsis of some words, to be supplied from the preceding clause; q. d. [He was, indeed, about to die for the nation] and not for the nation only, &c. Τέκνα τοῦ Θεοῦ. So called by anticipation, in order to show God's gracious designs that they should be so; as supra x. 16, ἀλλὰ πρόβηται, where see Note. Συναγάγῃ εἰς ἓν, scil. σῶμα, as it were into one Catholic and universal Church, united in one holy communion, under one common Head.

54. οὖν.] 'accordingly.' Παρῆρσιν, 'in proximity.'

—τὴν χώραν.] Meaning, I conceive, the desert of Bethaven. By the Ephraim here spoken of is to be understood that desert which, as Eusebius says, was eight miles North of Jerusalem. Though Jerome makes it twenty miles from Jerusalem, which is probably the more correct account. The exact situation of Ephraim it is impossible to fix. Certainly it was not where it is placed in Arrowsmith's map. As it is called by a Rabbinical writer, cited in Wetstein, Ephraim is rule, I should conjecture that it was situated somewhere in the Southern part of the valley between Mount Ephraim and the opposite range of Bethaven, which formed, we may imagine, the desert of Bethaven. The word πόλις here should be rendered town, since the place is called by Josephus, Bell. v. 8, πολίχιον.

55. ἵνα ἀγνίσωσιν ἐαυτούς.] Namely, from such ceremonial defilements as they might have contracted; in order to participation in the Paschal feast. This purification was effected by sacrifices, sprinkling of water, fasting, prayer, and other observances, which lasted from one to six days. This, and the other prescribed rites, brought a great concourse of people together at Jerusalem, before the Festival. Indeed, all who went had to undergo the rites in question. As a Rabbinical writer, cited by Wetstein, says, 'Tunc tur unusquisque ad purificandum se ad festum.' And Josephus, Ant. iv. 3. 12, ἀθῆμιτος ἔσθαι—μὴ προηγνηυκὸς εἰσάγειν τὸ πλῆθος.

56. τί δοκεῖ—τοῦτον.] These words are by most Expositors supposed to mean, 'What think ye, that he should not have come to the feast? But the feast was not yet arrived; and therefore that he should not have come was not surprising. Indeed, from what is said in the next verses, they had little reason to expect him at all. Moreover, the words τί δοκεῖ ὑμῖν rather indicate a mutual discussion of what was doubtful and uncertain, namely, whether his coming would or would not be. I have, therefore, followed the Pesch. Syr., Chrysostom, Euthymius, Lampe,

Pearce, Kuinoel, Tittman, and Campbell, in placing a mark of interrogation after ὅτι; thus making a double interrogation, and of course taking ἔλθῃ in a future sense, for ἐλεύσεται. The phraseology is, indeed, unusual; but this use of the interrogation with a double negation is intended to represent some one as proposing a question, and himself answering it in the negative. Thus we may render, 'What think ye? that he will not come to the feast?' equivalent to 'Is it your opinion (as it certainly is mine) that he will not come?' They were warranted in supposing so, since (as we find from the next verse) strict inquiries were made after him, and orders given for his apprehension.

XII. 1. πρὸ ἐξ ἡμερῶν τοῦ πάσχα.] A transposition as in 2 Cor. xii. 2, for ἐξ ἡμερῶν πρὸ τ. π. So Josephus, Ant. xv. 4, πρὸ ἡμερῶν τῆς ἰορτῆς; also Bell. ii. 8, 9; and also in the Sept. Ὅπου ἦν Λάζ. ὁ τεθ. is rightly rendered by Markland, 'where Lazarus was; he who had been dead and raised to life again.'

2. ἐποίησαν δ.] For the Impersonal, 'a supper was made.' The entertainment, however, was, as we find from Matt. xxvi. 6, not in the house of Martha, but in that of a person of the name of Simon (surnamed the Leper), probably a near relative of Mary, who, it would seem, acted as hostess on the occasion; for such is the import of the term διηκόνει.

— ἀνακειμ.] This, with σὺν following, instead of συνακ., is found in almost all the best MSS. and the early Editions, and has been received by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz. Lazarus's presence is mentioned, to show that since his resurrection he had possessed the regular functions of life.

3. καὶ ἐξέμαξε ταῖς θριξίν.] This has been thought to intimate that Mary had washed Jesus's feet before anointing them. If so, there is a remarkable transposition in the construction. But as the unguent used was liquid, the wiping would be as suitable to that as to washing; see more in Rec. Syn., in the Notes on Matt. xxvi. 6—11. On πιστικῆς see Note on Mark xvi. 3.

— ἡ δὲ οἰκία—μύρου.] A figurative mode of expressing the extreme fragrance of the unguent. So Plutarch i. 676, cited by Wetstein, ώδωται δὲ Ξεσπίσιον ὁλον ἀπὸ ἀρωμάτων καὶ μύρων ὁ οἶκος.

6. τὸ γλωσσόκομον.] This word originally denoted the box in which pipers deposited the mouth-pieces (γλωσσίδας, what we call reeds) of their wind-instruments. Thence it came to denote any box or casket for holding money or other valuables. And such is the sense here and in 2 Chron. xxiv. 8, and Plut. p. 1060, cited by Wetstein. Βαλλόμενα is for εἰσβαλλόμενα, 'what was put therein,' as contributions towards a common fund for the support of Christ and his Apostles, of which Judas was the treasurer. According to the common rendering of the passage, the sense proceeds very awkwardly; nor is this to be remedied by that θεὸς ἀπὸ μηχανῆς, a transposition, which the Critics call to their aid. It is plain that the sense commonly assigned to ἐβάσταζεν cannot be tolerated; and that of μανικῆ, proposed by some, is destitute of even probability. Almost all the best Commentators, ancient and modern, are agreed that it must signify surripuit, intervertit (like ferre for auferte in Latin); of which sense they adduce several examples, the most apposite of which are from Diog. Laert. iv. 59, and Josephus, Ant. xii. 5. 4, where σουλὰν and βαστ. are joined as synonymous. So also at Ant. ix. 4, 5, it is said of some who went to plunder the camp of the Syrians, ἀρμήσαντες εἰς μίαν σκηνήν—ἐβάστασαν (carried off) ἰσθῆτα καὶ πολλὰ χρυσόν. Indeed as at xx. 15, the word signifies to carry off by stealth, so it may here very well mean simply to steal; a sense required by the κλέπτης just before; for thus we learn why Judas took exception at the ointment being so employed, and why he is called a thief.

10. οἱ Ἀρχιερεῖς.] Meaning, as also supra xi. 47, the great council of the Sanhedrium, τὸ συνέδριον.

11. ὑπῆγον.] Literally, 'drew off,' abandoned that attachment to the teaching of the Scribes, which they had formerly. Not, 'withdrew from the Temple service,' as some Commentators explain; for (as Campbell observes) no sect of the Jews withdrew from the synagogue. Both Jesus and his Apostles and disciples punctually attended at the Temple service, until they were expelled from the synagogues. The word is used in this same sense also at vi. 67, ἔλεγε ὑπάγειν. Comp. v. 66.

12—19. See Notes on Matt. xxi. l. 16. Mark xi. l. 11. Luke xix. 29. 44.

13. βλάτα.] This is by many said to be a Coptic word, signifying a branch of the palm tree. But it rather comes from blad, slender, and thus denotes the tapering twigs of the palm tree. Indeed, the Coptic word may be derived from this, just as there are numerous words in the Rabbinical writers derived from the Greek and Latin.

15. μὴ φοβοῦ, θυγ. Σ.] This quotation (from Zech. ix. 9) differs both from the Hebrew and the Sept., and also from the citation in Matt. xxi. 5. The Evangelist either followed some other Greek Version, or chose to express briefly the sense, though not the words, of the prophet.

16. ἰδοξάσθη.] The word is used as at vi. 39, where see Note, and comp. ver. 23. In the words following, the first αὐτῷ is emphatical; and the sense of καὶ (repeat ὅτι) ταῦτα ἐποίησε αὐτῷ is, 'and that the people had done these things unto him [in fulfilment of prophecy]. These last words being suggested by the preceding.

17. ὅτι.] Many MSS., Versions, and early Editions have ὅτι, which was edited by Mathias, who remarks that ὅτι was introduced into the text by Beza. Be it so; but it is supported by perhaps stronger external authority than ὅτι; and internal evidence is quite in its favour; for thus ἐφώνησε, not ἐφώνησαν, would be required. Moreover, the context requires this sense. By ὁ ὢν μετ' αὐτοῦ must be meant, 'who had been with him' [on the occasion in question]. Thus there is a blending of two clauses into one. The sentence, fully expressed, would run, 'The people who had been with him when he raised Lazarus from the dead attested that he,' &c.

18. ἤκουσαν.] This, for ἤκουσε, is found in most of the best MSS. and early Editions, and is received by almost all Editors from Wetstein to Scholz. There is a transposition of τοῦτο.

19. θεωρεῖτε—οὐδέν.] The best Commentators are agreed that these words must be taken interrogatively. And thus they have certainly more spirit. The words ὁ κόσμος—ἀπῆλθεν

Ἦσαν δὲ τινες Ἕλληνες ἐκ τῶν ἀναβαινόντων ἵνα προσκυνήσωσιν ἐν τῇ ἑρτῇ· οὗτοι οὖν προσῆλθον Φίλιππῳ usual form of speaking, frequent in the Rab-bial writers, denoting that a leader or teacher very numerous followers.

[Ἕλληνες.] It is a much debated question are here the persons to be understood. Some as them to have been foreign Jews living of Palestine, and speaking the Greek lan-
 a. And certainly there were many Jews dis-all over Egypt, Asia Minor, &c., where it was the vernacular tongue, and was spoken
 he sojourning Jews. Yet that is no reason they should be called Ἕλληνες; nor can it be ad that they were ever so called. They would be called Ἑλληνιστᾶι; as at Acts vi. 1.
 9. xi. 20. It is therefore better to suppose h others) that by Ἕλληνες are to be under-
 1 Gentiles; for, 1. wherever in the New Test.
 1000 are mentioned, they are always person Jews; 2. because the thing recorded 1000 to the custom of those times; since the 1000 worshipped not only the gods of their country, but of any foreign nation into which might come; nay, they made journeys for purpose of worship, to the most celebrated 1000 temples, especially that of Jerusalem; see passages of Josephus, Philo, and Suetonius, in Recena. Synop. Nay, many Gentiles
 in that age diligent in their search after true 1000, and, in order thereto, frequented the 1000 synagogues, though they made no external 1000 of the Jewish religion, nor were cir-
 1000. Such are in Acts xvii. 4, called οἱ
 1000 εἰσβόμαιοι. And though εἰσβόμαιοι
 1000 here added, yet it may well be understood.
 1000, as it cannot be proved that the Gentiles,
 1000 strict sense, ever attended at Jerusalem,
 1000 celebration of the Passover, these persons
 , with most probability, be supposed Gentile 1000 to Judaism. See Note on Acts xi. 20.
 , [ἰδεῖν] 'to have an interview with.' An 1000 common to most languages. There were 1000 reasons why such persons should desire an 1000 to so celebrated a person. Their 1000, however, in seeking it can only be mat-1000 conjecture. Probably they were in a great 1000 worldly. Hence the language of warning,
 1000 used to them by our Lord, as to the conse-
 1000 of professing his religion.

1 In the reply of our Lord we may observe
 'what is there said is adapted for warning,
 1000, and instruction,—both to those ad-
 1000, and especially to the persons who sought 1000, and to whom what was said was 1000 to be reported. Our Lord gives them to 1000, that the time is near at hand in which the Son of Man should be glorified. That glory, however, could only be attained by his death, the effect of which he intimates, by an illustration derived from grain sown in the earth (see 1 Cor.

 xv. 36), would be an abundant harvest both of Jewish and Gentile converts. Further, to effectually repress all worldly or interested motives in becoming his disciples, he (at vv. 25, 26) apprises them, that as, before his exaltation, he was himself to 'suffer many things,' so were his disciples to expect suffering and persecution; though they might assure themselves that a glorious reward hereafter would be the result of their patient endurance unto the end.

— ἐλήλυθεν ἡ ὥρα ἵνα, &c.] 'The time has come, that' (ἵνα for ὅτι). Most recent Commentators (as Nosselt and Kuinoel) are of opinion that our Lord takes occasion, from this circumstance, to pre-signify to the two disciples the future spread of the Gospel, when it should be manifested not merely to a few religiously-inclined foreigners, but to all the nations of the earth in their own countries. But though that view may seem to be supported by the context, I would rather, with Lampe and Tittman, suppose that the glory of Christ here spoken of consists in the testimony given to him
 by God, by his resurrection from the dead, ascension to heaven, and sitting at the right hand of the Father; a glory which would be eminently displayed, when it became generally known on earth that he died to save men,—had, moreover, returned from death to life,—had ascended to heaven, and was constituted head of the human race, Lord in heaven and earth; and finally, when he should be acknowledged by Jews and Gentiles as the supreme Saviour of all men. See Phil. ii. 8.

24. ἐὰν μὴ ὁ κόκκος—φέρει.] This is an illustration of the effect produced by his death;
 though the comparison is unaccompanied with application. The sense is: 'As a grain of corn cast into the earth, unless it die (i. e. putrefy), remains alone (i. e. has no increase), so it must be with me; for as it must die to yield increase, so must I undergo temporal death, in order to be glorified, and produce a great spiritual harvest.'

25. Our Lord here teaches, that those of his disciples who desire communion in his glory must not decline participation in his tribulations; q. d.
 'He who so loveth his life as to prefer to the loss of it the loss of the advantages of my kingdom, shall not enjoy the felicity destined for those faithful followers, who encounter all perils for mine and the Gospel's sake.' Comp. Matt. x. 39, and the parallel passages.

καὶ ὁ μισῶν τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ τούτῳ, εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον φυλάξει αὐτήν. Ὑἱὸν ἐμοὶ διακονῇ τις, ἐμοὶ ἀκολουθεῖτω· καὶ ὅπου εἰμὶ ἐγώ, ἐκεῖ καὶ ὁ διάκονος ὁ ἐμὸς ἔσται· καὶ ἂν τις ἐμοὶ διακονῇ, τιμήσει αὐτὸν ὁ Πατήρ. Νῦν 27 ἡ ψυχὴ μου τετάραται· καὶ τί εἶπω; Πάτερ, σῶσον με ἐκ τῆς ὥρας ταύτης; ἀλλὰ διὰ τοῦτο ἦλθον εἰς τὴν ὥραν ταύτην. Πάτερ, δόξασόν σου τὸ ὄνομα. Ἀπεκρίθη ὁ Ἰησοῦς 30 καὶ εἶπεν· Οὐ δὲ ἐμὲ αὕτη ἡ φωνὴ γέγονεν, ἀλλὰ δι' ὑμᾶς. Ὑἱὸν κρίσις ἐστὶ τοῦ κόσμου τούτου· νῦν ὁ ἀρχὼν τοῦ 31

z infra 16.

25. ὁ φιλῶν τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ.] An emphatical expression, to signify being attached to life. So Eurip. Hec. 456, οὐ φιλεῖν δεῖ τὴν ἐμὴν ψυχὴν. These words have, indeed, immediate reference only to the then state of things and the primitive Christians; but they may, by accommodation, be applied to all times, and Christians of every age.

26. ἂν ἐμοὶ διακονῇ τις, ἐμοὶ ἀκολου.] Meaning, 'If any one would dedicate himself to my service, let him follow my footsteps, and be disposed to suffer all things for my name's sake; and (for his encouragement) let him be assured, that where I am, there will he be also, as partaker of my glory. Moreover, whosoever shall serve me faithfully, him will my Father reward gloriously.'

27. Having thus signified to his followers his own approaching sufferings, that they might 'follow his steps' (1 Pet. ii. 21), our Lord now yields for a moment to the feelings of his human nature, and, shrinking at the prospect of what he must shortly undergo, is ready to entreat that this cup may pass from him.

— νῦν ἡ ψυχὴ, &c.] If the common punctuation and interpretation be here adopted, we must suppose that, in the struggle of contending emotions, our Lord first utters, and then retracts, a prayer. Yet this view, as it is not a little objectionable, so neither is it necessary; for we may, with many of the best Commentators, ancient and modern, place a mark of interrogation after ταύτης, thus supposing two questions, as follows: 'What shall I say? [Shall I say] Father, deliver me from this hour? But for this cause came I to this hour,' i. e. to meet this hour, or time of suffering. Comp. Mark xiv. 35. Thus, it seems, when about involuntarily to utter a petition, he is checked by a reflection on the end for which he came into the world; and the natural emotions of fear soon subside into a prayer for the furtherance of his Father's glory, in any way that may seem good to Him.

28. ἦλθεν οὖν φωνὴ ἐκ τ. οὐρ.] Many recent Commentators understand by φωνή, here and at Matt. iii. 3, 17, simply thunder. They maintain that no words were uttered at all; and that the Evangelist did not suppose that there were any; but that he only meant to use the words which God, if he had expressed his will and intention by human voice, would have used. But this is an unjustifiable licence of interpretation. Nay, it is inconsistent with the words of v. 30, οὐ δὲ ἐμὲ αὕτη ἡ φωνὴ γέγονεν, ἀλλὰ δι' ὑμᾶς. 'That a voice was heard in plain words, from heaven, we are not permitted to doubt, because of the exactly similar circumstances which took place not only in the case of Moses and the children of Israel (Exod. xix. 19.), and also in that of Samuel (see 1 Sam. iii. 4. seqq.), but likewise in that of our Lord himself at his baptism and in his transfiguration on Mount Tabor, which places the thing beyond dispute. For, 1. the words themselves, which were heard, are expressly mentioned. 2. In the following passage, not only are some said to have thought that an angel spoke with Jesus, but our Lord himself says, οὐ δὲ ἐμὲ αὕτη ἡ φωνὴ γέγονεν, ἀλλὰ δι' ὑμᾶς. So also St. Peter relates, that he and the rest who were with our Lord on Mount Tabor heard a voice from heaven, which said, 'This is my beloved Son.' It is true that the bystanders differed in opinion. Some, who perhaps had not been very attentive, and had themselves not heard the words distinctly, said it thundered; for the voice had proceeded from the clouds, [and, indeed, that thunder sometimes accompanied (probably preceded or followed) this voice from heaven, is certain from Exod. xix. 16, 19. Rev. iv. 5. vi. 1. x. 3. EDIT.] Others, however, had heard them, and immediately supposed that God had spoken by an angel, conformably to the opinion of the Jews, who thought that God never spoke except by the ministry of angels; and therefore they did not doubt whether the words were uttered, but in what manner.' (Tittman.) See Note on Matt. iii. 17. That in this instance, as in the others adverted to, plain intelligible words were uttered, the express specification of the terms clearly shows. See Dr. Henderson's Lectures on Divine Inspiration, p. 91.

Of the words themselves, the full sense intended, though not then expressed, but meant to be understood from the event, may be what Dr. Burton explains: 'I have caused my Name to be glorified by my former dispensations, and now I shall do so again by thy death.'

30. δι' ὑμᾶς] 'for your sakes,' i. e. to condemn your faith.

31. νῦν κρίσις ἐστὶ, &c.] By the expression τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, Tittman and others would understand the genius avari, a spirit of unbelief and wickedness (see Eph. ii. 2, and compare Acts xvi. 18

- 12 κόσμου τούτου ἐκβληθήσεται ἔξω. * καὶ γὰρ, ἐὰν ὑψωθῶ ἐκ

 χρόνον τὸ φῶς μεθ' ὑμῶν ἐστί. περιπατεῖτε ἕως τὸ φῶς

(John Col. i. 13.), and by ὁ ἀρχὼν τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, in a general way, the influence which unbelief and iniquity exerted over the minds of men, impeding the progress of true religion and happiness. This view of the sense, however, seems rather ingenious than solid; and I see no reason to abandon the common interpretation, by which κρίσεις τοῦ κόσμου is explained to mean his punishment soon to overtake the Jews for rejecting Christ, and ὁ ἀρχὼν τοῦ κόσμου τούτου as understood to denote Satan. So in various parts of the Rabbinical writers the title Benai Mar is given to the Evil One. The full sense, then, may be thus expressed: 'Now is [at hand] the condemnation and punishment of the unbelieving world (i. e. now will sentence be passed on this world which 'lieth in wickedness'); now will the Prince of this world be deposed from his rule.' Learning, that 'now is the Prince of this world bent to be deposed, by the abolition of idolatry and superstition, and the introduction of true religion, and now will his subjects be condemned to sin and unbelief.' This sense of ἐκβάλλειν is found in the best writers. That the two clauses are very closely connected in sense, is certain from a similar passage at xvi. 11, compared with John, where our Lord says that the Paraclete, at his coming, ἐλέγξει τὸν κόσμον περὶ κρίσεως, meaning (as it is just after explained) ὅτι ὁ ἀρχὼν τοῦ κόσμου τούτου ἐκρίνεται, 'is to be condemned,' and consequently deposed.

22. Here our Lord obscurely hints at the means by which the great consummation just adverted to would be accomplished,—namely, by his crucifixion, resurrection, ascension, exaltation to glory, and the commencement of his office as Advocate with the Father; the first work of which would be the sending of the Holy Spirit, and thenceforward the mission of those who in every age should preach the Gospel. By these, and by his revealed Word in the New T., our Lord means to say, he would draw all men to him, i. e. would offer such moral inducements and spiritual aids to men, as would suffice to bring the understanding to assent to the truths of his religion, and to incline the will to obey its moral requisitions.

—ἐὰν ὑψωθῶ] 'when,' for ὅτ' ἂν, as at xiv. 3. John iii. 2, and sometimes in the Sept. By hypocritae may, it should seem, be intimated the universality intended in the blessings of redemption. Πρὸς ἑμαυτὸν alludes to the place whither he is going, Heaven. Thus at xiv. 2, 3, our Lord says he is going to prepare a place for them; and having prepared it, he will return and receive them to himself.

23. σημαίνων.] 'intimating.' The word is here used (as here) of things future and obscurely signified, as in oracles, &c. So Plutarch, cited by Wetstein, οὕτως λέγει, οὕτως κρύπτει, ἀλλὰ σημαίνει.

34. τοῦ νόμου] i. e. the Scriptures. See x. 34. Μένει εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, 'is to remain on earth for ever,' agreeably to those numerous passages of the Prophets, referred to by the Commentators, importing that Christ's kingdom would be everlasting. But by that was meant his Spiritual kingdom.

—ὑψωθῆναι τὸν Υἱὸν τ. ἀνθ.] It is plain from hence that the terms Χριστὸς and ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου were regarded as synonymous. The speakers take for granted that Jesus is, what he claims to be, the Messiah. There is, however, no reason to suppose, with the Commentators, that by ὑψωθῆναι the people understood him to speak of crucifixion. It should seem that not even the Apostles comprehended the import of what was said; which was only meant as a dark prediction to be understood after the event, for the confirmation of their faith. The multitude, as appears from what follows, understood the expression ὑψωθῆναι ἐκ τῆς γῆς only of removal from earth to heaven, whether by death or otherwise; though probably the former. That the expression 'being lifted up from the world,' was a frequent periphrasis (by euphemism) to denote death, is plain from the numerous examples adduced by Schoettgen from the Rabbinical writers.

—τίς ἐστιν—ἀνθρώπου:] This is not well rendered by our English Translators, 'Who is that Son of Man?' since τίς is here for ποῖος (like quis for qualis in Latin), as in Mark i. 27. vi. 2. Luke i. 66. John vii. 36, and often. Render: 'What sort of Son of Man is that to be?' To this question our Lord (v. 35.) only replies indirectly, and by allegory,—hinting at their erroneous opinions concerning the Messiah, by adverting to the opportunity, which they now have, for obtaining light to dissipate the clouds of error under which they labour—an opportunity which they must use while they have it, lest they be overtaken by that moral darkness, through the absence of spiritual light, which would disable them from directing their course aright. Here, as on other occasions, our Lord, knowing that he is addressing those who 'could not hear his Word,' (their carnal passions and preconceived opinions blinding their understandings, and rendering them inaccessible to the truth,) offers no explanation (Comp. viii. 21. with vii. 33.), but, instead thereof, a solemn warning. See Luke xiii. 23, and Note.

35. περιπατεῖτε.] Supply ἐν τῷ φωτί. This is explained by what follows a little after, v. 36, πιστεύετε εἰς τὸ φῶς, i. e. 'believe in Him who is a light to enlighten.' The words ὁ περιπατῶν ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ—πάγει are to be viewed in the same light as those at xi. 10 (where see Note);

ἔχετε, ἵνα μὴ σκοτία ὑμᾶς καταλάβῃ· καὶ ὁ περιπατῶν ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ οὐκ οἶδε ποῦ ὑπάγει. Ἔως τὸ φῶς ἔχετε, πιστεύετε 36 εἰς τὸ φῶς, ἵνα υἱοὶ φωτός γένησθε. Ταῦτα ἐλάλησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, καὶ ἀπελθὼν ἐκρύβη ἀπ' αὐτῶν.

Τοσαῦτα δὲ αὐτοῦ σημεῖα πεποιηκότος ἔμπροσθεν αὐτῶν, 37 οὐκ ἐπίστευον εἰς αὐτόν· ^d ἵνα ὁ λόγος Ἡσαίου τοῦ προ-38 φήτου πληρωθῇ, ὃν εἶπε· Κύριε, τίς ἐπίστευσε τῇ ἀκοῇ ἡμῶν; καὶ ὁ βραχίων Κυρίου τίνι ἀπεκαλύφθη; Διὰ τοῦτο οὐκ ἠδύναντο πιστεῦναι, ὅτι πάλιν εἶπεν 39 Ἡσαίας· Ἐτετύλωκεν αὐτῶν τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς, καὶ 40 πεπώρωκεν αὐτῶν τὴν καρδίαν· ἵνα μὴ ἴδωσι τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς, καὶ νοήσωσι τῇ καρδίᾳ, καὶ ἐπιστραφῶσι, καὶ ἰάσωμαι αὐτούς. Ταῦτα εἶπεν Ἡσαίας, ὅτι 41 εἶδε τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἐλάλησε περὶ αὐτοῦ· ὅμως μέντοι 42 καὶ ἐκ τῶν ἀρχόντων πολλοὶ ἐπίστευσαν εἰς αὐτόν· ἀλλὰ, διὰ τοὺς Φαρισαίους, οὐχ ὡμολόγουν, ἵνα μὴ ἀποσυνάγωγαι γένωνται. Ἦγάπησαν γὰρ τὴν δόξαν τῶν ἀνθρώπων μᾶλ- 43 λον ἢ τὴν δόξαν τοῦ Θεοῦ.

οὐκ οἶδε ποῦ ὑπάγει being a popular expression signifying, 'he knows not how to direct his course.'

36. ἐκρύβη ἀπ' αὐτῶν] i.e. 'withdrew himself from them, and kept himself in seclusion,' no longer teaching in public.

37—40. This portion is well termed by Grotius and Bengel the Epiphonema, or Epicrisis historica totius, containing the remarks of the Evangelist on the event (so little successful) of Christ's ministry. In this he treats, 1. of the miracles (v. 37—43), and 2. of the doctrines of Jesus; and shows that neither one nor the other could induce the Jews to believe in him. (Kuinoel and Tittman.)

38. ἵνα.] The best Commentators, ancient and modern, are agreed that ἵνα here denotes (as often) the event, and not the cause; for their unbelief did not happen because it was foretold, but it was foretold because it was foreseen that it would happen.

— τῇ ἀκοῇ.] 'Acōh properly signifies the act of hearing, or the faculty by which any one hears; but also the thing heard, and thence a report, or testimony. A sense of the word derived from the Heb. שָׁמַע, and occurring at Rom. x. 16. Gal. iii. 2. Jer. x. 22. Βραχίων, by a common figure, signifies power, or rather power exerted in action, and there may be, as Lampe supposes, an allusion to the custom of warriors in ancient times, of uncovering their arms, whether for actual battle or for giving orders. See Note on Luke i. 51. The interrogation implies a strong negation; q. d. nemo fere, very few.

These words of the Prophet, though sufficiently applicable to his own times, nay, to almost all times, yet were doubtless spoken with a particular reference to Christ and the men of his age.

39. διὰ τοῦτο.] 'Wherefore,' meaning, since they would not hearken to Christ's words.

— οὐκ ἠδύναντο πιστεῦναι.] This is not to be understood of physical, but of moral inability; meaning, that they would not; lit. they could not bring themselves to, &c. From a comparison of Matt. xiii. 10—17, it is evident (as Mr. Oplvis observes, Bampton Lect., p. 109.) that 'the Evangelist was far from intending to say, that the inability to believe was superinduced and caused, in order that the prediction of the Prophet might be accomplished; still less, that the miracles in question were wrought with a view to incredulity on the part of those who should witness them. We are to suppose that the fact of their unbelief is represented to bespeak a state of mind and heart which rendered them the awful examples of such blindness and insensibility as the Prophet foretold.'

— ὅτι πάλιν εἶπεν Ἡσαίας.] Render, 'For, as Isaiah saith,' &c.

42. ὅμως μέντοι τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἐπίστευσαν.] An accumulation of synonyms, to strengthen the sense, as in Herod. i. 189, ὅμως μέντοι τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἐπίστευσαν. On ἀποσυνάγωγαι, see Note at ix. 22.

44—50. This evidently forms the second part of the Evangelist's statement, namely, that containing the doctrines of Jesus, of which this is a brief summary, and in our Lord's own words proving how repeatedly Jesus had declared his exalted character and office, and warned them of the awful consequences of rejecting him. Comp. supra i. 5. 9. iii. 18. v. 45. vi. 63. vii. 12, 28. &c.

44. ἔκραξε.] The Aorist ἔκραξε and ἐβόη (of which the former denotes public teaching) are to be taken as Pluperfects.

— οὐ—ἀλλ' now nam—quoniam, 'not so much as in Him.' Or there may be, as Kuinoel does, an ellipsis of μόνον (on which see my note on Thucyd. iii. 45). Comp. Mark ix. 37.

3. ὁ θεωρῶν (ἐμὲ, &c.) A mode of expression to denote the intimate union of nature, essence, will, counsel, &c. between the Father and Son (see v. 17. xiv. 9. and Note).

5. φῶς.—[ἐλήλυθα.] St. John often styles our Lord φῶς. So i. 9. viii. 12. See Notes.

7. οὐ κρίνω αὐτόν.] The words are commonly taken to mean, 'I do not here on earth as judge over him, since I came to be a Son, not a Judge.' See iii. 17. v. 45. viii. 15.

Notes. Kuinoel and Tittman, however, take ἐμὲ here in the sense of condemnation and punish; i. e. 'I am not the cause of his condemnation, or of men in general, having come not to destroy, but to save; and therefore the whole blame is cast upon those who prefer darkness to light.' This verse comp. iii. 16—19. and 2 Pet. i. 9.

8. ὁ ἀθετῶν—κρ. αὐτόν.] There seems here to be an ellipsis omitted, per Asyndeton; q. d. 'Nevertheless, he will not go unpunished.' He is not.

9. ὁ λόγος.] By this and the τὰ ῥήματα are meant that part of Christ's teaching which related to his person and office. See iii. 17. and iv. 1. Εἴπω refers to commands, and λαλήσω to moral instruction. It is meant that the unbeliever's inattention and wilful neglect of both bring down on him condemnation and consequent punishment.

10. 50. There are here three things affirmed: 1. That he has not invented the doctrine himself, but received it from the Father, and that therefore it did not owe its origin to human invention, but was altogether divine. 2. He testifies his strong persuasion that all those things, which he committed to him to be delivered to men, had for their end but the eternal salvation of men; that his doctrine points out the way which leads to everlasting bliss. 3. He affirms that, in doing, he has confined himself to the will of the Father; that he has neither added nor suppressed aught, and that therefore his doctrine is pure, perfect, and altogether Divine. (Tittman.)

XIII. Having finished the work of public teaching, our Lord devoted the short remainder of his life to the private instruction of his disciples. These he in chap. xiii., xiv., xv., xvi., apprises of his approaching trials, and endeavours to console them by kind assurances, evincing his love both to them and the whole human race.

1. πρὸ τῆς ἑορτῆς π. π.] See Note on Matt. xvi. 2.

—εἰδὼς ὁ Ἰησοῦς ὅτι, &c.] Of his death he was well aware, having frequently conversed with his disciples upon it, and predicted its most minute circumstances.

—ἵνα μεταβῇ, &c.] Christ's departure from the world is termed μετάβασις, to intimate that he had not descended to earth as a mere man, but as the Son of God, who had come from, and would return to God. So we have in Isocrat. Paneg. μεταστάντος δὲ Ἡρακλίου εἰς θεοῦ. Apollod. 2. τὸν Ἡρακλῖα—εἰς ἀνθρώπων εἰς θεοῦ μετανίστασθαι. Liban. Ep. 371, ὁ Ζεὺς δὲ ἐκεῖνος, ὁ οὐς προστάτης, καὶ παρ' οὐ κατέβηκε, καὶ πρὸς ὃν ἦν.

—ἀγαπήσας τοὺς ἰδίους.] By τοὺς ἰδ. most Commentators understand his disciples. But if we consider the circumstances of the case, and that the great proof of his love was in the institution of the Eucharist, which was intended for the benefit of his own of every age,—we may rather suppose (with Grotius, Calvin, and Tittman,) that the expression is intended for true Christians in general. See xvii. 24.

—ἠγάπησεν.] This expression, Tittman observes, is to be taken, like many others, declaratively. By the tokens of love evinced by Jesus to his disciples, are to be understood the symbolical actions a little after narrated. At εἰς τέλος we may supply βίον; or rather, take εἰς τέλος ἡγ. for διὰ τῆς ἀγαπῆς, as Grotius and Tittman explain, comparing Anthol. i. 85. 5, Γνώσιός εἰμι φίλος· οὐδ' ἄρα τιμῶ, τοῦτον ἐξ ἀρχῆς μέχρι τέλους ἀγαπῶ.

2. δαίπνου γενομένου.] The exact sense of this expression has been disputed. Most Interpreters render, 'supper being ended;' others, 'while supper was preparing.' But the first rendering expresses too much (as is clear from v. 26), and the other, as is plain from v. 4, 12, too little; being moreover contrary to the usage of the language. It is best, with Kuin. and Tittm., to take γενομένου for γενομένου, (as did the Arabic and Persian Translators,) in the sense 'while supper was about,' 'during supper-time.' And, indeed, γενομένου is found in some ancient MSS. and Nonnus. Besides, though washing regularly preceded the meal, yet, as we learn from the Rabbinical writers, there were on the Paschal evening two washings. After all, however, it may be best, with Kuinoel and Tittman, to recognise an extraordinary transaction,—in fact a symbolical action, intended to forcibly inculcate a lesson of humility; which was very necessary, when we consider the discussion that had, at the beginning of supper, arisen among the disciples, as to which of them should hold the first dignities in the Messiah's kingdom and court. See Luke xxii. 24.

—βιβληκότης εἰς τὴν καρδίαν Ἰ. Σ.] An expression, like other similar ones in Scripture, used of suggesting any thought to the mind, and also found in the Classical writers; from whom examples are adduced by Wetstein. Many recent Commentators, indeed, regard this as merely a mode of expression to denote the enormity of the crime meditated. But that view, besides proceeding on an unsound principle, is utterly inconsistent with the character of the words; which evidently convey the idea of a real Being, possessed of an actual power over the minds of men. Here, we may observe, the two circumstances of Judas's temptation to betray his Master, and the condescension of that Master, are mentioned together, in order the more strongly to represent the baseness of the betrayer.

3. εἰδὼς ὁ Ἰησοῦς, &c.] q. d. Though he knew that God had given all power into his hands, yet he vouchsafed to set his disciples the following example of humility.

This expression ἀπὸ Θεοῦ ἐξῆλθε, taken in conjunction with πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν ὑπάγει, can import no less than that 'he was of celestial origin, and dwelt in heaven before he came on earth' (see iii. 13. vi. 62. xvii. 5. and i. 1.); and the latter (πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν ὑπάγει) must mean, that he would return to the Father, again to reign with Him by equal right. In short, the clause plainly declares the dignity of Christ's person—that as he had 'come from God' (by origination from the Father), and had the government of the whole universe committed into his hands, so he was going again to God, to resume the glory which he had had with the Father from all eternity. See supra iii. 13. viii. 42. and Notes.

4. τίθησι] 'lays aside;' for ἀποτίθησι. A use occasionally found in the later writers, as Arrian and Diod. Sic., and answering to that of ponere in Latin. By ἱμάτια is meant either the upper garment only, the pallium (plural for singular, as in the corresponding Hebrew term), or rather, as it should seem, the pallium and stola, the mantle and tunic. Λέντιον is a Hellenistic word (from whence the Latin lintum) nearly synonymous with σινδών, and meaning a sheet; though σάβανον was the more usual term. To be thus girded was considered by the ancients in the same light as, with us, a person's wearing an apron,—namely, as indicating the exercise of some servile or handicraft occupation.

5. βάλλει—νιπτῆρα.] Βάλλει is for ἐμβαλλει (or rather ἐγχεί), as in Exod. xxiv. 6. Τὸ νιπτῆρα. This washing, which, in the times of primitive simplicity, had been performed by the host or hostess to the guest, was in after ages committed to the servants, and was accordingly accounted a servile employment. Though, as Lampe remarks, it was not a mere act of servitude, but sometimes of reverence, such as the inferior rendered to the superior; as a wife to her husband, and children to their parents. It was never done by a superior towards an inferior. And this sets in a still stronger light the condescension of our blessed Lord.

6. σύ μου—πόδας;] This sort of interrogation, joined with wonder, involves a strong negation; and the σὺ and νίπτεις are emphatic.

7. ὁ ἐγὼ ποιῶ, &c.] A popular mode of expression for 'The meaning of what I am doing,' &c. Μετὰ ταῦτα is often used, as here, of a very short period hence; meaning, in the present case, 'after I have done what I am doing.' This our Lord explains at v. 12—17; namely, to set them an example of humility, condescension, and Christian 'forbearing of one another in love.

8. ἰάν μὴ νύσῃ σε, &c.] This need not be supposed to mean (as Kuinoel and others understand) 'unless thou suffered me to wash thee.' The expression was probably so worded, in order to make the thing appear a privilege to be conferred. With respect to the sense (which has been disputed) of the words following, ἔχεις μέρος μὲν μου, it may be observed, that the phrase ἔχεις μέρος μετὰ τινος properly imports no more than fellowship with any one, by community of sentiment, as in friendship. And such, Tittman thinks, is the sense here intended. But considering the frequent custom of our Lord to pass from sensible and temporal objects to things spiritual and eternal (as Luke x. 42.), we may rather, with Lampe, suppose that our Lord meant thus to intimate to Peter, that if he were not thus cleansed by him (with allusion to the mystical washing away of sin by the blood and Spirit of Christ; see 1 John i. 7. Rev. i. 5. Hebr. x. 22.), he could not have part in the communication of the benefits of his blood, as typified in the ordinance which he was about to institute. See 1 Cor. x. 16.

10. ὁ λελουμένος, &c.] In order to determine the exact sense of this passage (which, from its obscurity, has been variously interpreted) it is necessary first to ascertain the nature of the allusion; which some suppose to be to the Jewish custom of washing the hands and face before meals (see Matt. xv. 2); others, to the two kinds of washing, as religious rites, in use among the Jews; 1. by the immersion of the whole body at the consecration of priests and the baptism of proselytes; 2. by the purificatory ablutions in daily use among the Jews. Thus they suppose the meaning to be, that 'the true Christian needs not that total change, which is indispensable to the unconverted sinner; though he will need continual acts of repentance and faith, to cleanse himself from lesser impurities.' Of these two views, however, the latter is too far-fetched and artificial to be relied on; and the former would seem to be excluded by the term λούεσθαι being used, not βαπτίζεσθαι; the former denoting the washing of the whole body, as in a bath; the latter the washing only of a part; see Acts ix. 37, compared with Rom. ii. 2. 582. Hence the allusion may rather be, what Grotius supposes, to the use of the bath previously to going to an entertainment. After having undergone this ablution, a guest needed no further purification, on arriving at his host's house, than to have his feet washed, which might be soiled by the way. The moral lesson thus supposed to be inculcated is nearly the same as on the former interpretation.

After all, however, it would seem better to suppose that our Lord here intended not to teach any doctrine, properly so called, such as regeneration, but only, by this allusion to a temporal custom, to intimate a spiritual truth, i. e. the necessity for moral and internal purity; q. d. 'As he who has bathed is entirely purified, and fit to mix in society at a meal, except that his feet may need washing, so are ye now cleansed from moral defilement by my word and doctrine (see xv. 3). But one thing yet remains, which, like the washing of the feet, will, when done, complete the whole; namely, that you should receive a lesson to be taught you by the action I am about to perform.' This, it should be observed, was a lesson not only of humility, but of the need of the spiritual washing by the blood of Christ; as it was said at ver. 8, ἰάν μὴ νύσῃ σε, οὐκ ἔχεις μέρος μὲν μου, where see Note.

— καὶ ὑμεῖς καθαροὶ ἐστέ.] The καὶ should here (as at ver. 14) be rendered, 'thus also'; this clause containing, as Calvin observes, the minor proposition in the syllogism. Render the οὐχὶ just after, 'by no means.' These latter words were meant to smite the conscience of Judas.

12—17. Here our Lord shows the chief intent of the action he had been performing, admonishing them to practise the duty it was meant to suggest.

12. τί πεποιήκα ὑμῖν;] Meaning, the intent of what I have done to you.

13. φωνεῖτέ με, ὁ διδ.] Ὁ διδ. is not (as Campbell supposes) the nominative for the accusative, but rather for the vocative, as at Mark v. 41, and elsewhere. Indeed, here it forms part of the form of address, there being an ellipsis of λέγοντες. How frequent was this mode of address, is proved by the citations adduced from the Rabbinical writers by Schoettgen, which indeed show that the proper name of the Rabbins was almost always dropped.

14. εἰ οὖν ἐγὼ, &c.] An argumentum à majori ad minus. These words are not to be taken, nor were they understood, in the literal sense; for neither the Apostles nor the primitive Christians had any such custom. By washing one another's feet Christ did not mean that they should do this literally, but that they should behave towards each other with the same spirit as that characterized by this symbol of humility and condescension, having a mind weaned from pride, ambition, and vain-glory, and ever ready to show mutual forbearance, condescension, and kindness.

16. ἀπόστολος] for ὁ ἀπεσταλμένος, like the Hebr. מַלְאָךְ, as in 2 Cor. viii. 23. Nor is this use unknown in the Classical writers. So Herodotus i. 21. v. 35, ἵε Λακ. ἀπόστολος ἐγένετο. This was a proverbial saying of frequent occurrence (comp. Matt. x. 24. Luke vi. 40), and here to be accommodated to the purpose in view, that of enjoining them to manifest the same spirit of humility as their master.

17. εἰ ταῦτα—αὐτά.] The εἰ may, with Kuinoel and others, be rendered supponit, since, as at ver. 14, εἰ ἡνίφα, &c. Acts xi. 17. xvi. 15. xviii. 15. Rom. viii. 31, and elsewhere. Yet as it may be doubted whether they did really know the truths they had been told (an opinion of knowledge being a frequent cause of ignorance); and as that signification of the word is not to be resorted to unnecessarily, and where it materially alters the sense, so here it is better to retain the ordinary one, and suppose that our Lord here glances at that self-opinion; q. d. Ye may say that ye know all this very well. If, then, ye do know these things, happy are ye if ye do them.

Similar sentiments may be seen in Matt. vii. 21. Mark iii. 35. Luke vi. 46. And several such are adduced from ancient Greek writers by Wetstein and Kypke; ex. gr. Hesiod, Op. et D. 62, εὐδαίμων τις καὶ ὄλβιος οὗ τάδε πάντα εἰδὼς ἐργάζεται. Seneca, Epist. 75. 'Non est beatus qui scit illa, sed qui facit.' Knowledge and practice are indeed (as Lampe observes) inseparably connected, knowledge being the rule of practice, and practice the end of knowledge.

18. Our Lord now again adverts to the treachery of Judas, applying to him what was originally said by the Psalmist with reference to Ahithophel's treachery towards himself.

—οὐ περὶ πάντων, &c.] q. d. Of all of you I cannot affirm that ye will be so happy as to practise this precept.

—οἶδα οὖν ἐξελεξάμην.] The sense is, 'I know the [dispositions of] the persons whom I have chosen [as Apostles].' So xv. 16, ἐγὼ ἐξελεξάμην ὑμᾶς καὶ ἔθηκα ὑμᾶς. Αἱ δὲ ἅλλ' ἱνα, &c., sub. τοῦτο γίνεται, or the like. The ἵνα has the eventual force. The full sense is, 'But [such is the case with you] that the words of Scripture are fulfilled;' what was literally meant for Ahithophel being typically intended for, and fulfilled in, Judas.

—ὁ τρώγων—αὐτοῦ] Ὁ τρ. denotes a familiar friend; the communion of domestic hospitality having in every age been accounted an inviolable pledge of friendship. So in Eurip. Hec. 793. Quint. Curt. vii. 4. Ἐπῆραν, &c. The general sense is, 'has turned against me, to overthrow me.' A metaphor taken either from wrestlers, who endeavour to trip up their antagonists' heels; or from kicking animals, which suddenly and treacherously kick at and injure their keepers. Comp. Jerem. ix. 4, τὰς ἀδελφὰς πτέρην πτερινεῖ (scil. ἀδελφόν), καὶ τὸν φίλον δολίως πορεύσεται.

19. ἀπ' ἄρτι λέγω—πιστεύσῃτε, &c.] Meaning, 'I tell you this now, before it has taken place, that when it shall have come to pass, ye may be confirmed in your faith, that I am He whom I professed to be, the Christ;' that being implied, though, as viii. 24, not expressed. Περὶ is taken as at ii. 11. Our Lord's purpose was not only to confirm their faith, but to prepare them for the perfidy soon to be disclosed; since his words allude to only one traitor, as indeed he soon afterwards intimates in express terms.

20. So Matt. x. 40, where see Note. The connexion here is variously traced. The scope of the words seems to be, to fortify them under the tribulations they should endure in the course of their Apostolic office, by the remembrance, that as they sustained the character of representatives of their Lord, they should not be troubled at having to suffer, as He had, from the treachery, cowardice, stupidity, and perverseness of those whom they taught.

21. ἑμαρτύρησε καὶ εἶπεν.] For ἑμαρτ. διῆν Marturein denotes open declaration, in contradistinction to the indirect allusion at ver. 20.

22. ἔβλεπον εἰς ἄλλ.] This well depicts their anxiety, as ἀποροῦμενοι does their perplexity what to think or whom to suspect; see Gen. xxi. 1, and comp. Hom. II. Ω. 480.

23. ἦν δὲ ἀνακείμενος—ἐν τῇ κόλπῳ for ἐπὶ τὸ στῆθος, the expression used at ver. 25. This situation, Kypke observes, was one chiefly assigned to near and dear connexions, as wives and children, of which he adduces several examples.

24. μαθῆσαι [nutu significat, see Note on Luke i. 22.

25. ἐπιπεσὼν] 'leaning upon.' Euthymius, however, thinks he did not alter his posture, but merely turned his head. That the question was put in a low voice, and answered in the same tone, is plain from vv. 28, 29. Comp. Hom. Od. viii. 70, and see Matt. xxvi. 31.

26. ψωμίον.] This is not well rendered sop, though that signification is sometimes found. As derived from ψάω it signifies (like the Hebr. מִן מִן, to break) a bit or piece of any thing, i. e. a food. And here probably it denotes a piece of the paschal lamb dipped in the sauce. Such portions were usually distributed by the master of the family. There is no real discrepancy in the statements of the Evangelists. Jesus, it seems, was thus engaged, when, John putting the above question to him, he either helped Judas first, or, in serving out the portions, had come to him in his turn. Judas, then (perhaps sitting near Jesus, and having heard John's interrogation, or, with the suspicion natural to guilt, supposing that they were speaking of him), after receiving the portion, asks in a low voice, Is it I, master? To whom Jesus answers, σὺ εἶπας, it is thou (see Matt. xxvi. 25). Then in a loud voice he adds, ὁ ποιεῖς, ποίησον τάχιον, 'what thou art about to do, do very quickly.' Where the present ποιεῖς is for the future sense, the Imperative being, as Chrysostom remarks, persuasive, though with the force of indignant reproach. The manner of speaking is itself proverbial, as appears from the many examples adduced by Wetstein and others, of which the most apposite is Eurip. Iph. Aul. 817, δρᾷ γ' εἰτι θέλειται.

27. ὅτε [οὖν] ἐξῆλθε.] The MSS., Versions, and Editions, vary as to the reading, and still more the position of these words, which are in some copies connected with what precedes, in others with what follows. The Ed. Princ. and R. VOL. I.

Stephens, 1, 2, join them with the following, placing a period after νύξ; the Erasmus and Stephens's 3d Edition connect them with the preceding. But the old position was recalled by Beza and the Elzevir Editor, and was thus introduced into the testus receptus. Of later Editors, Wetstein, Matthæi, Knapp, and Vater, join them with the preceding; Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz, with the following. The determination of this question mainly depends upon its being decided whether the οὖν should be adopted or rejected. It is found in most of the MSS. (many of them very ancient), in several of the later Versions, and some Fathers; but is wanting in very many MSS. (some equally ancient), and the earlier and principal Versions; and is rejected by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz. The point, however, admits not of any certain determination. It might have been thrown out by those who, joining the words with the preceding, thought the οὖν worse than useless; or it might have been inserted by those who, connecting the words with what follows, thought that a particle of continuation was wanting. And this seems more probable, and better accounts for the variation of opinion as to the construction of the words. But as to whether ὅτε—ἐξῆλθε should be taken with the preceding, or the following, is a matter on which it is difficult to pronounce positively. We may, however, agree rather with those who adopt the latter course, by which a better sense is gained; for it could scarcely be the intention of the Evangelist to make an insignificant circumstance so prominent. And if the other mode of position be adopted, there will be great harshness in the next verse beginning so abruptly. At ἦν δὲ νύξ the words ὅτε ἐξῆλθε may very well be supplied from the preceding context; and it is expressed in Cyril and Nonnus.

— On the departure of Judas, our Lord proceeded to deliver those most interesting last discourses with his disciples, by which he intended to infix in their minds truths which, ignorant as they were, and labouring under heavy affliction, they could not, indeed, at that time, fully comprehend, but which they would afterwards understand; and by which, even now, they would language of consolation, exhortation, promise namely, of support), and valediction, interspersed with various intimations highly instructive, and some of them prophetic.

1. μὴ ταρσσίσθω ὑμῶν ἡ καρδία, &c. Meaning, 'Be not troubled in mind at what I have said of my departure; only trust in God, and trust in me.' The first πιστεύετε admits, indeed, of being taken either in the Indicative or in the Imperative, see Note supra ver. 39. And the former is adopted in the Vulg. and by the earlier modern Commentators; the latter by many ancient Fathers, the Pesch. Syr. Version, and almost all the modern Commentators from Whitby to Tittman. But from the connexion of the words, we can scarcely suppose the same word used first in the Indicative, and then in the Imperative, in the same sentence. We are therefore bound to suppose the Imperative to be meant in the first as well as the second πιστ.; especially as it yields a sense not only good in itself, but apposite (the whole of the verse being hortatory), and agreeable to the analogy of Scripture; namely, that a steadfast faith in God, and the one Mediator between God and man, would be the best support under all the trials to which they might be exposed. On the proof hence to be deduced of the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, see Smith's Scrip. Test. vol. iii. 179.

2. ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ—slow. This assurance seems meant to wean them from secular ambition, and console them under present affliction, by a representation of the ample felicity he is going to prepare for them. In the μοναὶ πολλαὶ some suppose an allusion to the numerous chambers in the house of his Father on earth, the Temple; and others to the custom of Eastern monarchs, of sleeping in their courtiers' habitations within the precincts of their vast palaces; others, again, think we may hence infer that there are various degrees of reward in Heaven, proportioned to man's progress in faith and holiness; while others barely understand by this, that Heaven is a most ample space, sufficient for and intended for all men; see on this whole context an able Discourse of Dr. Bates, Works, vol. iv. 347. All that we can with certainty pronounce intended by our Lord is to console them under affliction, by a view of the boundless felicity in reserve for the faithful. The words imply a participation in those mansions of bliss which our Lord himself was going to occupy, and to which he would lead the way of all his disciples.

3. εἰ δὲ μὴ, εἶπον ἂν ὑμῖν. Meaning, 'if it had not been so, I would have told you so, and I deceived you with vain hopes.' The Jews, with the exception of the Sadducees, believed that the Messiah's appearance would be succeeded by a state of eternal happiness. And our Lord assures his disciples that he would not have allowed them to indulge this hope in vain; but that he was now going to prepare for their admission into the mansions of eternal bliss. See Doddridge, Lampe, and Kuinoel.

—πορεύομαι, &c. These words contain (as Tittman observes) a sentence of particular application, in confirmation of the foregoing general one. 'Nay, I go to prepare a place for you there; namely, by virtue of his sacrifice and intercession; a similitude taken from one who goes before another to some unknown country, to prepare for his reception.'

3. ἐὰν πορευθῶ καὶ ἐτοιμάσω. The best Commentators are agreed that the sense is, as at John xii. 32, 'When I shall have gone, and shall have prepared a place; and that πάλιν ἔρχομαι is for πάλιν ἐλεύσομαι. They differ, however, on whether this coming of our Lord is to be understood of the day of judgment (see vv. 18, 28, xii. 26, Acts i. 11, 1 Thess. iv. 17), or of the day of each man's death. The former view is maintained by most ancient and earlier moderns; the latter by the generality of the recent Commentators. But if the latter interpretation be adopted, the words would seem a mere accommodation, with little meaning. And even were we to grant (what has never yet been proved) that at death the righteous are immediately received up into heaven, yet the maintainers of that doctrine do not assert that Christ comes to fetch them. The common interpretation, then, is greatly preferable; and it is placed beyond doubt by 1 Thess. iv. 16, sq. where the language of the Apostle is the best comment on that of his Lord. The purpose of both passages is the same, namely, the consolation of the persons addressed.

4. Our Lord had before said, that he was going to his Father's house, to prepare for the reception of his disciples; by which declaration they knew, or ought to have known, whither he went, and the way.

—τὴν ὁδόν i. e. the means whereby ye may arrive thither, namely, by faith in Christ. Since, however, the disciples (v. 5) did not thoroughly comprehend his meaning (confounding the terms with notions of an earthly kingdom, and never dreaming of the death of the Messiah), our Lord makes it clearer at ver. 6; at the same time using a certain boldness of metaphor, in order to impress it in a more lively manner on their memory.

6. ἐγὼ εἰμι ἡ ὁδός, &c. Ὁδός is for ὁδοποιός, or ὁδηγός. The other terms ἡ ἀλήθεια and ἡ ζωῇ, are by several of the best Commentators supposed to be put (abstract for concrete) by Hebraism, for the adjectives ἀληθινῇ and ζω-ποιός; see x. 7, compared with ver. 9. xi. 25. Others regard it as a more energetic mode of expression, q. d. 'I am the way, the true way [to life], the author of life and happiness;' the third term being exegetical of the two former. Yet even this may be thought to sacrifice some of the emphasis of the declaration. And though the other declaration be true, yet this is a more extensive truth; on which see Lampe and Bengel. Compare also Heb. x. 20. Jesus Christ is our way to the Father and to heaven, in his person, as God manifest in the flesh; in his office, as our Mediator with God, introducing us to the Holiest by 'a new and living way;' in his sacrifice, as our great High Priest for ever; who, by his perfect obedience and atoning sacrifice, hath made propitiation for the sins of the whole world; in his intercession, as our Advocate with the Father, who hath given us access with confidence to the throne of grace; lastly, he is our way, as being our great Moral Teacher and Perfect Exemplar, being 'the great Shepherd of the Sheep,' 'leaving us an example that we should follow his steps,' and preceding us in a way open to all, plain and even secure; pleasant, and terminating in everlasting bliss. He is the truth, both in his essence and attributes, as being one with the Father (who 'is truth'); he is the fountain of all truth, the complement of all truth (being the substance of all the types and figures of the Old Testament), having all the characters of truth. As such, he is our great Prophet, pointing out by his word, which 'is truth,' the way which leadeth unto everlasting life. Finally, he is the life, as being (what he elsewhere testifies of himself) 'the resurrection and the life;' through whom alone any one cometh unto the Father in acceptance and salvation, and through whose life-giving Spirit the dead in trespasses and sins are so quickened as to believe in him as the truth, and to come unto him as the way, and thus to finally experience him as the life. Accordingly, as it is expressed in the words following, no man cometh unto the Father, &c.; i. e. 'there is no admission to the heavenly mansions but by faith in Jesus as the way and the life, and obedience to him as the truth.'

7—10. In these verses it is affirmed that he who hath seen and heard Christ, hath, in some way and in a certain sense, seen and heard the Father (see Smith's Scrip. Test., vol. ii. 313); implying an essential union of Father and Son. So intimate is this union, that Christ says, αὐ-

τὸν Πατέρα μου ἐγνώκειτέ με, καὶ τὸν Πατέρα μου ἐγνώκειτέ ἄν', meaning, that if they had duly known their Lord in his proper character as Mediator and Redeemer, they would have proportionately known his Father also as the Creator. And he then subjoins for their comfort, that they shall shortly have that knowledge; see Dr. Smith, ubi supra.

By this knowing of Christ is meant the knowledge of his attributes; his infinite wisdom, benevolence, mercy, &c., which, if they be fully known, will be found the same as those of the Father.

7. καὶ ἅπ' ἄρτι γινώσκετε, &c.] It is clear from Philip's reply, that this is to be understood (by a frequent use of the Present tense) of what is shortly to be; q. d. Ye will a short time hence know, and, as it were, see him; meaning, after Christ's death, and at the sending of the Holy Ghost, to guide them into all truth. Or, retaining the usual force of the tenses, the sense may be, 'Yea, a short time hence [ye may say that] ye know Him, nay, have seen him;' namely, because ye have known and seen me, who am one with Him.

8. δεῖξον ἡμῖν τὸν Πατέρα] i. e. in some visible and sensible manner. A request, it should seem, founded on Philip's erroneously taking the expression of our Lord, ἑώρακάτε, in a literal sense.

9. οὐκ ἐγνωνκάς με:] Meaning, hast thou not known who I am, and what is my true character?

— ὁ ἑωρακὼς ἐμὲ, &c.] 'He who hath seen me hath [in effect] seen the Father;' of whom Christ was the image by his doctrines and perfections. He who saw Jesus living, acting, and dying, saw, in fact, the Father. (Tittman.)

Thus (observes Dr. Pye Smith) the oneness assumed is shown to be both that of moral excellences, and that of efficient operation. In each respect whosoever had seen or known the Son, had so seen or known the Father. The doctrines taught, the miracles performed, the spiritual excellences and glory displayed by the Son, are identically those of the Father. In short, the perfections were the perfections of the Son. The inference to be drawn from all this is (as Lampe, Tittman, and Smith have shown), that where there is such perfect oneness of attributes, there must be a oneness also of nature in the Father and the Son.

10. Here our Lord means to ask whether Philip did not yet believe the essential union and mutual indwelling of the Father and the Son, and of the Godhead in his human nature. He had frequently spoken to them on this subject; and his words were not 'of himself,' as distinct from the Father; and therefore they ought to have been more regarded, especially as the Father, dwelling in and working by him, had borne witness to him by so many stupendous miracles. Scott.)

— τὰ ῥήματα—οὐ λαλῶ.] These words, and the following, ὁ δὲ Πατὴρ—τὰ ἔργα, are an illustration of the community just mentioned, as applied both to words and to works. In the latter sense all will be regular, if we supply, as corresponding to τὰ ῥήματα—λαλῶ, the words τὰ ἔργα ἃ ποιῶ ἐν ὑμῖν ἅπ' ἑαυτοῦ οὐ ποιῶ. There is a plain reference to this omitted clause as the introductory δέ.

11. πιστεύετε, &c.] Here Christ not only repeats the foregoing assertion, but enjoins them to repose faith in it; telling them (as a popular proof of His conjunction with the Father) that His works (i. e. his miracles) argue community of mind, energy, and power.

12. ὁ πιστεύων—ποιήσει.] By τὰ ἔργα ἃ ἐγὼ ποιῶ, as Tittmann observes, is meant that sort of Christ's work which he at xvii. 4 calls the work committed to him by the Father, namely, a promulgating the Father's plan of salvation through the Son, in confirming it by miracles, in selecting a community of those who should embrace the plan of salvation, &c. By the greater works here mentioned we are to understand not greater per se; for, as far as regards the miracles worked by the Apostles, none could be more illustrious than those performed by our Lord, but only in a certain degree, partly as regarded their office and ministry (which is alone the subject of these words) and partly in respect to the extensive effects of those miracles and their results. See more in Whitby, and Smith's Scrip. Test., vol. ii. 318.

— ὅτι ἐγὼ πρὸς τὸν Π. μου πορ.] These words would seem to have so little bearing on the preceding ones, that most recent Commentators connect them closely with the following, καὶ ὁ ^fτι ^fἂν ^fαἰτήσητε, rendering: 'Because I go to my Father, whatsoever, &c.' This, however, is overlooking the καὶ; and in rendering because, the sense which is not very apposite. The real meaning intended seems to be, 'For I am going to my Father; and accordingly whatsoever ye ask,' &c. This is confirmed by facts; for after our Lord's death, resurrection, ascension, and glorification, He sent the Holy Spirit both to 'guide them into all truth,' and to enable them to work all miracles necessary to its confirmation. See infra vi. 7.

13. ὁ ^fτι ^fἂν.] Meaning (as is implied by ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί μου) 'whatsoever ye shall ask in my cause, for the furtherance of the work committed to you.' The next words τοῦτο ποιήσω are very important, as indicating the cause of the effects in question; on which see Dr. Pyc Smith and Calvin. With this verse compare infra xv. 16. xvi. 23. Hence it follows (as Whitby shows) that as both Father and Son equally hear and grant the petitions offered up in the name of Christ, both equally possess omniscience and omnipotence.

14. What is here said is not a vain repetition, but intended more strongly to impress on their minds the preceding assurance. Had the ancient Critics been sensible of this, they would not have had the temerity to cancel the verse, as, from its omission in several Versions, Fathers, and MSS., it is evident they did. But if the repetition be of the nature above pointed out, propriety surely demands that the sentence should not be couched in weaker terms than that which it is meant to enforce. Accordingly Translators and Expositors have done wrong in taking ἐάν in the conditional sense. It should rather seem to be put for ἂν, and τι for ὅτι, as at xx. 23, ἂν τινὲς ἀρῇτε τὰς ἁμαρτίας, ἀφίενται αὐτοῖς, where some MSS. (including the two most ancient ones) have ἐάν, which has been edited by Lachman. Render, 'whatsoever ye may ask,' &c.

16. ἄλλον Παράκλ. δώσει ὑμῖν.] On the nature of this promise, and especially on the particular term whereupon it mainly hinges, Παράκλητος, no little difference of opinion exists. To this have been assigned various senses, as Comforter, Teacher, Helper, Advocate, Intercessor; each of them too limited to reach the great extent of which the term is susceptible, or to do justice to its application, as expressive of the great variety of gifts imparted by the Holy Spirit. Of the above-mentioned senses those of Advocate or Helper, and Intercessor, have been, with reason, preferred by the most eminent Interpreters, and come nearest to the primary force of the term, namely, 'one called in or upon for aid' of whatsoever kind. Neither, however, must the senses assigned by others, Comforter and Monitor, be excluded; and although the exact force of the expression must every where vary with the context and the adjuncts; yet as the part assigned to the Παράκλητος in the work of man's salvation embraces a great variety of functions, so it may comprehend all, and in certain cases nearly all together of these senses, one or other of which has been usually regarded as the only, or the leading sense. And consequently it will be best either to leave the term untranslated, expressing it by Paraclete, or to render it Advocate; since the word Advocatus in Latin has nearly the same extent of signification.

The expression ἄλλον before Παράκλη. has reference to Christ, as having been the first Paraclete. And the title, as Calvin observes, is very suitable both to Christ and the Holy Spirit; inasmuch as the office of both is in many respects common. Not that Christ, at his departure, ceased to be our Advocate, or Patron; for he is perpetually such (see 1 John ii. 1.), but that, as Calvin observes, He is such, but not in a visible manner. The Holy Spirit is such visibilibus, and with us personally and individually in this world, doing what Christ did to his disciples while he was on earth. In short, He in various ways (as the Apostle says) 'hath our infirmities,' (Rom. viii. 26.), and, to sum all up in the expression of the same Apostle, ὑπερεντυγχάνει ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, by which is meant the doing that for us which we could not do for ourselves; the very character of a spiritual Advocate and Helper. And so the term ὑπερεντυγχάνω signifies primarily to act as any one's advocate or mediator; secondarily, to help any one generally. How this ὑπερεντυγχάνει differs from that of Christ is shown in the Note on Rom. viii. 26.

This passage, then, is one of those many which exist to prove the personality of the Holy Spirit; and as the offices of the Paraclete are such as imply omniscience, omnipresence, omnipotence, and other attributes of Deity, so may we hence infer the Divinity of the Holy Spirit.

16. εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα.] The best Expositors are agreed that the context here so limits the sense, that the phrase is synonymous with εἰς τέλος, 'continually, to the end of life.'

17. τὸ Πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας.] Meaning, the author of all truth, the very truth itself, and the impartor thereof, namely, Gospel truth. There is, however, a reference to the Holy Spirit, as being this Paraclete.

— ὁ κόσμος.] Meaning the carnal, corrupt, and worldly-minded part of it. So 1 Cor. ii. 14, ψυχικὸς ἄνθρωπος.

— οὐ δύναται λαβεῖν.] i. e. 'cannot bring themselves to receive it;' since, only 'minding earthly things,' they neither understand nor care about those heavenly gifts. And thus it happens, as is just afterwards said, that they have neither any perception nor any knowledge of the thing.

18. οὐκ ἀφήσω ὑμᾶς ὀρφ., &c.] In order to determine the exact sense of these words, it will be proper to fix that of the leading term ὀρφα-

νός. Now ὀρφανός is properly an Adjective (like orbus in Latin) followed by a Genitive of person or thing, in the sense deprived of: but it is sometimes used absolutely, in the sense destitute, as in Lucian de Morte Peregr. § 6. (cited by Elmer): ἔξ ἀνθρώπων εἰς θεοῦ ἀγαλμα τοῦτο εὐχόμενοι ὀρφανοὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ πυρὸς, ὀρφανὸς ἡμᾶς καταλείπον. There is, however, usually an allusion to children deprived of their parents; an idea especially apposite in the present instance; since, among the Jews, disciples were regarded as the spiritual children of their teachers; and hence a little before, xiii. 33, our Lord calls his disciples τέκνια, and at xxi. 5, παῖδια. Wetstein well illustrates the expression from a Rabbinical writer: 'Vae mihi tuâ causâ, magister et domus mi, quia totam generationem reliquisti orphanam.'

But to consider the import of the whole passage (which has been variously understood) some take these words in a physical sense, of Christ's reappearance, and society with them, after his resurrection; others, in a figurative one, of Christ's invisible and spiritual presence. It may be met, with Tittman, to unite both views, which is supported by facts. 'For (as Tittman observes) Christ did return literally to his disciples, after his resurrection, in a visible manner, and metaphorically, unseen, after his ascension to heaven; when also, as he promised, in departing to heaven (see Matt. xxviii. 20.), he was perpetually present with them, by the gracious aid of his omnipotent power in the discharge of their Evangelical functions. He was always with them, and, in fact, gave them, when absent, greater aid than he had done when present.'

19. καὶ [and (then)]. Θεωρεῖ, 'is to see, will see.' So, just after, θεωρεῖτε. Ζῶ, for ἀζῶ, and ζήσεσθε for ἀναζή, as supra v. 25, and Luke xxiv. 5. The two terms may be taken either in a metaphorical sense, of the spiritual life, or in the ordinary one of the natural. Both senses may have been intended.

20. ἐν ἐκ. τῇ ἡμ.] i. e. 'when the promise of the sending of the Paraclete shall be fulfilled.' Ἐγὼ ἐν τῷ Πατρὶ, &c. On this indissoluble union, see supra v. 10, 19. vi. 51. x. 38. v. 7. and Note.

21. ὁ ἐχὼν—ἀγαπῶν με.] This is a repetition of the sentiment at v. 15, and is meant to limit the declaration in the foregoing verse to those only who evince their love of God, by keeping his commandments; since to such alone will he manifest himself. See Bp. Ball, Ham.

p. 8, and compare ver. 23, 24. xv. 14. 1 John ii. 3. iii. 18—24. Ἐχουσ here, and often elsewhere, denotes to have in mind, so as to keep.

— ἐμφανίσω αὐτῷ ἐμ. This is by some understood literally of Christ's personal appearance after his resurrection. See v. 23 and Note. Yet that interpretation, it has been justly urged, is at variance with our Lord's explanation of the words, v. 23. It is better, therefore, with others, to take the expression figuratively, of an invisible and spiritual manifestation. Though, indeed, as far as regards the disciples, both senses may be supposed, as at v. 18.

22. Κύριε, καὶ τί γίγνεται, &c.] I have here before τί γίγνεται inserted καὶ, on the authority of many of the best MSS., some Versions and Fathers, and the Ed. Princ. It has been received by almost every Editor from Weistsein to Scholz. A similar construction is found at ix. 36, καὶ τίς ἐστι, Κύριε, &c., where many inferior MSS. (with the received text) in like manner are without the καὶ. Also 2 Cor. ii. 2, καὶ τίς ἐστι, &c. This forms one branch of that generic construction, by which καὶ is used with particles of interrogations, when it has always an intensive force. Τί γίγνεται ὅτι is an idiom corresponding to the Heb. מַה עוֹשֶׂה, which denotes, not (as it would seem to do) the manner, but the cause, as when we say, 'how is this, or how so?' So Eurip. Tr. 889, (cited by Kypke) τί δ' ἐστίν, σὺ γὰρ ὡς ἐκείνους θῆας;

This question of Judas doubtless originated in misapprehension of our Lord's words (as if he spoke of his resurrection only), arising from those false notions which the Apostles entertained of the Messiah's kingdom, and which they retained until they were illuminated by the Holy Spirit. Indeed, Judas's chief difficulty seems to have been to conceive how this preference of revelation to the disciples could consist with setting up his kingdom. To this question our Lord answers not directly (because they would not have comprehended him), but merely assigns a reason for the distinction which he would make between his disciples and the world, or turns their attention to what it especially behoved them to know and believe.—(comp. Luke xiii. 23, 24.) namely, that those only who truly loved him, evincing it decisively by keeping his commandments, would be the special objects of his Father's love.

22. ἐλεησόμεθα καὶ μονὴν π. αὐ. π.] The Commentators adduce examples of the phrase μονὴν ποιῆσαι, which they regard as synonymous with μένειν. But it is, in fact, a more significant expression, denoting a continued abiding. Of course it is to be taken in a metaphorical sense, of an invisible and spiritual presence, and is meant to illustrate the ἐμφανίσω αὐτῷ ἑμαυτόν at v. 21. In the Old Test. God is said to come to men, when he promises or bestows peculiar benefits on them: also to dwell or remain with those whom he especially favours; as also to leave and depart from those whom he ceases to benefit.

Besides, God and Christ may be said to come by the Holy Spirit, whose 'temple is the body of the Saints, (1 Cor. iii. 16. vi. 13.) and by whose indwelling they are made an habitation of God.' Eph. ii. 22. By this Spirit the Father and Son dwell in all true Christians. So in Philo, p. 124, (cited by Lampe) the Deity is thus mystically represented as coming and dwelling in the soul: Ἐπεὶ δὲ τοίνυν ἀοράτως τῶδε τῆς ψυχῆς χωρὶς ἐισδύεται, παρασκευάζουσι τὸν τόπον ἐκείνον ὡς ἐνιστὶν ἀξιοχρίων ἰνδαίτημα (οἱ οὖν γενησόμενοι· εἰ δὲ μὴ λυσταὶ μεταναστὰς εἰς ἕτερον οἶκον, ὃν ὃν ἄμεινον αὐτῷ δοκῇ ὑδουμιουργῆσθαι, &c.

24. ὁ μὴ ἀγαπῶν—οὐ τηρεῖ.] This is meant to affirm the same truth negatively; and consequently there is implied the negative of the proposition at v. 21; i. e. 'he will not have the love of Christ and the Father,' the ἐμφάνεια and the other benefits resulting from thence. In the words following there is again something to be supplied, in order to complete the sense (which is rather intimated than fully expressed), namely, 'And the doctrine you have heard is not so much mine as the Father's: he, therefore, who denieth me, denieth the Father who sent me, and consequently will lose those benefits.' Οὐκ—ἀλλὰ here (as often) signifies non tam—quam, implying no more than community of command. The full scope of this latter sentence καὶ ὁ λόγος—Πατρός is ably pointed out by Lampe, who compares similar declarations at vii. 16. (where see Note) iii. 34. vii. 26. xii. 49.

25, 26. The full sense is: 'These instructions have I given you while yet present with you (comp. Luke xxii. 44). When I am no longer with you, the Holy Spirit will be your guide, whom the Father will send in my behalf and in my place.' See Grotius and Lampe.

mise, then, includes first the communication of all needful knowledge, as to the counsels of God and the work accomplished by Christ for the salvation of men; 2. as a means of paving the way for its hearty reception, the bringing to mind what, though already said, had been forgotten, and the rectifying of all misconception.

27. εἰρήνην ἀφήμι—ὑμῖν.] Here we have not (what some have supposed) a mere form of farewell, but a solemn and affecting valediction and benediction, as of one about to part with his friends for ever, and therefore leaving behind him his blessing, as a bequest. For ἀφήμι may have the sense to bequeath; and so we use the word to leave. Δίδωμι is well added after ἀφήμι; the two terms being usually conjoined in the wording of a will.

The full import here of εἰρήνη is (as Lampe shows at large) peace with God, (Phil. iv. 7.) peace of conscience, and peace with all God's creatures. Τὴν ἐμὴν εἰρ. seems added by way of further explanation and confirmation of the εἰρήνη just before. The ἐμὴν, taken in reference to the subsequent clause, is emphatical; suggesting that this peace is given by Christ alone, who is our Peace (Eph. ii. 14.), and in whom alone we have peace with God. (Rom. v. 1.) The words οὐ καθὼς, &c. are explanatory of the preceding, and suggest a comparison, not between the manner of giving (for καθὼς has often a very lax sense), but between the nature of the gifts; the world conferring external, empty, and transitory peace,—Christ bestowing internal and spiritual, stable and solid peace. See Calvin.

—μη παρασείσθω, &c.] Here we have a repetition of the affectionately consolatory language at v. 1, though here somewhat more strongly expressed by a sort of climax; δειλιάω being a stronger term than παρασείσθαι. A similar mode of expression occurs at Deut. i. 21, μὴ φοβείσθω μηδὲ δειλιάσητε. See also v. 29.

28. Our Lord now concludes with the same exhortation as that with which he had commenced his address; after which, adverting to what he had said of his departure from them, he urges, that their love of him should make them rather rejoice than grieve thereat; and then explains why. He tells them that he is going, not to some distant region of the world (as some of the disciples fancied, xiii. 36.), but to the Father, to resume the majesty and glory he had before the creation of the world; and that from Him he would send to the disciples his Holy Spirit, to be their present and omnipotent aid and helper.

—ὅτι ὁ Πατὴρ—ἐστίν.] On the true and full import of these words, see the valuable Annotations of Lampe and Tittman in Recens. Syn., and sect. iv. of Bp. Bull's Defensio Fidei Nicenæ, and Dr. Pye Smith's Scrip. Text., vol. ii. 311. Suffice it here to say, that though there be a certain sense in which the Father may be said to be greater than the Son; yet that could not here have been intended by our Lord. It is ably remarked by Calvin, Christ does not here compare the divinity of the Father with his own, nor his human nature with the divine essence of the Father, but rather compares his present state with the celestial glory to which he was soon to be received; q. d. 'You would detain me here in this world. But, oh! it is better to depart and be in heaven.' And assuredly this it was that he held out as a matter of rejoicing, that he should dwell with his Father in glory, and with them by the Spirit of truth. Accordingly the comparison here is only indirect, namely, as far as respected the work of man's salvation, wherein the inferiority of the Son to the Father is admitted on all hands. Finally, the very mention of comparison implies the fallacy of supposing Christ to have been a mere man. See Whitby.

29—31. Our Lord next intimates why he had told them beforehand of his death, resurrection, ascension, and the coming of the Holy Ghost; namely, in order that the combined evidence of the prediction, and the miracles attending its accomplishment, might so confirm their faith, that, as it is said, xiii. 19, they might believe that he was he whom he professed to be, even the Christ.

30. οὐκ ἔτι π. λαλ.] As this is suspended on the words ἔρχεται γὰρ, &c., it is plain that the sense requires not will, but shall; i. e. 'I shall not have opportunity to discourse much with you.' On the ἀρχὸν τοῦ κόσμου τούτου see Note on xii. 31. The words ἐν ἐμοὶ οὐκ ἔχει οὐδέν are by the best Commentators admitted to mean, 'hath no power,' scil. power, in respect of me, 'will have no power against me,' viz., in frustrating the plan of salvation.

Τούτου after κόσμου, not found in very many of the best MSS., Versions, and earlier Fathers, is cancelled by almost every Editor from Westcott to Scholz, as being probably introduced from xii. 3.

31. ἀλλ' ἵνα γνῶ, &c.] Here (as often elsewhere) ἀλλὰ, and before ἵνα and such particles something is left to be supplied from the subject-matter. The full sense seems to be, 'But (the Father of the world is permitted to assault me) that the world may know,' &c.

ἵνεκεν αὐτοῦ μοι ὁ Πατήρ, οὕτω ποιῶ. Ἐγείρεσθε, ἄγωμεν ἵν' ἐυθην.

XV. ἘΓΩ εἰμι ἡ ἄμπελος ἡ ἀληθινή, καὶ ὁ Πατήρ μου ὁ γεωργός ἐστι. Ἐάν κλῆμα ἐν ἐμοὶ μὴ φέρον καρπὸν, αἶρει αὐτό· καὶ πᾶν τὸ καρπὸν φέρον, καθαίρει τὸ, ἵνα πλείονα καρπὸν φέρῃ. Ἡ δὲ ὑμεῖς καθαροί ἐστε διὰ τὸν λόγον ὃν λελάληκα ὑμῖν. Μείνατε ἐν ἐμοί, καὶ ἐγὼ ἐν ὑμῖν. Καθὼς τὸ κλῆμα οὐ δύναται καρπὸν φέρειν ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ, ἐὰν μὴ μένῃ ἐν τῇ ἁμπέλῳ· οὕτως οὐδὲ ὑμεῖς, ἐὰν μὴ ἐν ἐμοὶ μένητε. Ἐγὼ εἰμι ἡ ἄμπελος, ὑμεῖς τὰ

V. Commentators are not agreed as to the place where the remaining portion (Ch. xv., xvi.,) of Christ's discourse was delivered. Many say it was pronounced somewhere on the way to Jerusalem to Gethsemane. But of this there is no proof;—and, from the circumstances of the nature of the discourse, little probability. The words of Ch. xviii. 1, ταῦτα—ἐξήλθα—ἄνω, plainly show that the words cannot have been delivered on the road to Gethsemane; as some imagine, at Gethsemane; but rather referring to Glass, Beza, Pearce, Lampe, Doddridge, Knapp, and Tittman) in the guest-chamber, having risen from table, and previous to departure. Unless we suppose (with Rosenkranz, in a Dissertation on the internal history of the Discourse of our Lord), that it was pronounced in the Temple; for it would hardly have been safe to have remained so long at the guest-chamber. If this be admitted (and the learned say much to show the probability thereof), we are enabled the better to account for the use of the Vine; since there would then be no object to suggest it; for (as we learn from the Temple) above and around that gate of the Temple, which led from the Porch to the Holy Place, there was a richly carved vine, which served as a border and ornament. This would naturally suggest the parable in question, especially the figure of the vine was one frequent in the Scriptures, and the vine above mentioned was used as a symbol.

This resumption of the foregoing discourse, our Lord (loath to part with his faithful followers) goes on and further enforces the same topics. In this parabolical comparison Christ refers to his disciples the excellency of his religion and the nature of the union subsisting between himself and his faithful followers; suggesting the Blessings which spring from, and the fruit arising out of, that relation. See more in

ps. ἐγὼ εἰμι ἡ ἄμπελος ἡ ἀληθινή.] This similitude was not uncommon. It is often used in the Feast of the Jewish people and Church, and appears from the Rabbinical writers) was times taken to designate the Messiah. It represents the vital union between Christ and the faithful people in his Church. On the import of ἡ ἀληθινή, some difference of opinion exists. It is best explained by Euthymius, ἡ ἀληθινή καρποφοροῦσα. The force of the article here is the same as in ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ ἁλός, x. 14, where see Note. In calling God γεωργός (i. e. ἁμπελοργός, genus for species) Christ follows the usage of the Old Test. See Is. v. 1—7. Jer. ii. 21. Ps. lxxx. 8. Our Lord thus represents himself as the Vine (meaning the trunk of the vine) of religious truth,—the Gospel,—and his faithful disciples as the branches from that vine,—all deriving nourishment, and even life itself, from the parent stock.

2. ἐν ἐμοί] i. e. belonging to me; namely, considered as the trunk. Supply δύο, for ὅ ἐστι, like φέρον for ὅ φέρει. Αἶρει, 'taketh away.' Opposed to which is καθαίρει, 'purifies the branch,' namely, by ridding it of those useless shoots which most abound in the best trees. In this sense prune is used in Latin. So Hor. Epod. ii. 11, 'Inutilisæque falce ramos amputans, Feliciores inserit.' As, then, the vine-dresser purifies the vine by lopping off useless branches, and pruning the good ones, so (it is meant) does God purify his Church, by removing the bad and useless members, and spiritually pruning the good ones.

— πλείονα καρπὸν] not only more fruit, but better in quality; for the difference between the works done under the Gospel, and those of mere nature, is like that which exists between the fruit of wild trees, and that of cultivated ones. So Plut. Vit. Arat., similarly speaking of the 'irregularity' of virtue produced independently of philosophy, says, Τὴν δὲ τοιαύτην ἀναμαχλῶν ἐνδοῖα λόγου φιλοσόφου περὶ τὰς εὐφύτας ἀπεργάζεται τὴν ἀρετὴν, ὥσπερ καρπὸν αὐτοφυῆ καὶ ἀγώργητον, ἐκφέρουσα δίχα τῆς ἐπιστήμης.

3. ἡ δὲ—ὑμεῖς.] From ver. 3—17, Christ now suggests the application of the comparison, showing to what kind of vine branches they were to be referred, and the duties suitable to that state. (Lampe.) By καθαροί is here meant 'free from wilful error and prejudice,' and therefore capable of bearing spiritual fruit. They were then in a great measure, and were shortly afterwards to be quite so by the efficacy of the Holy Spirit, soon to be manifested. Hence, in the next verse, Christ exhorts them not to break off the mutual conjunction between them and himself, but constantly cultivate it, as He should on his part preserve it for ever.

4. μένατε ἐν ἐμοί—ὑμῖν.] Our Lord here addresses them not so much as disciples, but rather as his future ministers, and, in this capacity, exhorts them to zealously adhere to him,—not only in personal faith and obedience, but in their Apostolic duties. Μείνατε ἐν ἐμοί is used of union of thought, feeling, purpose, and action, as at 1 John ii. 6, 24, 27, 28. See more in Note supra vi. 56. The next words, καὶ ἐγὼ (sub. μὲν) ἐν ὑμῖν, contain a promise, as the following ones do a precept.

Ἐν τούτῳ ἰδοῦσάσθῃ ὁ Πατήρ μου, ἵνα καρπὸν πολύν ὁ φέρητε· καὶ γενήσεσθε ἐμοὶ μαθηταί. Καθὼς ἠγάπησέ με ὁ Πατήρ, καὶ γὰρ ἠγάπησα ὑμᾶς, μένατε ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ τῇ

ἐμῇ. Ἐὰν τὰς ἐντολάς μου τηρήσητε, μενεῖτε ἐν τῇ ὁ ἀγάπῃ μου· καθὼς ἐγὼ τὰς ἐντολάς τοῦ Πατρὸς μου

And the καὶ is to be taken for καὶ οὕτω, the οὕτω being implied in the αποδοῖς. The substance of the promise is, that 'Christ will abide in them,' importing communion with them by his Holy Spirit, and support and protection to them by the influence of the Paraclete, whom he should send to them from heaven. See Rom. viii. 9. 1 John iii. 24. iv. 13. The words καθὼς τὸ κλήμα—μένῃτε suggest another argument to union, deduced from the highly beneficial effects of it. As the branches receive all their life and vigour from the trunk, so must they adhere to Christ and his injunctions, if they would produce spiritual fruit. 'Ἀφ' ἐαυτοῦ,' by its own virtue.'

5. χωρὶς ἐμοῦ.] Supply δυνάτε; for χωρὶς ἐμῶν ἀπ' ἐμοῦ. The full sense is, 'apart from me ye can do nothing whatever.' See 2 Cor. iii. 5. Comp. v. 4.

6. ἐβλήθη ἔξω.] The Aorist is here for the Present, as used of what is customary, or perhaps to represent the thing to be done as already done. By τὸ κλήμα is meant the branch which has been separated from the trunk. The καὶ before ἐξηράνθη is not put (as some imagine) for the relative, but αὐτὸ is understood. Αὐτὰ is for αὐτὸ, populariter; κλήμα being put collectively, for κλήματα.

The τὸ before πῦρ is found in many MSS. and some early Editions, and is received by Matthæi, Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. The same phrase, however, occurs without the Article at Matt. iii. 10. vii. 19. Luke iii. 9. See my Note on Mark ix. 22.

7. ἐὰν μένητε—γενήσεται ὑμῖν.] We have here another argument for the preservation of this communion of sentiment; in drawing which the foregoing general enunciation (μένειν ἐν ἐμοί) is further evoked by καὶ τὰ ῥήματα—μένῃ; and as the former denotes continuance in, and communion in general,—so this denotes, in particular, steadfastness in assenting to and receiving the doctrines and instructions of Christ; see more in the Note at xiv. 12. The benefit promised in ὃ ἐὰν—ὑμῖν is nearly allied to that at Matt. xxi. 21. The whichever must, of course, be limited to whatever is necessary for the purpose adverted to in the preceding and following verses,—namely, their bringing forth much fruit, and promoting thereby the glory of God.

8. 'Here (as Calvin observes) we have a confirmation of the immediately preceding proposition, that God heareth the prayers of his people, so that they bear fruit, which is his glory.'

—ἰδοῦσάσθῃ.] The Aorist is here used as at ver. 6. (where see Note.) And ἴω is for ἐν, quod, as at iii. 23. iv. 17. We must not take the καὶ (as it is done by many) for οὐτὼ or ὅτι, but rather repeat ἐν τούτῳ from the preceding clause. So xiii. 35, ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκονται πάντες ὅτι ἐμοὶ μαθηταὶ ἴσσι. By being is, in both passages, meant really being; for we have here an idiom, frequent in the popular style of all languages, by which ἀληθῶς is implied in the context.

How, and in what respects, the Father is glorified by the disciples of his Son bringing forth the fruits of holiness and righteousness, &c., see Tittman, Calvin, and Lampe.

9—11. Christ here proceeds to remind them of his own singular love to them, and holds out for their imitation his own example in doing the work of the Father. (Tittman.)

9. καθὼς ἠγάπησέ με, &c.] Καθὼς and καὶ may be rendered quantopere—tantopere; or rather we may suppose the sense to be as—me; not, however, as implying equality in degree, but only in kind. The words following, μένετε ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ τῇ ἐμῇ are explained by the best Interpreters in general (including Bp. Hall, Harm. p. 33), 'continue in the love of me,' i. e. continue to love me. Some, however, as Calvin and Campbell, understand them in the sense, 'continue to be beloved by me, keep your place in my affections.' By which, it is true, a very good sense arises; but, it should seem, one forbidden by the next words, which may be compared with them at xiv. 23. Perhaps the best mode of removing the difficulty is, with Lampe, to unite both senses; the expression admitting of both. And it is observed by Lampe, that the union of both these senses is frequent in passages where the Divine love is spoken of; see Rom. v. 5. vii. 25. Eph. iii. 17. Jude 21.

Then are mentioned the means by which both of the above may be preserved; namely, by keeping His commandments, after the example which he had set them by doing the will of his Father.

10. ἐὰν τὰς ἐντολάς, &c.] What a wonderful concatenation may we here observe! Our Lord having shown us that abiding in him proceeds from loving him, and keeping his commandments, and tells us that his commandment is, that we love one another. Therefore, loving one another and keeping God is abiding in Christ, and love towards God and towards each other is effectually conjoined. (Euthymius.)

11. ἵνα ἡ χαρὰ—πληρωθῇ] i. e., as the best Commentators explain, 'that my joy in you (at your love, faith, and obedience) may be enduring, and that your joy (continuing in my love) may be complete and perfect;' see xvi. 24. 33. xvii. 13. 1 John i. 4. 2 John 12. Χαρὰ ἐν ὑμῖν denotes 'joy felt on your account,' and is distinguished from ἡ χαρὰ ὑμῶν.

12. αὕτη ἐστίν—ὑμᾶς.] These words are meant to show what kind of love is evinced by Him to them, and consequently expected from them in return. A similar argument is used at xiv. 21. See also Matt. xx. 28. Rom. v. 7, 8. 1 John iii. 16.

14. Here Christ shows how that friendship may be evinced; namely, as in the love before-mentioned, by keeping his commandments.

15. οὐκέτι ὑμᾶς—ἐγνώρισα ὑμῖν.] The full sense here (not very clearly developed) may best be expressed by the following paraphrastic version: '[I say friends; for] I no longer style you servants, since the servant [differeth from the friend, inasmuch as he] knoweth not what his master is doing (i. e. his plans of action). But you I call friends, [and as such I have treated you,] since whatsoever I have learned from my Father I have made known to you, [thus treating you with the most unreserved confidence,] to establish it.' Our Lord had, indeed, up to this time (agreeably to the custom of the Jewish Rabbins), called them servants, though he had not treated them as such. And the term is susceptible of a milder interpretation, considering the connexion of discipleship with master; and thus it is interchanged with διδάσκοντες at John xii. 26. The words of John xii. 4, which are adduced to show that he had before called them his friends, will only prove that Christ addressed them as friends. Certain it is that he had never before expressly styled them his friends.

By πάντα must (as is clear from xvi. 12) be understood, in a restricted sense, all things proper for them to know.

16. οὐχ ὑμεῖς—ὑμᾶς.] This is said to excite them to gratitude and obedience, by showing them that the obligation was all on their side. 'Εκλέγισθαι may here (as often) be taken, not so much of choice, as of the preference and love which it implies (antecedent for consequent); as Mark xiii. 20. Acts xiii. 17. 1 Cor. i. 27, 28. James ii.

5. Τιθῖναι, like the Hebr. בחר, and the corresponding terms in most languages, has often the sense appoint. ὑπάγητε is not (as it has usually been supposed) pleonastic; but conveys a notion of activity in the discharge of their functions as Apostles or Teachers. For that is what is meant by the καρπὸν φέρ. The words καὶ ὁ καρπὸς ὑμῶν μείνῃ point at the ulterior effects of these labours to succeeding ages; and which, judging by events, we now know must endure unto the end of the world. In the words following, ἵνα denotes event, result, or consequence. The sense is: 'Thus it shall happen, that whatever ye shall ask the Father,' &c.

17. ταῦτα ἐντέλλομαι, &c.] Meaning, that he has issued to them the injunctions he has, trusting that they will so fulfil them, as to love each other.

18. Having given the above injunction to mutual love, our Lord adverts to what would afford an additional argument for its cultivation, the hatred of the world towards them; and fortifies them against the persecutions, to which they would be thereby exposed, by the consideration that whatever they may have to endure, is no more than their Master has endured before them.

—γινώσκειτε.] Many take this as an imperative, in the sense reflect, consider. But the usual mode of interpreting it in an indicative sense is the more natural. Πρώτον is an adverb for πρώτον.

19. The scope of this verse is to intimate the cause of that hatred, and thus to suggest a motive of comfort to them, when they should have to endure it.

—εἰ ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου ἦτε.] The expression ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου εἶναι signifies 'to be conformed to the world;' as ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ, or ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου, &c. 'Εκ, as it properly denotes descent from, so it may very well figuratively import affinity to. Render, 'If ye had been of the world, the world would have loved its own.'

τὸ ἴδιον ἐφίλει· ὅτι δὲ ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου οὐκ ἐστέ, ἀλλ' ἐγὼ ἐξελεξάμην ὑμᾶς ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου, διὰ τοῦτο μισεῖ ὑμᾶς ὁ κόσμος. ὁ Μνημονεύετε τοῦ λόγου οὗ ἐγὼ εἶπον ὑμῖν· Οὐκ ἔστι δούλος μείζων τοῦ κυρίου αὐτοῦ. Εἰ ἐμὲ ἐδίωξαν, καὶ ὑμᾶς διώξουσιν· εἰ τὸν λόγον μου ἐτήρησαν, καὶ τὸν ὑμέτερον τηρήσουσιν. ὁ Ἄλλα ταῦτα πάντα ποιήσουσιν ὑμῖν διὰ τὸ ἐὼν ὄνομά μου, ὅτι οὐκ οἶδασιν τὸν ἐμφαντά με. ὁ Εἰ μὴ ἦλθον καὶ ἐλάλησα αὐτοῖς, ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ εἶχον· νῦν δὲ πρόφασιν οὐκ ἔχουσι περὶ τῆς ἁμαρτίας αὐτῶν. ὁ Εἰ μὲ μισῶν, καὶ τὸν 23 Πατέρα μου μισεῖ. Εἰ τὰ ἔργα μὴ ἐποίησα ἐν αὐτοῖς, ἃ 24 οὐδεὶς ἄλλος πεποίηκεν, ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ εἶχον· νῦν δὲ καὶ ἑωράκασιν καὶ μεμισήκασιν καὶ ἐμὲ καὶ τὸν Πατέρα μου. ὁ Ἄλλ' ἵνα πληρωθῇ ὁ λόγος ὁ γεγραμμένος ἐν τῷ νόμῳ 25

20. εἰ τὸν λόγον—τηρήσουσιν.] The sense of these words would seem to be directly contrary to that which the context requires. To remove this difficulty, some think that τηρεῖν is put for παρὰ-τηρεῖν. But for such a sense of the word with τὸν λόγον there is no authority. The same objection applies to that method of interpretation, which is founded on the use of εἰ to signify as. The best mode of removing the difficulty hitherto propounded is that of Tittman, who assigns the following sense: 'If they had admitted and observed my doctrine, they would admit and observe yours.' Yet this involves such an anomaly of language, as one must hesitate to ascribe to the Evangelist; because, though inattentive to the nicer idioms of the Greek language, yet he no where so openly sets all rules at defiance. Not to say that the use of the tenses in the antithetical clause forbids this sense. The difficulty may, I think, be effectually removed by considering the affirmative enunciation as dependent on the hypothetical εἰ, as meant to imply also its negative; the full sense being: 'If they have observed (which they have not done) my words, &c., meaning, 'if they have not observed my words, neither will they observe yours.' Thus I find Euthymius, and some of the early modern Commentators, took the words as equivalent to a negative sentence; but how this arose, they have failed to explain.

21. πάντα.] Meaning the instances of hatred and persecution even unto death, adverted to at vv. 19, 20. xvi. 2.

—διὰ τὸ ὄνομά μου] 'on my account;' or, indeed, literally, 'on account of the very name' by which they were called; since, as Lampe proves by examples from the early Fathers, even the very name of Christ was sufficient to provoke the bitterest enmity.

—οὐκ οἶδασιν.] Importing not an involuntary ignorance, but self-produced blindness, as to the true nature of the evidence for a Divine legation.

22. εἰ μὴ ἦλθον, &c.] This verse is explanatory of the preceding; and our Lord therein encounters a taut argument, which might be pleaded in excuse of the persons in question,—i. e. that they sinned from ignorance. This he overturns, by showing that their ignorance and perverseness were wilful, and therefore inexcusable; since sufficient means for the attainment of a knowledge of the truth had been provided, by evidence not only internal but external,—alike in doctrines and in miracles. ἁμαρτία is here to be taken, not of sin in general, but of the particular sin in question, that of rejecting the Messiah. From the antithetical clause νῦν δὲ—οὐκ εἶχον, &c., it appears that ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ εἶχον must be taken in a qualified sense, to mean, 'they would have been, comparatively, innocent of this offence, they would have been some excuse for them.' Of the phrase εἶχον πρόφασιν several examples are adduced by Weiststein from Aristotle and Senophon.

23. ὁ ἐμὲ μισῶν—μισεῖ.] This is meant by Christ to stigmatize, under a general assertion, the sinfulness of their conduct in particular; namely, that their hatred and rejection of Him and his mission, and injurious treatment of Him, was, in fact, shown to his Father. At ver. 24 the assertion in ver. 22 is resumed (the words of ver. 23 being in some measure parenthetical); and the proof of Divine mission from miracles is adverted to. Then is drawn the conclusion.

24. εἰ τὰ ἔργα μὴ ἐποίησα, &c.] Here, as Bp. Warburton observes (Works, vol. vi. 330), 'our Lord acknowledges that if the credentials of his Divine mission in his miracles had not been given, the unbelieving Jews had been free from blame.' 'Christ's miracles might (as Doddridge observes) truly be said to be greater than those the prophets had wrought, both in respect to the number, their purpose, and especially as they proceeded from a self-derived power, and were worked at all times, and in all ways, even in absence as well as presence.' See also A. Clarke.

25. ἀλλ' ἵνα πληρωθῇ, &c.] The best Commentators are agreed that ἵνα is here, as often, eventual; the sense being, 'Now by this having come to pass, the words written in the Law have been made good.' These words were properly spoken of the enemies of David; but as David was a type of Christ, so they are accommodated to the latter (comp. infra xix. 28. Acts i. 20). The words, indeed, as here quoted, do not exactly correspond with the Sept. or Hebrew of Ps. ciii. 1 (Sept.), since ἐπολέμησεν in the Sept. is in agreement with קָרַח in the Hebrew. But, as καὶ τίς με δωρεάν is found in kindred passages, of Ps. xxxiv. 19, and lxxviii. 4, Sept., it should not that this is not meant as a regular quotation, but is merely formed on all those three passages.

25. δωρεάν 'causelessly'; for ἀναιτίως, the expression used by Symmachus in his version. The only other example of this sense, which has been adduced, is from Ecclesi. xx. 24; though the use of the word at Galat. ii. 21, comes very near to it.

26. The connexion here is obscure, and has therefore been disputed. The statement of it propounded by Rosenmüller involves a supposition which, while too arbitrary, is not sufficiently significant. Euthymius rightly maintains the scope of the words to be consolation: a view also adopted by Kuinoel and Tittman. But they all engraft something or other which seems forced and arbitrary. The true connexion is, I apprehend, best pointed out by Calvin, as follows: 'The world will indeed persecute you; your doctrine will be mocked at by some, and be reviled by others; but no violence of men will be able to shake the firmness of your faith, when the Holy Spirit shall have been given unto you, to confirm and establish you by his testimony.'

— παρὰ τοῦ Πατρὸς ἐκπορεύ.] In laying down the exact force of this term, Commentators generally run into one or other of the two extremes, either of supposing it to denote the eternal procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father (meaning thereby something answering to the eternal generation of the Son), or of assigning to it no more than the sense of ἐρχεσθαι at John xvi. 7; where that word denotes merely the effusion of the Holy Spirit. Here, if any where, we shall do best to steer a middle course. All that seems revealed in the present passage is, that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, as a messenger from and co-operating with both. See more in Calvin and Scott.

— μαρτυρήσει περὶ ἐμοῦ.] This is explained by almost all recent Commentators of confirming by arguments what has been already taught; meaning, that the Holy Spirit would then cause Christ's person, counsels, and works, to be more and more made known; as it is said xvi. 14, καὶ τότε ἐμὶ δοξάσει. This, however, is a sense by no means permitted by the words; and the usual signification of μαρτυρεῖν is here the more requisite, from the word being so used in the very next verse; for that it should bear two such different acceptations within so short a space can scarcely be supposed. The true interpretation, then, seems to be that of the ancient and earlier modern Commentators, 'the Holy Spirit will bear witness that I am the Christ, by the miraculous powers and supernatural gifts with which He will endow believers in me.'

27. To the testimony of the Holy Spirit Christ adds that of the apostles and disciples themselves, who were, in all respects, qualified to bear unimpeachable testimony to the person, character, and actions of Christ, as having been with him from the beginning of his ministry, a testimony so much the more weighty, since it was, in the case of some, confirmed by personal miracles.

XVI. The Apostles had doubtless expected honours and distinctions among men from their relation to Christ: and had this vain hope been countenanced, their approaching trials might have tempted them to conclude that they had been deceived. Hence our Lord warned them that persecution awaited them, in order to fortify their minds, lest they should be so disconcerted by the unexpected attacks of evil, as to abandon their Christian profession. (Scott and Tittman.)

1. σκανδαλισθῆτε.] On the force of the expression, see Note at Matt. xi. 5.

2. ἀποσυναγώγους π.] Among these trials excommunication (on which see Note supra ix. 22) is mentioned first, as being, among the Jews, a punishment reserved for crimes of the deepest dye, since it put the persons thus excluded on a level with Pagans.

— ἀλλά] 'quid imo, nay.' 'ἵνα is for ὅτε, as often.

— δόξῃ λατρίαν προσφέρειν τ. Θεῷ.] Λατρεύειν properly signifies 'to serve any one as a slave.' But in the New Test. and Sept. it is always used to denote the offering of sacrifice, or rendering worship and service of any kind. Hence λατρεία denotes religious service; and (especially as προσφέρειν is a sacrificial term) προσφέρειν λατρίαν will signify 'to offer a sacrifice,' or a religious service in general. The sense, then, is: 'he will think he is rendering an acceptable religious service to God.' So a Rabbinical writer, cited by Lampe: 'Omnis effundens sanguinem improborum aqualis est illi qui sacrificium offert.' Doddridge thinks there is here an allusion to such sort of deeds as the assassination of Paul, planned by the forty conspirators. (see Acts xxiii. 14, seq.), and in which they gloried: and certain it is that the greatest enormities recorded in Josephus were perpetrated by the Zelotæ, who originally were religious zealots. Indeed, it is very probable, as Scott suggests, that as the highest degree of excommunication implied a sentence of death, (though the Jewish magistrates at this time had not sufficient authority to carry it into execution,) so the zealots made a merit of inflicting it in any way they could contrive.

3. καὶ ταῦτα—ἐμὶ.] This is meant to trace such conduct to its original source (namely, ἐγώ—

4. ἡ ὥρα] i. e. the time for suffering such calamities.

—ταῦτα—οὐκ εἶπον.] By ἐξ ἀρχῆς is to be understood the beginning of Christ's ministry. Since, however, our Lord had apprised his disciples of the persecutions they would have to undergo on account of their Christian profession, many take the οὐκ εἶπον restrictively, to mean, I did not fully apprise you, &c. Yet this will not be necessary, if the ταῦτα be understood to mean (as it very well may) the things which should befall them after their Lord's departure. Now to these he had no where directly adverted, but only to the evils to be endured while he was with them. Such, indeed, is placed beyond doubt by the words following, which suggest the reason why Christ did not do it; namely, either because he was then with them to comfort and support them, and himself to bear the brunt of those trials; or because he was then going to stay with them, and was unwilling to afflict them before the time. In using the expression ὅτι μεθ' ὑμῶν ἤμην Christ, by implication, speaks of himself as already departed.

5. νῦν δὲ ὑπάγω, &c.] These words are generally considered as introducing a new subject, namely, that of his departure; and the following sense is assigned: 'But now that I am going to Him who sent me, none of you asketh,' &c. Yet thus the kai is silenced; and the sentiment in the preceding words ταῦτα δὲ—εἶπον is much enervated. And though δὲ has sometimes a transitive force, yet the context must decide where. It is better to suppose the words to be connected with the preceding clause. Thus the δὲ will be, as often, adversative. In this view I would compare a similar mode of expression in Euripides, Herac. 9 (here adduced by Markland), Πηλεΐδων μετέσχεον εἰς ἀνὴρ Ἡρακλῆϊ, ὅτ' ἦν μεθ' ἡμῶν νῦν δ' ἵπται κατ' οὐρανὸν Ναιΐ, &c. Here, however, something not expressed is left mentally to be supplied; q. d. 'And therefore I have thought it necessary to tell you,' or something similar. The kai in the words following signifies, 'And [yet], i. e. though I am going,' a signification frequent in St. John's writings. By ἠρώτῃ is meant νῦν ἠρώτῃ; for they had asked previously. The disciples are, however, I conceive, reproved, not so much for not then asking, as for the feeling which occasioned it,—namely, deep sorrow;—a sorrow which would naturally produce silence. For it has been well said,

'Light sorrows speak; great griefs are dumb.'

Their sorrow, however, was blameable, as proceeding from want of reflection on the causes of his departure, the places whither he was going, and the purpose of it, though these had been before suggested to them. To these, however, our Lord at vv. 7. 11, again adverts, and in plainer terms.

7. Christ here again points out that his departure would be for their advantage; for unless he passed through his sufferings to glory, the promised COMFORTER would not come into them, and consequently they could not be saved. It was, indeed, highly expedient; for the benefits to be obtained thereby were unspeakable. 'The Holy Spirit (says Tittman) effected much more in the disciples than Christ himself had done (see vv. 12. 14. 16), imparting to them a more complete knowledge of the Saviour than what He himself could communicate, and also many other excellent gifts necessary for their Apostolic function; supplying to them eloquence irretrievable, the power of working the most illustrious miracles for the confirmation of their testimony concerning Jesus, and rendering their timid minds invincible to all the terrors of their adversaries.'

8—11. ἐλέγξει τὸν κόσμον, &c.] The sense of this portion, as it is not a little obscure, has been much disputed. The difficulty chiefly hinges on the expression τὸν κόσμον; by which some understand the world at large; others, the Jewish world, i. e. the Jews only. And, assuming as they adopt one or the other view, they assign to the passage either a general or a particular sense. The former is maintained by Grotius, Hammond, and Lampe; the latter by most of the recent Commentators, especially Kuenen and Tittman, who explain the meaning to be, that 'He will show clearly, 1. the great sin of the Jews in disbelieving and rejecting Jesus, by the conversion of many thousands of Jews in consequence of the effusion of the Spirit; 2. He will evince the righteousness and innocence of him whom they had accused and condemned, by teaching, through the Apostles, that God had received him into heaven; 3. He will show that all the opposition of the rulers of this world to the cause of the Gospel will be in vain; for the truth shall prevail, and their policy shall be judged and condemned.' Thus the sense might be expressed as follows: 'He will convict the world (meaning the Jews) of the sin of unbelief, and He will convince them both of my righteousness, and of the victory obtained by me over the Prince of this world.' Yet it involves no small harshness to take ἐλέγχει in two different senses in one and the same sentence. Not to say that the sense convict involves an incongruity; for since, as observes Mr. Rose (on Parkh. in v.), 'whether the word be taken in its unlimited, or in its restricted sense, it is to be its own judge, the sense of ἐλέγχει must be to convince, not convict; those two terms, when applied to a fault, only differing in this, that the individual may be himself convinced of his fault, but is convicted of it in the judgment of others.' It will be better, therefore, to retain the usual sense convince; or rather both senses (convinced and convicted) may be united, exactly as in a similar mode of expression at 1 Cor. xiv. 24, ἐλέγχεται ὑπὸ πάντων, ἀνακρίνεται ὑπὸ πάντων, where the word has also that double sense. As, however, the term convince may imply the other of convict, but not vice versa, the expression convinced is best retained. How this conviction was effected, and to what extent, we learn from the Acts of the Apostles (see Acts ii. 4) and the early Ecclesiastical writers. Finally, by ἁμαρτία is here to be understood not only the sin of unbelief, but that of persecuting and crucifying 'the Lord of life,' and endeavouring to suppress 'the word of truth,' sent from God.

With respect to the meaning of περὶ δικαιοσύνης, the best Commentators are agreed that it must be referred to Christ (περὶ denoting quod attinet ad); and that, taken in conjunction with the words following, δικαιοσύνη can denote no other than the innocence and holiness of Jesus. The proof of which (adverted to in the words following) was his going to His Father in heaven, vindicated by his resurrection, and also by his sending the Holy Spirit with miraculous gifts; see Acts ii. 2. sq. xvii. 31. Rom. i. 4. 1 Cor. xv. 14, &c. In περὶ κρίσεως the περὶ must be taken in the same sense, and the import of the phrase be determined by the words following; which show it to be the Divine judgment against all, whether Jews or Heathens, who persisted in rejecting Jesus as the Saviour. The certainty of this is stated at in ver. 11, by the mention of the condemnation of ὁ ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου, which expression, however, does not (as most recent Commentators imagine) denote the body of the Jewish rulers, Chief Priests, &c. &c.; but (as the old Commentators thought, and as I have shown is the sense at xii. 21) SATAN. For, by the manifestation of the Holy Spirit, in all His miraculous gifts and wonderful effects, the Author of sin was condemned, and his power subverted. And if he was condemned, so would his followers be, whether Jews or Gentiles, and punishment be executed on them, both in this world and in the next. Such appears to be the true meaning of the whole passage, at least in its primary import; but besides that, another and secondary one seems meant to be included,—and that far more important than the other,—by which the words may be referred to the general and internal operation of the Spirit on the hearts of men of every age and country. And this eclectic sense is ably drawn forth by Lampe and Mr. Scott. According to the former view, the term world must be understood of the Jewish world; according to the latter, the whole world.

12. πολλά 'many other doctrines;' namely, the abrogation of the Ceremonial law, the removal of the distinction between Jews and Gentiles; and also, in a general way, the more mysterious doctrines of the Gospel afterwards revealed through the Spirit, in the Epistles of St. Paul. Βαστάζειν, like the Latin ferre, often signifies, as here, to comprehend, by the same metaphor as that found in our understand. So Epict. 36 (cited by Wetstein), τὴν σπαντοῦ φύσιν κατὰμαθε, εἰ δύνασαι βαστάσαι. Comp. Hor. A. P. 39. So also in the Rabbinical writers we meet with the expression 'not to be able to carry a thing.'

13. ἐκείνος.] Spoken emphatically, to denote the Comforter before mentioned, ver. 7. And here we may remark on this proof, among so many others existing in this Gospel, of the personality of the Holy Spirit,—namely, from personal actions being ascribed to Him, and the masculine gender being used.

—ὁδηγ. ὑμᾶς εἰς πᾶσαν τὴν ἀλ.] Render, 'I will guide you into all the truth, or the whole truth' (namely, as regards the subject in question); no part being, as now, from circumstances, kept back. So in Plato, Apol. Socrates, the philosopher says to his judges: ὕμεις μου ἀκούσασθαι πᾶσαν τὴν ἀλήθειαν. So also Ps. xxiv. 5, ὁδηγήσου με ἐπὶ τὴν ἀλήθειάν σου, and the saying of Rabbi Eleazar: 'The Spirit of Holiness (meaning the Holy Spirit) dwelt with Joseph from his boyhood to the day of his death, and guided him into every word of wisdom.'

14. ἐκεῖνος ἐμὲ δοξάσει, &c.] The purpose of these words seems to be, to show that the Holy Spirit, in all which he shall reveal and teach, will have in view the glory of Christ. So that, in glorifying him, he shows him to the believer as the Lord of all, the object of all worship, obedience, love, and praise. See Scott. Present for Future. Χαρήσεται a strong expression, signifying, 'ye felt joy.' By τὴν χαρὰν ὑμῶν οὐδεὶς μὴν it is meant that their joy should and permanent; not liable to be is all joy founded on human affairs. that here subjoins, what would tend to anxiety for the explanation which he fit not to give them, by intimating ing of joy, they would have no occa- sions on the subject, since the Holy Spirit would supply them with all necessary information or assistance; q. d. 'Ye will have nothing to ask me;' for that such is the sense of ἐμὲ οὐκ ἐρωτ. οὐδ., the best Commentators are agreed. On the subject of putting questions, Christ engrafs that of preferring requests; and shows that, whatever else they might have to ask for, in his cause, whether spiritual illumination or courage in action, the Father would deny them nothing.

24. αἰτεῖτε—πληρ.] i. e. 'ye have only to ask and receive, that your joy may be complete.'

26. In this verse the sense will be best ascertained by adverting to the two antithetical expressions, ἐν παροιμίαις λαλεῖν and παρρησίᾳ ἀναγγελεῖν. As to the former, the term παροιμία signifies not only a proverb, but whatever is expressed (as proverbs usually were) in figurative language and in an enigmatical manner, and so as not at first to be understood, especially by the less informed or less attentive. Indeed, in the antithesis there would seem to be an allusion to the two ways in which, as Schoettgen shows, instruction was communicated among the Jews; namely, ἔως τῆς ψ, 'by similitude or figure,' and μετὰ τὴν ψ, 'plainly, without enigma:' both modes employed by our Lord, as occasion required. I would compare here a passage of Æsch. Agam. 1154, where Cassandra says, φρονέω δ' (scil. ὑμᾶς) οὐκ ἔτ' ἐξ αἰνυμάτων. Here, then, our Lord grants that, in his preceding discourses, he had spoken on the subjects in question with more or less of obscurity and enigma. And by the words following, ἀλλ' ἔρχεται ὥρα ὅτε οὐκ ἔτι, &c. he intimates the reason for this,—namely, that to have done otherwise would have been then unseasonable and premature. And it may be observed that our Lord's declarations elsewhere, and especially in these Chapters, wherein he discourses concerning his death, resurrection, ascension to the Father, and the coming of the Holy Ghost, though they may to us seem plain, yet to the Apostles, labouring, as they were, under Jewish prejudices, and loath to believe that their Lord was about to die—they could not but appear obscure and involved in mystery.

By περὶ τοῦ Πατρὸς we may suppose to be meant, 'concerning the perfections and attributes of the Father,' the way of access to him, and his counsels for the salvation of men and the establishment of the Christian Church. The fulfilment of the present promise is alluded to at Luke xxiv. 26—44. and Acts i. 3.

26—28. Here are indicated the advantages resulting from this fuller knowledge: 'At that time (i. e. when I shall have more fully taught you concerning my Father, his counsels, and decrees) ye shall address your prayers in my name, and shall receive benefits the most precious.' (Tittman.)

26. καὶ οὐ λέγω—ὑμῶν.] Since Christ has at xiv. 16. promised that he will ask the Father on their behalf, and as we have just after, xvii. 9, seqq. an actual intercession for them, and as Christ is at Rom. viii. 34. Heb. vii. 25. and 1 John ii. 1. said to be continually interceding for his disciples, the sense of the words must be, not what they would at first seem to express, but what has been assigned by the most eminent Interpreters for the last century, namely, 'I need not say that I shall pray the Father for you, since you know I will do that; [nay, there is no need, in another respect,] for the Father himself (i. e. of his own accord) loveth you, [and therefore may be presumed to be always ready and willing to bestow on them all needful blessings].' This idiom has the technical name præteritio, and is to be found even in the Classical writers. Αὐτὸς is for αὐτόματος. Πεφιλήκατε and πεπιστεύκατε are to be taken as Presents. On the full sense of ἐξῆλθον παρὰ τοῦ Πατ. (as denoting, not mission from, but procession from, God, implying the being with God, and very God,) compare iii. 13, 31. vi. 62, and see the Notes of Lanpe and Tittman in Recens. Synop.

30. νῦν οἶδαμεν, &c.] Meaning, 'Now we experimentally know that to thee all the thoughts and desires of men are open, and therefore cannot doubt of thy divine mission.'

31. Ἄρτι πιστεύετε;] Our Lord checks their excessive confidence, and inculcates diffidence in their own strength; q. d. 'Do ye now really and fully believe?' The interrogation here is, as Calvin points out, ironical, and involves a delicate sarcasm; q. d. 'Do you boast such great things, as if you fully believed? But, alas! there will soon occur that which will discover your emptiness.'

32. καὶ νῦν ἐλήλυθεν.] nav, is now come. At ἴδια supply οἰκήματα. So 1 Macc. vi. 54. καταπίσθησαν ἕκαστος εἰς τὸν τόπον αὐτοῦ. Comp. Hom. Odysse. α. 274, Μνηστήρας μὲν ἐνὶ οἴκῳ σκιδνασθαι ἀνωχθί. This alludes, not, as some have imagined, to the Apostles and disciples going to their own dwellings after Christ's crucifixion (for there was no abandonment in that, and they could not thus be said to have left him alone), but to what is recorded at Matt. xxvi. 36. and Mark xiv. 50. τότε οἱ μαθηταὶ πάντες ἀφέντες αὐτὸν, ἐφύγον, namely, to their own homes. By μόνον is meant, alone and unsupported by aid or sympathy; for, with the exception of John, not one of the Apostles stood by the cross.

—καὶ οὐκ εἰμὶ, &c.] The has here, as often, the sense and yet, standing for καὶ νῦν. And in μετ' ἐμοῦ there is an allusion to the double meaning of the expression. See Note on viii. 29.

33. ταῦτα λελάληκα, &c.] By ταῦτα we must understand, not merely (as has been supposed intended) what was just before said of the weakness of their faith, and the flight consequent upon it, but all that has been said in the foregoing discourses.

With respect to the meaning of the next words, ἵνα ἐν ἐμοὶ εἰρήνην ἔχητε, some suppose it to be, 'that ye might be at peace in your minds about me;' by which ἐν ἐμοὶ will be for ἐν ἑαυτοῖς or περὶ ἐμοῦ, 'as regards me.' Yet this, though sufficiently suitable to the preceding, is by no means so to the following context; and moreover such a signification of ἐν is unauthorized: not to mention that the interpretation itself quædis-spiritus the whole passage. From the words ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ θλίψιν ἔχετε it should rather appear, that the peace in question is meant, not as it regarded Christ, but themselves; and that we may suppose, with the ancient and most modern Expositors, that ἐν ἐμοὶ means 'by faith in me,' or 'by me;' namely, by looking at my example and sacrifice. Thus εἰρήνην will denote that tranquillity of mind, consolation, and com-

δέδωκας αὐτῷ, δώσῃ αὐτοῖς ζωὴν αἰώνιον. Ἡ αὕτη δὲ ἐστὶν ἡ 3
αἰώνιος ζωὴ, ἵνα γινώσκωσί σε τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν Θεόν,

this sacrifice of himself to atone for the sins of the whole world.

3. αὕτη δὲ ἐστὶν—Χριστόν.] In the interpretation of this verse the utmost caution is requisite, since from it senses the very opposite have been sought. It has ever been regarded by the Heterodox as one of their strong-holds, and from this they have adventured to impugn the doctrine of the DEITY OF CHRIST. In order to effectually frustrate their attempt, many Orthodox Commentators, ancient and modern, adopt such a construction of the sentence, as that the words τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν Θεόν may belong not only to the Father, but also to the Son. This they seek to effect in two ways; 1. by inverting the natural order of the words, thus: 'Ut te, et quem misisti Jesum Christum, solum verum Deum agnoscant.' 2. By supposing an ellipsis of εἶναι, and after καὶ supplying αἶμα σοι. But the best Commentators have long been agreed, that this arbitrary transposition and supplying of words involves so much violence, that the interpretation founded thereon is inadmissible. Indeed, as Bp. Middleton observes, 'it could only have originated in a wish to evade the consequences which this text has been supposed to establish.' We must not, then, seek here an assertion of the Deity of Christ, but content ourselves with proving that Christ is not here represented as a mere Leyate, much less a mere MAN. That our Lord did not, could not, mean to make such an assertion, is plain both from the passage itself, and from what precedes and follows it.

In the first place it is proper to ascertain the exact sense of the terms μόνον ἀληθινόν, and γινώσκω. Now this will mainly depend upon the construction, about which no little difference of opinion exists. There are two classes of Interpreters, who each suppose an ellipsis of εἶναι. But as Bp. Middleton has proved, the exposition of the one class is negatived by the presence of the Article τόν; and that of the other, both by that, and by its involving an unprecedented harshness of construction. It is evident that τὸν μόνον ἀλ. Θ. is in opposition with σε; and we may, with Lampe, suppose the τόν to mean, 'who art thou,' &c.; or with Bp. Middleton, render, 'as being.' It is, however, most important to ascertain the true import of μόνον ἀλ. Θ. Now many ancient Expositors (as Athanasius, and most of the early Fathers), and, of the moderns, Calvin, Bp. Bull, Wetstein, Tittman, Hales, and others, suppose the words to recognise in God the Father a superiority, as being such principaliter, and κατ' ἐξοχὴν, the Fountain of all Deity; namely, as it is expressed by Athanasius (cited by Bp. Bull), Def. Fid. Nic. p. 264, ὅτι μόνος ἀγέννητος, καὶ μόνος πηγὴ θεότητος. Yet, however true may be the doctrine itself (which has been fully established, as on a Rock, by Zanchius and Bp. Bull, in Section iv. of his DEFENSIO FIDEI Nicenæ), yet here it should seem to be out of place. Indeed, one of the arguments which most effectually keep out the heterodox interpretation will go far to exclude this. And to those by whom it has been supported, we may, to a certain degree, apply what Bp. Middleton has said of the Socinian interpreters, who, he observes, 'argue as if in our Saviour's days there had been the same controversy about the nature and essence of the One True God, as arose afterwards; whereas the dispute then was, whether there were a plurality of Gods, or only One; of which the Jews held the latter, and the whole Pagan world the former opinion.' This very circumstance, I would remark, is strongly in favour of an interpretation which has every appearance of being the true one, and has been adopted by some ancient and many eminent modern Expositors (as Lucas Brug., Maldon., Grotius, Whitby, Pearce, Schleusner, Bp. Middleton, Bp. Burgess, and Dr. Pye Smith), according to which μόνον ἀλ. Θ. is meant in opposition to the false gods of the Heathens, who have no real entity; comp. 1 Thess. i. 9. And so Dean Turtton (against Dr. Wieseman) explains it to mean, 'him who is true, or the true One; thereby conveying the idea that while insecurity and uncertainty are inherent in every thing here below, stability essentially belongs to God.' Thus, then (to use the words of Bp. Middleton), the Apostles would be taught that eternal life 'is only to be obtained by a knowledge of the one true God, and of Jesus Christ; thus directing the mind to the truths both of natural and revealed religion.' This is supported and confirmed by two passages of Josephus, namely, Antiq. viii. 13. 6, προσκύνουν τῷ Θεῷ, καὶ μέγιστον καὶ ἀληθὲ μόνον ἐντοκαλουντες τοὺς δ' ἄλλους ὀνόματα ἐντοφάουλον καὶ ἀνοήτου δόξαν πεποιθμένα, and Antiq. x. 11. 7, where Nebuchadnezzar calls the God of Daniel (Jehovah) τὸν μόνον ἀλ. Θ., καὶ τὸ πᾶν κράτος ἔχοντα, i. e. greater than all the gods of the heathens. Nor can any inference be justly drawn against the Deity of Christ from μόνον being here subjoined after Θεόν; for, as Wetstein well observes, such terms as sole, only, or singular, are not opposed to the idea of plurality in the most absolute and exclusive sense, but frequently denote that which is most eminent, distinguished, or excellent. And, as Dr. Pye Smith with equal truth remarks, 'exclusive, as well as universal, terms in Scripture are not to be regarded as necessarily signifying absolutely, but they must frequently be understood with a limitation suggested by the nature and circumstances of the case.' Of this use of μόνον instances occur in Mark vi. 47. John viii. 9. 1 Cor. ix. 6. &c. And examples of the same use of solus in Latin may be seen in Facciolati's Lexicon. Indeed the restricted sense of this term may be well illustrated by those expressions in the Liturgy of our Church, 'Thou only art holy' (said of Christ, but not exclusively of the Holy Spirit); and 'Thou only art the Lord' (also said of Christ, but not exclusively of the Father). Thus it is plain that there is no opposition intended between the Father and the Son, and that the Father is no more said to be the true God to the exclusion of the Son, than at 1a. xiv. 6. xiv. 22. And consequently it is (as Bp. Middleton says) 'frivolous to introduce this passage into the Trinitarian dispute.'

To advert to the import of γινώσκω, the term must, in its full force, denote such knowing and recognising the Father and the Son to be what they have revealed themselves, can glori-

and not in mere speculative knowledge, as shall influence us to worship, serve, and obey them; such, in short (to use the words of Calvin in allusion to 2 Cor. iii. 18), as 'shall transform us to the image of God, from faith to faith.'

Thus the general sense of the passage may be thus expressed: 'This is the way by which they may attain unto eternal salvation; namely, to know and recognise Thee as the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent [as Mediator between God and man];' meaning (as Calvin points out) that God is known by the interposition of this Mediator, inasmuch as He is known alone 'in the face of Jesus Christ,' who is his lively and 'express image.' Finally, the best comment on the present passage is 1 John v. 20, where see Note.

4. σε ἐδόξασα.] Namely, by causing God and his attributes to be known and acknowledged on earth.

— τὸ ἔργον—ποιήσω.] Not the work of teaching only, as some recent Commentators suppose, but also (as Grotius, Calvin, Lampe, and Storr have proved) that of atonement by his death and passion, which was then near commencing.

5. δόξασόν με σὺ, &c.] Here again our Lord sets forth his Divine majesty as the Son of God. 1. He professes that he had δόξαν (Hebr. תָּכָר) i. e. the Divine Majesty, embracing the whole compass of the Divine nature, attributes, counsels, and works, see the Note on i. 14; 2. He makes the asseveration, 'I had this glory παρὰ σοί, i. e. with God in heaven.' Therefore he was in Heaven before he came into the world, or was in the bosom of the Father (John i. 18); 3. He professes that he had glory with the Father before he came to the earth; nay, before the world was; or (as St. John expresses it) ἐν ἀρχῇ, i. e. from eternity (see the Note on i. 1); 4. He prays that the glory and majesty which, as Son of God, he enjoyed from all eternity, the Father would now invest him with, as Son of man, and Saviour of the human race. (Tittman.) What is meant by this glorifying of Christ by the Divine Father, is well shown in vol. ii. p. 141 of Dr. Pye Smith's Script. Test. It may be briefly explained (with him) the manifestation of his name, the unveiling of the same moral and spiritual excellence, the same absolute and infinite perfection, in the person and character of the Son of God, to be effected by the extension and success of the Christian religion.

6—14. Christ here begins to speak of his disciples, and commends them to the especial favour and protection of the Father, since they had been his docile followers, and were to be the first planters of his Gospel.

6. As ὄνομα τοῦ Θεοῦ is often used for Θεός, so σοῦ τὸ ὄνομα may denote Thee, i. e. 'thy nature, attributes, and counsels for the salvation of men.'

— οὓς δίδωκάς μοι.] The sense is: 'whom, by Thy Providence, thou hast delivered to me out of the unbelieving world, to be taught, and brought unto salvation.'

— σοὶ ἦσαν.] Thine; 1. by right of creation and preservation; and 2. by the bond of sincere attachment to thee. Δίδωκας, meaning, 'hast given me them as disciples.' Τὸν λόγον σου τει. means the doctrine of the Gospel, delivered to them through Christ by God the Father.

7. ἔγνωκαν 'they assuredly know.' By πάντα may be understood both the words and works enjoined by the Father, but chiefly the former, as appears from the next verse.

8. ὅτι παρὰ σοῦ ἐξῆλθον.] 'Here (observes Tittman) we must be careful to distinguish the proceeding of Jesus from God, xvi. 28, and coming to the earth, v. 3, from his being sent by God as the Messiah. It should, however, seem that ἐξῆλθον here includes both these particulars; one referring to his Divine nature, as SON OF GOD, the other to his office of Messiah, or Son of Man, as commissioned from the Father, and sent to redeem mankind. The best comment on this passage is viii. 42, ἐγὼ γὰρ ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐξῆλθον καὶ ἤκα (scil. εἰς τὸν κόσμον).

9. Our Lord now prays for their preservation in the faith, and also that they may be defended against the power of the enemy, and maintain perfect unity one with another.

— οὐ περὶ τοῦ κόσμου ἐρωτῶ.] Since our Lord further on, vv. 20, 22, prays for the world,—nay, on another occasion (Luke xxiii. 34) for his very enemies,—this has been supposed to mean, 'I pray especially for thy faithful people; they are worthy that I should pray for them.' Others take the οὐ—ἀλλὰ in the sense non tam—quam, to signify that the prayer for his disciples is not meant to exclude the world from his prayers. Both which modes of explanation come to the same thing. The difficulty may perhaps best be removed by rendering οὐκ ἐρωτῶ, 'I am not praying,' i. e. I am not now praying. Indeed, the nature of the thing (as has been well known) did not admit of Christ's then praying for the world, i. e. the unbelieving part of it, those who had not embraced the Gospel; see ver. 20.

9. ὅτι σοί εἰσι.] Here is added a reason why God should protect them; 'for they are thine;' i. e. now by adoption (see 1 John iii. 2), as heretofore by creation, &c.; see Note supra v. 6.

10. καὶ τὰ ἐμὰ—ἐμὰ.] The neuter πάντα is here used to denote both persons and things. These words seem intended to illustrate the preceding; since from the close communion of will, counsel, and works, of the Father and the Son, whatever is the one's is also the other's, see xvi. 15. Hence the disciples are sometimes called the Father's, and sometimes the Son's. This is (as Calvin observes) meant to suggest that he will assuredly be heard, and they protected.

—καὶ διδοῦσθαι ἐν αὐτοῖς.] These words seem meant to express something beyond the preceding; q. d. 'they are not only mine, but I am glorified in and through them; therefore they are effectively mine.' Some, as Rosenmüller and Tittman, take δεδόξαι in a Future sense, as a preterite prophetic; while others, as Grotius and Doddridge, would take it for a Present or Aorist. Both views may be said to be, in a certain measure, correct,—the Perfect being often put for the Present, when an action or state is designated which has commenced in time past, but extends also to the present. But the Present, in an action of continued progression, like the spreading of the Gospel, is so intermingled with the Future, that the Future may also be included. Thus the full sense is: 'I have been, am being, and am to be glorified.'

11. καὶ οὐκ ἔτι—ἔρχομαι.] These words offer another reason why he thus commends them to the protection of his heavenly Father; namely, because they will soon be deprived of his presence in the body, under which they had hitherto been at rest. (Calvin.) See xiv. 18. The full sense is: 'I am [as it were] no longer in the world, but they are in the world [alone]; while I am going to Thee [and therefore I pray for them].'

—Πάτερ ἅγιε, &c.] Now follows, to the end of the Chapter, the intercessory prayer of Christ for the disciples.

—τήρησον αὐτοὺς ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί σου.] On the exact sense of ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί σου some difference of opinion exists. And no wonder; since the term ὄνομα is one of very extensive signification. If we consider its connexion with the context of this prayer, in which ὀνόματί σου occurs at vv. 6. 26, as put for God himself, it would seem that the sense of the expression may here be, 'in the knowledge and worship of Thee.' As, however, that would seem scarcely extensive enough, and as ὄνομα may readily, by metonymy, be taken to mean His will, or the revelation of it in the Gospel of Christ,—so many (including the best Expositors) are agreed that the meaning intended here and in the next verse is, 'preserve them in the faith and practice of thy true religion.'

—οὐς δέδωκάς.] Instead of οὓς, very many MSS. and several Greek Commentators and early Editors have ᾧς, which has been received by almost every Editor from Bengel and Wettstein to Scholz. And this is very agreeable to the Critical Canon, which directs the more difficult reading to be preferred. But that Canon has several exceptions; and, amongst the rest, where the readings are exceedingly similar in appearance, and where the propriety of the language rejects the more difficult one, or where the context will not permit it. Now all these circumstances here concur. For the ᾧς involves an unprecedented harshness; since thus we must take ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι in the sense 'by thy power,' a use of ὄνομα no where else found in Scripture, or any other writings, and which would be unsuitable to the words following. Besides, the idiom of ᾧς for ὅς is not agreeable to the character of St. John's style, and no where occurs in his Gospel or his Epistles. Whereas the above use occurs at vv. 6. 9. 12, of this prayer. Indeed, the common reading is not only greatly superior in external evidence (being supported by a decided majority of MSS., some exceedingly ancient, and the earliest Versions and Fathers), but seems to be placed beyond doubt by the repetition of the words in the next verse, ἐγὼ ἐτήρουν αὐτοὺς ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί σου, οὓς δέδωκάς μοι.

—ἵνα ὥσιν ἐν καθὼς ἡμεῖς.] There is here a blending of two phrases, ἵνα ὥσιν (καθ' ὅσον), and ἵνα ὥσιν καθὼς ἡμεῖς (ἵσμεν); the latter explaining the former: the sense being, 'that they may be united in sentiment, affection, and zeal for the dissemination of the Gospel, even as We are united in will and purpose.' See Smith's Script. Test. vol. ii. p. 93.

12. ἀπώλετο.] There seems here to be, as in Ps. ii. 12, an allusion to the case of a traveller, who has, from abandoning his guide, lost the right path, and come to destruction. In the words of the above Psalm, ἀπώλεσθαι πειρασίαν, μὴ μνησθαι ἀπολαίσθαι ἐξ ὁδοῦ δικαίας, there is, as in the present passage, the antecedent for the consequent.

—ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας.] Not meaning merely, as Rosenmüller, Kninoel, Schleusner, and Tittman, render, homo perditus, nullius frons; but, by a Hebrew mode of expression, 'one who is devoted to perdition.'

—ἵνα ἡ γραφή πληρωθῇ.] Meaning, 'as that the Scripture is thus fulfilled;' or, may be applied in this case. On the passage here had in view the Commentators are not agreed. Most think there is only a general reference to the prophecies concerning the passion of our Saviour. (Set there seems a special one; see Ps. xli. 9, and ix. 8, compared with Acts i. 20.)

13. ταῦτα λαλῶ ἐν τῇ κόσμῳ.] Here our Lord shows that he did not thus earnestly pray to the Father for his disciples, as though he felt solicitude as to their future state, but rather that he might, in some measure, relieve their present anxiety. (Calvin.)

— ἵνα ἔχωσι—αὐτοῖς.] Render, 'that they may [by these words] have their joy in me (i. e. of which I am the object) complete and perfect': it would shortly be the case at his resurrection, ascension, and the sending to them the Holy Spirit.

14. ἐγὼ δέδωκα αὐτοῖς τὸν λόγον σ.] Comp. xx. 8, and Note.

— καὶ ὁ κόσμος ἐμίσησεν αὐτοὺς.] Here Christ commends his disciples to the Father on another ground; namely, that because of the hatred of the world towards them, they need his aid and defence. (Calvin.) See infra xv. 18. 21.

15. οὐκ ἐρωτῶ—κόσμου.] 'I pray not that thou shouldst remove them.' To better comprehend the purport of the expression, it is proper to bear in mind a remark of Euthymius and Grotius, viz. 'these words are said in explication of the preceding, and for the sake of the disciples then present, and within hearing.' Our Lord, therefore, meant indirectly to warn his disciples, under the bitter persecutions they would be called upon to endure, not to wish or pray for death, since he had important purposes for them to answer during many years; at the same time suggesting to them motives for constancy and fortitude, in their being fenced and preserved under the sorrows which would surround them.

By τοῦ πονηροῦ many Commentators understand the Evil One, referring to Matt. vi. 13, and John v. 19. But as to the first-mentioned passage, we may say, with Horace, 'Nihil agit exemplum litem quod lite resolvit'; for there the sense is much disputed as here. The latter is, indeed, to a purpose; and we might add 1 John ii. 13, 14. 12. v. 19. Yet all that these will prove is, not a masculine sense might, not that it must, be kept: I say might, if the context would permit. But that rather requires the neuter sense; sense which, as it is much more extensive, so is styled to be preferred, as is done by Grotius, Irenæus, Calvin, Lampe, Campbell, and Rosenmüller. This same sense τὸ πονηρὸν occurs in Rom. i. 9. Deut. iv. 25. ποιήσατε τὸ πονηρὸν. comp. also 2 Thess. iii. 3. Render, 'I ask not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou wouldst preserve them from the evil that is in the world' (i. e. sin); and deliver them from the malice of its agents of whatever kind. So that the two senses merge into each other; since the evil spoken of is evil both physical and moral (namely, sin), originating in the author and instigator thereof, the Evil One.

17. αγιάσουν αὐτοὺς, &c.] From preservation under trials and tribulations, our Lord proceeds to pray for their preservation in the discharge of their Evangelical office. Ἀγιάζειν, like the Hebr. שָׁרַף, signifies properly to separate, or set apart to some office, whether civil or ecclesiastical; in the latter case, to consecrate to the worship of God, or the concerns of religion. Ἅγιος properly denotes a person so set apart, or consecrated, and is used especially of Prophets or Priests, both being said αγιάζεσθαι. It is also used of the appointment by the Father of the Son to the work of human salvation by his incarnation (see x. 36), and to which our Lord is said to have devoted himself. But how, it may be asked, are we to understand the term, as applied to the Apostles? Some assign as the sense, 'Set them apart unto the promulgation of thy truth' (i. e. the Word of the Gospel, 'which (it is then added by way of explanation) is the Truth'). Others, 'Sanctify them (namely, by cleansing them from sin, and freeing them from the power of sin, through the operation of the Holy Spirit), unto the promulgation of thy Faith.' This latter interpretation seems preferable, as being called for by the fact, that the Apostles required far more than to be set apart to the ministry: not to say that in the term itself there seems an allusion to the Πνεῦμα ἅγιον, the all-efficacious Agent in the matter. And this use of the word to denote purify is of frequent occurrence both in the Sept. and the New Test., as 1 Thess. v. 23. Since, however, the word is sometimes used in the sense appoint (as Gen. ii. 3, ἡγίασεν ἡμέραν, and supra x. 36 (of our Lord Jesus Christ), ὃν ὁ Πατήρ ἡγίασε, i. e. ἀφώρισε), that sense may here also be admitted; yet only in conjunction with the other; namely, to denote the consecration as appendant to the sanctification, the former as the result of the latter.

Finally, there is no necessity, with some, to render ἀλήθεια just after, 'the truth,' or 'that truth.' The full sense intended is, 'truth itself.' This latter clause may be considered as explanatory of τῇ ἀληθείᾳ σου before; ὁ λόγος ὁ σὸς meaning the Gospel. The whole passage is well paraphrased by Mede: 'Separate them unto the ministry of the Truth, the word of thy Gospel, which is the truth and verification of the promises of God.'

19. ἐγὼ ἁγιάζω ἑμαυτὸν.] Here, again, some difference of opinion exists as to the sense of the term ἁγιάζειν, though it is generally agreed that it must be explained suitably to the sense adopted at ver. 17. This is, however, not absolutely necessary, considering the sudden transitions and changes of sense observable in this Gospel. It should seem that the word is here to be taken in the secondary sense pointed out at ver. 17; and thus we may render: 'I set myself apart, devote myself exclusively to the service of Him who sent me.' The words following, ἁγιασμένοι ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, must be explained in the same manner as those at ver. 17, ἁγιάσου αὐτοὺς ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ σου; q. d. 'that they also may be sanctified and consecrated to the discharge of their sacred office.' Meaning, not only that they should have in Christ an example of this devoted service, but that they should be sanctified and consecrated thereto by the effect of Christ sanctifying himself. For, as Calvin well remarks, 'our Lord thus points out the fountain from whence flows that sanctification [i. e. without me ye can do nothing, Ed.] conveyed to us through the teaching of the Gospel [and the aid of the Spirit, Ed.]; namely, because he hath consecrated himself unto the Father, that his holiness might reach unto us.'

20—26. Now commences the concluding portion of the prayer, on the scope of which a considerable difference of opinion exists; not only as to the persons who may be supposed to be objects of this prayer, but still more, whether what is here said should be referred to Christians of that age, or of all ages. And according as either of these views be adopted, so have the leading terms, δόξαν, &c., been interpreted. It should seem that by τῶν πιστευόντων (which all the best Editors are agreed to be read instead of πιστευουσῶν) are meant not only the believers in general of that age (as distinguished from the Apostles) but those of every age to the end of time, even all who should be converted by the Gospel of Christ, the foundation of which was laid by the Apostles.

At ver. 21 our Lord prays that they may be united to each other and to God, by a union as close as that which subsists between the Father and the Son (see x. 30, and Note), i. e. in being of one mind, sentiment, will, and purpose, being united to the Father and the Son by the Holy Spirit working in them. And for this, among other reasons,—that the unbelieving part of the world may, by seeing that union and concord, be more led to believe my doctrine to be from God.

At ver. 22 a difference of opinion exists as to who are the persons prayed for. Some say, Christians in general; others, the Apostles. And each class of Expositors interpret the δόξαν there according to their respective views; the former understanding it of the reward laid up in heaven for the righteous. But thus, it is urged on the other side, the expression δέδωκα will have to be taken for δόσω, which is the more harsh, as δέδωκας, the next word but one, must then be taken in a preterite sense. They, therefore, suppose by δόξαν to be meant 'such a part of Christ's mediatorial glory, imparted to them by the Holy Spirit, as was suitable to the purposes they were to accomplish, including, of course, the working of miracles in establishment of the truth of the Gospel.' Accordingly they take the next words, ἵνα ὥσι τετελειωμένοι, &c., to advert to the mode of sanctifying such high gifts; namely, with that perfect union with themselves, and with the Father and the Son, as exists between the Father and the Son. This, however, seems a most factitious sense, and one little agreeable to the context. Nor is the difficulty involved in the enallage of tense so great as to need being removed in so violent a manner. We have only to suppose that our Lord here spoke by anticipation, by adverting to a thing future as if past. Most harsh, indeed, were it to suppose the subject in this verse to be different from that in the two preceding ones. The persons here meant must certainly be chosen Christians in general. On the nature and component parts of this glory see Lampe and Tittman in Recess. Synop.

At ver. 25 there is manifestly a transition to the Apostles; the οὗτοι being said δεικνύμενοι. Our Lord finally commends them to the care and protection of the Father.

24. Σίλω ἵνα, &c.] The expression Σίλω may best be rendered 'verily, I would'; for there is no reason to suppose that more was meant than that fervent and importunate desire for the glorification of his faithful followers, which demand the present Prayer itself.

The sense is: 'Most gracious Father, the world hath not known Thee [as I know and have known and manifested Thee and thy counsels]; but these (meaning the Disciples present) have known that Thou hast sent me.' On the expression οὐκ ἔγνω, see supra viii. 27, 28.

26. ἵνα ἡ ἀγάπη, &c.] i. e. 'that the love with which thou hast loved me may be in them (i. e. may be extended to them), and that I may be in them' (meaning, by his spiritual presence); that they may remain united with me in the same holy cause, that of 'glory to God and good-will to men.'

XVIII. The Evangelist now proceeds to record the Passion of our Lord, touching lightly on what had been recorded by the preceding Evangelists, and adding certain circumstances omitted by them; thus strongly confirming the truth of what had been before written, and, in the circumstances which he himself records, plainly taking that truth for granted. (Lampe.)

1. χειμάρρου.] A poetic expression; χειμάρρως being properly applied as an epithet to ποταμοῖς, and also used as a substantive, to denote a winter-torrent, which flows in the rainy season only, and is dry in summer.

— τοῦ Κέδρων.] Instead of the common reading, τῶν Κέδρων, four of the most ancient MSS. and six ancient Versions, with some Fathers, have τοῦ Κεδρὼν, which was preferred by Beza, Casaubon, Campbell, Cast., Drus., Lightfoot, Bois, Bynæus, Reland, and others of the best Commentators down to Middleton, Kuinoel, and Tittman, and has been received by Bengel, Griesbach, Knapp, Vater, and Scholz. The common reading, however, is strenuously, but not satisfactorily, defended by Lampe and Matthæi. The external evidence for τοῦ may, indeed, seem slender; but it is, in fact, of the most weighty kind; the MSS. being some of the most ancient in existence, and the Versions the most estimable, and both confirmed by Josephus. Internal evidence, too, is quite in favour of τοῦ, since it is far more likely that τοῦ should have been altered by the scribes into τῶν, than τῶν into τοῦ, especially in uncial MSS. The common reading might, as Bp. Middleton observes, originate in a mistake of the Copyists, or may even have been a pur-posed alteration, since the Greeks were accustomed to Grecize barbarous names. And this is the more probable in the present instance, from the name meaning to mean 'the brook of Cedars'; though, in reality, as Lightfoot and Reland have shown, it is derived from the Heb. קֶדְרִין, denoting the black torrent. Finally, the circumstance of τῶν Κέδρων occurring twice in the Sept., affords no decisive evidence for the common reading; since the very same mistake may have arisen there as in the present passage. Still less weight attaches to the authority for the common reading, here adduced by Matthæi, of Chrysostom, Cyril, Theophylact, and Euthymius. For the evidence afforded by Commentators and Homily-writers, in proper names, which they do not particularly treat on, is but small, especially where the common reading is retained.

— κήπος.] This seems to have been a plot of garden-ground provided with a cottage or garden-house.

3. τὴν σπείραν.] This word (best derived from σπῖω, cognate with σπῆω, to drive or twist), signifies literally a band. Hence it might designate any military corps; but here, the most eminent Commentators are of opinion, it denotes either the Roman cohort which garrisoned the castle of Antonia, or the detachment of it, which, by order of the Procurator, attended on the Sanhedrim at the great festivals, in order to preserve peace. Hence the propriety of the Article, as denoting the detachment then on duty.

— μετὰ φανῶν καὶ λαμπῶν.] Here some misconception has arisen, for want of due discrimination between the terms φανῶν and λαμπῶν. The best founded view seems to be this—that λαμπῶν never signified a lantern, but only a lamp, or torch; also that φανῶν, while it originally signified a torch, came afterwards to mean a lantern; not, however, such as is now in use, but merely a rude utensil to hold or keep in a light; such, in fact, as those travelling lanterns, described as now in use in the East by Pococke and Niebuhr, cited in Parkh. Lex. Accordingly λαμπῶν here signifies not lamps, but torches. That both lanterns and torches were in use among soldiers, appears from Dionys. Hal. ix. 40. (cited by Lampe and Wetstein) ἐξέτρεχον ἅπαντες ἐκ τῶν σκευῶν ἀνδρῶν, φανῶς ἔχοντες καὶ λαμπάδας. It was, indeed, usual for such corps as the one in question (which was a corps on guard) to carry (as in the present instance) both arms and lanterns or torches. So Thucyd. iii. 23, speaking of the piquet-guard of the Peloponnesians, says, καὶ ἐν τούτῳ οἱ τριακόσιοι αὐτοῖς ἐπαφύροντο λαμπάδας ἔχοντες.

4. ἐρχόμενα ἐπ' αὐτόν.] This phrase is by some accounted a Hebraism. But, as Kypke and Wetstein have shown, it is also found in the Classical writers, in whom ἐρχομαι signifies to befall, and is almost always used of what is evil. Ἐξελθών. This is rightly taken by Euthymius, Moldenhaur, and Pearce for προελθών, namely, from that part of the garden whither Christ had retired for prayer.

6. ἀπῆλθον—ἔπесον χαμαί.] In accounting for the effect thus produced on the soldiers, the earlier and the more recent modern Commentators adopt very different views. The former here suppose miraculous agency; the latter, with the exception of Tittman, recognise none, attributing the circumstance to the awe of the soldiers at the sight of so exalted a person; adducing what they call parallel instances from ancient writers; ex. gr. Val. Max. ii. 19. 3. Arrian, Exp. Alex. v. p. 314. Those, however, are cases of quite another kind; and the mode in which the above Commentators account for the thing is any thing but satisfactory. Their supposition, that this falling to the ground was an act of reverence, is one utterly unsupported by facts, and devoid of probability. And to suppose, as some do, an ellipsis of προσεκύνειν, is quite inadmissible. If we confine ourselves simply to the plain words, and the actual circumstances of the case, we can hardly fail to see that something is here suggested far surpassing the ordinary, and rising to the preternatural. There is little reason to doubt but that some undefinable, but supernatural, power was exercised, such as in many similar instances recorded in Holy Writ; as, for example, that at Acts ix. 4, where the persecuting Saul is described as being 'struck to the earth,' as well as struck with blindness.

8. εἰ οὖν ἐμὶ—ὑπάγειν.] A brief manner of speaking, of which the full sense is: 'If, then, ye seek to take me [take me; but] let those [my companions] depart.'

9. ἵνα πληρωθῇ, &c.] Meaning, 'So that this was made good, or verified, the words,' &c. namely, xvii. 12.

10. μάχαιραν.] Denoting, not so much a sword, as the short falcion worn by the side of the sword, and used to cut, as the other was chiefly to thrust. See Hom. Il. Γ. 271, and Herodot. ii. 61. The word is derived from the old adjective μάχαιρος, as ιταῖρα from ιταῖρος; and signified, literally, a battle knife, as opposed to the knife used for domestic purposes. That it was employed for the purposes of hunting, as well as war, is plain from Servius on Virg. Æn. ix. 586.

11. σου.] This, not found in very many of the best MSS. and Versions, is cancelled by almost every Editor from Bengel and Wetst. to Scholz; and with reason; for internal evidence is as much against it as external.

—τὸ ποτήριον—αὐτό;] See Matt. xxv. 24, 54. The interrogation, accompanied with a double negation, involves a strong affirmation, and the whole is expressive of perfect acquiescence in the will of his Father.

12, 13. On the discrepancy which has been supposed to exist in this statement, as compared with the other Evangelists, see Markland and Tittman in Recens. Synop.

[ὁ ἄλλος μαθητής.] Here no little difficulty has been found, to account for the Article.
 It is, with many, as redundant, rather it removes the difficulty. And to cancel Erasmus, Bengel, and Vater, is most the evidence for its omission is so only that of four MSS.; and that of is but slender. Indeed, as Bp. Middleton, it is far easier to account for the
 of the Article in a few of the MSS., it to be authentic, than for its insertion
 all of them, supposing it to be spurious;
 parent difficulty which might operate as ment in the one case, would be a powerful argument in the other. We must therefore in the present reading, and explain as may. Now almost all Commentators, and modern, are agreed that by the other
 the Evangelist means himself; and with but though Grotius, Lampe, Heumel, deny this, they are as unsuccessful in not to have been St. John, as they are on any other disciple. The Evangelist mentions himself by name, and yet (as shows) he has described the whole of place in the hall of Annas, &c. so circumspectly, that we cannot but conclude that is ecclesiastical tradition attests, present.
 g, then, (remarks Bp. Middleton) that himself is meant by ὁ ἄλλος μαθητής,
 it be impossible to assign something like a reason why he should call himself the disciple. 'This phrase (continues the learned author) obviously implies the remaining one of us, who not only were, in common with me, disciples of Christ, but between me still closer relation might be recognized; and if it could be shown that John stood towards each other in any way, the term the other disciple might be used, immediately after the mention, to designate John; especially if, cause whatever, John was not to be by name. Now it does appear that a and even exclusive friendship existed Peter and John. The same expression, ὁ ἄλλος, occurs in John xi. 2, 3, 4, 6; from any be inferred that this phrase, when accompanied with the mention of Peter, was readily, in the earliest period of Christianity, understood to signify John.'

— ὁ δὲ μαθητής—ἀρχιερεῖ.] This is meant to account for the circumstance of persons in their station of life having obtained access to the hall of the High Priest.

16. τῷ θυρωρῷ.] This office, though it was among the Greeks and Romans confined to men,
 was, in the greater simplicity of Jewish manners,
 chiefly exercised by maid-servants.

18. εἰστήκεισαν δὲ οἱ δούλοι, &c.] Render :
 'Now the servants and the officers were standing (having made a fire of charcoal [in a chafingdish], for it was cold) and warming themselves;
 and Peter was standing by and warming himself.'
 Εἰστ. is Pluperf. for Imperf., as often in the best writers from Homer downwards. So Luke xvi.
 20, ἐβίβλητο. In this way, too, it is rendered by all the ancient and the best modern Latin Translators; though, I believe, by no English
 one. Ἀνθρ. must, from the nature of the case, have the full sense above expressed. Certainly the fuel (ἀνθρακιά) was not coal, but charcoal.
 So Plutarch, Op. Mor., p. 693, A. (cited by Wetstein) ὁ σοφὸς Ἀναχάρσις—ἰππῆν τὴν ἀνθρακίαν (commended the invention of the chafing-dish) ὅτι καπνὸν ἔξω καταλιπόντες, οἰκάδι πῦρ κομίζουσιν. And so Hippocrates and other writers use ἀνθρακιά to denote a chafingdish with the charcoal in it; which (though Commentators have failed to perceive it) is certainly the sense infra xxi. 9, βλείπουσιν ἀνθρακίαν κείμενην, as is plain from the κείμενην, which means set or placed, according to the use of the word in the best writers. So Herodot. i.
 181, κλίη κίσται, and iv. 81, κίσται χαλκῆιον.
 There, however, the Translators have so little understood the import of κείμενην, that they have most of them passed it over; and some Critics have conjectured καίτοι κείμενην, but needlessly. Finally, I have placed the words ἀνθρακίαν πεποικηκότες, ὅτι ψύχος ἦν, in a parenthesis, by which the sense is much cleared. Certainly there ought to be a stop after ὑπηρέται, though not one of the Editors has seen this,
 except R. Stephens. That, indeed, is evident from πεινηκότες standing, as it does, without the Article.

20. π. ἰδίδαξα ἐν τῇ συναγωγῇ καὶ ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ.] This very circumstance, of his having taught his doctrines continually in the Temple, was one quite sufficient to exculpate him, and render the charge of heresy most improbable. (Lampe.)

The τῇ before συναγωγῇ, not found in a great number of the best MSS., has been cancelled by almost all Editors from Bengel and Matthæi to Scholz, and rightly; internal evidence being quite against it: since it would be far more likely to be wrongly inserted, on account of the ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ, than inadvertently omitted.

— ὅπου πάντοτε οἱ Ἰουδ., &c.] This (instead of the common reading πάντοθεν), found in almost all the MSS. and all the Editions up to Beza's, has been received by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz; and rightly: since the external evidence for πάντοθεν is but slender, and its internal far inferior to the other reading. It was, in truth, as Wetstein shows, a mere emendation of Beza. Both he and the ancient Critics stumbled at the tautology occasioned by the repetition of πάντοτε; which the former removed by reading πάντοθεν,—the latter, by reading πάντες. Yet it cannot be denied that πάντοθεν would have been more suitable. So Joseph. Bell. vi. 4. 3, μη γὰρ ἂν ποτε Ἰουδαῖοι παύσασθαι νεωτερίζοντες τοῦ ναοῦ μένοντες, ἰφ' οὗ οἱ πανταχόθεν συλλέγονται.

— ἐν κρυπτῷ ἐλάλησα οὐδέν.] This, as the best Commentators are agreed, must be taken comparatively, and with restriction, i.e. nothing post sinitum (like the Heathen mysteries, or the Jewish Cabala), at variance with his public doctrines, and consequently nothing savouring of sedition.

22. ράπισμα.] See Note at Matt. xxvi. 67.

23. εἰ κακῶς—ἢ δὲ καλῶς, &c.] Καλῶς and κακῶς here may denote either truth and falsehood, respectively, or respect and disrespect. The latter, however, is the more agreeable to the context. With the sentiment Wetstein compares one in Eurip. Frag. 372. Ἥ δαὶ μ' ἐλέγχιαι, ἢ τι μὴ καλῶς λέγω· Ἥ τοῖσιν εὐλεχθεῖσι σὺ χωρεῖν λόγους.

24. ἀπέστειλεν οὖν, &c.] In this verse we have, as Kuinoel remarks, a mention parenthetically introduced, of what the Evangelist had omitted to notice after v. 13; it being his intent thus to intimate that the transactions recorded from v. 13 to 23 took place at the house of Caiaphas. This use of the particle οὖν, to denote a resumption of what the writer was before saying (after a parenthetical portion, whether short or long,) is fully treated on by Hoogerstraen de Part. 509; all whose examples are taken from the New Test., especially the Gospel of St. John. It is not impossible, however, that it may, in the present instance, have been inserted by those who thought some particle here necessary, as at ver. 28.

28. ἀγούσιν οὖν τὸν Ἰησοῦν—εἰς τὸ πρ.] In the passage of Matth. xxvii. 2, there is added καὶ παρέδωκαν αὐτὸν Πιλάτῳ Πιλάτῳ, whence it is evident that it was their purpose that Pilate should order him to be put to death. Hence may be asked, why should the Jewish Rulers have delivered Jesus to the Roman Procurator for punishment, and not themselves have executed it; and by what right could Pilate condemn him to death? On this question the most learned are divided in opinion; some contending that the right of inflicting punishment had been taken away from the Jews; others, that they still retained that right,—at least they seem to have exercised it. See Acts vii. 57. xii. 2. xxiii. 2. The discrepancy seems to be best settled by those who maintain that a distinction must be made between sacred and civil causes; and that in those pertaining to religion, the Jews had yet the power of inflicting capital punishment, [subject, however, to the sentence being confirmed by the Procurator. J but that in civil causes, and such criminal as appertained to the crimen læsæ majestatis, reason (as did sedition), that was not conceded them, the cognisance of all such matters rest solely with the President or Procurator. our Lord's cause, at the beginning, did not to be civil; at least the Jewish Rulers had pronounced him worthy of death because he had claimed himself the Messiah, or Son of God; and they led him to Pontius Pilate, in order that he might cast on him the blame of shedding innocent blood. Afterwards, however, when he had declared that he found no fault in him, seemed to wish to remove from himself the blame of the cause, they ventured (as we see from Luke xxiii. 2.) to bring forward no-fold political charge, namely, that of leading the populace to rebellion, and of dishonouring the payment of tribute; offences of them falling within Pilate's jurisdiction, sine agnitione of Judaea. (Tittman.) 1. Λάβετε αὐτόν ὑμεῖς. Take ye him and judge him; q. d. 'I cannot do a thing so unusual in the Roman law as to condemn a person unheard.' On ἡμῖν οὐκ ἔξεστιν, &c., see on v. 25—27, and especially the Rabbinical law cited in Rec. Syn., p. 665.

2. Ἱνα ὁ λόγος πληρωθῇ. &c.] The best commentators are of opinion that the sense is: 'his was made good the words,' &c. But it is necessary to deviate from the usual import of the formula; for as our Lord had predicted the manner of his death (Matt. xx. 19. xxvi. 2. & xli. 32, sq.), so, as Blacoe remarks, the thing of what is here said seems to be, that the Jews fulfilled this prophecy when they declined passing sentence on him by their own law; crucifixion being not a Jewish, but a Roman punishment.

34. ἀφ' ἐαυτοῦ 'proprio motu;' meaning, 'from thy own knowledge or suspicion of my having been concerned in seditious practices, or from the suggestion of others,' as was really the case. See Luke xxiii. 2.

35. μήτι ἐγὼ Ἰουδαῖός εἰμι. &c.] The full sense is well expressed by Kuinoel in the following paraphrase: 'No; I have not asked thee of my own thought: I have found nothing hitherto in thee which would afford any colour to such a charge as thine enemies advance; but it does not hence follow that thou art innocent. Of thee and thy case I know nothing. I am not a Jew, to know or care about such things. It is on the representations of thy countrymen and the Chief Priests that I examine thee. What hast thou done to afford ground for this accusation?'

36. ἡ βασιλεία. &c.] Meaning, 'I am a king, it is true, but] my kingdom is not a temporal one [but entirely spiritual]. If my kingdom had been of this world, I should have collected about me vast numbers of my countrymen. These would have defended me against the attacks of my Jewish adversaries. But as I have done nothing of this sort, it is plain that my kingdom is not of such a nature as at all interferes with earthly governments, or affords any colour for this charge of sedition.' (Tittman.)

37. οὐκοῦν βασιλεὺς εἰ σὺ;] Some Commentators would have the interrogation removed, in the sense 'So, then, thou art a king?' This may seem to be more agreeable to what follows; but

 σον, σταύρωσον! Λέγει αὐτοῖς ὁ Πιλάτος· Λάβετε αὐτὸν ὑμεῖς καὶ σταυρώσατε· ἐγὼ γὰρ οὐχ εὐρίσκω ἐν αὐτῷ αἰτίαν.

there is no good authority for οὐκοῦν in a declarative sentence.

37. σὺ λέγεις, &c.] i. e. 'thou truly sayest that I am a king; it is very true: I am a king.' Σὺ λέγεις signifies it is so; a phrase of modest assent and affirmation. Our Lord now proceeds to show the nature of his kingdom, and in what sense he is a king. He is come, not to reign, but to bear witness to the truth; meaning, that of the Gospel: to promote, confirm, and establish it.

— ὁ ὢν ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας] 'he who is studious of the truth.' So Rom. ii. 8, ὁ ἐξ ἐριθείας. Comp. viii. 47.

38. τί ἐστὶν ἀλήθεια;] The exact force of this question has been disputed. Some taking the meaning to be: 'What is truth to me? what care I about truth?' Yet this,—besides being a sense not fairly to be elicited from the words,—is such as involves no little improbability. For though, from the account Josephus gives of Pilate, (whose administration he represents as one continued series of venality, rapine, tyranny, savage cruelty, and whatever could disgrace him, whether in his judicial or magisterial character,) it cannot be imagined that he cared at all about truth; yet that he should have chosen thus openly to disclaim all regard to it, cannot well be supposed. It should rather seem that by this question, What is truth? he meant to say (with a reference to the endless disputations of Philosophers on the subject), 'Ay, but what is truth? Define it; that is the great point.'

To this question our Lord, knowing the spirit in which it was put, of course vouchsafed no answer; and Pilate, scarce caring to receive any, 'again went forth to the Jews.'

39, 40. Now followed the transactions recorded in Luke xxiii. 5, seqq. and Matth. xxvii. 12, seqq. What is related here and in Matth. xxvii. 15, seqq. Luke xxiii. 14, seq. and Mark xv. 8, took place after Herod had sent Jesus back to Pilate. See the Note on Luke xxiii. 16. Matth. xxvii. 15.

XIX. 4, 5. On the motives and intent with which Pilate brought out Jesus, see Rec. 89a.

6. σταύρωσον, σταύρωσον.] In very many MSS., Versions, Fathers, and early Editions, is added αὐτόν, which is received by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz. But it is so difficult to account for its omission in far more than half of the MSS. (many of them very ancient) and so easy to account for its insertion, that I dare not follow their example. Such kind of exclamations are usually very elliptical, and the pronoun is often omitted. Out of very many examples which I could adduce, one must suffice: Pseudo-Eurip. Rhea. 685, Παις, παῖς.

— λάβετε αὐτόν ὑμεῖς, &c.] Many understand these words as a permission. But Pilate neither said, nor could say this seriously; for he well knew that crucifixion was not in use among the Jews; and the Priests had already declared that they could not put him to death, on account of the festival. The words (as Chrysostom long ago saw, and in which light they have been viewed by some modern Commentators, as Lampe) are those of irritation and disgust; neither does it appear that the Jews regarded them as a permis-

tion, since they immediately resort to a new charge—that of blasphemy. (Kuinoel.)

7. ἡμεῖς νόμον ἔχομεν, &c.] The sense is: By our law he has been found guilty of blasphemy, and condemned; but, on account of the basit, we could not inflict the punishment; and therefore we had recourse to thee." By the law they meant certain passages of the Old Test. (as Levit. xxiv. 16. Deut. xiii. 1. sq. v. 18. 20) which denounce death on pretenders to Divine mission; for ἐποίησεν here means pretended to be.

The τοῦ before Θεοῦ is omitted in many MSS. and early Editions, and is cancelled by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz; a decision approved of by Bp. Middleton, who shows that Πῶς Θεοῦ may mean the Son of God, as well as the Son of God, and proves that Christ, in affirming that he was the Son of God, did, in fact, affirm his Messiahship; see Note on Matt. xiv. 33, and comp. Luke xxii. 66 with v. 70. Tittmann, however (whose Note see in Reverens. Synop.), is of opinion that the names Messiah and Son of God were by no means synonymous, but of very different meaning; the former expressing office, the latter Divine nature; see i. 14. And that Pilate so understood the appellation, he thinks is clear from what follows. Be that as it may, the two appellations by which the Saviour of Israel was called, namely, Messiah (which implied, they thought, Kingship), and Son of God, (which expressed his Divine nature and union with God), afforded the Chief Priests an opportunity of shifting the charge as they found it convenient; passing either that of sedition, or of blasphemy.

8. μᾶλλον ἐφοβήθη.] Namely, to condemn him to be crucified. Pilate's apprehension arose probably from an impression, too strong for him to suppress, that Jesus was at least a very extraordinary person, if not the character he claimed to be. Whether this idea was at all mixed up with the notion of a Heathen Demigod (though the most celebrated Commentators ascribe it chiefly to that) is very doubtful. The stories of Demigods, &c., were probably by the higher classes regarded in nearly the same light in which we now them; namely, as mere mythological fictions, only deserving of attention from their high antiquity and poetic elegance.

9. ὁ ἀπολῦσας εἰ σύ.] This cannot mean, as some Commentators imagine, 'of what country art thou?' for Pilate knew him to be a Galilean;

but, as others interpret, 'What is thy origin, descent, and parentage?' So 2 Sam. i. 13, πῶθεν εἰ σύ; Josh. ix. 8, πῶθεν ἴστα; for Pilate now knew that Jesus claimed to be of celestial origin (Υἱὸς Θεοῦ). To this question our Lord was pleased to make no answer; partly because Pilate's conduct did not entitle him to any, and partly because an answer to the interrogation, in the usual acceptance of the words, Pilate could scarcely need; and in any other sense it would have been little intelligible to him, and have only led to further questions,—all superfluous, since our Lord knew that he had resolved to deliver him to the fury of the Jews.

11. ἀνῶθεν] 'from on high,' from Heaven, i. e. as it is said Acts ii. 23, 'by the determinate counsel of God.' In this sense the word occurs also at iii. 31. James i. 17, and Ælian, cited by Wetstein, καὶ ταῦτα μὴν λεόντων ἰσθμὶ δῶρα φύσει, ἀνῶθεν αὐτοῖς δοθέντα. So the Hebr. מִלְּפָנִים and מִלְּשָׁמַיִם. Instead of ἐξουσίαν ἔχειν, the more Classical phrase is κύριος εἶναι. So in a kindred passage of Dion Cass. p. 398. 1, κύριος καὶ σώσει καὶ ἀπολῦσαι τινας. By δεδομένον, Grotius rightly understands, not that common permission which leaves many things to the natural course of events, but something decreed in the Divine counsels.

—διὰ τοῦτο.] With these words Commentators have been not a little perplexed. To suppose this, with Kuinoel, a mere formula of transition, is very unsatisfactory. It may be best regarded as a highly elliptical expression, importing, 'Wherefore [in thus giving me up to the fury of the people] he who put me into thy hands is more in fault than thou.'

If this be not admitted, we may, with Markland, suppose that while our Lord admits Pilate's authority to be lawful, he, by implication, denies that of the Sanhedrim to be so; and means to argue that, therefore, their sin was greater in proportion to the presumption of their passing a sentence which they had no sufficient authority to carry into execution.

12. This penetrating insight into his thoughts, and candid judgment of his conduct, seems to have much affected Pilate for the moment, and hence (ἐκ τούτου) he made another effort to save Jesus. The Jews, however, perceiving that Pilate was studying every method of releasing

Jesus, and that he paid little attention to their second charge of blasphemy,—as not falling under his cognisance,—now return to their first alleged crime, which especially belonged to the Procurator, namely, that of sedition, and treason against Caesar. See Euthymius.

12. οὐκ εἶ φίλος τ. κ. J.] A popular meiosis; meaning, 'thou art disaffected to Caesar.' So Arrian, Epict. iii. 26 (cited by Wetstein), τὸ Καίσαρος μὴ εἶναι φίλον. Joseph. Ant. xiv. 8. 1, αὐτοῦ φίλους εἶναι Καίσαρος περιβάλλει. The threat was not to be despised; since, as we learn from Suetonius and Tacitus, Caesar was most suspicious, and punished with death any offence that bordered on the crimen læsæ majestatis.

13. ἐκάθισεν.] A forensic term signifying sat for judgment. At Λιθόστρωτον supply ἵδαφος, which is expressed in 2 Chron. vii. 3. This was a pavement formed of pieces of marble or stone of various colours; such as were called termiculata, and tessellata. A sort of luxury which had arisen in the time of Sylla, and had extended even to the most remote provinces. Julius Caesar (as we learn from Sueton., Vit. 46,) carried about with him in his expeditions such pieces of sawn marble and variegated stone with which to adorn his prætorium, on which the βῆμα was placed. The fashion seems to have been brought from the East at the Roman conquests in Asia. It had probably long been in use there. So Aristes, ap. Euseb. Præp. Evang. p. 453, says of the Temple at Jerusalem, τὸ δὲ πᾶν ἵδαφος λιθόστρωτον καθίστηκε.

14. παρασκευὴ τοῦ πάσχα.] i. e. the eve of the Sabbath, when preparation for its celebration was made.

— ὥρα δὲ ὡσεὶ ἔκτη.] On the seeming discrepancy between this account and that of the other Evangelists, see Townsend's Chr. An. i. 3. 24, and the Note on Mark xv. 25.

15. οὐκ ἔχομεν, &c.] A mere pretence; since the Jews always maintained that they owed no allegiance to any earthly monarch, but were subjects of God only.

17. καὶ ἀπήγαγον.] Many MSS. and early Editions, and some Fathers and Commentators, have ἤγαγον, which is received by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz; but wrongly; since ἀπάγειν is a vox solennis de hac re. The error, I suspect, arose from the contraction ἀπῆγαγον, which might easily be mistaken for ἤγαγον.

— βαστάζων τὸν σταυρὸν.] As those about to suffer crucifixion were always obliged to do. So Artemid. ii. 56, λοικὴ γὰρ καὶ ὁ σταυρὸς θανάτου, καὶ ὁ μέλλων αὐτῷ προσελθὼν, πρότερον αὐτὸν βαστάζει.

19. τίτλον.] Τίτλος answers to the Latin titulus, a diminutive from titus, derived from τίτος, and that from τίω, which signifies privately, to hold up or out. Thus τίτλος must simply a board fastened to any thing, to hold out, i. e. notify something connected with it. Hence it denotes that board (painted white, with an inscription in black letters) which was fixed up publicly, to indicate the cause of any one's condemnation; see Hesych. in Σαῦς. The custom of affixing these τίτλοι to every malefactor about to be executed, is an Oriental one of the most remote antiquity, and still retained in the East, especially in Turkey, where the τίτλος is called legh, & writing.

[καὶ ἡ γραφὴ πληρωθῇ.] Meaning, as commentators are of opinion, 'Thus filled the Scripture (i. e. Ps. xxii. 18.)
 with.' It has been disputed whether the
 of this Psalm was meant to refer to Christ.

Most recent Interpreters think it was king it to relate solely to David, and to reference to the rebellion of Absalom. Thus regard the words as merely introduced by son and accommodation to the present case. But though it be true that the form πληρωθῇ ἡ γραφὴ sometimes means, that thing so happened, that this or that passages of the Psalms cannot be proved been fulfilled in the case of David, where-and other parts of the same Psalm, were fulfilled in that of Christ; and, what is, as the Evangelist plainly regarded the
 as prophetic, and the words as fulfilled
 in, the former view is decidedly preferable.

VOL. I.

28. εἰδὼς—ὅτι πάντα ἤδη τετ.] The true sense here is doubtless, 'knowing that all things [namely, what he had to do and to suffer] were now accomplished.'

—ἵνα τελειωθῇ, &c.] Notwithstanding what many recent Commentators allege, it is plain that the Evangelist did not mean merely to accommodate the passage; but to show that it was prophetic of Christ, and was now fulfilled, at least in its principal scope. As to the argument that the imprecations at ver. 22 et seqq. of the Psalm show it not to be prophetic, it is very weak.
 For it is not necessary to suppose the whole Psalm prophetic of Christ. See Note supra
 ver. 24.

29. ὑσσώπῳ περιθέντες.] There are several species of the hyssop; one of which (and no doubt the one here meant) has a woody reedlike stalk, of two feet or more in length, and which is mentioned by the Rabbinical writers as bound up in bundles for firing. Ὑσσώπῳ, then, is here put for καλᾶμ ὑσσώπου (hence called by Matthew and Mark καλᾶμ, as being rough and reedy); and this, if of the length above mentioned, might easily enable a person to reach the mouth of Jesus on the cross, which, as was shown on Matth. xvii. 32, was so low, that the feet of the crucified person were not more than a yard from the ground. Περιθέντες signifies 'having wound or fastened it around,' or, 'having stuck it on.' Thus the word is used in the LXX.
 to express the Hebr. קשר, 'to tie to,' in Prov. vii. 3.
 And Arist. Thesm. 387. uses περιθεῖν for ἐπιθεῖν.

30. κλίνας τὴν κεφαλὴν.] As those do who are just expiring. See Virg. Æn. xi. 829.

— παρέδωκε τὸ πνεῦμα.] This and the expression of St. Matthew, ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα, suggest the idea of a placid, peaceful, and resigned dissolution, and were therefore used by the pious among the Hebrews to denote that the soul is rendered back unto God, its original author, to dispose of according to his good pleasure. (Grot. and Kuinoel.)

31. παρασκευὴ.] Namely, the προσάβατον, namely, as being not only an ordinary Sabbath, but the extraordinary one on the 15th of Nisan. For ἐκείνη, very many MSS., Versions, and early Editions have ἐκείνου, which is received by most Editors from Wetstein to Scholz, with the approbation of Bp. Middleton.

— ἵνα κατεαγῶσιν αὐτῶν τὰ σκέλη.] Not, as some have imagined, in order to increase their torment, but to accelerate death; as is plain from the passages of the Classical writers cited by Wetstein, from which it appears that this was very often done. The legs, we learn, were broken, just above the ankle, by an iron mallet.

34. Some difference of opinion exists, 1. as to the intent of the Evangelist in this attestation. It has been generally supposed that he meant to establish the fact of the real death of Christ; while some (as Dr. Burton) think it was his intent to refute the Docetæ, who held that Jesus had not a real body, but was only a phantom. 2. As to the phenomenon itself, the earlier Commentators in general regard it as miraculous; but the researches of modern pathologists have established the fact, that the effusion would have taken place in any case, being the natural consequence of such a wound; and that it is, under all circumstances, decisive evidence of the actual death of Christ. Medical writers are, indeed, not quite agreed whether by αἷμα καὶ ὕδωρ be meant the small portion of water found in the pericardium, called lymph, or (which is more probable) the sanguineous and aqueous liquor found in the cavities of the pleura after a mortal wound, or that follows a stab in the pleura, when the pericardium has been pierced, which is always mortal; consequently a proof that if Christ had not been already dead, this wound would certainly have extinguished the last remains of life; which was doubtless the intent of the soldier.

35. καὶ ὁ ἰωρακῶς—ἡ μαρτυρία.] I would render: 'And one who was an eye-witness [in the circumstance] (namely, John himself) testifieth to the truth of this, and his testimony is true: viz. he is conscious that he speaketh the truth, so that ye may rely on his testimony.'

36. ἐγὼ νετο γὰρ ταῦτα.] The γὰρ refers to a clause omitted; q. d. '[And believe ye well may]—for all these things were really done,' &c.

— ὅστοῦν οὐ, &c.] Many recent Commentators are of opinion that the passages of the Old Test. (Exod. xii. 46. Numb. ix. 12.) in which it is enjoined, that 'not a bone of the lamb shall be broken,' are not prophetic, and had no reference to Christ. 'There are (say they) no vestiges in the Old Test. of the Paschal lamb being considered as a type of Christ; nor did the Evangelist mean to so represent it. He only applies the passage to our Lord, and compares Christ with the Paschal lamb; intending to denote, that in the institution of the Paschal lamb, something had been enjoined similar to what would, by Divine interposition, take place in the case of Christ; by which Providence, therefore, it happened that his bones were not broken.' But that the Evangelist did mean to represent the Paschal lamb as a type of Christ, and consequently that such must be the only true view, no person who fairly considers the words can doubt. What an offer so probable a reason for the otherwise unaccountable injunction, that not a bone of the Paschal lamb should be broken, as that it might point to the sacrifice of that lamb as a type of the sacrifice of Christ?

There is evidently a correspondence between the type and antitype. And as the passage referred to at the next verse, in the margin, is (as Lampe and Tittman prove) plainly prophetic of the piercing of the Redeemer's side, so we have here both a correspondence of type and antitype, and a fulfilment of prophecy, viz. of the piercing. With respect to the circumstance, 'looking at him whom they have pierced,' it was partly fulfilled at the first advent of our Lord, at the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish state, and will be finally, and more signally, fulfilled at the last advent, the day of judgment; which seems especially alluded to at Rev. i. 7. As to the seeming discrepancies in the above two passages (namely, Ex. xii. 46. Zech. xii. 10.), suffice it to say, that the former is, properly speaking, no sentence at all, but only a statement of the sense. The other is a quotation; and although it differs considerably from the Sept., it agrees with the Versions of Aquila, Theodotian, and Symmachus; and, indeed, with the Hebrew, if, with 36 MSS. and many Critics, we read יָהִי instead of יָהִי. And so, I find, Abp. Newcome translates. Thus there will be no reason to suppose a change of person, for accommodation sake; which is forbidden by the text of the Chaldaee Translator.

39. ὁ ἐλθὼν πρὸς τὸν Ἰ., &c.] Render, 'he who had formerly gone to Jesus by night.'

— σμύρνη καὶ ἀλόης.] The σμύρνα here mentioned is (as we learn from Dioscorides and Pliney) the juice of a certain tree in Arabia, from which, on the trunk being bored, exudes a kind of gummy liquid, which is caught on mats, &c.; and, as we learn from Herodot. ii. 82, was used in embalming. The ἀλόη here spoken of is by many supposed not to be, what has been generally imagined, the herb aloes, from which a bitter juice is expressed, but an aromatic tree, which is also called agalloctum, and the hyaloe, whose wood was likewise employed by the Egyptians for embalming corpses. At all events, it should seem (as the best Commentators are agreed) that we are not to suppose the myrrh and aloes (or the latter at least) to have been in a liquid state, (namely, the distillation from the trees), but to have been the wood of those trees, dried and pulverized. This, indeed, appears by the great weight of the spices (100 lb. troy weight). The body would not have been regularly embalmed, since there was not time sufficient for that; but spices and unguents were brought to wash and anoint the body, and to envelop it in aromatic drugs.

— ὡς λίτρας ἑκατόν.] Instead of ὡς, not a few MSS. and early Editions have ὡς, which is received by Griesbach and others down to Scholz. I have followed their example, though the reading is uncertain; since St. John uses both ὡς and ὡσαύτως in this sense. The quantity of spices here mentioned has been thought by some incredibly great; and they propose some other signification of λίτρα. But there is no reason to abandon the common interpretation; for the chamber in which our Lord's body was deposited, would, according to the common custom, have to be completely perfumed; and no inconsiderable part would probably be reserved for the funeral; since, on such occasions, immense quantities of spices were burnt; especially when great respect was meant to be shown to the dead. So Joseph. Antiq. xv. 3. 4, notices the great quantity of θυμιάματα (meaning the odour of burnt spices) at the funeral of Aristobulus. And so, speaking of Herod's funeral (Ant. xvii. 10), he says that there were fifty ἀρωματόφοροι.

40. ἔδωκεν αὐτὸ—ἀρωμάτων.] After having embalmed the corpse for several days, they swathed it in linen rollers, or bandages, closely enfolding and wrapping it in that bed of aromatic drugs with which they had enveloped it. (Horne's Introd., vol. iii. 513.)

— ἐνταφιάζειν.] The term signifies to prepare for burial, whether by embalming or otherwise.

41. καὶ ἐν τῷ κήπῳ μνημεῖον.] According to a custom of the Jews, and also of the Greeks and Romans, to have sepulchres in their gardens. Thus the mausoleum of Augustus was erected in a garden.

42. διὰ τὴν παρασκευὴν, &c.] Since the day (Friday) was verging to a close, and the Sabbath was at hand, they (for greater dispatch) laid Jesus, for the present, in the sepulchre, which was near at hand, that they might observe the Sabbatical rest.

2. τὸν ἄλλον μαθ., &c.] These words, 'the other disciple whom Jesus loved,' are not to be taken in close connexion, so as to imply that Peter and John were the two disciples whom he loved; but there must be a kind of break, as if the Evangelist had said, 'the other disciple—him, I mean, whom Jesus loved.' (Scholefield.)

4. προέδραμε τάχιον.] Here we have a blending of two forms of expression, to strengthen the sense.

7. χωρὶς ἐντετυλιγμένον εἰς ἓνα τόπον.] The construction is ἐντετ. εἰς ἓνα τόπον χωρὶς. The participle has a sensus prægnans, i. e. rolled up and placed.

On this circumstance it is well remarked by Racine (in his observations on particular passages of Scripture), that 'the linen clothes thus placed and disposed apart from one another, plainly showed that the body had not been carried away by thieves. Those who steal are not observed to do things in such a quiet orderly manner.'

8. ἐπίστευσεν.] Not the truth of the resurrection, as some eminent Commentators explain, (for, as the words following suggest, they did not yet know or fully comprehend the prophecies which predicted Christ's resurrection,) but the fact related by Mary, that the body had been removed from the sepulchre.

10. πρὸς ἑαυτούς.] Render, 'to themselves,' i. e. their companions, who then, jointly with them, occupied the same house. Thus it comes to mean 'to their homes;' of which see many examples are adduced by the Commentators, as Joseph. Ant. viii. 4. 6, πρὸς αὐτοὺς ἵκανον ἀπῆλθον. Numb. xxiv. 25, ἀπῆλθον πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς. And so the Latin ad se recipere.

12. ἐν λευκοῖς.] Supply ἱματίους; of which ellipsis several examples have been adduced.

15. ὁ κηπουρός.] This is by many explained 'the bailiff.' But there is no reason why it may not denote the occupier of the plot of garden. The term κύριος is here, as often, merely an appellation of common civility to a person of respectable appearance.

— εἰ σὺ ἐβάστασας αὐτόν.] Meaning, it should seem, 'if thou hast been concerned in his removal.' The word βασιτάζειν properly signifies to law; 2dly, to bear away, remove; the nature and purpose of the removal being determined by the context. It is, however, (like ἀναίρειν) especially applied to the removal of a corpse to burial. So Eurip. Alc. 724, γέροντα βασιτάζει νεκρόν. El. 1225, σῶμα βασιτάζειν τόλμα.

Mary, it seems, thought the corpse had been removed to some other place of burial by some friend of Jesus, with the knowledge, if not with ance, of the gardener, and she was anxious to know where.

17. μή μου ἄπτου, &c.] On the purpose of this address, and consequently on the exact sense of the words themselves, some difference of opinion exists. The expression ἄπτου seems intended to denote an act of dutiful reverence. A sense of the word which may be illustrated from Eurip. Phœn. 910, μή πειλαμβάνου, where the Schol. explains by μή μου ἄπτου. In the words following, ἀναβίβηκα is by the best Commentators regarded as a kind of Preterite-present; q. d. 'I am not now ascending,' i. e. going to ascend. The general sense may be thus expressed: 'Embrace me not; let me go: waste not these precious moments in demonstrations of duty and affection. These you will have sufficient opportunity of showing me afterwards; for I have yet some time longer to stay with you on earth, before I ascend to my Father. But go immediately to my brethren, and tell them that soon I shall ascend to Him who is my Father and your Father, my God and your God.' He says not, ascend to heaven; but, in order to remind them of the relation in which he stands to God, and they to him, he says, 'to my Father;' thus signifying that he who 'was from the beginning with God,' is going to act as their Mediator with God, who would now become their Father and their God,—not by creation only, but by the spiritual paternity implied in the Gospel covenant. Thus saying 'my God,' he speaks in accordance to the expression just before—'my brethren;' and because 'he is not ashamed to call them brethren,' (Heb. ii. 11.) therefore calls Him who is their God his God.

19. τῶν θυρῶν κεκλ.] On this circumstance a wide difference of opinion exists among Commentators of various times. Some (including the ancient Interpreters generally, and many earlier modern Expositors) understand by this that our Lord miraculously penetrated through the closed doors; others, consisting chiefly of the recent modern Commentators, suppose him to have entered merely in an ordinary way, after knocking and being admitted. Of these two views, the former, besides involving an insuperable philosophical difficulty (well stated by Whitby and Lampe), supposes a sense which can by no means be shown to exist in the words, and which indeed would have required διὰ τῶν θυρῶν κεκλεισμένων. Still less, however, is the latter view to be defended; for surely no unbiased person can attentively peruse this passage, and the similar one at ver. 26, without being sensible that something far more than an ordinary entrance is intended. For, as it is well observed by Tittman, 'why should our Lord be said to have come, the doors having been closed or fastened, unless to suggest that he entered in a way any thing but common?' Indeed, had nothing more than the ordinary been intended, there would surely have been no occasion for the words τῶν θυρῶν κεκλεισμένων. For to make them (as the Commentators last mentioned are compelled to do) a mere notatio temporis (q. d. 'at door-shutting time'), is to suppose a use quite unauthorized, and which is, moreover, precluded by the close connexion of the words with the following ones: ἔπου ἦσαν οἱ μαθηταὶ συνηγμένοι, the sense being, 'the doors having been closed [of the place; where they were assembled together.]' Moreover, the words διὰ τὸν φόβον τῶν Ἰουδαίων are to be connected not with συνηγμένοι, but with κεκλεισμένων, being intended to show why the doors were thus closed, i. e. barred; for the term κλείω here does not merely mean shut, but closed and fastened. A sense quite inherent in the word itself (whence the derivative κλειθρον, a bar or lock), and which is frequent in the best writers. So we have at Acts v. 23, τὸ δεσμοτήριον εἴρομεν κεκλεισμένον, i. e. its gates barred. Eurip. Bacch. 652, κλείω πάντα πύργον. Æschyl. Suppl. 934, πῶλον πύργων μηχανῇ κεκλεισμένην. Such being the sense of the words, they undoubtedly point to something preternatural: though not, I apprehend, what the above Commentators suppose,—that our Lord penetrated through the doors closed as they were. But (as a beautiful economy similar to that which we observe in nature, may be discerned in our Lord's working of miracles, by which no more power is employed than is necessary to accomplish the purpose in view) we may suppose, with the best Commentators (as Calvin, Grotius, Whitby, and Campbell) that our Lord caused the doors to preternaturally open of themselves; as the angel, Acts v. 19. 23, 'opened the doors of the prison' in which the Apostles were confined; see also Acts xii. 10. Thus, as it is observed by Calvin, 'the circumstance of the doors being barred was purposely introduced, as containing in it an illustrious specimen of the Divine power inherent in our exalted Saviour; who, we may suppose, by thus entering not without a miracle, intended to afford his disciples a striking proof of his Divinity.' This seems alluded to at ver. 30.

1 Matt. 16.
& 18. 18.

19. εἰρήνῃ ὑμῖν!] A usual form of salutation, meaning (as Dr. A. Clarke explains), May every blessing of heaven and earth which you need be granted you! His addressing them in his usual form of salutation would be a most effectual means to quiet their fears, and assure them that it was He, their Saviour.

21. εἶπεν—πάλιν Εἰρήνῃ ὑμῖν.] This our Lord repeats, not so much to strengthen what he had just said, as rather to draw their attention to the great things which he is about to say. (Calvin and L. Brug.)

—καθὼς ἀπέσταλκε, &c.] Since Christ's mission included various momentous purposes, such as could have no parallel with the sending of the Apostles, we must refer the words καθὼς—καὶ solely to those points which were similar; namely, the being delegated and commissioned by Christ, as his ambassadors, to carry the message of salvation to the 'world yet lying in sin.' As, then, Christ's commission was Divine, so also was that of his Apostles, and consequently so must be that of their successors.

22. ἐνεφύσησε, &c.] The construction is: ἐνεφύσησε αὐτοῖς καὶ λέγει αὐτοῖς. So 1 Sam. xvii. 21, καὶ ἐνεφύσησε τῷ παιδαρίῳ τριε, and Job iv. 21.

This is to be regarded, not what some have supposed it, as a partial effusion of the Holy Spirit, but rather as a symbolical act, by which our Lord was pleased to confirm and illustrate (by a significant sign, see supra xiii. 8. Matt. xxvii. 24. Jerem. xxvii. 2) the promise before made; for the words λάβετε Πνεῦμα ἅγιον can only be understood as a present promise of a future benefit, which should very shortly be communicated; namely, on the day of Pentecost, when it was formally and substantially bestowed.

And thus as Christ had been inaugurated in his office by the Holy Spirit at his baptism, so they were, in like manner, to be then baptized with the Holy Ghost.

23. ἂν τινων, &c.] These words (on which see Note at Matt. xvi. 18, 19) were doubtless meant primarily for the Apostles; but they contain a promise which, with due limitation, may be extended to their successors. For the privilege given was one of office; and as the office was handed down, there is no reason why the privilege should not remain. The best Commentators are agreed that ἀφῆτε and κρατῆτε must be taken declaratively,—i. e. to pronounce the remission or retention of sins, which is the usual and the sole view of the sense.

24. εἷς ἐκ τῶν δώδεκα.] So said because the regular number of members in any body is made use of to designate the name of the body, even though the number may not at the time be complete.

25. ἔλεγον οὖν αὐτῷ, &c.] Though the Evangelist has expressed himself with great brevity, we are not to suppose but that the disciples told Thomas the whole of what had taken place; as indeed is clear from the words of his reply.

—τὸν τύπον τῶν ἥλων] i. e. the mark or impression made by the nails. So Athen. p. 385, τοὺς τύπους τῶν πλῆγῶν ἰδοῦσα. He means to say, that 'unless he have the testimony of both sight and touch as to the identity and real bodily presence of Jesus,' &c. For Thomas did not so much call in question the tenacity of the disciples, as he supposed they had been deceived by some spirit.

26. ἴσω] for ἐν τῷ ὁλίῳ.

27. ἄπιστος] for μὴ πιστεύων. This only sense is rare in the Classical writers; yet the lat-

28. ὁ Κύριός μου, &c.] How decidedly these words recognise the Divinity of Christ, none have been disposed to deny, but those who deny the doctrine itself. So necessarily, indeed, does this follow from the words, according to their plain and obvious import, that those who refuse to acknowledge Jesus as their Lord and their God, are compelled to resort to the expedient of taking these words, not as a solemn address, but as an empty formula of admiration, as the ancients said, Hercules!
or Jupiter! and the moderns Good Lord,
ia. &c. To which it has been well replied by Dr. Pye Smith (Scrip. Test. vol. ii. p. 263), that as the Divine name as an exclamation of surprise, however usual among heathens, and even some Christians, was by no means the custom of the Jews, among whom outward reverence for the name of the Deity was most punctiliously observed. Such a sense, too, is forbidden by the words of our Lord's reply; in which he commends
 the faith of Thomas, though he gently reproves his tardiness with which it was rendered. Finally, the circumstance of the words being introduced by the formula εἶπεν αὐτῷ, shows that they cannot be a mere exclamation of surprise, but an address, wherein the Nominative with the Article is used as the Vocative, as at xix. 3, and often in the New Test.; in short, 'an address which (to use the words of Bp. Middleton) though in the form of an exclamation, amounts to a confession of faith, and was equivalent to a direct assertion of our Saviour's Divinity.'

And in vain has it been attempted to evade the force of this recognition by assigning a lower sense to Θεός; for a refutation of which, and an illustration of the sense in which the Apostles understood it, see Note in Recens. Synop. 'On all accounts (as Dr. P. Smith observes, Scrip. Test. vol.
 i. 262—270) we are constrained to take the terms
 in their proper import and full measure of signification—MY LORD AND MY GOD—a combination of the two sacred names forming the strongest representation of Divine Majesty of which the language is capable. The testimony, then, is clear, and the authority irrefragable; for by not using the name of God, now first applied to him by the Apostles, our Lord virtually takes it to himself, as 'thinking it (to use the words of the Apostle) not robbery to be equal with God.'
 29. Θωμᾶ.] This, not found in very many

MSS. and early Editions, has been cancelled by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz.

— μακάριοι οἱ μὴ ἰδόντες, &c.] The term μακάριος must here be understood comparatively, for our Lord did not mean to affirm that those who believe without seeing would be preferred to those who believe on the evidence of sight; but only that where the effects of that faith were equal, it argued greater simplicity, candour, and wisdom to yield a reasonable evidence without seeing, than could be argued from merely having believed on sight, after sufficient evidence of another kind had been proposed. See more in Doddridge and Whitby.

30. σημεῖα.] Some understand by this the miracles worked by Christ. An interpretation, as Tittman and Kuinoel have shown, quite untenable. Greatly preferable is that of others who understand the evidences and proofs of his resurrection; a sense which perhaps has place at ii. 18,
 and which is supported and illustrated by a passage of Acts i. 3, παρίστηναι αὐτὸν ζῶντα, ἐν πο-λλοῖς τεκμηρίοις. As, however, there is something harsh in assigning the same meaning to ταῦτα in the next verse, the ταῦτα may be understood of the above evidences of the resurrection; and assuredly Christ's resurrection being proved, also evidenced him to be the Messiah, his resurrection being the attestation of God, who 'raised him up from the dead and gave him glory' (1 Pet. i. 21); see also Acts ii. 24. Rom.
 iv. 24. viii. 11. Since, however, no small harshness is incurred in taking σημεῖα of itself to mean proofs of his resurrection (without the addition of what would seem requisite to express such a sense, τῆς ἀναστάσεως αὐτοῦ), I am inclined to think that μὲν οὖν is a conclusion from all that has been said, and I would take the term σημεῖα
 to here mean evidences of his being the Christ.
 Nor is there any harshness in supposing so much sense included in so brief a mode of expression;
 since τοῦ Χριστοῦ εἶναι may very well be supplied from the context following.

XXI. The doubt raised as to the authenticity of this Chapter by Grotius, Le Clerc, and Heumann, has been fully shown by Lampe, Kuinoel, Tittman, and especially Weber in a Dissertation on the subject, — to be founded neither on internal evidence nor external authority.
 Allowing the Chapter to be (what the objectors say) an Appendix to the foregoing accounts, yet (as Tittman suggests) might not the Evangelist have had good reason to add something to his Gospel, as we know St. Paul did to certain of his Epistles, especially that to the Romans? As to the objection, that 'the circumstances recorded are not of sufficient consequence to have come from the Evangelist,' that has little or no force: indeed, it were presumptions to wit in judgment on the words of inspiration, which these must certainly be considered, since not the slightest external evidence has ever been adduced to invalidate their authenticity, they being found in all the MSS. As to certain peculiarities which are found, or rather supposed, to exist therein, we are to bear in mind that our Lord after his resurrection no longer held intercourse with his Disciples in the way he had done before his death, nor treated them with the same familiarity; nay, that he bore himself as one already withdrawn from human society, and soon to depart in order to enter upon 'that glory which he had with the Father before the world was.' His purpose in so doing was, probably, that they might thus be gradually weaned from his visible presence, and become accustomed to his invisible presence.

2. ἦσαν ὁμοῦ] i. e. temporarily, at the period in question. Ἄλλοι ἐκ τῶν μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ δύο. Whether these were Apostles, or of the number of the Seventy Disciples, or of Christ's followers in general, is quite uncertain.

3. ὑπάγω ἀλιεύειν.] 'I am going;' i. e. I mean to go. This use of the Present found here in ὑπ. and just after in ἐρχόμεθα, followed by an Infinitive of action, denoting intention of presently doing a thing, seems to be derived from the popular phraseology, though something like it is found in the later Classical writers; see Raphael on Matt. xvi. 28.

— ἐνέβησαν.] This (for the common reading ἀνέβ.) is found in the best MSS. and earliest Editions, and has been received by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz; rightly; for ἀναβαίνειν, in a context like the present, cannot be tolerated. The words of Mark vi. 51, may, indeed, be thought to defend it; but that passage is of a different kind.

— ἐπίασαν οὐδέν.] We may be allowed to suppose on the present occasion (as in the similar case recorded at Luke v. 5), that it was so ordered by Divine Providence, that nothing should be caught the night before, in order to make still more remarkable the miracle which should follow.

5. παιδία.] Παιδίων and τακνίων were terms of kindness or affability, used by elderly persons or superiors to those with whom they conversed. Προσφάγιον properly denotes what is eaten along with bread, as we say meat, though (like ὀφείριον) it was generally used, as here, of fish. From Chrysostom and Wetstein it appears that τὶ ἔχετε was a phrase employed by those who inquired of fishers or hunters what they had taken. So at Aristoph. Nub. 731, ἔχετε τι; the Scholiast remarks, Τῇ τῶν ἀγριωτῶν λέξει χρώμεται τοῖς γὰρ ἀλιεύουσιν ἢ ὀρεθισαγριωταῖς οὕτω φασίν· ἔχετε τι;

6. βάλετε εἰς τὰ δεξιὰ μέρη.] The suggestion, as they supposed, of one who had some knowledge of their art. (Euthymius and Lampe.) Εὐρήσετε is employed with an ellipsis common to hunters and fishers in all languages. Ἀπὸ ἐκ ὑπὸ, 'because of;' a sense usually considered Hebraic, but found also in the Classical writers, especially Thucydides.

7. ὁ Κύριός ἐστι.] They inferred this from the prodigious draught, and the remembrance of the similar one mentioned at Luke v. 1.

— ἐπενδύτην.] From the researches of Salmas., Lampe, and Fischer, this appears to mean, that upper linen tunic used by Greeks, Romans, and Jews, and called by the Romans supernus, corresponding to our coat, and worn between the inner tunic (the interna or subucula of the Romans, and the χιτωνίσκος or εὐπρόντις of the Greeks) and the surdut, upper garment, or cloak. It seems, from Euthymius, to have been a common fisherman's coat, consisting of a sort of full frock without sleeves, reaching only to the knees, and bound round the middle by a belt. The Article has here the force of the present possessive; and διεζώσατο has a significant prægnans, for put on and girded.

— γυμνός.] Not meaning absolutely so; but stripped, with nothing on but the under garment, καὶ ἔβαλεν ἑαυτὸν εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν. Οἱ δὲ ἄλλοι μαθηταὶ τῷ πλοκαρίῳ ἦλθον, (οὐ γὰρ ἦσαν μακρὰν ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς, ἀλλ' ὡς ἀπὸ πηχῶν διακοσίων) σύροντες τὸ δίκτυον τῶν ἰχθύων. Ὡς οὖν ἀπέβησαν εἰς τὴν γῆν, βλέπουσιν ἀνθρακιὰν κειμένην, καὶ ὄψαριον ἐπικείμενον, καὶ ἄρτον. Λέγει αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Ἐνέγκατε ἀπὸ τῶν ὄψαριων ὧν ἐπιάσατε νῦν. Ἀνέβη Σίμων Πέτρος, καὶ εἵλκυσε τὸ δίκτυον ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, μεστὸν ἰχθύων μεγάλων ἑκατὸν πεντηκοντατριῶν· καὶ τοσοῦτων ὄντων, οὐκ ἐσχίσθη τὸ δίκτυον.

Λέγει αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Δεῦτε ἀριστήσατε. οὐδεὶς δὲ ἐτόλμα τῶν μαθητῶν ἐξετάσαι αὐτόν· Σὺ τίς εἶ; εἰδότες ὅτι ὁ Κύριός ἐστιν. Ἐρχεται οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, καὶ λαμβάνει τὸν ἄρτον καὶ δίδωσιν αὐτοῖς, καὶ τὸ ὄψαριον ὁμοίως. Τοῦτο ἤδη τρίτον ἐφανερώθη ὁ Ἰησοῦς τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ, ἐγερθεὶς ἐκ νεκρῶν.

Ὅτε οὖν ἡρίστησαν, λέγει τῷ Σίμωνι Πέτρῳ ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Σίμων Ἰωάνᾳ, ἀγαπᾷς με πλείον τούτων; λέγει αὐτῷ· Ναί, banic. Peter, we may suppose, did not plunge into the sea, in order to swim ashore (for he could swim), but only in order to wade thither. In haste he would not stay to go as the other disciples did, who proceeded more leisurely by the skiff belonging to the skiff, at the same time mingling with them to the shore the net of fishes. [τὸ δίκτυον τῶν ἰχθύων.] Supply μεστὸν, which is expressed at ver. 11. This idiom, in use of capacity, is found in all languages, only, however, in the popular or colloquial vocabulary.

h. βλέπουσιν ἀνθρακιὰν κειμένην.] See Note on xviii. 18. This might, indeed, be accounted without supposing miraculous agency; but in the air of the passage it should rather seem as if the fire and food were not only provided by God, but provided miraculously, as the draught fishes had been a little before. Both of the meals being probably intended to teach them, symbolical actions, that their Lord could, and did, abundantly supply the temporal as well as spiritual necessities of his disciples.

— ὄψαριον.] Render, 'a fish'; not, as has been usually done, fish; for that use of the word, to denote plurality, is not found either in the Scriptural or Classical writers; whereas, in the sense of the word frequently occurs, especially in heaven and Ælian.

11. ἐσχίσθη.] Render, 'was rent.' 12. ἀριστήσατε.] It has been a point somewhat disputed, whether this should be interpreted dinner, or of breakfast. Most recent Commentators adopt the latter sense; while Campbell retains the former. And, indeed, if it could be shown that the ancients took (as he asserts) two meals for our three (breakfast, dinner, & supper), and that the latter corresponded to supper, he would be justified in so doing. As I have, I think, proved in my Note on Thucydides iv. 91, that, though, in earlier times, only one meal was taken—the ἀριστον and δεῖπνον—yet that afterwards, even as early as the time of Thucydides, there were three, the ἀκράτισμα, answering to our breakfast; the ἀριστον, to our lunch, or early dinner; and the δεῖπνον, to our later dinner, or supper. If, then, the same custom prevailed in Judæa, then ἀριστον will denote the second meal, call it by what name we may. If, however, the Jews (as is not improbable) retained the primitive custom of two meals a day, then ἀριστον will here mean, as it did in the time of Homer, breakfast, and denote (as its etymon would suggest) a far more substantial meal than the ἀκράτισμα, which seems to have meant merely a slight meal, caught up by those who could not wait till the ἀριστον, which was taken about an hour before noon.

14. τρίτον.] Meaning, the third time recorded in this Gospel; for it appears from Matt. xxviii. 16, seq. that he had appeared to them five times before. Or we may understand the third time of showing himself to his disciples collectively.

15. πλείον τούτων.] Some (as Whitby, Pearce, and Middleton) by τούτων understand 'these things,' namely, the nets, boats, and other implements of his trade; q. d. 'Dost thou prefer my service to these thy secular employments?' But to this somewhat jejune sense it has been well objected by Dr. Jortin, that Peter might love his Lord more than those, and yet not love him much. The true meaning seems rather to be (what the words in their obvious sense would suggest), 'Dost thou love me more than those do?' An interpretation which was adopted by all the ancient, as it has been by the most eminent modern Commentators, including Lampe, Campbell, Kuinoel, and Tittman. In this question our Lord may be supposed to have alluded to the profession of superior attachment to him, which Peter had made on a former occasion (Matt. xxvi. 33); 'though all men should be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended.'

It is observable that though our Lord asks the question thrice, yet the admonition which each time follows it up is not quite the same; for βέ-

Κύριε· σὺ οἶδας ὅτι φιλῶ σε. Λέγει αὐτῷ· Βόσκει τὰ ἀρνία μου. Ἔγει αὐτῷ πάλιν δεύτερον· Σίμων Ἰωνᾶ, ἀγαπᾷς 16
 με; λέγει αὐτῷ· Ναί, Κύριε· σὺ οἶδας ὅτι φιλῶ σε. Λέγει αὐτῷ· Ποίμαινε τὰ πρόβατά μου. Λέγει αὐτῷ τὸ τρίτον· 17
 Σίμων Ἰωνᾶ, φιλεῖς με; Ἐλυπήθη ὁ Πέτρος, ὅτι εἶπεν αὐτῷ τὸ τρίτον· Φιλεῖς με; καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Κύριε, σὺ πάντα οἶδας· σὺ γινώσκεις ὅτι φιλῶ σε. Λέγει αὐτῷ ὁ 18
 Ἰησοῦς· Βόσκει τὰ πρόβατά μου. Ἄμην ἄμην λέγω σοι· 18
 ὅτε ἥς νεώτερος, ἐξώνυνες σεαυτὸν, καὶ περιεπάτεις ὅπου ἤθελες· ὅταν δὲ γηράσῃς, ἐκτενεῖς τὰς χεῖράς σου, καὶ ἄλλος σε ζώσει, καὶ οἴσει ὅπου οὐ θέλεις. Τούτο δὲ εἶπε, σημαίνων 19
 ποίρῃ θανάτῳ δοξάσει τὸν Θεόν. καὶ τοῦτο εἰπὼν λέγει αὐτῷ· Ἀκολουθε μοι. Ἐπιστραφεὶς δὲ ὁ Πέτρος βλέπει τὸν 20

κειν signifies simply to feed, provide with pasture; ποιμαίνειν, both to feed and to tend; the former being especially applicable to the ἀρνία (or young, inexperienced professors); and the latter to the πρόβατα (or more advanced and mature professors). As Christ was the chief Shepherd (1 Pet. v. 4), so Peter and the other Apostles were to be shepherds. And the notion of tending necessarily carries with it that of guiding and governing. The admonition was thrice repeated, either, as Beza supposes, with reference to Peter's three denials, the disgrace of which it was just he should wipe away by a triple confession; or, in order that the importance of the injunction might thus be more strongly impressed on the mind of Peter and the other Apostles. So in Aristoph. Ran. 368, τοῦτοις αὐδῶ, καὺθις ἀπανδῶ, καὺθις τὸ τρίτον μάλ' ἀπανδῶ.

17. σὺ πάντα οἶδας.] A recognition of his omniscience (as supra xi. 23), and consequently of his Divinity; see Smith's Scrip. Test. vol. iii. 164. The feeling of chagrin (implied in the expression ἐλυπήθη) was one quite unmixed with any impatience of rebuke; being occasioned by the recollection of his late fall, and some distrust as to the strength of his future resolutions.

18. ἄμην ἄμην λέγω σοι, &c.] By these words (probably suggested by the circumstance of Peter's girding himself, after having changed his clothes, as we may suppose he did after having come on shore thoroughly wet) our Lord intended, it should seem, in a most impressive manner (with which comp. Acts xxi. 19) to signify to his disciple what he would have to undergo in his cause, as introductory to the final and solemn injunction to follow his example.

To advert to the particular import of the prediction, the words ἐξώνυνες σεαυτὸν, καὶ περιεπάτεις ὅπου ἤθελες are evidently a figurative mode of expressing the possession of youthful vigour, and perfect freedom of action. The next words ὅταν δὲ γηράσῃς—θῆλεις are by most Expositors, ancient and modern, supposed to allude to crucifixion; while several recent Commentators recognise a reference solely to the helplessness of age. But that view, besides yielding a sense very frigid, and by no means suitable to the occasion, is forbidden by the words οὐ θέλεις. Yet whether the words can fairly be thought to refer to the crucifixion itself, may be doubted; for though the expressions, ἐκτενεῖς τὰς χεῖράς σου, καὶ ἄλλος σε ζώσει, be correspondent thereto, since the person would have to stretch out his arms to be nailed to the cross bars; yet that is supposing him to be already there, and not require to be taken 'where he would not wish to go,' namely, to the place of execution. Hence Kuinoel and Tittman maintain that the words only predict that Peter should die a violent death. And indeed the words following, τοῦτο δὲ—Θεόν, cannot be proved to have reference to more than martyrdom, by whatever death. Yet they, and especially the subsequent admonition ἀκολουθε μοι, rather suggest the idea of death by crucifixion; and as the universal testimony of antiquity establishes it as a fact, that Peter suffered martyrdom by crucifixion, I am therefore inclined to think, with Casaubon, Scaliger, Lampe, Weinstein, and Ernesti, that there is a reference, not to actual crucifixion, but to the preparation for it, in which the criminal was compelled to put his neck into a furca, of the form Π, called patibulum; his hands being extended and bound to the transverse horns (to represent, by a figurative action, the punishment he was about to suffer); and after being thus carried, as it were in procession, to the place of execution, he was then actually crucified. As to the obscurity which this interpretation supposes to exist in the words, that is by no means greater than might be expected in a prediction not intended to be fully understood until after the event; when it would prove as great a support to the Apostle, as it must before that time have been a source of alarm and dismay.

From the question put by Peter at ver. 21, it is manifest that he understood his Lord's expressions, of a violent death by the executioner; but what kind of death he did not understand; and in his 2d Epistle, i. 14, though he speaks with uncertainty, yet he plainly alludes to a violent death. 19. δοξάσει τὸν Θεόν.] An expression designating martyrdom; on which see Tittman.

20. ἐπιστραφεὶς.] It seems that Peter, though he was aware of the figurative sense intended in ἀκολ., yet thought it safer to observe the direction in the literal one, and therefore follows his master. Then, turning about and seeing John also following, and thereby showing his comprehension of the meaning of Jesus, he feels a curiosity to know whether John, his friend and companion, would accompany him in death, and μαθητὴν, ὃν ἡγάπα ὁ Ἰησοῦς, ἀκολουθοῦντα, ὃς καὶ ἀνέπεσεν ἐν τῷ δειπνῷ ἐπὶ τὸ στῆθος αὐτοῦ, καὶ εἶπε· Κύριε, τίς ἐστὶν ὁ παραδιδούς σε; Τούτον ἰδὼν ὁ Πέτρος λέγει τῷ Ἰησοῦ· Κύριε, οὗτος δὲ τί; Λέγει αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰησοῦς· ^{1 Matt. 16. 28.} Ἐάν αὐτὸν θέλω μένειν ἕως ἔρχομαι, τί πρὸς σέ; σὺ ἀκολουθεῖ μοι. Ἐξῆλθεν οὖν ὁ λόγος οὗτος εἰς τοὺς ἀδελφούς, ὅτι ὁ μαθητὴς ἐκεῖνος οὐκ ἀποθνήσκει. Καὶ οὐκ εἶπεν αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰησοῦς, ὅτι οὐκ ἀποθνήσκει· ἀλλ' ἐὰν αὐτὸν θέλω μένειν ἕως ἔρχομαι, τί πρὸς σέ;

Οὗτος ἐστὶν ὁ μαθητὴς ὁ μαρτυρῶν περὶ τούτων, καὶ ^{2 Supra 19. 35.} γράψας ταῦτα· καὶ οἶδαμεν ὅτι ἀληθὴς ἐστὶν ἡ μαρτυρία αὐτοῦ. ^{3 Supra 20. 30.} Ἔστι δὲ καὶ ἄλλα πολλὰ ὅσα ἐποίησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, ὅ

before asks οὗτος δὲ τί (scil. ποιήσει); which I mean, 'What shall he do?' i. e. suffer; (for ὡ has often the sense of πάσχω) i. e. What will be his fate?

2. ἐὰν αὐτὸν θελω, &c.] Here, again, the se is obscure, for the very same reason as see, and consequently has led to a great variety of interpretations; all of them more or less specious. To ascertain their true import,—the po of the words, and their plain force, both separately and conjointly, must first be ascertained. Now it is evident that our Lord intended no rebuke to Peter for his curiosity on a subject which did not concern himself, and into which it was not proper for him to pry. And as πρὸς σὺ was (as appears from the Classical citations of Wetstein and Kypke) a frequent mode of repressing vain curiosity, the chief sense implied seems to be that assigned by Euthymius, 'Do thou mind thine own concerns.' As, never, τί πρὸς σὺ is accompanied by the words αὐτὸν θελω μένειν ἕως ἔρχομαι, something more is evidently meant, though somewhat obscurely expressed. And considering that the force of this kind of phrase is to put a negative on any action asked, and that the scope of Peter's query was, to know whether John too would suffer martyrdom, the words may justly be supposed to contain, together with a mild reproof for the query taken in putting such a question, an oblique intimation that he would not suffer martyrdom, but continue alive up to—what period?

3. ὁ μαθητὴς. But what are we to understand this coming? Certainly not (what many have supposed) his final coming to judge the world; but 'If I should choose for him not to die at present, what would that be to thee?' That would, I suppose, be making the expression more enigmatical than its wording will justify. The coming of Christ must rather denote the coming of Christ power to execute vengeance on the Jewish nation. That John lived up to, and far beyond, the completion of Christ's judgments on the Jewish nation, is well known. As, however, the apostle did not at that time know of this advent of our Lord, but only of the final one, it is no wonder that they should then have understood it the other, and consequently supposed that he did not die at all.

4. 25. Several eminent Critics and Commem-

tators, even those who receive all the rest of the Chapter, regard these verses as not from the Evangelist, but an addition from another hand,—probably John the Presbyter. This they are induced to suppose, partly from the change of person in οἶδαμεν, and partly by a fancied dissimilarity to the style in the preceding verse. But it is strange that they should not have seen that, if the rest of the Chapter be (as it certainly is) from the Evangelist, so must at least the clause οὗτος—γράφας ταῦτα; for this would be indispensable to form any conclusion; and that these verses (which Kuinoel calls a corollarium) were meant to do so is pretty clear. But if that clause be St. John's, so probably must the next, since it is strongly confirmed by an altogether kindred passage at xix. 35. Nor is there any such difficulty in the change of person at οἶδαμεν, as to be fatal to the authenticity of the clause; since it may be taken, not per enallagen, as many contend (for propriety would rather require οἶδα), but, as some eminent Critics maintain, communicative, i. e. to include the disciples and first Christians in general; q. d. 'It is known.' In short, from whom can this clause and the next verse have proceeded, if not from St. John? The Bishops of the Churches of Asia, say the first-mentioned Critics. But the Evangelist's assertion could not need the support of their testimony. Besides, the singular οἶμαι in the next verse (which cannot be taken for sine, because it is no where so used in the Scriptures,) forbids this notion. Are we, then, to consider v. 25 as an addition by some hand different from that of the preceding clause? Certainly not; for surely there would seem to be no need of any addition, at least not to the reader; though the writer might see the thing in a different view. Upon the whole, there is not, I think, the slightest reason for supposing that the verse came from any other than the Evangelist, who seems to have intended it as a supplement to what was said at xx. 30.

The words οὐδὲ αὐτὸν οἶμαι—βιβλία are an Oriental and hyperbolic mode of expression (to represent that the miracles, the remarkable actions and discourses of Jesus were exceedingly numerous); of which many examples are adduced by the Commentators from the Scriptural and the Classical writers. To which I have, in Rec. Syn., added others, from Eurip. Hipp. 1248.

χωρῆσαι τὰ γραφόμενα βιβλία. Ἀμήν.

Æschyl. Pers. 435. and Eurip. Menalipp. frag. 3, οὐδ' ἄπας ἂν οὐρανός, Διὶς γραφέντος τὰς βροτῶν ἀμαρτίας, ἱξαρκίσειεν.

At ver. 24 the τούτων has reference to the events of this Chapter, and the ταῦτα to those of the rest of the Gospel. At ἄλλα πολλά is plainly to be supplied ἃ οὐκ ἔστι γεγραμμένα ἐν τῷ βιβλίῳ τούτῳ. To these ἀγραφα allusions are occasionally found. Compare Matt. xi. Acts xx. 35. Numberless, however, as were the actions of our Lord which were left unrecorded, we have reason to acquiesce in the providence of Him who 'doeth all things well.' Every important purpose, in a work meant for the people at large rather than for the learned, is accomplished by the Gospels in their present state. Had they recorded all the words and actions of Christ, or even any considerable part, they would have been, as the Évangélist, perhaps, means to intimate, too voluminous for a manual adapted to ordinary use. Enough is recorded to direct our faith, and regulate our practice; more would have been superfluous, and in some respects (from the multitude of questions and unprofitable speculations to which they would have given rise) might have defeated the main purpose in view, the making men 'wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus.'

ΤΩΝ

ΑΓΙΩΝ ΑΠΟΣΤΟΛΩΝ.

I. ΤΟΝ μὲν πρῶτον λόγον ἐποιήσαμην περὶ πάντων, α Luke 1. 2.
 ὁ Θεόφιλε, ὃν ἤρξατο ὁ Ἰησοῦς ποιεῖν τε καὶ διδάσκειν,

A highly important book forms the grand connecting link between the Gospels and the Epistles, as a sort of appendix to the former, and introduction to the latter; and as it is highly illustrated by both, so is it indispensably necessary to a full understanding of both, and hence it is termed by Chrysostom an exceeding great treasure. That St. Luke was the author is plain from what is said at the commencement, and the similarity of its style as compared with of the Gospel. Inasmuch that some have asserted, not improbably, that the Gospel and Acts formed only two parts of one general work. Indeed, of the genuineness of the present we have the amplest proof in the testimonies of the earliest Christian Fathers; insofar that this has never been disputed. The first time it was published we are better enabled to ascertain than that of any other book in the New Testament. Considering that the history therein related is brought down to the second year of Paul's imprisonment, it could not have been written before A.D. 63; and as it makes no mention of St. Paul's death, it is most likely to have been written before that event. And learned men generally assign A.D. 63 as the time of its composition. Though, indeed, from the date of the present book depending upon the date of St. Luke's Gospel (on which see the Introduction), and of St. Paul's death, which is not thoroughly ascertained, the point admits of no determination. It is probable, however, that the latter end of A.D. 65, or the beginning of 66, is the true date; i. e. if St. Paul died, not in the persecution which arose suddenly after the great fire at Rome, in Oct. 64, but (as some think, on the testimony of Eusebius Rom.) about two years after. If, then, St. Paul perished in the persecution of autumn of A.D. 64, that will carry back the Acts, though probably not further than the latter part of 64.

The Canonical authority of this book is connected with that of the Gospel, on which see the Introduction, and that to St. Mark. To advert merely to the contents, which will be best appreciated by adverting to the purpose of the work: it is plain that St. Luke did not mean to write a regular history of the rise and progress of the Christian Church for thirty years after the Ascension, but merely intended, as Dr. Pye Smith expresses it (Script. Test. vol. iii. p. 5), 'to give a collection of most important particular memoirs referring to the commencement of the Christian dispensation; detailing some events in the history of the Churches at Jerusalem and Antioch, and occupying the latter half with many interesting transactions of St. Paul.'

Indeed the purpose of this book seems to have been two-fold; 1st, to give an authentic account of the communication of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and of the miraculous powers and supernatural gifts bestowed by the Spirit on the first preachers of the word and professors of the Gospel. Also, 2dly, to present such an authentic narrative of the early progress of the Gospel as should establish the full claim of the Gentiles to be admitted into the Church of Christ—a claim even yet disputed by the Jews. And, in a general way, to afford matter of confirmation to various accounts in the Gospel, and supply irrefragable evidence of the Divine origin of the Christian religion. Of the place where the work was written we have no certain information. It was probably Achaëa, where St. Luke seems to have chiefly resided after the year 58, and where Ecclesiastical tradition tells us that he died.

To advert to the book itself; we there find a manifest attention paid to chronological order; and some epochs being fixed by their combination with certain political events, there is little difficulty in determining the dates of almost all the events recorded in this book,—with the exception, however, of those which took place between the years 33 and 34, and between 44 and 60, on which, and the chronology of the book in general, see Bp. Marsh's Michaelis, vol. iii. P. i. p. 336—338, and especially Hug's Introduct. to the New Testament, vol. ii. p. 312—314.

The style of this book is neat and perspicuous, and differs not materially from that of the later Greek writers in the Alexandrian and the κοινή

διάλεκτος. As to the speeches of St. Peter and St. Paul, there is in them (as the learned Valcknaer says), if not the finish of composition found in the Greek orators, a simple dignity in the historical parts, and a grandeur in the didactic, to which it were impossible to add aught.

I. 1. τὸν μὲν πρῶτον λόγον, &c.] Very similar to this is the exordium to a Dissertation of Philo-Judaeus: 'Ὁ μὲν πρῶτος λόγος ἦν ἡμῖν. ὃ θεόδοτος, περὶ τοῦ, &c.'

Here we have that irregular use of μὲν, without a δέ in the apodosis, which is also found at Rom. i. 8. x. 1. 2 Cor. xii. 12. and sometimes in the Classical writers; ex. gr. Eurip. Orest. 8. Moreover, πρῶτον is used for πρότερον, a use frequent in the best writers. Λόγος, in the sense of narrative of words or actions, history, occurs frequently in the Classical writers, and in the New Test. at Acts v. 21. John iv. 39. Hence historians were anciently called λογιστοί; and λόγον ποιῆσαι signified to compose a history. B. πᾶντων must be understood all things necessary to be revealed; see John xx. 30. sq. xxi. 23. Certainly it must be taken with some limitation of sense, since St. Luke has, in his Gospel, omitted many discourses and transactions recorded by the other Evangelists. 'Ὁν is for ἂν, by a common idiom, usually referred to the principle of Attraction; ἤρξατο is supposed by the Commentators to be pleonastic, as in Mark vi. 7. Matt. xii. 1. and often elsewhere. But it is, properly speaking, never pleonastic. In several of those passages it signifies, 'took in hand'; and in others, including the present, it has an intensive force, intimating the great labour, difficulty, or importance of the work undertaken.

2. ἄχρι ἧς ἡμέρας—ἐξελέξατο.] Most of the later Commentators construe διὰ Πν. ἁγ. with ἐξελέξατο; while the ancient and earlier moderns take them with ἐντειλάμενος; perhaps rightly; this being agreeable to the natural construction. Διὰ Πν. ἁγ. signifies, 'by means of the Holy Spirit.' Here, as in some other passages, what our Lord taught and did is, with reference to his human nature, attributed to the Holy Spirit; see Smith's Scrip. Test. L. iv. ch. 1. 'Ἐντειλάμενος' need not be confined to any one direction, but may be extended to all the injunctions given to the Apostles for the right discharge of their office; see Matt. xxviii. 19. Mark xvi. 15-19.

3. παρίστημι, i. ἔ.] 'sese exhibit,' 'proved or evidenced himself to be alive.' A use of παρίστημι occurring also at xxiv. 13, and frequently in the Classical writers. Τεκμηρίον denotes 'clear and evident proofs.' 'Ὀπταίνου-νος, from ὀπταίνουμαι, cognate with ὀπτομαι, is a very rare word, scarcely found elsewhere, except in 1 Kings viii. 8. Tob. xii. 19. Δι' ἡμερῶν τεσσάρων, meaning, at intervals during that period, and on no less than eight different occasions; 1. to Mary Magdalene and the other Mary (Matt. xxviii. 1-9); 2. to the two disciples on their way to Emmaus (Luke xxiv. 13); 3. to Peter (Luke xxiv. 34); 4. to ten of the Apostles (Thomas being absent) (Luke xxiv. 36. John xi. 19. 24); 5. to the Eleven Apostles (John xi. 26); 6. to seven of the Apostles in Galilee, at the sea of Tiberias (John xxi. 4); 7. to James (1 Cor. xv. 7); 8. when the Apostles and Disciples were assembled together, and when he led them out as far as Bethany (Luke xxiv. 50); from whence he ascended to heaven, in the presence of above 300 brethren at once, 1 Cor. xv. 6.

4. συναλιζόμενος.] Some MSS. have συνελθόντες, which is preferred by several Critics, but without reason; since the authority for it is very slender, and it is evidently a gloss on the received reading, which is rather difficult, and therefore variously interpreted. The ancients, and earlier moderns, in general explain it 'conversans,' by a derivation from ἄλσ or ἄλσας; the later Commentators, conversans cum illis, 'during these communications with them'; deriving it from ἄλσας confertim, and supposing it a neuter sense. The former signification is a very unusual one, and here little suitable. The latter is greatly preferable, and is confirmed by many passages of the Classical writers adduced by the Commentators; ex. gr. Herodot. i. 62, οὗτοι μὲν ἐν συνελθόντες, and v. 15. The construction is: ἐλεγχόμενος σὺν αὐτοῖς, παρήγγειλεν (αὐτοῖς), μὴ χωρίζεσθαι we have another example of passive in a neuter sense.

—ἐπαγγελίαν τοῦ Πατρὸς] i. e. 'the promised gift of the Father,' the Holy Spirit; see 2. 3. Joel ii. 28. 'Ἐν ἡκούσατε,' which ye have lately heard of from me.' Sub. ἔκ or παρὰ; see John xiv. 26. xv. 26. xvi. 7. Luke xxiv. 49.

5. Βαπτισθῆ. suggests the abundance of the thing; q. d. 'ye shall be plentifully imbued with the influences of the Holy Spirit.'

6. et.] Some explain it by nam; others, by annon. The former may be considered the more accurate version. The idiom seems to have arisen from a blending of the oratio directa with the indirecta. According to the rules of regular composition, it would have been written ἐπαγγέ-λων εἰ ἀποκαθίσταται, ὅτι ἀποκαθίσταται,

— ἔθετο ἐν τῇ ἰδίᾳ ἐξουσίᾳ.] This has been explained by most Commentators since the time of Kypke, 'hath appointed' (i. e. determined),
 'suo arbitrio.' But there appears no sufficient reason to depart from the interpretation before adopted, 'hath put in his own power'; a popular form of expression, it should seem, for 'placed at,' or 'reserved in,' his own disposal. Not, indeed, as implying that Christ was ignorant of them, but that they were secrets reposed with the Father, which the Son was not authorized to disclose.

8. δύναμιν.] Meaning, the miraculous gifts of the Spirit; for (as Whitby truly observes) δύναμεις in the New Test., when it relates to God the Father, Christ, or the Holy Ghost, always imports some miraculous or extraordinary power; compare Luke xxiv. 49. Ἐπελθ. τοῦ ἁγ. Πνεύ-μα. Many take this with δύναμιν, as in regimen with it.
 But whether that be permitted by propriety of language may be doubted; and it is forbidden by τοῦ ἁγ. Πνεύματος being here plainly used, not in the personal sense, but to denote the influence of the Spirit, as in Luke i. 35. The expression ἕως ἐσχάτου (scil. μέρους) τῆς γῆς was probably understood by the Disciples of that part of the East only, namely Syria. But our Lord, doubtless, meant it of the whole world (see Ps. xix. 5.
 Is. xlix. 6, and comp. Matt. xxviii. 19), intimating the order of its propagation, agreeably to his Father's promise, Ps. ii. 8, of giving Him the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession.

9. καὶ νεφέλη ὑπέλαβεν] 'and [then] a cloud received him.' In ὑπέλ. there is a *significatio stein), τὸν δὲ δελφῖνα λίγουσι ὑπολαβόντα

10. ἀτενίζοντες ἦσαν] 'were fixedly gazing at directs, with πορευομένου, but with αἱ τὸν οὐρανόν, as is plain from the other passages of the New Test. where the word occurs.

— παρεστήκεισαν.] The full sense is, 'came naturally; comp. Matt. xxviii. 3.

inherent in ἰστηκίμαι, but which is usually expressed by something further added, as in a similar passage of Aristoph. cited by Valcknaer, τί πάσχει, ἄνδρες; ἵστατ' ἐκπεπληγμένοι.

11. οὕτως ἐλεύσεται.] Namely, visibly and out of the clouds; see Dan. vii. 13, and comp. Matt. xxiv. 30.

12. σαββάτου ἔχον ὁδόν.] Ἐχον, for ἀνέχον, as in a passage of Arrian Periplos, p. 171 (cited by Kuinoel), where two emporia are said to be from a certain town, ἔχοντα ὁδὸν ἡμερῶν εἴκοσι. A sabbath day's journey (as determined, not by the Mosaic law, but by the Jewish masters, from a calculation of the greatest distance of any part of the camp of Israel from the tabernacle) was 2000 cubits, about $7\frac{1}{2}$ stadia.

13. τὸ ὑπερίον.] This word is not a compound, but a simple; and is properly an adjective in a contracted form for ὑπερίονιον, which occurs in Hom. II. B. 214, and often in the Odyssey; a word formed from ὑπέρ, as πατρώος from πατήρ.

Commentators are not agreed whether by this we are to understand an upper room in a private house, or an upper apartment of the Temple. But besides that no one reason exists for this latter view, and many against that opinion, it is at once forbidden by the words immediately following, οὐ ἦσαν καταμένοντες, which tend to confirm the generally received view, that it was a large upper apartment of some private house, which served as a common lodging or oratory, &c., for all which purposes upper rooms in the Eastern countries have always been (from their greater retirement, and usually capaciousness) preferred.

14. προσκαρτ. ὁμοθ. τῇ προσ.] Προσκαρτερεῖν is used with a Dative, both of person, in the sense to wait upon any one, and, as here, of thing, to attend closely to it; a signification found both in the Scriptural and the Classical writers. Ὁμοθυμαδὸν is well explained by Suidas and Hesych. ὁμοψύχως. Render, 'with one heart and soul.' Δίημις signifies supplicatory and earnest prayer. So Heb. v. 7, it is united with ἱκετηρία, and at Eph. vi. 18, with προσκαρτερησις. Also at Phil. iv. 6, we have τῇ προσυχῇ καὶ τῇ δεήσει, and at 1 Tim. v. 5, ταῖς δεήσεσι καὶ ταῖς προσευχαῖς.

— σὺν γυναιξί.] Render, not (with some) 'their wives,' but 'the women;' many of whom, however, were the wives of the Apostles or disciples, and the rest consisted of those who had followed Christ out of Galilee, and ministered to him of their substance.

15. ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ταύταις.] Namely, one of the ten days intervening between the Ascension and the feast of Pentecost.

— ἦν τε ὄχλος—εἴκοσιν.] Ὀνομ., persons, as in Rev. iii. 4, and often in the Classical writers. By ὄχλος, &c. is only meant the number then present; the disciples at large being far more numerous; about 600, as we have reason to think.

16. In this address Peter proposes to the disciples the choosing of another Apostle, in the room of the traitor Judas, to complete the original number. He reminds them that the words, not so much of David, as of the Holy Spirit speaking by David, had been fulfilled. Of which fulfilment he adduces Ps. lxix. 25, and cix. 8, as examples; probably having in mind also Ps. xli. 9, and Is. 12; and intimates, that as Scripture has been fulfilled in the one case, so it now remained to be fulfilled in the other, by the business for which they were then assembled. The terms εὐαγγ. and προεῖπε περὶ will not permit us to suppose, with many recent Commentators, that what is said by David of his treacherous companion is here, on account of the coincidence of the case, applied, by accommodation, to Judas; but we must suppose, that what was prophesied by the Holy Spirit was meant primarily of David's enemies and treacherous companions; but, secondarily and typically, of Christ's enemies and treacherous friends. See Doddridge. The citations are quoted substantially agree with the Hebrew and Septuagint, except that the plural is changed to the singular, because it is applied to Judas only. The above principle of accommodation might, if dred, be admitted, if we could, with some recent Commentators, construe κληρωθῆναι with περὶ Ἰούδα. But that is forbidden by propriety; since περὶ 'I. plainly belongs to προσῆς, not to κληρ., and the term κληρ. is never used with περὶ to mean 'in the case of,' but with ἐκ. The first of the two passages presents a lively figure of utter destruction.

17. σὺν ἡμῖν.] For σὺν, very many MSS., chiefly ancient, and some Fathers, have ἐν, which has been edited by Griesbach and Scholz. I have, however, followed Matthæi and Vater, in retaining the common reading.

— ἔλαχε τὸν κλ.] Δαχαίνει signifies properly 'to receive by lot, have allotted to one.' The κληρὸν is not (as some have considered it) redundant, but denotes appointment. The meaning being, 'the appointment belonging to this ministry' or office. Here, it is plain, there is nothing to sanction popular election of ministers, still less the deciding on questions of religion by lot. See Grotius.

18. The best Expositors are agreed that this and the next verse are parenthetical, and to be regarded as the words, not of Peter, but of Luke; who thus introduces some circumstances respecting this treachery; namely, what use Judas made of the wages of iniquity, and what was his fate. The obscurity of which the Commentators complain has been chiefly occasioned by the sense at v. 17 being not sufficiently developed. If the Apostle had subjoined the words ἐξ ἧς παρίβη, πορευθῆναι εἰς τὸν ἴδιον τόπον, which he does afterwards at v. 25, all would have been plain. It is evident that he had them in his mind.

— ἐκτήσατο] i. e. 'was the means of its being purchased,'—namely, by the chief priests. For the best Commentators are agreed that this is to be referred to that idiom of Scripture, by which an action is sometimes said to be done by a person, who was only the occasion of its being done. Comp. Gen. xlii. 38. Exod. xxiii. 8. 1 Kings xiv. 16. Jerem. xxviii. 23. Rom. xiv. 15. 1 Cor. vii. 16. 1 Tim. iv. 16. If this be thought too harsh, the expression may be considered as a figurative construction, by which Judas might be said to have bought the field with the wages of iniquity, by receiving such wages as would have bought the field. So Achmet Oneirocrit.: 'Si quis viderit, quod invenit vel emerit plurimas oves lac præbentes, inveniet opes et gaudium et servos pro pecuniarum ovium numero.' And so 2 Kings v. 26, 'Was this a time to receive money and garments,' and olive-gardens and vineyards, and sheep and oxen, and men-servants and maid-servants?'

— μισθοῦ τῆς ἀδικίας.] We have here a Genitive of cause, to signify, 'obtained by iniquity.' Comp. 2 Pet. ii. 15.

— πρηνὲς γενόμενος ἐλάκησε, &c.] Here πρηνὲς γ. signifies 'tumbling headlong.' 'Ἐλάκησε' is for διεσπάρη, as in Aristoph. Nub. 409; the term λακίς being synonymous with σφοδρῶς, crepe, to crack. With the expression ἐλάκησε μέσος may be compared that of Plaut. Cure. ii. i. 7, 'Hoc metuo, ne medius disrumpar.' Similar to the present is a passage of Joseph. Bell. vi. l. 6, καὶ παταίσας πρὸς τινα πέτρων πρηνὲς ἐπ' αὐτῆς (read from the best MSS. αὐτὴν) μετὰ μεγίστου φόβου κατέπεσεν.

— ἐξεχύθη πάντα τὰ σπλάγχνα.] So 2 Sam. xx. 10, ἐξεχύθη ἡ κοιλία αὐτοῦ. Ælian, Anim. iv. 52, ἥδη δὲ καὶ ἵππων πλευραὶ ἐμπαύοντες διέσχισαν, καὶ τὰ σπλάγχνα ἐξέχυναν. Cholin, fol. 56. 2, 'Armenus quidam vidit hominem qui de tecto in plateam decidit, et viscera ejus effluerunt.'

On the seeming discrepancy between the account of Judas's manner of death here, and that at Matt. xxvii. 5, ἀπελθὼν ἀπήγγεστο, see the Note there.

20. Of the two clauses of this verse, the first is taken from Ps. lxi. 26, but with a slight alteration of the wording, so as to accommodate it to the case of Judas. In either case it is a highly figurative mode of expressing utter destruction; since that any one's house should become a perpetually deserted abode, is a very lively image of utter ruin. Ἐπαυλις (corresponding to the Heb. תרע) denoted originally a shepherd's hut, but afterwards came to denote a habitation generally. So Apoll. Rhod. Arg. i. 800. (cited by Valcknaer) Δήμου—πύρθεσκον ἱπαυλεις.

The latter clause is taken from Ps. cix. 8, where ἐπισκοπὴ denotes the superintendence of anything done, a charge, or office; with allusion to that of Apostleship, formerly held by Judas.

21. The Apostle now proceeds to declare more expressly what steps they should take in the matter.

— τῶν συναλθόντων.] Supply ἐκ. Render, 'of those who have associated with us, formed part of the same society.' In εἰσῆλθε καὶ ἐξῆλθε we have an idiom formed on the Heb. שמעו וצאו and equivalent to cessavit est. An elliptical mode of speech, which, expressed in full, would stand thus: ἐν ᾧ εἰσῆλθε ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, καὶ ἐξῆλθεν ἀφ' ἡμῶν. Comp. Eurip. Phœn. 543. Moreover, ἕνα τούτων is to be referred to τῶν συνελθόντων, &c. at v. 21; by a sort of hyperbaton not unusual in the Classical writers; as Herodot. iii. 18.

At ver. 22, with ἀρξάμενος ἀπὸ τοῦ βαπτ., &c., I would compare Philostr. Vit. Apoll. i. 24, οἱ δὲ λοιποὶ, ἀπὸ Ἰωνίας καὶ Λυδίας ἀρξάμενοι, διεφθάρσαν.

23. ἔστησαν] 'adstare jusscrunt,' set up, proposed.

24. καρδιογνώστα πάντων] 'searcher of all hearts.' It has been doubted whether this should be referred to God the Father, or God the Son. Certainly the appellation is not unfrequent in the Old Test., Josephus, and Philo, as applied to the former. But that it is equally applicable to the latter, appears from John xvi. 30, where see Note. See also John i. 48—50. ii. 24. vi. 69. xxi. 17. Apoc. ii. 23. Κύριος is an usual appellation of Christ our Saviour; and besides that the reference in question is confirmed by the connexion with ver. 21, there would be a peculiar propriety in addressing this prayer to him, as being the Head of the Church, and he who originally appointed the other Apostles.

—ἀνάδειξον] 'declare.' It is well observed by Chrysostom, 'that they do not say ἐκλεξαί, but ἀνάδειξον τὸν ἐκλεγέντα, because every thing has been known and determined by God long before it has even entered into the thoughts of men.' Similarly it is said, Joseph. Ant. vi. 5. 6, (cited by Wetstein) ἐγὼ μὲν ἀπέδειξα τοῦτον, ὃν αὐτὸς (ὁ Θεὸς) ἐξελέξατο.

For the common reading, ἐκ τούτων τῶν δύο ἕνα ὃν ἐξελέξω, nearly all the MSS., Versions, and the Editions up to that of R. Stephens, have ὃν ἐξελέξω—ἕνα, which has been received by every Editor from Bengel to Scholz.

25. τὸν κλῆρον τῆς διακονίας τ. καὶ ἀποστ.] 'the appointment to this ministry.' This is exegetical of τῆς διακονίας just before. Παρέβη, 'abandoned, deserted'; by a metaphor taken from a traveller who deserts the right road. Comp. 2 Pet. ii. 15. A very rare use of the word, but of which I have noted one example elsewhere;

namely, Joseph. Ant. xiv. 9. 2, οὐδὲν πρὸς τ. εὐνοίας καὶ πίστιως παρέβη.

—πορευθῆναι εἰς τὸν τόπον τ. 12.] These words have been variously explained; but the common interpretation (by which τὸν τόπον τὸν ἴδιον is taken to mean the place suited to him—namely, the place of destination) may be considered the true one, as being recommended by its simplicity and its suitability to the usage both of the Jewish and Heathen writers, and confirmed by several passages of the Apostolical Fathers. The following examples will suffice. Basil Trism on Numb. xxiv. 25. 'Balaam ivit in locum suum,' i. e. Gehenna. Max. Tyr. Diss. 23, where it is said that, upon the dissolution of the body, the soul is called to its own place, ἐπὶ τὸν αἰῶνα τόνον.

26. ἔδωκαν κλήρους.] The exact mode in which they cast the lots cannot be determined; various being the methods by which the ancients practised the sortilegium. They used to cast slips of parchment, or pieces of the tabula aræphica, with the names inscribed, into an urn. And this kind of sortitio most Commentators here understand. Now the lots are said to be thrown on whom the lots are cast, and to fall upon him who comes off successful in the sortitio. Συγκαταψηφίζω properly denotes 'to choose by common suffrages,' and then 'to number with or unto,' συγκταριθμεῖν. This deciding of a doubtful matter by casting lots was understood to be a mode of attaining to the will of the Almighty; and was, therefore, from the earliest times, resorted to, in the creation of kings, or the appointment of priests. See the numerous Classical citations in Lexicon. Synop., and compare Levit. xvi. 8. Numb. xxi. 34. Josh. xiii. 6.

II. 1. συμπληροῦσθαι.] See Note on Luke ix. 51. At Πεντηκοστῆς the Commentators suppose an ellipsis of ἡμέρας or ἡμερῶν. But there is perhaps no ellipse at all; Πεντηκ. being a substantive and an appellative. On this point see Horne's Introd.

—ἦσαν ἅπαντες.] Meaning, according to some, the Apostles only; or rather, we may suppose, with others, the disciples at large, mentioned

ἐγένετο ἄφνω ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἦχος, ὥσπερ φερομένης πνοῆς βιαίας, καὶ ἐπλήρωσεν ὅλον τὸν οἶκον οὗ ἦσαν καθήμενοι.
3 Καὶ ὤφθησαν αὐτοῖς διαμεριζόμεναι γλώσσαι ὡσεὶ πυρός, c Matt. 2. 11.
4 ἐκάθισέ τε ἐφ' ἑνα ἕκαστον αὐτῶν. d Supra 1. 6. Καὶ ἐπλήσθησαν ἅπαντες Πνεύματος ἁγίου, καὶ ἤρξαντο λαλεῖν ἐτέραις γλώσ-5 σαις, καθὼς τὸ Πνεῦμα ἐδίδου αὐτοῖς ἀποφθέγγεσθαι. infra 10. 6. Ἦσαν ἤκουον εἰς ἕκαστος τῇ ἰδίᾳ διαλέκτῳ λαλούντων αὐτῶν. Mark 10. 17.

1 Cor. 12. 10.

u. l. 15. For (as Kuinoel observes) the subject u. l. 15 is the assembly of the 120 disciples whom Peter addressed, and from whom Matthias was taken into the Apostolic body; while the eleven Apostles are only mentioned en passant. Now with the predicatio, which is destitute of a subject, the subject immediately antecedent, and not that of which mention was made en passant, but primarily, ought to be taken. This, too, is clear from ἅπαντες, not οὗτοι, being used. Indeed, the absence of the rest of the disciples on so solemn a festival cannot be supposed.

2. ὥσπερ φερομ. πνοῆς β.] This use of φίεσθαι and its compounds, to denote the rushing of winds sweeping along like a tempest, and associated with the adjectives πολλός, βίαιος, and others of similar signification, is frequent in the Classical writers. So Ælian, Hist. An. vii. 24. ἰσίδαν τὸ πνεῦμα βίαιον ἐκφέρηται.

— τὸν οἶκον.] Doubtless the ὑπερφόν, supra, 13, where see Note.

3. διαμεριζόμεναι.] Not, divided (which sense would require διασχιζόμεναι), but dispertitæ, divided out to each from one common source.

— γλώσσαι πυρός] i. e. pointed flames; the tip of a flame of fire being called a tongue, from its resemblance thereto. Thus in the form of the flame there was a peculiar adaptation to the thing signified.

— ἐκάθισέ τε ἐφ' ἑνα ἕκαστον α.] At ἐκάθισ some would supply Πνεῦμα, taken from Πνεύματος. Kuinoel, however, with reason, objects that the phrase Πνεῦμα ἁγ. ἐκάθισ is unexampled. He might have added, that Πνεῦμα cannot be taken from Πνεύματος afterwards, because that is not in the same sentence; for, notwithstanding what some think, a new one commences at καὶ ἐπλήσθη. Besides, there Πν. signifies only the influence of the Spirit, not the Spirit personally. As to the true ellipse, Falkner alone has seen that ἐκάθισ (scil. ἐκάστη τῶν γλωσσῶν) ἐφ' ἑνα ἕκαστον αὐτῶν. Thus the sense is: 'And there were seen as it were tongues of fire, distributing themselves, and settling upon them, i. e. one on each.'

These appearances were symbolical; representing emblematically, 1. the power and purifying effects of the Holy Spirit (see Matt. iii. 11); 2. and chiefly the gift of tongues, the first-fruits of the Spirit.

4. ἤρξαντο λαλεῖν ἐτέραις γλώσσαις.] Mon-

ing, languages other than those which they were acquainted with; i. e. such as they were ignorant of, and which are specified at ver. 8—11.

— ἰδίδου α. ἀποφθέγγεσθαι] 'gave them power to speak out,' 'show forth.' Ἀποφθέγγεσθαι being used both of deep and sententious, and also of divinely inspired and prophetic language. So Jambl. de Myst. iii. 17, (cited by Elsner) ἰνίστα τῶν ἐνθικῶν τινα ἀνθρώπων ποιῶν (ὁ Θεὸς) μὲτὰ σοφίας λόγον ἀποφθέγγεσθαι. Plutarch, de Pythiæ Orac., p. 405, (speaking of the Delphic priestesses) πρῶτον μὲν ὥσπερ εἰρηται, τὰ πλείστα κἀκίμαι καταλογάζον ἀπεφθέγγοντο, and p. 268, ἀποφθέγγεσθαι λόγια καὶ χρησμοφθεῖν τοῖς ἰεροτάσιν. And Philo de Joseph., p. 543, relates that, on his having interpreted dreams to Pharaoh, the king said to him, οὐ γὰρ ἀνεν Θεοῦ ταῦτ' ἀποφθέγγεσθαι μοι δοκεῖτε.

5. ἄνθρωποι εὐλαβεῖς] 'religious men'; εὐλαβῆς being here (as also at Luke ii. 25, and infra x. 2,) synonymous with εὐσεβῆς, though the two words properly differ in sense; εὐσεβῆς (as Tittman shows) signifying that reverence of God which is exerted in actions, and especially in acts of worship; while εὐλαβῆς points at the mind itself, and denotes one who is fearful of offending God in word or deed. Hence εὐλαβῆς answers to the German Gottesfürchtig, and our God-fearing; εὐσεβῆς, to our pious, or devout.

These, consisting of foreign Jews and a few proselytes, had taken up their temporary residence at Jerusalem, for the purpose of those greater facilities for religious duties which the place afforded, and because the advent of the Messiah was then expected.

— ἀπὸ παντὸς ἔθνους τ. ὑ. τ. ο.] This is a general, not an universal proposition; and consequently to be taken with limitation, as merely denoting the various parts of the world. Of this hyperbolic use of πᾶς several examples have been adduced by Bp. Pearce. The expression ὑπὸ τὸν οὐρανόν has been supposed entirely Hebraic; but the same idiom is shown by Kyprios to occur sometimes in Plato.

6. τῆς φωνῆς ταύτης.] What particular voice is here meant, has been variously disputed. Some, most improbably, refer it to the ἦχος at ver. 2; while others regard φωνῆς as put for φήμη, by a use occasionally found in the Sept.; thus supposing ταύτην to stand for περὶ τούτου. Since, however, φωνῆ used for φήμη nowhere else occurs in the New Test., we may best understand φωνῆς of the noise produced by the assembled multitude praying or conversing together (v. 2), and doubtless in a state of considerable agitation.

6. συνεχύθη] 'were thrown into great agitation.' So Achill. Tat., p. 321, (cited by Wetst.) ὡς οὖν ταῦτα ἡκούσαμεν, συνεχύθη.

This was their first feeling. Their second was amazement; ἐξίσταντο καὶ ἰθαύμαζον.

— διαλέκτῳ.] Not dialect, but language: in which sense the word is always used in the New Test. and Josephus, and frequently in the Classical writers.

7. πάντες.] This (not found in many MSS.) has been cancelled by Matthæi and Scholz, but retained, within brackets, by Griesbach and Vater.

— Γαλιλαῖοι.] The sense is: 'They were amazed at seeing persons nearly all of one country, and that a rustic and illiterate one, all speaking foreign languages, and addressing each of them in his own tongue.'

8. ἐν ᾧ ἐγεννήθημεν.] This seems to be a popular phrase for τῇ ἰγγυνεῖ, native. In the words following supply ὅντες. Render, 'We, I say, who are Parthians, Medes, &c. At ἀκούομεν there is a repetition, in order to clear the sense long suspended by the interposed portion at ver. 9, 10.

9. Ἰουδαίαν.] What this name can here have to do in a list, of which the air is one of foreign nations, it is not easy to see. And as to what has been urged by some in its defence, it proceeds on the supposition that the language of Judæa was a different one from that of Galilee: whereas there is great reason to think that the latter differed from the former only as the English of Middlesex differs from that of Somersetshire, or the Italian of Tuscany from that of Venice or Genoa. Upon the whole, it is plain that Ἰουδαίαν cannot be accounted for in any satisfactory way, and must (as it has been by the most eminent Critics) be regarded as corrupt; though probably to be emended from some hitherto uncollated MSS. In the mean time I have little doubt but that the true reading is, according to the conjecture of Barthius (which had also occurred to myself), Ἰδουμαίαν,—a very similar word to the common reading; for Δ and Μ are perpetually confounded; and part of the Μ being faded off, would leave a Α; and the abbreviation for δὲν [δ] is very similar to en. In fact, the words Ἰουδαίαν and Ἰδου-

μαίαν are often confounded, especially in the MSS. of Josephus. By Idumæa we may understand that tract of country situated on the other side of Jordan, and South-east of Judæa, which was sometimes called Arabia Petrea; and so the word is sometimes used in Josephus. And we know that Damascus was now in possession of Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea. There is, indeed, the greatest reason to think that the territory subject to him also extended to that part of Arabia which was N. E. from Judæa, and would thus be almost continuous with Mesopotamia. And it is plain that the countries are mentioned in geographical order, from East to West.

10. κατὰ Κυρήνην.] Render, 'near to Cyrene,' as infra xvi. 7. xxvii. 2, and sometimes in the Classical writers, though πρὸς and περί are more usual; ex. gr. Joseph. Ant. xvi. 6. 1, τοῖς κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν Ἰουδαίοις, καὶ ὅσους ἢ πρὸς Κυρήνην Λιβύην κατίσχειν. Dio Cass., p. 574. 33, and 704. 82, τὴν Λιβύην τὴν περὶ Κυρήνην.

At ἐπιδημοῦντες supply ᾤδον, i. e. at Jerusalem. So Athen., p. 361, (cited by Wetstein) at Ῥώμην κατοικοῦντες, καὶ οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες τῇ πόλει. Accordingly, by οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες Ῥωμαῖοι are to be understood Romans, whether of Jewish birth or proselytes, (i. e. such as had either been made citizens of Rome, or Roman proselytes to Judaism) who were sojourning at Jerusalem. So Ἀντιοχεῖς is used in Josephus for Jews dwelling at Antioch.

11. τὰ μεγαλεῖα.] See Note on Luke i. 49.

12. διηπόρουν.] The full sense is, 'were utterly at a loss.' By πάντες are meant the persons just mentioned, namely, the foreigners and foreign Jews, to whom are, in the next verse, opposed the ἑτέροι, meaning those of Judæa.

— λέγοντες.] Supply times. Τί δὲ οὗτω τοῦτο εἶναι; is a popular idiom, denoting, 'What should this mean?' i. e. How has it arisen? Ἦν εἴλετο and βούλεσθαι often signify no more than our English would or should. So Herodot. i. 78, (cited by Wetstein) τί εἶδοι σαρματῶν ἐπ' ἑτέρας;

13. χλευάζοντες] 'mocking, or jeering.' The word is best derived from χέλειν, synonymus with χαίλει, the lip, and signifies to 'thrust out the lip.' Comp. Ps. xxii. 7.

Instead of χλευάζειν, a few ancient MSS. and some Fathers have διαχλ., which is modified by Σταθεὶς δὲ Πέτρος σὺν τοῖς ἑνδεκα, ἐπῆρε τὴν φωνὴν αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀπεφθέγγετο αὐτοῖς· Ἄνδρες Ἰουδαῖοι καὶ οἱ κατοικοῦντες Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἅπαντες, τοῦτο ὑμῖν γνωστὸν ἔστω, καὶ ἐνωτίσασθε τὰ ῥήματά μου. Ὁὐ γὰρ, ὡς ὑμεῖς ^{1 Thes. 5.} ὑπολαμβάνετε, οὗτοι μεθύουσιν· ἔστι γὰρ ὥρα τρίτῃ τῆς ἡμέρας· ἀλλὰ τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ εἰρημένον διὰ τοῦ προφήτου ^{Joel 2. 28. L. 34 2. John 7. 38.} Ἰησῆ. Καὶ ἔσται ἐν ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις [λέγει ὁ Θεὸς], ἐκχεῶ ἀπὸ τοῦ πνευματος μου ἐπὶ πᾶσαν σάρκα· καὶ προφητεύσουσιν οἱ υἱοὶ ὑμῶν καὶ αἱ not every Editor from Griesbach downwards, without sufficient reason; for the external sense in favour of the new reading is weak, and internal evidence not strong. Simple verbs not unfrequently changed into compounds, to communicate a stronger sense, or for greater elegance. And γλευσάω occurs more than once where in this book, and often in the LXX; (λ. nowhere, either in the New Test. or the K.

- γλεύκου.) Not, new-made wine (which is proper signification of the word), for that is hidden by the time of year; but new, i. e. a wine, which is very intoxicating. See Is. 26. And so γλεύκος occurs in Job xxxii. and sometimes in the Classical writers. his was, Markland thinks, intended as a sneer the meanness of their condition; since no man of respectability tapped the last year's stock so early as June, unless compelled by want. Yet new wine (notwithstanding what Luke v. 39) might be preferred by some one, on account of its intoxicating qualities. Hedyllus ap. Athenæum, p. 176, ἡδύαι δὲ ἕκαστοι μεμβυσμένα παύγια μουσῶν; we know from Plut., Columella, and Pliny, also Hor. Sat. iv. 2. 19.) that some sorts (probably from a peculiarity in the making), if kept in a cool place, retained their sweetness for a long time, and hence were called δει δυν.

Σ. σὺν τοῖς ἑνδ.] Namely, to show their concurrence in what Peter should say, was to be the speaker.

- Ἄνδρες Ἰουδαῖοι, &c.] From this ver. to 17 we have the address of Peter, which produced such an effect on the minds both of those who wondered and those who derided, that 3000 men were then added to the Church of Christ. Some have maintained that only the substance of the address is recorded, and that many things omitted, which were said by the Apostle. The former position may be true; but the latter is not then can safely be affirmed. At least an ancient writer cannot be supposed to omit any thing necessary to be recorded. Ἐνωτίσασθε, 'give into your ears;' and, by implication, 'listen attentively to;' an Alexandrian word occurring in the LXX. and the later Greek text, and probably derived from the common root.

ὑπολαμβάνετε] lit. 'sup-ponite,' 'take up (thought).'

- ὥρα τρίτῃ.] Before which time none but these characters took strong drink: indeed no persons who made profession of religion took food or drink of any kind until after morning prayers.

16. τοῦτό ἐστι.] Meaning, 'this [state of things] is [a fulfilment of] what was predicted,' &c.

17—21. These verses are a citation from Joel ii. 28—32 (in the Hebrew, iii. 1—5), but with some slight variation both from the Hebrew and the Sept. The chief difference is in ἐν ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις being used for μετὰ ταῦτα. The words λέγει ὁ Θεὸς form no part of the quotation, but are an insertion by the Evangelist, to indicate the person who says this. The two last clauses of ver. 17 are merely interchanged in their order. At ver. 18, γὰρ is inserted, which strengthens the sense; καὶ γὰρ signifying quoniam. The words καὶ προφητεύσουσι are added (from the preceding context) by way of explanation. Finally, at ver. 19, the words ἀνω and κάτω are supplied to strengthen the sense; especially as they are often found joined to ἐν οὐρανῷ and ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς in the Old Test. See Exod. xx. 4. Josh. ii. 11. The passage contains (as the Jewish Interpreters themselves admit) a highly figurative description of the state of things which shall precede and accompany the coming of the Messiah; namely, by an extraordinary outpouring of the Spirit. But Peter himself did not then understand the full sense of the prophecy, as regarded 'all flesh,' i. e. men of all nations, both Jews and Gentiles. πᾶσα, rendered by the LXX. μετὰ ταῦτα, is admitted by Kimchi to be equivalent to the Hebrew words which correspond to ἐν ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις in other passages of the LXX.; and the phrase is universally granted by the Jewish Commentators to denote the times of the Messiah, under which the closing scheme of Divine revelation would be promulgated. Ἀπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος is said to be for πνεῦμα, as in the Hebrew. But it rather seems to be a slight alteration adapted to the sense rather than the words, i. e. (by an ellipsis of μέρου) a portion of my Spirit. What kind of spiritual effects are meant, is clear from the following verses. Ἐκχεῶ is, like the correspondent terms in Greek and Latin, used to suggest the effusion of the gifts imparted. The expression πᾶσαν σάρκα, 'all persons,' seems to denote some of all orders and ranks, and (in a secondary sense) of all nations.

17. προφητ.] This must, in the full sense, signify 'speaking under Divine inspiration,' namely, by prophesying (in the strict sense of the expression), including the lesser degrees of the προφητεία (see Rom. xii. 6. 1 Cor. xii. 10. xiii.

χωρῆσαι τὰ γραφόμενα βιβλία. Ἀμήν.

Æschyl. Pers. 435. and Eurip. Menalipp. frag. 3, οὐδ' ἄπας ἂν οὐρανός, Διὶς γραφέντος τὰς βροτῶν ἀμαρτίας, ἱξαρκέσαιεν.

At ver. 24 the τούτων has reference to the events of this Chapter, and the ταῦτα to those of the rest of the Gospel. At ἄλλα πολλά is plainly to be supplied ἃ οὐκ ἔστι γεγραμμένα ἐν τῷ βιβλίῳ τούτῳ. To these ἀγραφα allusions are occasionally found. Compare Matt. xi. Acts xx. 35. Numberless, however, as were the actions of our Lord which were left unrecorded, we have reason to acquiesce in the providence of Him who 'doeth all things well.' Every important purpose, in a work meant for the people at large rather than for the learned, is accomplished by the Gospels in their present state. Had they recorded all the words and actions of Christ, or even any considerable part, they would have been, as the Evangelist, perhaps, means to intimate, too voluminous for a manual adapted to ordinary use. Enough is recorded to direct our faith, and regulate our practice; more would have been superfluous, and in some respects (from the multitude of questions and unprofitable speculations to which they would have given rise) might have defeated the main purpose in view, the making men 'wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus.'

ΠΡΑΞΕΙΣ

ΤΩΝ

ΑΓΙΩΝ ΑΠΟΣΤΟΛΩΝ.

- 1 I. ΤΟΝ μὲν πρῶτον λόγον ἐποιήσαμην περὶ πάντων, α Luke 1. 3.
ὡ Θεόφιλε, ὧν ἤρξατο ὁ Ἰησοῦς ποιεῖν τε καὶ διδάσκειν,

THIS highly important book forms the grand connecting link between the Gospels and the Epistles, being a sort of appendix to the former, and introduction to the latter; and as it is highly illustrated by both, so is it indispensably necessary to a right understanding of both, and hence it is justly termed by Chrysostom an exceeding great treasure. That St. Luke was the author is plain both from what is said at the commencement, and from the similarity of its style as compared with that of the Gospel. Inasmuch that some have conjectured, not improbably, that the Gospel and the Acts formed only two parts of one general work. Indeed, of the genuineness of the present book we have the amplest proof in the testimonies of the earliest Christian Fathers; inasmuch that this has never been disputed. The time when it was published we are better enabled to ascertain than that of any other book in the New Test. Considering that the history therein contained is brought down to the second year of St. Paul's imprisonment, it could not have been written before A. D. 63; and as it makes no mention of St. Paul's death, it is most likely to have been written before that event. And learned men in general assign A. D. 63 as the time of its publication. Though, indeed, from the date of the present book depending upon the date of St. Luke's Gospel (on which see the Introduction), and that of St. Paul's death, which is not thoroughly ascertained, the point admits of no certain determination. It is probable, however, that the latter end of A. D. 65, or the beginning of A. D. 66, is the true date; i. e. if St. Paul perished, not in the persecution which arose immediately after the great fire at Rome, in Oct. A. D. 64, but (as some think, on the testimony of Clemens Rom.) about two years after. If, however, St. Paul perished in the persecution of the autumn of A. D. 64, that will carry back the period, though probably not further than the earlier part of 64.

The Canonical authority of this book is connected with that of the Gospel, on which see the Introduction, and that to St. Mark. To advert previously to the contents, which will be best appreciated by adverting to the purpose of the work: it is plain that St. Luke did not mean to write a regular history of the rise and progress of the Christian Church for thirty years after the Ascension, but merely intended, as Dr. Pye Smith expresses it (Scrip. Test. vol. iii. p. 5), 'to give a collection of most important particular memoirs referring to the commencement of the Christian dispensation; detailing some events in the history of the Churches at Jerusalem and Antioch, and occupying the latter half with many interesting transactions of St. Paul.'

Indeed the purpose of this book seems to have been two-fold; 1st, to give an authentic account of the communication of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and of the miraculous powers and supernatural gifts bestowed by the Spirit on the first preachers of the word and professors of the Gospel. Also, 2dly, to present such an authentic narrative of the early progress of the Gospel as should establish the full claim of the Gentiles to be admitted into the Church of Christ—a claim even yet disputed by the Jews. And, in a general way, to afford matter of confirmation to various accounts in the Gospel, and supply irrefragable evidence of the Divine origin of the Christian religion. Of the place where the work was written we have no certain information. It was probably Achaë, where St. Luke seems to have chiefly resided after the year 58, and where Ecclesiastical tradition tells us that he died.

To advert to the book itself; we there find a manifest attention paid to chronological order; and some epochs being fixed by their combination with certain political events, there is little difficulty in determining the dates of almost all the events recorded in this book,—with the exception, however, of those which took place between the years 33 and 34, and between 44 and 60, on which, and the chronology of the book in general, see Bp. Marsh's Michaelis, vol. iii. P. i. p. 336—338, and especially Hug's Introd. to the New Test. vol. ii. p. 312—314.

The style of this book is neat and perspicuous, and differs not materially from that of the later Greek writers in the Alexandrian and the κοινή

διάλεκτος. As to the speeches of St. Peter and St. Paul, 'there is in them (as the learned Valcknaer says), if not the finish of composition found in the Greek orators, a simple dignity in the historical parts, and a grandeur in the didactic, to which it were impossible to add aught.'

I. 1. τὸν μὲν πρῶτον λόγον, &c.] Very similar to this is the exordium to a Dissertation of Philo-Judæus: 'Ὁ μὲν πρότερος λόγος ἦν ἡμῖν, ὃ θεόδοτος, περὶ τοῦ, &c.'

Here we have that irregular use of μὲν, without a δὲ in the apodosis, which is also found at Rom. i. 8. x. 1. 2 Cor. xii. 12, and sometimes in the Classical writers; ex. gr. Eurip. Orest. 8. Moreover, πρῶτον is used for πρότερον, a use frequent in the best writers. Λόγος, in the sense of narrative of words or actions, history, occurs frequently in the Classical writers, and in the New Test. at Acts v. 24. John iv. 39. Hence historians were anciently called λογόποιοι; and λόγον ποιεῖσθαι signified to compose a history. By πάντων must be understood all things necessary to be revealed; see John xx. 30. sq. xxi. 25. Certainly it must be taken with some limitation of sense, since St. Luke has, in his Gospel, omitted many discourses and transactions recorded by the other Evangelists. Ὡς is for ἄ, by a common idiom, usually referred to the principle of Attraction; ἡρξάτο is supposed by the Commentators to be pleonastic, as in Mark vi. 7. Matt. xii. 1, and often elsewhere. But it is, properly speaking, never pleonastic. In several of those passages it signifies, 'took in hand'; and in others, including the present, it has an intensive force, intimating the great labour, difficulty, or importance of the work undertaken.

2. ἄχρι ἧς ἡμέρας—ἐξελέξατο.] Most of the later Commentators construe διὰ Πν. ἀγ. with ἐξελέξατο; while the ancient and earlier moderns take them with ἐντειλάμενος; perhaps rightly; this being agreeable to the natural construction. Διὰ Πν. ἀγ. signifies, 'by means of the Holy Spirit.' Here, as in some other passages, what our Lord taught and did is, with reference to his human nature, attributed to the Holy Spirit; see Smith's Scrip. Test. L. iv. ch. 1. 'Ἐντειλάμενος' need not be confined to any one direction, but may be extended to all the injunctions given to the Apostles for the right discharge of their office; see Matt. xxviii. 19. Mark xvi. 15—19.

3. παρίστησεν ἰ. ὅτι 'setse exhibit,' 'proved or evidenced himself to be alive.' A use of παρίσταναι occurring also at xxiv. 13, and frequently in the Classical writers. Τεκμηρίον denotes 'clear and evident proofs.' Ὀπτανόμενος, from ὀπταίνομαι, cognate with ὀπταμαι, is a very rare word, scarcely found elsewhere, except in 1 Kings viii. 8. Tob. xii. 19. Δι' ἡμερῶν τεσσ., meaning, at intervals during that period, and on no less than right different occasions: 1. to Mary Magdalene and the other Mary (Matt. xxviii. 1—9); 2. to the two disciples on their way to Emmaus (Luke xxiv. 15); 3. to Peter (Luke xxiv. 34); 4. to ten of the Apostles (Thomas being absent) (Luke xxiv. 36. John xx. 19. 24); 5. to the Eleven Apostles (John xx. 26); 6. to seven of the Apostles in Galilee, at the sea of Tiberias (John xxi. 4); 7. to James (1 Cor. xv. 7); 8. when the Apostles and Disciples were assembled together, and when he led them out as far as Bethany (Luke xxiv. 50); from whence he ascended to heaven in the presence of above 500 brethren at once, 1 Cor. xv. 6.

4. συναλίζόμενος.] Some MSS. have συνελ., which is preferred by several Critics, but without reason; since the authority for it is very slender, and it is evidently a gloss on the received reading, which is rather difficult, and therefore variously interpreted. The ancients, and earlier moderns, in general explain it 'conveniens,' by a derivation from ἔλκε or ἔλκε; the later Commentators, conveniens cum illis, 'during these communications with them;' deriving it from ἔλκε confertim, and supposing it a neuter noun. The former signification is a very unusual one, and here little suitable. The latter is greatly preferable, and is confirmed by many passages of the Classical writers adduced by the Commentators; ex. gr. Herodot. i. 62, οὗτοι μὲν δὲ συναλίζοντο, and v. 15. The construction is: ἐλκε ζόμενος σὺν αὐτοῖς, παρίγγειλεν (αὐτοῖς). In χωρίζεσθαι we have another example of passive in a neuter sense.

—ἐπαγγελίαν τοῦ Πατρὸς] i. e. 'the promised gift of the Father,' the Holy Spirit; see 3. Joel ii. 28. Ἦν ἡκούσατε, 'which ye have lately heard of from me.' Sub. ἔκ or παρ; see John xiv. 26. xv. 26. xvi. 7. Luke xxiv. 49.

5. Βαπτισθ. suggests the abundance of the thing; q. d. 'ye shall be plentifully imbued with the influences of the Holy Spirit.'

6. αἱ.] Some explain αἱ by anum; others, by anpon. The former may be considered the more accurate version. The idiom seems to have arisen from a blending of the oratio directa with the indirecta. According to the rules of regular composition, it would have been written ἐνταύτων αἱ ἀποκαθίστανται, or ἀποκαθίστανται, &c.

inherent in ἰστηνέιναι, but which is usually expressed by something further added, as in a similar passage of Aristoph. cited by Valcknaer, τί πάσχειτ', ἄνδρες; ἵστατ' ἐκπεπληγμένοι. 11. οὕτως ἐλεύσεται.] Namely, visibly and on the clouds; see Dan. vii. 13, and comp. Matt. xxiv. 30.

12. σαββάτου ἔχον ὁδόν.] Ἐχον, for ἀνέχον, as in a passage of Arrian Periplus, p. 171 (cited by Kuinoel), where two emporia are said to be from a certain town, ἔχοντα ὁδὸν ἡμερῶν εἴκοσι. A sabbath day's journey (as determined, not by the Mosaic law, but by the Jewish masters, from a calculation of the greatest distance of any part of the camp of Israel from the tabernacle) was 2000 cubits, about 7½ stadia.

13. τὸ ὑπερῖον.] This word is not a compound, but a simple; and is properly an adjective in a contracted form for ὑπερίων, which occurs in Hom. II. B. 214, and often in the Odyssey; a word formed from ὑπέρ, as πατρός from πατήρ.

Commentators are not agreed whether by this we are to understand an upper room in a private house, or an upper apartment of the Temple. But besides that no one reason exists for this latter view, and many against that opinion, it is at once forbidden by the words immediately following, οὗ ἦσαν καταμένοντες, which tend to confirm the generally received view, that it was a large upper apartment of some private house, which served as a common lodging or oratory, &c., for all which purposes upper rooms in the Eastern countries have always been (from their greater retirement, and usually capaciousness) preferred.

14. προσκαρτ. ὁμοθ. τῇ προσ.] Προσκαρτερεῖν is used with a Dative, both of person, in the sense to wait upon any one, and, as here, of thing, to attend closely to it; a signification found both in the Scriptural and the Classical writers. Ὁμοθυμαδόν is well explained by Suidas and Hesych. ὁμοψύχως. Render, 'with one heart and soul.' Δέησις signifies supplicatory and earnest prayer. So Heb. v. 7, it is united with ἱκετηρία, and at Eph. vi. 18, with προσκαρτήρησις. Also at Phil. iv. 6, we have τῇ προσυχῇ καὶ τῇ δεήσει, and at 1 Tim. v. 5, ταῖς δεήσεσι καὶ ταῖς προσευχαῖς.

— σὺν γυναιξί.] Render, not (with some) 'their wives,' but 'the women;' many of whom, however, were the wives of the Apostles or disciples, and the rest consisted of those who had followed Christ out of Galilee, and ministered to him of their substance.

15. ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ταύταις.] Namely, one of the ten days intervening between the Ascension and the feast of Pentecost.

— ἦν τε ὄχλος—εἴκοσιν.] Ὀνομ., persons, as in Rev. iii. 4, and often in the Classical writers. By ὄχλος, &c. is only meant the number then present; the disciples at large being far more numerous; about 600, as we have reason to think.

16. In this address Peter proposes to the disciples the choosing of another Apostle, in the room of the traitor Judas, to complete the original number. He reminds them that the words, not so much of David, as of the Holy Spirit speaking by David, had been fulfilled. Of which fulfilment he adduces Ps. lxxix. 25, and cix. 8, as examples; probably having in mind also Ps. xli. 9, and lv. 12; and intimates, that as Scripture has been fulfilled in the one case, so it now remained to be fulfilled in the other, by the business for which they were then assembled. The terms εὐαγγέλιον and προεῖπα περὶ will not permit us to suppose, with many recent Commentators, that what is said by David of his treacherous companions is here, on account of the coincidence of the case, applied, by accommodation, to Judas; but we must suppose, that what was prophesied by the Holy Spirit was meant primarily of David's enemies and treacherous companions; but, secondarily and typically, of Christ's enemies and treacherous friends. See Doddridge. The citations in question substantially agree with the Hebrew and Septuagint, except that the plural is changed to the singular, because it is applied to Judas only. The above principle of accommodation might, in red, be admitted, if we could, with some recent commentators, construe πληρωθῆναι with περὶ Ιουδα. But that is forbidden by propriety; since περὶ 'I' plainly belongs to προσῆτα, not to πληρ., and the term πληρ. is never used with περὶ to mean 'in the case of,' but with ἐπὶ. The first of the two passages presents a lively figure of their destruction.

17. σὺν ἡμῖν.] For σὺν, very many MSS., chiefly ancient, and some Fathers, have ἐν, which was edited by Griesbach and Scholz. I have, however, followed Matthæi and Vater, in retaining the common reading.

— ἔλαχε τὸν κλ.] Λαγχάνειν signifies properly 'to receive by lot, have allotted to one.' The ἀπὸν is not (as some have considered it) redundant, but denotes appointment. The meaning being, 'the appointment belonging to this ministry' or office. Here, it is plain, there is nothing of sanction popular election of ministers, still less the deciding on questions of religion by lot. See Grotius.

18. The best Expositors are agreed that this and the next verse are parenthetical, and to be regarded as the words, not of Peter, but of Luke; who thus introduces some circumstances respecting this treachery; namely, what use Judas made of the wages of iniquity, and what was his fate. The obscurity of which the Commentators complain has been chiefly occasioned by the sense at v. 17 being not sufficiently developed. If the Apostle had subjoined the words ἐξ ἧς παρέβη, παραυθῆναι εἰς τὸν ἰδίον τόπον, which he does afterwards at v. 25, all would have been plain. It is evident that he had them in his mind.

— ἐκτήσατο] i. e. 'was the means of its being purchased,'—namely, by the chief priests. For the best Commentators are agreed that this is to be referred to that idiom of Scripture, by which an action is sometimes said to be done by a person, who was only the occasion of its being done. Gen. xlii. 38. Exod. xxiii. 8. 1 Kings xiv. 1. Jerem. xxxviii. 23. Rom. xiv. 15. 1 Cor. vii. 1. 1 Tim. iv. 16. If this be thought too harsh, the expression may be considered as a figurative metonymy, by which Judas might be said to have bought the field with the wages of iniquity, by selling such wages as would have bought the field. So Achmet Oneroerit. 'Si quis viderit, et invenierit vel emerit plurimas oves lac præstans, inveniet opes et gaudium et servos pro pecunia ovium numero.' And so 2 Kings v. 26, 'Was this a time to receive money and garments,' and olive-yards and cinegaris, and sheep and oxen, and men-servants and maid-servants?'

VOL. I.

— μισθοῦ τῆς ἀδικίας.] We have here a Genitive of cause, to signify, 'obtained by iniquity.' Comp. 2 Pet. ii. 15.

— πρηνὴς γενόμενος ἐλάκησε, &c.] Here πρηνὴς γ. signifies 'tumbling headlong.' 'Ἐλάκησε' is for διεβόλῃ, as in Aristoph. Nub. 409; the term λακίω being synonymous with φοβέω, crepo, to crack. With the expression ἐλάκησε μέσος may be compared that of Plaut. Cure. ii. i. 7, 'Hoc metuo, ne medius disrumpar.' Similar to the present is a passage of Joseph. Bell. vi. l. 6, καὶ πταίσας πρὸς τινα πέτραν πρηνὴς εἰς αὐτῆς (read from the best MSS. αὐτὴν) μετὰ μεγίστου φόβου κατέπεσεν.

— ἐξεχύθη πάντα τὰ σπλάγχνα.] So 2 Sam. xx. 10, ἐξεχύθη ἡ κοιλία αὐτοῦ. Ælian, Anim. iv. 52, ὅδη δὲ καὶ ἰππων πλευραὶς ἱμνισσόντες διεσχίσαν, καὶ τὰ σπλάγχνα ἐξείχον. Cholin, fol. 56. 2, 'Aramæus quidam vidit hominem qui de tecto in plateam decidit, et viscera eius effluerunt.'

On the seeming discrepancy between the account of Judas's manner of death here, and that at Matt. xxvii. 5, ἀπελθὼν ἀπήγγατο, see the Note there.

20. Of the two clauses of this verse, the first is taken from Ps. lxi. 26, but with a slight alteration of the wording, so as to accommodate it to the case of Judas. In either case it is a highly figurative mode of expressing utter destruction; since that any one's house should become a perpetually deserted abode, is a very lively image of utter ruin. Ἐπαυλις (corresponding to the Heb. πτω) denoted originally a shepherd's hut, but afterwards came to denote a habitation generally. So Apoll. Rhod. Arg. i. 800. (cited by Valcknaer) Δήμου—πύρρσκον ἱπαυλίας.

The latter clause is taken from Ps. cix. 8, where ἐπισκοπὴ denotes the superintendence of any thing done, a charge, or office; with allusion to that of Apostleship, formerly held by Judas.

21. The Apostle now proceeds to declare more expressly what steps they should take in the matter.

— τῶν συνελθόντων.] Supply ἐκ. Render, 'of those who have associated with us, formed part of the same society.' In εἰσῆλθε καὶ ἐξῆλθε we have an idiom formed on the Hebr. בָּרַחַבְרָא and equivalent to versatus est. An elliptical mode of speech, which, expressed in full, would stand thus: ἐν ᾧ εἰσῆλθε ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, καὶ ἐξῆλθεν ἀφ' ἡμῶν. Comp. Eurip. Phœn. 543. Moreover, ἕνα τούτων is to be referred to τῶν συναλθόντων, &c. at v. 21; by a sort of hyperbaton not unusual in the Classical writers; as Herodot. iii. 18.

At ver. 22, with ἀρξάμενος ἀπὸ τοῦ βαπτ., &c., I would compare Philostr. Vit. Apoll. i. 24, οἱ δὲ λοιποὶ, ἀπὸ Ἰωνίας καὶ Λυδίας ἀρξάμενοι, διεφθάρσαν.

23. ἔστησαν] 'adstare jusscrunt,' set up, proposed.

24. καρδιογνώστα πάντων] 'searcher of all hearts.' It has been doubted whether this should be referred to God the Father, or God the Son. Certainly the appellation is not unfrequent in the Old Test., Josephus, and Philo, as applied to the former. But that it is equally applicable to the latter, appears from John xvi. 30, where see Note. See also John i. 48—50. ii. 24. vi. 69. xxi. 17. Apoc. ii. 23. Κύριος is an usual appellation of Christ our Saviour; and besides that the reference in question is confirmed by the connexion with ver. 21, there would be a peculiar propriety in addressing this prayer to him, as being the Head of the Church, and he who originally appointed the other Apostles.

—ἀνάδειξον] 'declare.' It is well observed by Chrysostom, 'that they do not say ἐκλεῖξαι, but ἀνάδειξον τὸν ἐκλεγέντα, because every thing has been known and determined by God long before it has even entered into the thoughts of men.' Similarly it is said, Joseph. Ant. vi. 5. 6, (cited by Wetstein) ἐγὼ μὲν ἀπείδειξα τοῦτον, ὃν αὐτὸς (ὁ Θεὸς) ἐξελέξατο.

For the common reading, ἐκ τούτων τῶν δύο ἕνα ὃν ἐξελέξω, nearly all the MSS., Versions, and the Editions up to that of R. Stephens, have ὃν ἐξελέξω—ἕνα, which has been received by every Editor from Bengel to Scholz.

25. τὸν κλῆρον τῆς διακονίας τ. καὶ ἀποστ.] 'the appointment to this ministry.' This is exegetical of τῆς διακονίας just before. Παρέβη, 'abandoned, deserted;' by a metaphor taken from a traveller who deserts the right road. Comp. 2 Pet. ii. 15. A very rare use of the word, but of which I have noted one example elsewhere;

namely, Joseph. Ant. xiv. 9. 2, οὐδὲν πρὸς τ. εὐνοίας καὶ πίστιν παρέβη.

—πορευθῆναι εἰς τὸν τόπον τ. 13.] These words have been variously explained; but the common interpretation (by which τὸν τόπον τὸν ἴδιον is taken to mean the place suited to him—namely, the place of destruction) may be considered the true one, as being recommended by its simplicity and its suitableness to the usage both of the Jewish and Heathen writers, and confirmed by several passages of the Apostolical Fathers. The following examples will suffice. Beal Turin on Numb. xxiv. 25. 'Balaam ivit in locum suum,' i. e. Gehenna. Max. Tyr. Diss. 25, where it is said that, upon the dissolution of the body, the soul is called to its own place, ἐπὶ τὸν αὐτὸν τόπον.

26. ἔδωκαν κλήρους.] The exact modus in which they cast the lots cannot be determined; various being the methods by which the ancients practised the sortilegium. They used to cut slips of parchment, or pieces of the tabula scriptoria, with the names inscribed, into an urn. And this kind of sortitio most Commentators here understand. Now the lots are said to be their on whom the lots are cast, and to fall upon him who comes off successful in the sortitio. Συγκαταψήφισον properly denotes 'to choose by common suffrage,' and then 'to number with or unto,' συγκταριθμεῖν. This deciding of a doubtful matter by casting lots was understood to be a mode of submitting to the will of the Almighty; and was, therefore, from the earliest times, resorted to, in the creation of kings, or the appointment of priests. See the numerous Classical citations in Hezue. Synop., and compare Levit. xvi. 8. Numb. xxi. 34. Josh. xiii. 6.

II. 1. συμπληροῦσθαι.] See Note on Luke ix. 51. At Πεντηκοστῆς the Commentators propose an ellipsis of ἡμεῖς or ἱστέον. But there is perhaps no ellipse at all; Πεντηκ. being a substantive and an appellative. On this feast see Horne's Introd.

—ἦσαν ἅπαντες.] Meaning, according to some, the Apostles only; or rather, we may suppose, with others, the disciples at large, mentioned εγένετο ἄφνω ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἦχος, ὥσπερ φερομένης πνοῆς βιαίας, καὶ ἐπλήρωσεν ὅλον τὸν οἶκον οὗ ἦσαν καθήμενοι.

 3 Καὶ ὤφθησαν αὐτοῖς διαμεριζόμεναι γλῶσσαι ὡσεὶ πυρός, c Matt. 3. 11.
 4 ἐκάθει τε ἐφ' ἓνα ἕκαστον αὐτῶν. d Supra 1. 5. infra 10. 6. Mark 16. 17. 1 Cor. 12. 10.
 5 Καὶ ἐπλήσθησαν ἅπαντες Πνεύματος ἁγίου, καὶ ἤρξαντο λαλεῖν ἑτέροις γλώσσαις, καθὼς τὸ Πνεῦμα ἐδίδου αὐτοῖς ἀποφθέγγεσθαι. Ἦσαν δὲ ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ κατοικοῦντες Ἰουδαῖοι ἄνδρες εὐλαβεῖς
 6 ἀπὸ παντός ἔθνους τῶν ὑπὸ τὸν οὐρανόν. Γενομένης δὲ τῆς φωνῆς ταύτης, συνῆλθε τὸ πλῆθος, καὶ συνεχύθη· ὅτι ἤκουον εἰς ἕκαστος τῇ ἰδίᾳ διαλέκτῳ λαλούντων αὐτῶν.

at i. 15. For (as Kuinoel observes) the subject at i. 15 is the assembly of the 120 disciples whom Peter addressed, and from whom Matthias was taken into the Apostolic body; while the eleven Apostles are only mentioned en passant. Now with the predicant, which is destitute of a subject, the subject immediately antecedent, and not that of which mention was made en passant, but personally, ought to be taken. This, too, is clear from ἅπαντας, not οὗτος, being used. Indeed, the absence of the rest of the disciples on so solemn a festival cannot be supposed.

2. ὥσπερ φερομ. πνοῆς β.] This use of φέρεσθαι and its compounds, to denote the rushing of winds sweeping along like a tempest, and associated with the adjectives πολλός, βίαιος, and others of similar signification, is frequent in the Classical writers. So Ælian, Hist. An. vii. 24. ἐκείδαν τὸ πνεῦμα βίαιον ἐκφέρηται.

— τὸν οἶκον.] Doubtless the ὕπερφον, supra i. 13, where see Note.

3. διαμεριζόμεναι.] Not, cloven (which sense would require διασχίζουσαι), but dispartita, divided out to each from one common source.

— γλῶσσαι πυρός] i. e. pointed flames; the top of a flame of fire being called a tongue, from its resemblance thereto. Thus in the form of the flame there was a peculiar adaptation to the thing designated.

— ἐκάθει τε ἐφ' ἓνα ἕκαστον α.] At ἐκάθει some would supply Πνεῦμα, taken from Πνεύματος. Kuinoel, however, with reason, objects that the phrase Πνεῦμα ἁγ. ἐκάθει is unexampled. He might have added, that Πνεῦμα cannot be taken from Πνεύματος afterwards, because that is not in the same sentence; for, notwithstanding what some think, a new one commences at καὶ ἐπλήσθ. Besides, there Πν. ἁγ. signifies only the influence of the Spirit, not the Spirit personally. As to the true ellipse, Valckner alone has seen that ἐκάθει (scil. ἐκάθει τῶν γλωσσῶν) ἐφ' ἓνα ἕκαστον αὐτῶν. Thus the sense is: 'And there were seen as it were tongues of fire, distributing themselves, and settling upon them, i. e. one on each.'

These appearances were symbolical; representing emblematically, 1. the power and purifying effects of the Holy Spirit (see Matt. iii. 11); 2. and chiefly the gift of tongues, the first-fruits of the Spirit.

4. ἤρξαντο λαλεῖν ἑτέροις γλώσσαις.] Meaning, languages other than those which they were acquainted with; i. e. such as they were ignorant of, and which are specified at ver. 8—11.

— ἐδίδου α. ἀποφθέγγεσθαι] 'gave them power to speak out,' 'show forth.' Ἀποφθέγγεσθαι being used both of deep and sententious, and also of divinely inspired and prophetic language. So Jambl. de Myst. iii. 17, (cited by Elsner) ἰνίστα τῶν ἐνθίκων τινα ἀνθρώπων ποιᾷ (ὁ θεὸς) μετὰ σοφίας λόγον ἀποφθέγγεσθαι. Plutarch, de Pythiæ Orac., p. 405, (speaking of the Delphic priestesses) πρῶτον μὲν ὥσπερ εἰρηται, τὰ πλείστα κἀκίνα καταλογάδην ἀπεφθέγγοντο, and p. 268, ἀποφθέγγεσθαι λόγια καὶ χρησμοδῶν τοῖς ἱερωτάσιν. And Philo de Joseph., p. 543, relates that, on his having interpreted dreams to Pharaoh, the king said to him, οὐ γὰρ ἀνεν θεοῦ ταῦτ' ἀποφθέγγεσθαί μοι δοκεῖς.

5. ἄνδρες εὐλαβεῖς] 'religious men;' εὐλαβῆς being here (as also at Luke ii. 25, and infra x. 2,) synonymous with εὐσεβῆς, though the two words properly differ in sense; εὐσεβῆς (as Tittman shows) signifying that reverence of God which is exerted in actions, and especially in acts of worship; while εὐλαβῆς points at the mind itself, and denotes one who is fearful of offending God in word or deed. Hence εὐλαβῆς answers to the German Gottesfürht, and our God-fearing; εὐσεβῆς, to our pious, or devout.

These, consisting of foreign Jews and a few proselytes, had taken up their temporary residence at Jerusalem, for the purpose of those greater facilities for religious duties which the place afforded, and because the advent of the Messiah was then expected.

— ἀπὸ παντός ἔθνους τ. ὑ. τ. ο.] This is a general, not an universal proposition; and consequently to be taken with limitation, as merely denoting the various parts of the world. Of this hyperbolic use of πᾶς several examples have been adduced by Bp. Pearce. The expression ὑπὸ τὸν οὐρανόν has been supposed entirely Hebraic; but the same idiom is shown by Κύριος to occur sometimes in Plato.

6. τῆς φωνῆς ταύτης.] What particular voice is here meant, has been variously disputed. Some, most improbably, refer it to the ἦχος at ver. 2; while others regard φωνῆς as put for φήμη, by a use occasionally found in the Sept.; thus supposing ταύτης to stand for περὶ τούτου. Since, however, φωνή used for φήμη no where else occurs in the New Test., we may best understand φωνῆς of the noise produced by the assembled multitude praying or conversing together (v. 2), and doubtless in a state of considerable agitation.

6. συνεχῶς] 'were thrown into great agitation.' So Achill. Tat., p. 321, (cited by Weist.) ὡς οὖν ταῦτα ἠκούσαμεν, συνεχύθη.

This was their first feeling. Their second was amazement; ἐξίσταντο καὶ ἐθαύμαζον.

—διαλέκτῳ.] Not dialect, but language: in which sense the word is always used in the New Test. and Josephus, and frequently in the Classical writers.

7. πάντες.] This (not found in many MSS.) has been cancelled by Matthæi and Scholz, but retained, within brackets, by Griesbach and Vater.

—Γαλιλαῖοι.] The sense is: 'They were amazed at seeing persons nearly all of one country, and that a rustic and illiterate one, all speaking foreign languages, and addressing each of them in his own tongue.'

8. ἐν ᾧ ἐγεννήθημεν.] This seems to be a popular phrase for τῇ ἐγγυνί, native. In the words following supply ὄντες. Render, 'We, I say, who are Parthians, Medes, &c. At ἀκούομεν there is a repetitum, in order to clear the sense long suspended by the interposed portion at ver. 9, 10.

9. Ἰουδαῖαν.] What this name can here have to do in a list, of which the air is one of foreign nations, it is not easy to see. And as to what has been urged by some in its defence, it proceeds on the supposition that the language of Judæa was a different one from that of Galilee; whereas there is great reason to think that the latter differed from the former only as the English of Middlesex differs from that of Somersetshire, or the Italian of Tuscany from that of Venice or Genoa. Upon the whole, it is plain that Ἰουδαῖαν cannot be accounted for in any satisfactory way, and must (as it has been by the most eminent Critics) be regarded as corrupt; though probably to be emended from some hitherto uncollated MSS. In the mean time I have little doubt but that the true reading is, according to the conjecture of Barthius (which had also occurred to myself), Ἰδομαῖαν,—a very similar word to the common reading; for Δ and Μ are perpetually confounded; and part of the Μ being faded off, would leave a Δ; and the abbreviation for δοῦ (δου) is very similar to ου. In fact, the words Ἰουδαῖαν and Ἰδο-

μαῖαν are often confounded, especially in the MSS. of Josephus. By Idumæa we may understand that tract of country situated on the other side of Jordan, and South-east of Judæa, which was sometimes called Arabia Petraea; and so the word is sometimes used in Josephus. And we know that Damascus was now in possession of Arctas, king of Arabia Petraea. There is, indeed, the greatest reason to think that the territory subject to him also extended to that part of Arabia which was N. E. from Judæa, and would thus be almost continuous with Mesopotamia. And it is plain that the countries are mentioned in geographical order, from East to West.

10. κατὰ Κυρήνην.] Render, 'near to Cyrene;' as infra xvi. 7. xxvii. 2, and sometimes in the Classical writers, though πρὸς and περί are more usual; ex. gr. Joseph. Ant. xvi. 6. 1, τοῖς κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν Ἰουδαίοις, καὶ ὅσους ἢ πρὸς Καππαδοκίαν κατὰσχεν. Dio Cass., p. 374 B, and 704. 82, τὴν Λιβύην τὴν περὶ Κυρήνην.

At ἐπιδημοῦντες supply ἔδω, i. e. at Jerusalem. So Athen., p. 361, (cited by Wetstein) δ' Ῥώμην κατοικοῦντες, καὶ οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες τῇ πόλει. Accordingly, by οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες Ῥωμαῖοι are to be understood Romans, whether of Jewish birth or proselytes, (i. e. such as had either been made citizens of Rome, or Roman proselytes to Judaism) who were sojourning at Jerusalem. So Ἀντιόχεια is used in Josephus for Jews dwelling at Antioch.

11. τὰ μεγαλεῖα.] See Note on Luke i. 48.
12. διηπόρουν.] The full sense is, 'were utterly at a loss.' By πάντες are meant the persons just mentioned, namely, the foreigners and proselytes Jews, to whom are, in the next verse, opposed the ἕτεροι, meaning those of Judæa.

—λέγοντες.] Supply τίς. Τί ἐν ὅλῳ τοῦτο εἶναι; is a popular idiom, denoting, 'What should this mean?' i. e. How has it arisen? For εἶλαι and βούλεσθαι often signify so near to our English would or should. So Herodot. i. 74 (cited by Wetstein) τί εἶλαι σημαίνει ὡς τίρας;

13. χλευάζοντες.] 'mocking, or jeering.' The word is best derived from χέλειν, synonymous with χαίλειν, the lip, and signifies to 'thrust out the lip.' Comp. Ps. xxii. 7.

Instead of χλευάζειν, a few ancient MSS. and some Fathers have διαχλ., which is received by almost every Editor from Griebach downwards, but without sufficient reason; for the external evidence in favour of the new reading is weak, and the internal evidence not strong. Simple verbs are not unfrequently changed into compounds, to communicate a stronger sense, or for greater elegance. And χλευάζω occurs more than once elsewhere in this book, and often in the LXX; δαιγλ. no where, either in the New Test. or the LXX.

— γλυεύουσιν. Not, new-made wine (which is the proper signification of the word), for that is forbidden by the time of year; but new, i. e. sweet wine, which is very intoxicating. See Is. xlix. 26. And so γλυεύουσιν occurs in Job xxxii. 19, and sometimes in the Classical writers.

This was, Markland thinks, intended as a sneer on the meanness of their condition; since no person of respectability tapped the last year's γλυεύουσιν so early as June, unless compelled by necessity. Yet new wine (notwithstanding what is said Luke v. 39) might be preferred by some persons, on account of its intoxicating qualities. See Hedyllus ap. Athenæum, p. 176, ἡδύαι δὲ γλυεύουσιν μεμεθυμένα παιγνία μουσῶν; and we know from Plut., Columella, and Pliny, (see also Hor. Sat. iv. 2. 19.) that some sorts of wine (probably from a peculiarity in the making of it), if kept in a cool place, retained their sweetness for a long time, and hence were called δαί γλυεύουσιν.

14. σὺν τοῖς ἑνδεκά. Namely, to show their consent and concurrence in what Peter should say, who was to be the speaker.

— Ἄνδρες Ἰουδαῖοι, &c. From this ver. to v. 36, we have the address of Peter, which produced such an effect on the minds both of those who wondered and those who derided, that 3000 persons were then added to the Church of Christ.

Some have maintained that only the substance of the address is recorded, and that many things are omitted, which were said by the Apostle. The former position may be true; but the latter is more than can safely be affirmed. At least an inspired writer cannot be supposed to omit any thing necessary to be recorded. Ἐνωτίσασθε, 'receive into your ears;' and, by implication, 'hearken attentively to:' an Alexandrian word often occurring in the LXX. and the later Greek writers, and probably derived from the common dialect.

15. ὑπολαμβάνετε lit. 'sup-ponite,' 'take up [in thought].'

— ἔρα τρίτη. Before which time none but dissolute characters took strong drink: indeed no

persons who made profession of religion took food or drink of any kind until after morning prayers.

16. τοῦτό ἐστι. Meaning, 'this [state of things] is [a fulfilment of] what was predicted,' &c.

17—21. These verses are a citation from Joel ii. 28—32 (in the Hebrew, iii. 1—5), but with some slight variation both from the Hebrew and the Sept. The chief difference is in ἐν ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις being used for μετὰ ταῦτα. The words λέγει ὁ Θεός form no part of the quotation, but are an insertion by the Evangelist, to indicate the person who says this. The two last clauses of ver. 17 are merely interchanged in their order. At ver. 18, γε is inserted, which strengthens the sense; καὶ γε signifying quidem. The words καὶ προφητεύσουσιν are added (from the preceding context) by way of explanation. Finally, at ver. 19, the words ἄνθρωποι and κῆτος are supplied to strengthen the sense; especially as they are often found joined to ἐν οὐρανῷ and ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς in the Old Test. See Exod. xx. 4. Josh. ii. 11. The passage contains (as the Jewish Interpreters themselves admit) a highly figurative description of the state of things which shall precede and accompany the coming of the Messiah; namely, by an extraordinary outpouring of the Spirit. But Peter himself did not then understand the full sense of the prophecy, as regarded 'all flesh,' i. e. men of all nations, both Jews and Gentiles. πᾶν, rendered by the LXX. μετὰ ταῦτα, is admitted by Kimchi to be equivalent to the Hebrew words which correspond to ἐν ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις in other passages of the LXX.; and the phrase is universally granted by the Jewish Commentators to denote the times of the Messiah, under which the closing scheme of Divine revelation would be promulgated. Ἀπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος is said to be for πνεῦμα, as in the Hebrew. But it rather seems to be a slight alteration adapted to the sense rather than the words, i. e. (by an ellipsis of μυροῦ) a portion of my Spirit. What kind of spiritual effects are meant, is clear from the following verses. Ἐκχεῶ is, like the correspondent terms in Greek and Latin, used to suggest the abundance of the gifts imparted. The expression πᾶσαν σάρκα, 'all persons,' seems to denote some of all orders and ranks, and (in a secondary sense) of all nations.

17. προφητεῖ. This must, in the full sense, signify 'speaking under Divine inspiration,' namely, by prophesying (in the strict sense of the expression), including the lesser degrees of the προφητεῖα (see Rom. xii. 6. 1 Cor. xii. 10. xiii.

2.). which was preaching and teaching the truths of the Gospel. The next clause intimates that God would also reveal his will to both old and young, in a manner which partook of the προφ. just before mentioned, namely, by visions and dreams.

The terms προφητεία and ὁρασις are sometimes synonymous: but here ὁρασις is equivalent to ὁρασις: in either of which terms an appearance is presented to the person, whether waking or by trance; whereas ἐνύπνιον is always a dream, in which something is preternaturally suggested to the mind. And here we should render, 'shall dream visions,' i. e. shall see visions in dreams. Thus at 1 Sam. iii. 1, ὁρασις διαστέλλουσα denotes a distinct revelation by supernatural appearance, in opposition to the less direct revelation by dreams or otherwise. With respect to the present passage, the ὁρασις was fulfilled in the case of St. Paul; the ἐνύπνια in that of St. Peter. Finally, what is said at ver. 19 was remarkably fulfilled by the communication of the Spiritual Gifts, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles and in St. Paul's Epistles.

For ἐνύπνια, some MSS. have ἐνυπνίους, which has been edited by Griesbach and Scholz, whilst the common reading is retained by Matthæi and Vater.

19, 20. All that we can infer from these verses is, that the events in question will take place at 'the times of the Messiah.' But whether they are to be referred to the first advent of our Lord, at the destruction of Jerusalem, or to his second, at the day of judgment, Commentators are not agreed. They are exactly parallel to, and admit of, nay perhaps require, the same mode of explanation as Matt. xxiv. 29. Luke xxi. 25. where see Notes. But the final and full accomplishment of these prophecies will probably not take place before the consummation of all things.

19. αἶμα καὶ πῦρ.] A formula exactly corresponding to our fire and sword. The ἀτμίδα καπνοῦ (alluding to the smoke of burning towns) is graphic, and completes the picture of devastation.

20. ὁ ἥλιος μεταστραφήσεται εἰς σκ.] See Note on Matt. xxiv. 29, where we have the same imagery, and admitting of the same explanation.

— ἡ σελήνη εἰς αἶμα.] By αἶμα is here to be understood that obscure sanguineous hue, which the heaven assumes when the atmosphere is filled with smoke and vapours; and especially the lurid appearance it presents when smoke and flames are thrown up by earthquakes. See Kitt. Comp. Rev. vi. 12. viii. 8.

— τὴν ἡμέραν Κυρίου τὴν μεγ. καὶ ἐπιφ.] Meaning, a day memorable for the visitation of God's punishment on the guilty, and therefore terrible, as the Hebrew is rendered, though the former sense is assigned to the word ἡμέρα in other passages.

21. πᾶς ὅς—σωθήσεται.] The best Commentators are agreed that ἐπικ. τὸ ὄνομα here denotes religious invocation, as a disciple of Christ, by embracing his religion. Σωθ. denotes not temporal deliverance only (to which many recent Commentators confine it), but chiefly that spiritual one, by which men are conducted to the full salvation. At any rate, the words ὅς ἂν ἐπικαλίσσεται τὸ ὄνομα Κυρίου, taken with other passages, representing worship as paid to Christ in common with Jehovah, strongly attest the Deity of the Redeemer.

22. After having shown that a Redeemer had been promised, who should 'save to the uttermost' his faithful worshippers, the Apostle proceeds to turn their attention to the grand subject of his discourse,—showing that JESUS OF NAZARETH, whom they have crucified, is that personage, (proved to be such by his resurrection to life,) and pointing out the purposes for which he was raised from the dead. On this is engrained a notice of the validity of the general evidence in favour of Jesus's Messiahship, and the nature of that evidence. Then it is subjoined that this Jesus it is, thus raised and invested with supreme dignity, who hath procured this plenteous effusion of the Holy Spirit, as attested by the effects which they now see and hear. Of Him, too, it is added, the words of Ps. cx. 1, are meant, which their own Rabbins referred to the Messiah. Hence (the Apostle concludes) they may be assured that this Jesus, whom they have crucified, is the Lord and Christ appointed of God.

But to consider the passage in detail, the Apostle addresses them by the conciliatory appellation Ἰσραηλῖται. Ναζωραῖον is subjoined to Ἰησοῦ, because, in mentioning his name thus formally, it was proper to add, what had, indeed, become a usual appellation; see Mark xvi. 6. Acts iii. 6. x. 38. — ἄνδρα ἀπὸ—δεδειγμένον.] The construction is, ἀνδρα ἐποδ. εἰς ὑμᾶς εἶναι ἀπὸ Θεοῦ. Δυνάμεις, τέρασιν, καὶ σημείοις, are nearly synonymous, but combined to strengthen the sense, as including every sort of supernatural work.

23. τῇ ὀρίσμένῃ βουλῇ καὶ προγν.] The best Commentators are agreed, that τῇ ὀρίσμ. βουλῇ means the determinate, and consequently immutable, counsel of God (so Luke xxii. 22, κατὰ τὸ ὀρισμένον); and that προγνώσει signifies decree; a signification common both to Hellenistic and Classical Greek. "Ἐκδοτον δούναν or λαβεῖν denotes to give up, or receive, at discretion, to treat at one's pleasure; and is used of those who are given up to their enemies. The expression διὰ χειρῶν ἀνόμων, as conjoined with τῇ ὀρίσμ. βουλῇ—Θεοῦ, is meant to suggest, that God's counsels and decrees did not absolve the Jews of guilt in putting Jesus to death, since they were still free agents. Προσπῆξαντες scil. σταυρῶν is added, to show that the putting to death was by the most cruel and ignominious mode.

—ἀνείλετε.] A good many MSS. have here ἀνείλατε (as also ἀνείλατο at vii. 21, and ἐξείλετο at xxiii. 27), which reading has been edited by Scholz; but on insufficient grounds. At least he ought, in consistency, to have received ἐξείλατο at vii. 10, on stronger evidence. But indeed it is doubtful whether these Alexandrian forms, which swarm in the MSS. of the Alexandrian recension, were not introduced by the scribes.

24. λύσας τὰς ὠδῖνας τοῦ θαν.] The best Commentators, ancient and modern, are of opinion that ὠδῖνας denotes not pains, but bonds; a signification, indeed, scarcely known in the Classical writers, but occurring in the LXX. This interpretation, they think, is supported by the following λύσας, and especially by κρατεῖσθαι, and is confirmed by certain passages cited by Wetstein. But that λύσας may only mean removed, without any allusion to a bond, is clear from what I have annotated on the words λύσιν τῶν δεσμάτων in Thucyd. ii. 101. So also Job xxxix. 2, ὠδῖνας ἐκ αὐτῶν ἔλυσας, and Lycophr. Cass. 1198, σφάλλωντες ἐξέλυσας λαθραίας γονῆς. We may, therefore, with reason retain the common version, pains, and merely suppose that in κρατεῖσθαι there is an allusion to the notion of tight bands, as in Ælian, H. A. xii. 5, τοῦτε τῶν ὠδῶν λύσαι δεσμούς.

—οὐκ ἦν δυνατόν, &c.] Meaning, morally

impossible, i. e. consistently with the circumstances of the case, the dignity of His person (as being 'the Prince of life,' iii. 15, and having life in himself, John v. 26; see also John x. 18), the nature of His undertaking, the accomplishment of the work for which He came on earth, the purpose of God the Father, and the prophecies of Scripture.

25. The Apostle now proceeds to show why it was impossible; and that by a reference to the word of God.
 — εἰς αὐτόν] 'concerning,' or 'with reference to, him.' So Diad. Sic. (cited by Elsnor), εἰς οὐδὲν ἵπτερον ἢ τὸ παρὸν λέγειν. Whether this reference be primary or secondary has been disputed. The most eminent Interpreters, however, have long been of opinion, that the 16th Psalm has, in many of its parts, a double sense; one historical, of David, the other mystical and allegorical, of Christ. Be that as it may, the latter, if secondary in order, is primary in importance. It should seem that David spoke in the person of the Messiah.

— προωρώμην.] Προωρᾶσθαι here signifies 'to be so mindful of, as to act always before us.' The Aorist is expressive of what is perpetually and habitually done. By the Lord is meant his power to save. The words ὅτι ἐκ δεξιῶν μου ἐστίν are intended to show in what light the Lord is considered; namely, as a helper. In these some recognise an allusion to those παράκλητοι, who stood as any one's supporters when he was brought to trial; and we may compare the παρακληυστοὶ καθήμενοι mentioned in Thucyd. vi. 13. ἵνα μὴ σαλ., 'that I should not succumb under calamity.'

26. διὰ τοῦτο εὐφράνθῃ ἡ καρδ. μου.] This and ἡγαλλιάσατο ἡ γλῶσσά μου are meant to denote extreme joy, both that which is inwardly felt, and that outwardly expressed.

The διὰ τοῦτο refers to the reason for this exultation,—which was, that he should be preserved amidst the sorrows that were coming upon him, and could look forward with joy to the triumph which awaited him; see Hebr. xii. 2.

— ἐπ' ἐλπίδι] 'upon, or in, hope'; namely, of being raised up; see Rom. viii. 21. This use of ἐπὶ also occurs in Xenoph. Mem. ii. 1. 18.

27. εἰς ἄδου] scil. δόμον, or οἶκον; see Notes on Matt. xvi. 18. Luke xviii. 23, v. 31. Οὐδέ δώσεις, 'nor wilt thou suffer.' For δίδόναι, like the Hebr. נָתַן, denotes sometimes not a physical, but a moral giving by permission. Τὸν Ὅσιόν σου. This is usually rendered, 'thy pious worshipper;' a sense which may very well suit David, but not CHRIST, with reference to whom the sense must be, 'me who am pre-eminently the Holy One; and thine, as united to Thee in the Godhead.' Ἰδεῖν διαφθοράν, 'to experience putrefaction,' i. e. to lie so long in the grave as to be exposed thereto.

28. Ἐγνώρισάς—ζωῆς.] Render, 'Thou hast made known (i. e. opened out) paths of life,' i. e. the means of avoiding permanent death, and attaining unto life and glory; or, as referred to David, life everlasting. The next clause adverts to the state of glory, and the fulness of joy which should succeed to that 'earthly race which was set before him;' after which he should sit down at the right hand of God, and be blessed with his immediate presence.

29. The Apostle now proceeds to propound an argument, resting on the position that the Messiah is meant in the Psalm in question; and he does this by tacitly encountering an objection which might be made; q. d. These are the words of David, and are to be understood of him. In answering which the Apostle introduces the mention of David in highly reverential language, calling him Patriarch. 'I may be permitted (says he) freely to tell you concerning the Patriarch David, that he both died and was buried, and his sepulchre remains unto this day;' [and, indeed, remained, Jerome testifies, in the time of the emperor Adrian.] And as David died, was buried, and his body experienced corruption, so it followed that, in the passage adverted to, he could not have spoken of himself.

30. In this and the next two verses the Apostle clinches the argument. The sense may be thus expressed: 'Now he being a Prophet (i. e. one endowed with a supernatural knowledge of future events), and, in that quality, knowing that God had sworn a solemn oath to him, that from the fruit of his loins (i. e. from his posterity) Christ should, as to his human nature, descend, in order to sit on his throne; he, foreseeing this event, spoke (in the passage in question) of the resurrection of Christ, when he said that his soul,' &c. On this promise see 2 Sam. vii. 11. 16, and the other passages adduced in the references. The expression ὄρεα ὤμοσε, as applied to God, of course denotes only His 'fixed and immutable purpose'; q. d. sanctissime promisit.

The words τὸ κατὰ σάρκα—Χριστὸν were rejected by Mill and Bengel, and have been cancelled by Griesbach, Lachmann, and Knapp; but on very slender authority—only that of three MSS.; for, as to the reading of the Cod. Cantab., it is evidently an emendation. And that the words were formerly in that MS., is plain from their being found in the Latin Version which accompanies it. Of the three MSS. which are said not to have the words, the Barb. I is of no authority; and the other two (the Cod. Alex. and the Cod. Ephr.), though very ancient MSS., yet bear perpetual marks of the liberties taken with the text by some biblical Critics of an early period. This added to the fact that the words are found in all the other MSS. (not very far short of 200), including the most ancient of MSS., the Cod. Vaticanus, and (as we have seen) the Cod. Cantab., à primâ manu, makes the external evidence against the words very slight. And as to the internal, it is surely far more probable that the words should have been accidentally omitted in two or three MSS., than that they should have been foisted into all the other MSS. The evidence, indeed, of the Versions—consisting of the printed Syriac (Peschito), the Vulg., Coptic, Æthiopic, Armenian, and Arabic—may seem adverse to the words. But as to the first, though the printed Syriac has them not, yet the MSS., I am informed, have. And the authority of the Vulgate, which might seem weighty, is, in fact, far otherwise in cases like the present, where it is unsupported by the ancient Italic; and that the words were read in that Version, is plain from what is brought forward by Sabatier; see Matthæi. As to the authority of the other Versions, it is but slender. Again, the evidence of the Fathers against the words is any thing but determinate; since, while some of them adduce the verse without the words, others (as Theophylact, Theodoret, and especially Chrysostom) cite it with them. Indeed, it may be said that the evidence of Fathers, in cases like the present, of words supposed to have been inserted, is the less to be relied on, since citing, as they perpetually do, from memory, they often omit words, especially such as are not to their purpose.

As to what has been urged against the words by Heinrichs and Kuinoel, that they are placed differently in different MSS., the truth is that in only some two or three MSS. are they thus transposed, and that evidently from the carelessness of scribes. Finally, as to their argument, that the omission of the words produces a more difficult reading, and therefore such as is the more likely to be genuine; this, though of greater weight than the former, is far from being conclusive; also even that Critical canon has its exceptions. It cannot, for instance, well apply in cases like the present, where the more difficult reading is found in only two or three MSS. out of a very great number; for then it is more probable that the reading in question arose from alteration, than that a false reading should have crept into all the

I have therefore felt fully justified in retaining the words, especially as they are considered genuine by Scholz. Comp. Rom. i. 3. 2 Tim. ii. 8. Rom. ix. 5.

32. τοῦτον τὸν Ἰ. &c.] The evidence for this resurrection is now adverted to, and that by a reference not only to the positive testimony of the Apostles, disciples, and other eye-witnesses (as contrasted with the want of evidence for the assertion of the Jews, that he did see corruption, and did not rise), but to that testimony of his resurrection, and consequent Messiahship, which was afforded by his exaltation to the right hand of God; by his having obtained, agreeably to the promise, the sending of the Holy Spirit and the copious effusion of his gifts,—producing effects such as they now see and hear, and which, by their miraculous nature, attest the Divine character of Him who procured them.

—ἐπαγγελίαν τοῦ ἁγ. Πνεύμ.] for τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἐπαγγελμένον. By τούτο we are to understand the whole of the transactions before narrated.

34. οὐ γὰρ Δαυὶδ, &c.] The Apostle's argument is this: 'That David speaketh not concerning himself, but the Messiah (see ver. 25, et seq.), is manifest from what he says Ps. cx. 1, where he speaks of a Lord who was to be at God's right hand till all his enemies were subdued. For that patriarch himself is not raised from the dead, and ascended into the heavens, to sit at God's right hand; therefore he must have spoken this of some other person; namely, of Jesus Christ, who hath set forth this which ye now see and hear.'

The concluding words of the quotation ('until I make thine enemies,' &c.) suggest the inevitable destruction they would bring upon themselves, if they continued to reject the Saviour.

36. Here we have the conclusion, that this same Jesus, whom they had crucified, was the divinely constituted Lord and Christ.

—ἀσφαλῶς γινωσκίτω.] With this phrase

Wetstein compares from Eunap. Proer., εἰδότες ἀσφαλῶς. The phrase also occurs in Thucyd. i. 37, ἵνα ἀσφαλίστερον προσιδῆται. By οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ is meant the Jewish nation; and πᾶς extends the declaration to every individual thereof.

37—44. Here are described the effects produced on the people by the above discourse.

37. ἀκούσαντες.] Supply τούτο.

—κατενύγησαν τῇ καρδίᾳ] 'were pierced to the heart.' Κατανύσσειν signifies 'to be pricked through with some sharp instrument;' and is used figuratively of the emotions of violent grief, or deep remorse, whether expressed outwardly, or felt inwardly; see Gen. xxxiv. 7. Ps. cviii. 16. Sept. Eccles. xii. 12. xlviii. 20. Several examples, too, are adduced by Wetstein and Kypke from the Classical writers. Of these, however, only two are quite to the purpose; namely, Simplicianus on Epict., ὡς τοὺς μὴ πάντως νεκρωμένους νύττειν ἐκ τῶν λόγων, and Plutarch, de Animi Tranq. p. 476, where he says that the conscience of evil doers τῇ ψυχῇ μεταμίλειαν αἰμάσσουσιν αἰεὶ καὶ νύσσουσιν ἐναπολείπει.

—τί ποιήσομεν.] So it is said infra ix. 6, τί με δεῖτε ποιῆσαι; Here must be supplied, from the subject-matter, some such words as are expressed infra xvi. 30, τί με δεῖ ποιεῖν ἵνα σωθῶ;

38. μετανοήσατε.] This repentance must, of course, be supposed to include reformation, by an abandonment of their former preconceived opinions, and by acknowledging Jesus to be the Christ, and embracing his religion by baptism (see Matt. xxviii. 19, and Note), and thereby engaging to observe all his injunctions both of faith and practice. Comp. infra iii. 19, and Bp. Bull's Harm. Apost. p. 9.

—βαπτισθῆτω ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰ. Χρ.] The expression βαπτίζεσθαι ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι τινος is equivalent to εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τινος (which could not here have been used without involving tautology), or ἐν ὀνόματι τινος. In all which cases the preposition denotes dependence on, de-

* Ἦσαν δὲ προσκαρτεροῦντες τῇ διδαχῇ τῶν ἀποστόλων, 42 καὶ τῇ κοινωνίᾳ καὶ τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου, καὶ ταῖς προσ-

tedness to, and obedience to (as 1 Cor. x. 2, βαπτίζεσθαι εἰς τὸν Μωϋσῆν), and should be rendered, not into, but unto. Ὁνόμ. Χρ. is thought to be for Χριστοῦ; but there is rather a reference to the words of Christ at Matt. xxviii. 19, containing the form in baptism, wherein ὄνομα is by no means without force.

38. τὴν δωρεὰν τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύματος.] Meaning, chiefly it should seem, not the miraculous gifts before adverted to, but, as appears from what follows, the ordinary aids and influences of the Spirit, given to every man to profit withal.

39. ὑμῖν ἐστιν ἡ ἐπαγγελία, &c.] 'to you pertains the promise,' namely, of sending the Spirit.

— πᾶσι τοῖς εἰς μακρὰν.] This is by many recent Expositors taken to mean the Jews dispersed abroad among the nations. But there is no good reason why the expression may not mean, as the ancient and most modern Commentators suppose, the Gentiles, a view strongly confirmed by Ephes. ii. 13. 17, where by οἱ μακρὰν are denoted the Gentiles, also designated as 'aliens from the commonwealth of Israel.' And it is no sufficient objection to say, that Peter was as yet unacquainted with the truth, that the Gentiles were to be admitted into the Christian covenant. For it appears that the Jews did not deny that the Gentiles were to be admitted to the Messiah's religion, but they thought they could alone become such by becoming proselytes to the Jewish faith. This sense, indeed, seems required by the words following, unless we suppose (what perhaps it may be best to do) that the Apostle had here in view both the dispersed of Israel, and the strangers from the covenant of promise; i. e. both the dispersed Jews and the Gentiles who as yet stood afar off. That he meant to include the former is probable from a similar mode of expression in Ezek. xi. 16. Mic. iv. 7. Zech. vi. 15, and especially Ezek. vi. 12, and Dan. ix. 7, 'unto us belongeth confusion of faces; unto all Israel, those that are near, and those that are far off, through all the countries whither thou hast driven them.' The words ὅσους ἂν προσκαλέσεται Κύριος ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, seem added to further develop this secondary sense of τοῖς μακρὰν; q. d. 'all, I say, even as many as the Lord our God may call upon' [to embrace 'the glorious gospel of Christ'].

40. διεμαρτύρετο καὶ παρ.] 'did he earnestly charge and exhort;' see 1 Tim. v. 21.

— σῶθητε ἀπὸ τῆς γ. &c.] This is by some rendered, 'separate yourselves from,' &c.; by others, 'suffer yourselves to be saved.' Yet these cannot be called tertium; they are rather paraphrastic glosses. The literal sense is, 'be ye saved;' or, taking it as passive or reciprocal, 'save yourselves.' Though by a sempre præsens, suggested by the ἀπὸ, there is here included the idea of separation from, as the means of preservation from, the moral contamination of the world. We may compare a similar expression in 2 Cor. vi. 17, ἐξέλθετε ἐκ μέσου αὐτῶν, καὶ ἀφορρηθῆτε. Numb. xvi. 21, ἀποσχίσθητε ἐκ μέσου τῆς συναγωγῆς; and Ezra x. 11, διαστάλητε ἀπὸ λαῶν τῆς γῆς. Σκολιάς signifies perverse and generally twisted, by a metaphor taken from what is crooked as opposed to straight. The phrase is borrowed from Deut. xxxii. 5, γενεὰ σκολιὰ καὶ διαστραμμένη.

With respect to the doctrine hence to be inferred, suffice it to say that the air of exhortation here observable, implies at once the necessity for exertion, and also that the power of exertion is present with man to 'work out his salvation.'

41. ἀσμένως.] This—not found in a few ancient MSS. and Fathers—has been by some Biblical Critics supposed spurious; but without any good reason; for it was evidently either omitted by the scribes through inadvertence, or cancelled by the ancient Critics, as seemingly to them unnecessary. The μὲν οὖν just before may be rendered interitum; having a continuative and slightly illative sense. The μὲν is in parallelism with the δὲ at the next verse; as Mark xvi. 19. John xix. 24. sq. supra i. 6, and often in this book. Ἀποδέχεσθαι, as used of things, signifies 'to approve,' &c., and is often accompanied with ἀσμένως.

— ἐβαπτίσθησαν.] In the first age of Christianity, those who acknowledged Jesus to be the Messiah, were received, by this solemn rite, into the Church; so that a fuller instruction did not precede, but follow baptism. Προσετίθησαν, 'these adjuncturunt.' Pass. for Middle, as often in this verb. The use of ψυχαὶ for persons is common to the Classical as well as Scriptural writers (so Eurip. Hel. 52, ψυχαὶ δὲ τολμαὶ), as the Hebr. נַפְשׁ for נַפְשׁ. Indeed the idiom is found in all languages.

42. Having recorded the amazing increase to the members of the visible Church, the Apostle takes occasion to notice their manner of living; and by προσκαρτ. τῇ διδαχῇ he intimates that they continued steadfastly to adhere to that profession which they had so suddenly taken up.

— ἦσαν προσκαρτ. τῇ διδαχῇ.] So προσκαρτ. τῇ προσηυχῇ in Acts i. 14. vi. 4. Rom. xii. 12. Col. iv. 2.

— τῇ κοινωνίᾳ—προσευχαίς.] On the sense of the words considerable difference of opinion exists. Many eminent Expositors, ancient and modern, take κλάσι τοῦ ἄρτου of the Eucharist; which opinion may seem confirmed by the preceding τῇ κοινωνίᾳ; that term being frequently used of the Lord's Supper. Thus they in general take τῇ κοινωνίᾳ καὶ τῇ κλάσει, by a Hendiadys, for 'the common participation of the Eucharistic bread broken and distributed.' Some, however, understand κοιν. of association for religious purposes: while most of the recent Commentators understand by κοιν. social intercourse; and by τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου, the exercise of mutual hospitality; which, they think, is supported by the expression κλῆν ἄρτου at ver. 46. But that sense is little agreeable to the context, which certainly requires something far more. Nor is there any authority for such a sense of κοινωνία in Scripture; nor perhaps of τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου; for ver. 46 (to which they appeal) may very well bear another sense. Some, again, join κοινωνίᾳ with the words preceding, namely, τῶν ἀποστόλων, q. d. 'in intimate society with the Apostles.' A construction very harsh, and a signification quite unauthorized. It must undoubtedly be taken with what follows; and τῇ κοιν. καὶ τῇ κλάσει seems put, by a hysteron proteron, for τῇ κλάσει καὶ κοιν.; or, by hendiadys, for 'by a common participation of bread broken.' Now this might be understood of the Eucharist; yet as verse 46 undoubtedly has reference to the same subject, but certainly cannot be so understood, as appears from the words following; so it should seem that in both that passage and this we are to understand the common participation of meals, taken in charitable communion and religious thankfulness, and followed by prayer. This view is confirmed by what is said at ver. 46. So St. Paul, 1 Tim. iv. 4, 5, says (with reference, it may be supposed, to these religious meals), that every kind of food is good, if it be taken μετὰ εὐχαριστίας; for (he adds) ἀγιαζεται διὰ λόγου καὶ ἑντεύξεως. By these religious meals we need not, however, with some, understand the Agape, or Love-feasts, which used to precede the Eucharist; for those were probably not yet in being; having, it should seem, originated at a somewhat later period, when the custom of having all things in common,—practicable only in a small society,—was afterwards discontinued; and, in the place of it, was substituted a formal communion at certain stated religious meals, which preceded the celebration of the Lord's Supper; see Rom. xiv. 6.

43. πάσῃ ψυχῇ] 'every person,' i. e. of the multitude at large, mentioned at ver. 46. Ἐγένετο ἵνα ἐκταύτο, as often. Φόβος, 'reverential awe.'

44. ἦσαν ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό.] This is generally taken of 'being collected together for divine worship.' And although the great number (3120) of the disciples has been urged as an objection to that view, yet we need not suppose all to have been assembled at the same time, nor perhaps all at the same place. As, however, a certain degree of harshness attaches to that interpretation, it seems better, with some eminent Expositors, to understand the expression of perfect unanimity and concord (as Ps. cxxxii. 1, and elsewhere in the Sept.); which is confirmed by iv. 34, and a passage of Thucyd. i. 79, ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ αἱ γνώμαι ἐφερον. What, however, is chiefly meant, seems to be, that 'the believers all kept together as a society distinct from the Jews;' which view is supported by the words following.

— εἶχον ἅπαντα κοινά.] The earlier Commentators, in general, understand by this an entire community of goods; while many recent Expositors think that the words are to be taken only in a popular sense, such as that of the adage πάντα κοινά, denoting great charity and beneficence. The next verse, however, excludes this latter view, though it does not necessarily imply an absolute community by distribution. Some of the rich, it seems, sold their property in part, in order to have more to give immediately to their poorer brethren; but the money accruing from thence (as is plain from infra iv. 32. v. 4. xii. 12) did not cease to be at their own disposal. That all did not sell their property is evident from the fact, that there were soon afterwards rich and poor among the Christians; see ix. 36. xi. 29. xx. 35. 1 Cor. xvi. 1. Eph. iv. 28. It is plain that this so called intercommunity of goods was voluntary, limited in extent, and produced by the peculiar circumstances of the infant Church at Jerusalem,—composed as it was, in a great measure, of foreign Jews sojourning there, and detained by the natural wish of acquiring a thorough knowledge of the religion which they had adopted, and yet whose funds might, by their detention so much longer than they had expected, have fallen short, and thrown them on the charitable assistance of their richer brethren. As to the native Jews, the poorer converts were peculiarly objects of consideration to their richer brethren; since all charity on the part of those who adhered to the Jewish religion would be denied them, and they would have scrupled to partake of the relics from the Temple sacrifices, which were distributed to the poor. Nay, their means of supporting themselves might occasionally be taken from them by bigoted employers or customers. Under these circumstances no relief or aid could be expected, except from their Christian brethren, who therefore, it seems, agreed not only to contribute much of their ready-money, but occasionally and in part, as need might require, to sell their possessions; and in general were induced by the admonitions of the Apostles to regard their wealth as held in trust for the benefit of their poorer fellow Christians.

45. κτήματα.] The term properly denotes possessions or property in general; but here it must be understood of the bona immobilia (lands and houses), as ὑπάρξεις (for the more Classical τὰ ὑπάρχοντα) may be of the mobilia, personal property.

προσκαρτεροῦντες ὁμοθυμαδὸν ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ, κλῶντές τε κατ' οἶκον ἄρτον, μετελάμβανον τροφῆς ἐν ἀγαλλιάσει καὶ ἀφελότητι καρδίας, αἰνοῦντες τὸν Θεὸν, καὶ ἔχοντες χάριν πρὸς ὅλον τὸν λαόν. Ὁ δὲ Κύριος προσετίθει τοὺς σωζομένους καθ' ἡμέραν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ.

46. προσκαρτ.] Προσκ. is put for προσκ. ταῖς προσευχαῖς, which occurred a little before. Render: 'They persevered in attending the Temple service every day,' i. e. (as is implied) at the stated hours of prayer.

— κλῶντές τε κατ' οἶκον ἄρτον.] This is by many understood of the Eucharist, or at least of the agapæ which preceded the Eucharist; while others understand it of common meals taken by companies at certain houses in rotation. And certainly there is much to countenance this in what follows. Yet, if we consider the preceding words, it will seem more probable that the meals in question were the charitable and religious meals, taken in common, treated of supra ver. 42. At κατ' οἶκον supply ἕκαστον; meaning, 'in groups assembled at different houses;' for no one apartment was now large enough to contain the whole.

— ἐν ἀγαλλιάσει καὶ ἀφελότητι καρδ.] This phrase denotes the disposition of mind in the partakers, whether rich or poor, respectively; ἀγαλλιάσει being intended chiefly of the latter, and ἀφελότητι, principally, though not exclusively, of the former. It is meant that 'the rich cordially rejoiced in exercising liberality to the poor, and that the poor were heartily thankful for their liberality.' The one class was as far removed from grudging or ostentation, as the other was from envy or ill-will.

47. αἰνοῦντες—λαόν.] This may signify, in a general way, 'They were [in their mode of life] much occupied in prayer, and were in favour with the people.' As, however, αἰνοῦντες is grammatically connected with μετελάμβανον, it seems better to suppose the sense to be: 'And these common meals (namely, those mentioned supra ver. 42) they held with prayer to God; and by the use of them, and by their general conduct, they were in favour with the people at large,' i. e. all except the Rulers, the Priests, and their party.

— προσετίθει τοὺς σωζομένους.] On the exact sense of these words considerable difference of opinion exists. Our authorized Version renders 'those that should be saved;' but it is now almost universally agreed that this mode of rendering cannot be admitted, since it would require, not σωζομένους, but σωθησομένους. The version in question must therefore be rejected; not (as Wetstein thinks) because it introduces a Calvinistic doctrine, but because such a sense cannot be shown to be inherent in the words. The sense had been saved, which some Anti-Calvinistic Commentators propose, is equally inadmissible. If we keep close to the propriety of the language

(which, where a doctrine is concerned, we are bound to do), we cannot, I think, translate better than (as Doddridge and Wesley do) 'the saved,' meaning 'those who were being saved;' which is supported by the authority of the Pesh. Syriac Version. The expression must of course denote those who hearkened to the earnest injunction, ver. 40, 'Save yourselves from this perverse generation,' namely, by withdrawing from community with them, renouncing Judaism, seeking admission into the Christian Church, by baptism, and thus being 'saved from their sins by the washing of regeneration,' and put into a state of salvation; whereby, through the grace of the Holy Spirit, imparted under the Gospel, they might be actually saved both from the guilt and the power of sin. See Dr. A. Clarke and Dr. Hales. Indeed (as Bp. Pearce observes) we find the converse, upon their repentance towards God, and faith in Jesus Christ, often spoken of in the New Test. as persons already saved; i. e. rescued from that eternal misery to which they stood exposed, till they were baptized: ex. gr. Tit. iii. 5, ἔσωσεν ἡμᾶς διὰ λουτροῦ παλυνύσεως. See also 1 Cor. xv. 2. and Luke xix. 9. Consequently, οἱ σωζόμενοι will be equivalent to οἱ πιστεύοντες. So in a kindred passage, Acts v. 14, προσετίθειτο πιστεύοντες τῷ Κυρίῳ. This also at 1 Cor. i. 18, τοῖς σωζομένοις, meaning those who had received the Christian faith, as opposed τοῖς ἀπολλυμένοις, to the Jews, who reject it; and also at 2 Cor. ii. 15; also Rev. xxi. 24, καὶ τὰ ἔθνη τῶν σωζομένων, simply believers in the Gospel, ἐν τῷ φωτὶ αὐτῆς περιπατήσουσι.

III. This seems meant to connect with ii. 43; vv. 44—47 being in some degree parenthetical. St. Luke now returns to what he had been saying about many miracles having been worked by the Apostles; and of these he adduces one by way of example,—namely, that of a cripple from his birth.

1. Ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ must here mean together, in company, and be taken after ἀνέβαινον, 'was going up.' So Josephus, cited by Krebs, μὲν Ἀντιόχῃ ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ παρῆλθον. The use of ἐπὶ with an Accus. in the sense to, is found also in the Classical writers, and especially with nouns of time.

2. ἐκ κοιλίας μητρὸς] for ἐκ γαστρὸς. See John ix. 1. Ἐκ γαστρὸς occurs in the Pseudo-Theogn. v. 307. Ἐτίθουν. The sick and poor were, both among Jews and Gentiles, usually laid, or placed themselves, at the portals of the Temples, to ask charity of the worshippers; though sometimes at the gates or doors of rich men. See Luke xvi. 20, and Note.

—[Ὀραϊαν.] So I have chosen to edit, with almost every Editor up to Wets. Those after him wrote Ὀραϊαν; but wrongly, I conceive; for Ὀρ. is a proper name, being one of that class which become such by an adjective with the Article having so defined some one of a class of things, that it is pointed out as single and apart from the rest. In that stage the adjective should be written with a small initial letter. But when the Article is omitted, it becomes a proper name, and consequently must have a capital. Which gate of the Temple is here meant, the Commentators are not agreed. Most of them suppose it to have been the Eastern gate, leading from the court of the women to that of the Israelites, which was overlaid with Corinthian brass (a material far more valuable than gold itself, and brought with exquisite art); also called the gate of Nicanor, and of which mention is made in Joseph. Bell. v. 5. 3. vi. 5. 3. It has, however, been shown by Wagenseil, Bengel, and Walch, that this involves much of improbability. (See an abstract of their arguments in Kuinoel.) Hence the learned have for some time been generally agreed that the gate here meant is that which was called Ῥωμῆ, from ῤωμ (the lily), also the name of a royal city in Persia, as we learn from Athenæus, p. 573, so called διὰ τὴν ὀραιότητα. And old Constantinople had a gate so called. Accordingly Ὀραϊα would be a good representation in Greek of ῤωμ in Hebrew. Of the reasons given for the above supposition, the most weighty are, 1. that, after the healing of the cripple, Peter and John repaired to Solomon's Portico, which he appears from Joseph. Ant. xx. 8, compared with xv. 14) was very near the gate Susan. 2. The lame mendicant would doubtless choose a place where he would be likely to get most money, and that would be where most persons might be expected to enter. Now at the gate Susan there was a far greater concourse of people than elsewhere; since there were the tabernæ, in which wine, salt, flour, oil, doves, and other things necessary for sacrifice, were sold. Moreover, it was the custom of the Sacred writers to name Hebrew names, even those which by use had taken the nature of proper names, into appellatives.

ἢ δὲ ἥρῳτα ἐλεημοσύνην λαβεῖν.] Many MSS.

and some early Editions have not λαβεῖν, which was by Pricæus considered as insinuous. But Bos, Alberti, Wetstein, Kypke, and especially Valcknaer, have proved, by many examples derived from Greek writers of various times, that there is here an idiom, by which λαβεῖν and other terms are elegantly pleonastic after verbs of asking. 'Ἐλεημ., αἷμα,' meaning the sum given; a signification of the word found only in the later Greek writers, from Callimachus downwards.

4. ἀτενίσας εἰς αὐτόν.] See Note on Luke xxii. 56.

5. ἐπέιχεν α.] Supply ὀφθαλμοῦς.

6. ὁ δὲ ἔχω, τοῦτό σοι δίδωμι.] I would compare Aristoph. Lysist. 671, ὅπερ οὖν ἔχω, δίδωμί σοι, and Soph. Elect. 450, σμικρὰ μὲν τὰδ', ἀλλ' ὅμως δ' ἔχω, δὸς αὐτῷ. By ὁ ἔχω is meant, 'out of such power as I have committed to me (namely, from Jesus Christ) I bestow the benefit I am now doing.'

—ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι.] Meaning, 'by the authority of Jesus.' Here, it has been justly remarked, a striking difference may be seen between the manner in which miracles were worked by Jesus, and that by his Apostles. The former acted in his own name, and by virtue of his own power; the latter, merely by a delegated authority. See Note on Mark xvi. 17, 18. and John xiv. 12.

7. πιάσας αὐτόν, &c.] This was an action done, not, as some Expositors say, more Medici, but as a symbolical one, representing the cure, and giving a gracious assurance of it; such as our Lord was pleased often to exert. See Mark vii. 33.

—βάσεις.] Βάσις signifies, 1. the act of walking; 2. the effect of it, in the step taken. 3. the part whereon we rest in taking it, namely, the foot; as here, and in Soph. Aj. 692, and often in the later Greek writers. The following term σφυρά is explanatory of the foregoing one, and denotes the malleoli, or ankle-bones, by which the bones of the foot exert their force.

8. ἐξαλλόμενος.] Not so much for joy, as many Commentators imagine; nor, as (Ecumen. thinks, to try whether he could walk; but, it should seem, at first from ignorance how to walk, by which his essays would be rather leaping than walking; just as the imperfect glimmer of the newly acquired sight of the blind man at Mark viii. 24, made him first 'see men as trees walking.' 'Ἐξαλλόμενος well describes the headlong eagerness of incipient action, as ἔστη, καὶ περιεπα- the other stages of it: 'he first leaped, then stood still, and lastly walked,' i. e. in a regular manner. See Note on Acts xiii. 11.

11. κρατοῦντος.] Render, 'keeping close to'; as in Col. ii. 19, & 2 Sam. iii. 6. Here for the vulg. τοῦ λαθύντος χωλοῦ, Griesbach, Matthæi, Vater, and Scholz, have edited αὐτοῦ on strong evidence, external and internal.

12. ἀπεκρ. πρὸς τὸν λ.] 'made [this] address to the people.'

— πεπ. τοῦ περιπ. α.] There is here an anomaly of construction, which some Commentators seek to remove by supposing an ellipsis of πρᾶγμα and ἔνεκα; others, by resolving πεπ. into ποιηταῖς οὐσι; comparing Acts xxvii. 1, ὡς δὲ ἐκρίθη τοῦ ἀποπλεῖν ἡμᾶς, and xx. 3. Yet this principle of resolution is seldom effectual, being hypothetical, and explaining nothing solidly. The ellipses, too, are liable to the same objection. It should seem that the present idiom proceeded originally from the employing of the Infinitive with ὥστε or εἰς τὸ, denoting end or aim. This construction was afterwards changed to its equivalent τοῦ with an Infin., which is often found in the LXX., and was then changed, in most cases, to the simple Infinitive.

13, 14. The Apostle now suggests the real cause of the cure, calling their attention to Christ. The general meaning is, that 'the purpose of God, in the miracles which he ordained to be wrought by the Apostles, was to show forth the glory of his Son Jesus Christ.' Hence it follows that men are here not to extol Peter or any one else. It is CHRIST only who is to be exalted. See John iii. 30. (Calvin.)

13. ὁ Θεός—ἡμῶν.] The repetition of ὁ Θεός is emphatical; and the mention of the God of their fathers was introduced to show that they taught no new religion which should alienate them from the God of Israel. (Doddridge.)

— ἐδόξασε.] Namely, by his resurrection and ascension.

— ὃν ὑμεῖς μὲν παρεδώκατε.] With decision is necessarily intermixed reproof. (Calvin.) After ὑμεῖς I have, with Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz, on good evidence, introduced μὲν into the text.

— κρίναντος ἐκείνου ἀπολ.] 'when he had determined that he should be let go.' With reference to the words of Pilate, Luke xxiii. 14, παίδευσαι οὖν αὐτὸν ἀπολύσαι.

14. τὸν Ἅγιον καὶ Δίκαιον] 'the Holy and Just One.' A designation of the Messiah, (as at iv. 27. Rev. iii. 7. John x. 36.) formed on ὁ Ἅγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ, which occurs at Mark i. 24. Luke iv. 34, and John vi. 69.

— ᾔτησασθε ἄνδρα φονέα χαρ. ἐπὶ α.] I would compare Hesiod, 'Ergy. 190, πολλὰς δὲ κακῶν ρεκτῆρας καὶ ὕβριν ἄνδρα τρέφοντες. The sense of χαρ., 'to be given up for pardon,' is not unfrequent in the later writers.

15. τὸν ἀρχ. τῆς ζωῆς] 'the author of life,' namely, as being the first to rise from the dead, he was thereby the cause of all men rising again. See John i. 4. v. 21. xiv. 6, and the Note. So Heb. ii. 10, ἀρχ. τῆς σωτηρίας.

16. καὶ ἐπὶ—αὐτοῦ.] Render, 'And his name (i. e. the power accompanying the invocation of his name) through faith in his name (i. e. his) hath made strong this man, whom ye do not know.' Ὁλοκληρίαν, 'complete soundness and health,' as in Ia. i. 6, and sometimes in the later Classical writers.

17. οἶδα ὅτι κατὰ ἀγνοίας ἐπράξατε, &c.] When we consider the numerous miracles of our Lord, and the other ample proofs which the Jews had of his being the Messiah, it may seem difficult to understand how they could be said to have done what they did through ignorance. To remove this difficulty, some would refer the words ὥσπερ καὶ οἱ ἄρχοντες ὑμῶν, not to Ignorance, but to ἐπράξατε, in the sense, 'I know that through ignorance ye were induced to do as our rulers did.' But this is violating the construction, and forcing on the passage a sense not inherent in the words. Besides, the ignorance in question extended to both classes. Nor is there any occasion to resort to such a harsh method, since the expression may be taken as said popularly, and consequently need not to be too rigorously interpreted, but only supposed to mean, I am aware that you did what you did, under the influence of error, prejudice, and other carnal passions.' The Apostle does not mean that this ignorance was without blame; for as it resulted from pride, prejudice, and worldly-mindedness, and was co-existent with ample means of information, it was criminal; yet though criminal, he estimates it admitted of some extenuation. For the character of the Apostle's expressions is exoneratory, like the words of his Lord, when interceding for his murderers: Πάτερ, ἄφεσι αὐτοῖς ὁ θεὸς οἰκασί τι ποιῇσι, Luke xiii. 34.

18. ὁ δὲ θεὸς—ἐπλήρωσεν οὕτω] q. d. 'God hath used that ignorance for good, by permitting that you should commit this crime; and moreover, since thus would be fulfilled the declarations of the Prophets concerning the calamities with which the Messiah should be oppressed.' The Rabbins themselves acknowledged that all the Prophets prophesied of the Messiah.

19. We have now the application of the whole discourse, in which the Apostle exhorts them to repentance and newness of life, by a true conversion of the heart. For as μετάν. denotes change of mind, so does ἐπιστρέφω the change of conduct resulting therefrom, and inseparable from true conversion. See Bp. Bull's Harm. Ap., p. 9.

—εἰς τὸ ἐξάλ. ὑμῶν τὰς ἁμ.] Ἐξαλείφειν ἡμῶν, 1. to wipe off oil from any thing; 2. to wipe off characters chalked on a board, or traced on a slate; 3. to obliterate any writing, whether on waxed tablets, or written on parchment, either by scratching out, or crossing out. And, as crossing out accounts in a ledger implies that the sums are discharged, or the payment forgiven, so the word came to mean, in a figurative sense, to wipe off offences, as in 1s. xliii. 23, ἰσώ σιμι ὁ ἐξαλείφειν τὰς ἀνομίας σου; also 2 Macc. xii. 9, and Eccles. xvi. 20. And Lysias, cited by Wetstein, ὅπως ἐξαλειφθῇ αὐτῶν τὰ ἁμαρτήματα.

—ὅπως ἂν ἔλθῃ, &c.] Ὅπως ἂν is by

most modern Expositors taken to mean when, or after that (for ἐπειδὴν); by others it is interpreted until, i. e. 'waiting until.' The latter rendering, however, involves a harsh ellipsis; and as to the former, though examples of ὅπως in the sense of time are frequent, yet not with ἂν, and only as used of time past. Indeed, the sense thus arising is far from satisfactory. Hence it is better, with the Syr., and many eminent Commentators, from Luther downward, to take it in the sense so that, in order that, as Luke ii. 35, Matt. vi. 5, et alibi. Render, 'that so the times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord;' i. e. 'that ye may see with joy the time which the Lord hath appointed as the period of refreshing.' Ἀνάψυξις denotes, 1. a regaining one's breath after it has been interrupted; 2. a breathing-time from some labour, a rest from trouble, or deliverance from evil generally; 3. (by implication) the happiness occasioned by such a change. What particular period is here designated, Expositors are not agreed. It must, of course, be at the coming of the Messiah; but some refer that to his coming at the destruction of Jerusalem; others, to his coming at the end of the world; and others, again, his coming in the Millennium reign. As to the first view, it is, I apprehend, untenable. The third has been ingenuously, but not satisfactorily, defended. It seems safest to adopt the second; by which the ἀνάψυξις of the present passage will be the same with the ἀναισις at 2 Thess. i. 7, ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ μετ' ἀγγέλων, 'the restitution of all things.' In the expression ἀπὸ προσώπου τοῦ Κυρίου we have a Hebrew periphrasis, for ἀπὸ Κυρίου, which means, 'by God's providence.' Instead of the common reading προκεχειρισμένον, some of the most ancient MSS., most of the ancient Versions, and all the early Editions, except the Erasmian, have προκεχειρισμένον, which is confirmed by several of the ancient Fathers, has been approved by most Commentators, and has been received by almost every Editor from Bengel and Wetstein downwards; and justly; for the common reading seems to have been either a false alteration of some Critics, who did not understand the expression, or a gloss thereon. Render, 'him who was of old destined and appointed for you (i. e. for your relief and salvation), even Jesus Christ.' Thus, in the later writers, προχειρίζω τινά τινι signifies 'to set any one apart to any office.' Some would here sink the προ, which, indeed, in Classical Greek, is merged in the proper signification of the word; but this is not permitted by 1 Pet. i. 20, προγεγενημένου (Χριστοῦ) πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου.

21. ὃν δεῖ οὐρανὸν μὲν διέξασθαι, &c.] Of these words the true scope is to anticipate a possible objection,—that if Jesus had been the Mes-

of speech, which, expressed in full, would stand thus: ἐν ᾧ εἰσῆλθε ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, καὶ ἐξῆλθεν ἀφ' ἡμῶν. Comp. Eurip. Phœn. 543. Moreover, ἕνα τούτων is to be referred to τῶν συνελθόντων, &c. at v. 21; by a sort of hyperbaton not unusual in the Classical writers; as Herodot. iii. 18.

At ver. 22, with ἀρξάμενος ἀπὸ τοῦ βαπτ., &c., I would compare Philostr. Vit. Apoll. i. 24, οἱ δὲ λοιποὶ, ἀπὸ Ἰωνίας καὶ Λυδίας ἀρξάμενοι, διεφθάρσαν.

23. ἔστησαν] 'adstare jusscrunt,' set up, proposed.

24. καρδιογνώστα πάντων] 'searcher of all hearts.' It has been doubted whether this should be referred to God the Father, or God the Son. Certainly the appellation is not unfrequent in the Old Test., Josephus, and Philo, as applied to the former. But that it is equally applicable to the latter, appears from John xvi. 30, where see Note. See also John i. 48—50. ii. 24. vi. 69. xxi. 17. Apoc. ii. 23. Κύριος is an usual appellation of Christ our Saviour; and besides that the reference in question is confirmed by the connexion with ver. 21, there would be a peculiar propriety in addressing this prayer to him, as being the Head of the Church, and he who originally appointed the other Apostles.

—ἀνάδειξον] 'declare.' It is well observed by Chrysostom, that they do not say ἐκλεῖναι, but ἀνάδειξον τὸν ἐκλεγέντα, because every thing has been known and determined by God long before it has even entered into the thoughts of men.' Similarly it is said, Joseph. Ant. vi. 5. 6, (cited by Wetstein) ἐγὼ μὲν ἀπείδεα τούτων, οὐκ αὐτὸς (ὁ Θεός) ἐξελέξατο.

For the common reading, ἐκ τούτων τῶν δύο ἕνα οὐν ἐξελέξω, nearly all the MSS., Versions, and the Editions up to that of R. Stephens, have οὐν ἐξελέξω—ἕνα, which has been received by every Editor from Bengel to Scholz.

25. τὸν κλῆρον τῆς διακονίας τ. καὶ ἀποστ.] 'the appointment to this ministry.' This is exegetical of τῆς διακονίας just before. Παρέβη, 'abandoned, deserted'; by a metaphor taken from a traveller who deserts the right road. Comp. 2 Pet. ii. 15. A very rare use of the word, but of which I have noted one example elsewhere;

namely, Joseph. Ant. xiv. 9. 2, οὐδὲν πρὸς Ὑ. εὐνοίας καὶ πίστιως παρέβη.

—πορευθῆναι εἰς τὸν τόπον τ. ἴδ.] These words have been variously explained; but the common interpretation (by which τὸν τόπον τὸν ἴδιον is taken to mean the place suited to him—namely, the place of destruction) may be considered the true one, as being recommended by its simplicity and its suitableness to the usage both of the Jewish and Heathen writers, and confirmed by several passages of the Apostolical Fathers. The following examples will suffice. Baal Turin on Numb. xxiv. 25. 'Balaam ivit in locum suum,' i. e. Gehenna. Max. Tyr. Dias. 25, where it is said that, upon the dissolution of the body, the soul is called to its own place, ἐπὶ τὸν αὐτὸν τόπον.

26. ἔδωκαν κλήρους.] The exact modus in which they cast the lots cannot be determined; various being the methods by which the ancients practised the sortilegium. They used to cast bits of parchment, or pieces of the tabula scriptoria, with the names inscribed, into an urn. And this kind of sortitio most Commentators here understand. Now the lots are said to be their on whom the lots are cast, and to fall upon him who comes off successful in the sortitio. Συγκαταψυφίσει properly denotes 'to choose by common suffrage,' and then 'to number with or unto,' συγκταριθμεῖν. This deciding of a doubtful matter by casting lots was understood to be a mode of submitting to the will of the Almighty; and was, therefore, from the earliest times, resorted to, in the creation of kings, or the appointment of priests. See the numerous Classical citations in Ætæa. Synop., and compare Levit. xvi. 8. Numb. xxi. 34. Josh. xiii. 6.

II. 1. συμπληροῦσθαι.] See Note on Luke ix. 51. At Πεντηκοστῆς the Commentators suppose an ellipsis of ἡμέρας or ιορτῆς. But there is perhaps no ellipsis at all; Πεντηκ. being a substantive and an appellative. On this point see Horne's Introd.

—ἦσαν ἅπαντες.] Meaning, according to some, the Apostles only; or rather, we may suppose, with others, the disciples at large, mentioned

at i. 15. For (as Kuinoel observes) the subject at i. 15 is the assembly of the 120 disciples whom Peter addressed, and from whom Matthias was taken into the Apostolic body; while the eleven Apostles are only mentioned en passant. Now with the predicative, which is destitute of a subject, the subject immediately antecedent, and not that of which mention was made en passant, but pro-ferendy, ought to be taken. This, too, is clear from ἅπαντες, not οὗτοι, being used. Indeed, the absence of the rest of the disciples on so solemn a festival cannot be supposed.

2. ὥσπερ φέρομ. πνοῆς β.] This use of φέρεσθαι and its compounds, to denote the rushing of winds sweeping along like a tempest, and associated with the adjectives πολλός, βίαιος, and others of similar signification, is frequent in the Classical writers. So Ælian, Hist. An. vii. 24. ἐκιδόν τὸ πνεῦμα βίαιον ἐκφέρηται.

— τὸν οἶκον.] Doubtless the ὑπερφύον, supra i. 13, where see Note.

3. διαμερίζουμαι.] Not, divides (which sense would require διασχιζόμεναι), but dispartitæ, divided out to each from one common source.

— γλῶσσαι πυρὸς] i. e. pointed flames; the top of a flame of fire being called a tongue, from its resemblance thereto. Thus in the form of the flame there was a peculiar adaptation to the thing designated.

— ἐκάθισέ τε ἐφ' ἑνα ἕκαστον α.] At ἐκάθισα some would supply Πνεῦμα, taken from Πνεύματος. Kuinoel, however, with reason, objects that the phrase Πνεῦμα ἅγ. ἐκάθισα is unexampled. He might have added, that Πνεῦμα cannot be taken from Πνεύματος afterwards, because that is not in the same sentence; for, notwithstanding what some think, a new one commences at καὶ ἐπλήσθ. Besides, there Πν. ἅγ. signifies only the influence of the Spirit, not the Spirit personally. As to the true ellipse, Valcknaer alone has seen that ἐκάθισα does not belong to γλῶσσαι, or to πυρὸς; but that we are to supply ἐκάστη, quod evolendum ex ἕκαστον, as follows: ἐκάθισα (scil. ἐκάστη τῶν γλῶσσῶν) ἐφ' ἑνα ἕκαστον αὐτῶν. Thus the sense is: 'And there were seen as it were tongues of fire, distributing themselves, and settling upon them, i. e. one on each.'

These appearances were symbolical; representing emblematically, 1. the power and purifying effects of the Holy Spirit (see Matt. iii. 11); 2. and chiefly the gift of tongues, the first-fruits of the Spirit.

4. ἤρξαντο λαλεῖν ἐτέραις γλώσσαις.] Meaning, languages other than those which they were acquainted with; i. e. such as they were ignorant of, and which are specified at ver. 8—11.

— ἐδίδου α. ἀποφθέγγεσθαι] 'gave them power to speak out,' 'show forth.' Ἀποφθέγγεσθαι being used both of deep and sententious, and also of divinely inspired and prophetic language. So Jambl. de Myst. iii. 17, (cited by Elsner) ἐνίστα τῶν εὐημελῶν τινα ἀνθρώπων ποιῶ (ὁ Θεὸς) μετὰ σοφίας λόγον ἀποφθέγγεσθαι. Plutarch, de Pythiæ Orac. p. 405, (speaking of the Delphic priestesses) πρῶτον μὲν ὥσπερ εἰρηται, τὰ πλείστα κἀκείναι καταλογάδην ἀπεφθέγγοντο, and p. 268, ἀποφθέγγεσθαι λόγια καὶ χρησμοφδεῖν τοῖς ἰερῶσιν. And Philo de Joseph. p. 543, relates that, on his having interpreted dreams to Pharaoh, the king said to him, οὐ γὰρ ἀνεν Θεοῦ ταύτ' ἀποφθέγγεσθαί μοι δοκεῖς.

δ. ἄνδρες εὐλαβεῖς] 'religious men'; εὐλαβῆ being here (as also at Luke ii. 25, and infra x. 2,) synonymous with εὐσεβῆς, though the two words properly differ in sense; εὐσεβῆς (as Tittman shows) signifying that reverence of God which is exerted in actions, and especially in acts of worship; while εὐλαβῆ points at the mind itself, and denotes one who is fearful of offending God in word or deed. Hence εὐλαβῆς answers to the German Gottesfürchtig, and our God-fearing; εὐσεβῆς, to our pious, or devout.

These, consisting of foreign Jews and a few proselytes, had taken up their temporary residence at Jerusalem, for the purpose of those greater facilities for religious duties which the place afforded, and because the advent of the Messiah was then expected.

— ἀπὸ παντὸς ἔθνους τ. ὕ. τ. ο.] This is a general, not an universal proposition; and consequently to be taken with limitation, as merely denoting the various parts of the world. Of this hyperbolic use of πᾶς several examples have been adduced by Bp. Pearce. The expression ὑπὸ τὸν οὐρανόν has been supposed entirely Hebraic; but the same idiom is shown by Kypke to occur sometimes in Plato.

6. τῆς φωνῆς ταύτης.] What particular voice is here meant, has been variously disputed. Some, most improbably, refer it to the ἦχος at ver. 2; while others regard φωνῆς as put for φήμης, by a use occasionally found in the Sept.; thus supposing ταύτης to stand for πρὸς τοῦτον. Since, however, φωνή used for φήμη nowhere else occurs in the New Test., we may best understand φωνῆς of the noise produced by the assembled multitude praying or conversing together (v. 2), and doubtless in a state of considerable agitation.

6. συνεχύθη] 'were thrown into great agitation.' So Achill. Tat., p. 321, (cited by Wetst.) ὡς οὖν ταῦτα ἠκούσαμεν, συνεχύθη.

This was their first feeling. Their second was amazement; ἔξίσταντο καὶ ἐθαύμαζον.

— διαλέκτῳ.] Not dialect, but language; in which sense the word is always used in the New Test. and Josephus, and frequently in the Classical writers.

7. πάντες.] This (not found in many MSS.) has been cancelled by Matthæi and Scholz, but retained, within brackets, by Griesbach and Vater.

— Γαλιλαῖοι.] The sense is: 'They were amazed at seeing persons nearly all of one country, and that a rustic and illiterate one, all speaking foreign languages, and addressing each of them in his own tongue.'

8. ἐν ᾗ ἐγεννήθημεν.] This seems to be a popular phrase for τῇ ἡλικίᾳ, native. In the words following supply οὗτος. Render, 'We, I say, who are Parthians, Medes,' &c. At ἀκούομεν there is a repetitio, in order to clear the sense long suspended by the interposed portion at ver. 9, 10.

9. Ἰουδαῖαν.] What this name can here have to do in a list, of which the air is one of foreign nations, it is not easy to see. And as to what has been urged by some in its defence, it proceeds on the supposition that the language of Judæa was a different one from that of Galilee; whereas there is great reason to think that the latter differed from the former only as the English of Middlesex differs from that of Somersetshire, or the Italian of Tuscany from that of Venice or Genoa. Upon the whole, it is plain that Ἰουδαῖαν cannot be accounted for in any satisfactory way, and must (as it has been by the most eminent Critics) be regarded as corrupt; though probably to be emended from some hitherto uncollated MSS. In the mean time I have little doubt but that the true reading is, according to the conjecture of Barthius (which had also occurred to myself), Ἰδουμαίαν,—a very similar word to the common reading; for Δ and Μ are perpetually confounded; and part of the Μ being faded off, would leave a Δ; and the abbreviation for δοῦ (δα) is very similar to ου. In fact, the words Ἰουδαῖαν and Ἰδου-

μαίαν are often confounded, especially in the MSS. of Josephus. By Idumæa we may understand that tract of country situated on the other side of Jordan, and South-east of Judæa, which was sometimes called Arabia Petrea; and so the word is sometimes used in Josephus. And we know that Damascus was now in possession of Arctas, king of Arabia Petrea. There is, indeed, the greatest reason to think that the territory subject to him also extended to that part of Arabia which was N. E. from Judæa, and would thus be almost continuous with Mesopotamia. And it is plain that the countries are mentioned in geographical order, from East to West.

10. κατὰ Κυρήνην.] Render, 'near to Cyrene;' as infra xvi. 7. xxvii. 2, and sometimes in the Classical writers, though πρὸς and περί are more usual; ex. gr. Joseph. Ant. xvi. 6. 1, τοῖς ἀπὸ τῆς Ἀσίας Ἰουδαίοις, καὶ δούτοις ἢ πρὸς Κυρήνην Λιβύην κατὰ χεῖν. Dio Cass., p. 374. 33, and 704. 82, τὴν Λιβύην τὴν περὶ Κυρήνην.

At ἐπιδημοῦντες supply ἔδω, i. e. at Jerusalem. So Athen., p. 361, (cited by Wetstein) ἡ Ῥώμην κατοικοῦντες, καὶ οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες ἐν πόλει. Accordingly, by οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες Ῥωμαῖοι are to be understood Romans, whether of Jewish birth or proselytes, (i. e. such as had either been made citizens of Rome, or Roman proselytes to Judaism) who were sojourning at Jerusalem. So Ἀρτιοχίαις is used in Josephus for Jews dwelling at Antioch.

11. τὰ μεγαλεῖα.] See Note on Luke i. 48.

12. διηπόρουν.] The full sense is, 'were utterly at a loss.' By πάντες are meant the persons just mentioned, namely, the foreigners and foreign Jews, to whom are, in the next verse, opposed the Ἕτεροι, meaning those of Judæa.

— λέγοντες.] Supply τίνας. Τί ἐν εἰλε τοῦτο εἶναι; is a popular idiom, denoting, 'What should this mean?' i. e. How has it arisen? For εἰλεῖν and βούλεσθαι often signify no more than our English would or should. So Herodot. i. 74 (cited by Wetstein) τί εἰλεοι σαρπηλίου οὐ τίρας;

13. χλευάζοντες.] 'mocking, or jeering.' The word is best derived from χέλειν, synonymous with χάλλειν, the lip, and signifies to 'threat on the lip.' Comp. Ps. xxii. 7.

Instead of χλευάζ, a few ancient MSS. and some Fathers have διαχλ, which is received by

- 14 Σταθεῖς δὲ Πέτρος σὺν τοῖς ἑνδεκα, ἐπῆρε τὴν φωνὴν αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀπεφθέγγετο αὐτοῖς· Ἄνδρες Ἰουδαῖοι καὶ οἱ κατοικοῦντες Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἅπαντες, τοῦτο ὑμῖν γνωστὸν almost every Editor from Griesbach downwards, but without sufficient reason; for the external evidence in favour of the new reading is weak, and the internal evidence not strong. Simple verbs are not unfrequently changed into compounds, to communicate a stronger sense, or for greater elegance. And χλευάζω occurs more than once elsewhere in this book, and often in the LXX; καὶ γὰρ, no where, either in the New Test. or the LXX.

[— γλεύκους.] Not, new-made wine (which is the proper signification of the word), for that is forbidden by the time of year; but new, i. e. sweet wine, which is very intoxicating. See Is. lix. 26. And so γλεύκος occurs in Job xxxii. 19, and sometimes in the Classical writers.

This was, Markland thinks, intended as a sneer at the meanness of their condition; since no person of respectability tapped the last year's γλεύκος so early as June, unless compelled by necessity. Yet new wine (notwithstanding what is said Luke v. 39) might be preferred by some persons, on account of its intoxicating qualities. See Hedyllus ap. Athenæum, p. 176, ἡδύαι δὲ γλεύκος μαμειθυσμένα παλγνία μουσῶν; and we know from Plut., Columella, and Pliny, (see also Hor. Sat. iv. 2. 19.) that some sorts of wine (probably from a peculiarity in the making of it), if kept in a cool place, retained their sweetness for a long time, and hence were called ἀλ γλεύκος.

14. σὺν τοῖς ἑνδ.] Namely, to show their consent and concurrence in what Peter should say, who was to be the speaker.

— Ἄνδρες Ἰουδαῖοι, &c.] From this ver. to v. 36, we have the address of Peter, which produced such an effect on the minds both of those who wondered and those who derided, that 3000 persons were then added to the Church of Christ. Some have maintained that only the substance of the address is recorded, and that many things are omitted, which were said by the Apostle. The former position may be true; but the latter is more than can safely be affirmed. At least an inspired writer cannot be supposed to omit any thing necessary to be recorded. Ἐνωτίασθε, 'give into your ears;' and, by implication, 'listen attentively to:' an Alexandrian word then occurring in the LXX. and the later Greek writers, and probably derived from the common dialect.

15. ὑπολαμβάνετε] lit. 'sup-ponite,' 'take up [a thought].'

— Ἐρα τρίτη.] Before which time none but moderate characters took strong drink: indeed no

persons who made profession of religion took food or drink of any kind until after morning prayers.

16. τοῦτό ἐστι.] Meaning, 'this [state of things] is [a fulfilment of] what was predicted,' &c.

17—21. These verses are a citation from Joel ii. 28—32 (in the Hebrew, iii. 1—5), but with some slight variation both from the Hebrew and the Sept. The chief difference is in ἐν ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις being used for μετὰ ταῦτα. The words λέγει ὁ Θεός form no part of the quotation, but are an insertion by the Evangelist, to indicate the person who says this. The two last clauses of ver. 17 are merely interchanged in their order. At ver. 18, γὰρ is inserted, which strengthens the sense; καὶ γὰρ signifying quoniam. The words καὶ προφητεύσουσιν are added (from the preceding context) by way of explanation. Finally, at ver. 19, the words ἀνδρες and καὶ τῶ are supplied to strengthen the sense; especially as they are often found joined to ἐν οὐρανῷ and ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς in the Old Test. See Exod. xx. 4. Josh. ii. 11. The passage contains (as the Jewish Interpreters themselves admit) a highly figurative description of the state of things which shall precede and accompany the coming of the Messiah; namely, by an extraordinary outpouring of the Spirit. But Peter himself did not then understand the full sense of the prophecy, as regarded 'all flesh,' i. e. men of all nations, both Jews and Gentiles. πνεῦμα, rendered by the LXX. μετὰ ταῦτα, is admitted by Kimchi to be equivalent to the Hebrew words which correspond to ἐν ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις in other passages of the LXX.; and the phrase is universally granted by the Jewish Commentators to denote the times of the Messiah, under which the closing scheme of Divine revelation would be promulgated. Ἀπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος is said to be for πνεῦμα, as in the Hebrew. But it rather seems to be a slight alteration adapted to the sense rather than the words, i. e. (by an ellipsis of μέρος) a portion of my Spirit. What kind of spiritual effects are meant, is clear from the following verses. Ἐκχεῶ is, like the correspondent terms in Greek and Latin, used to suggest the exuberance of the gifts imparted. The expression πᾶσαν σάρκα, 'all persons,' seems to denote some of all orders and ranks, and (in a secondary sense) of all nations.

17. προφητ.] This must, in the full sense, signify 'speaking under Divine inspiration,' namely, by prophesying (in the strict sense of the expression), including the lesser degrees of the προφητεία (see Rom. xii. 6. 1 Cor. xii. 10. xiii.

2.), which was preaching and teaching the truths of the Gospel. The next clause intimates that God would also reveal his will to both old and young, in a manner which partook of the προφ. just before mentioned, namely, by visions and dreams.

The terms προφητεία and δρασις are sometimes synonymous; but here δρασις is equivalent to ὄπτασις: in either of which terms an appearance is presented to the person, whether waking or by trance; whereas ἐνύπνιον is always a dream, in which something is preternaturally suggested to the mind. And here we should render, 'shall dream visions,' i. e. shall see visions in dreams. Thus at 1 Sam. iii. 1, δρασις διαστύλλουσα denotes a distinct revelation by supernatural appearance, in opposition to the less direct revelation by dreams or otherwise. With respect to the present passage, the δρασις was fulfilled in the case of St. Paul; the ἐνύπνια in that of St. Peter. Finally, what is said at ver. 19 was remarkably fulfilled by the communication of the Spiritual Gifts, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles and in St. Paul's Epistles.

For ἐνύπνια, some MSS. have ἐνυπνίους, which has been edited by Griesbach and Scholz, whilst the common reading is retained by Matthæi and Vater.

19, 20. All that we can infer from these verses is, that the events in question will take place at 'the times of the Messiah.' But whether they are to be referred to the first advent of our Lord, at the destruction of Jerusalem, or to his second, at the day of judgment, Commentators are not agreed. They are exactly parallel to, and admit of, nay perhaps require, the same mode of explanation as Matt. xxiv. 29. Luke xxi. 25. where see Notes. But the final and full accomplishment of these prophecies will probably not take place before the consummation of all things.

19. αἶμα καὶ πῦρ.] A formula exactly corresponding to our fire and sword. The ἀτμίδα καπνοῦ (alluding to the smoke of burning towns) is graphic, and completes the picture of devastation.

20. ὁ ἥλιος μεταστραφήσεται εἰς σκ.] See Note on Matt. xxiv. 29, where we have the same imagery, and admitting of the same explanation.

— ἡ σελήνη εἰς αἶμα.] By αἶμα is here to be understood that obscure sanguineous hue, which the heaven assumes when the atmosphere is filled with smoke and vapours; and especially the lurid appearance it presents when smoke and flames are thrown up by earthquakes. See Kitt. Comp. Rev. vi. 12. viii. 8.

— τὴν ἡμέραν Κυρίου τὴν μεγ. καὶ ἐπιφ.] Meaning, a day memorable for the visitation of God's punishment on the guilty, and therefore terrible, as the Hebrew is rendered, though the former sense is assigned to the word ἡμέρα in other passages. 21. πᾶς ὃς—σωθήσεται.] The best Commentators are agreed that ἐπικ. τὸ ὄνομα here denotes religious invocation, as a disciple of Christ, by embracing his religion. Σωθ. denotes not temporal deliverance only (to which many recent Commentators confine it), but chiefly that spiritual one, by which men are conducted to the full salvation. At any rate, the words ὁ ἂν ἐπικαλέσῃται τὸ ὄνομα Κυρίου, taken with other passages, representing worship as paid to Christ in common with Jehovah, strongly attest the Deity of the Redeemer.

22. After having shown that a Redeemer had been promised, who should 'save to the uttermost' his faithful worshippers, the Apostle proceeds to turn their attention to the grand subject of his discourse,—showing that JESUS OF NAZARETH, whom they have crucified, is that personage, (proved to be such by his resurrection to life,) and pointing out the purposes for which he was raised from the dead. On this is engrained a notice of the validity of the general evidence in favour of Jesus's Messiahship, and the nature of that evidence. Then it is subjoined that this Jesus it is, thus raised and invested with supreme dignity, who hath procured this plentiful effusion of the Holy Spirit, as attested by the effects which they now see and hear. Of Him, too, it is added, the words of Ps. cx. 1, are meant, which their own Rabbins referred to the Messiah. Hence (the Apostle concludes) they may be assured that this Jesus, whom they have crucified, is the Lord and Christ appointed of God.

But to consider the passage in detail, the Apostle addresses them by the conciliatory appellation Ἰσραηλῖται. Ναζωραῖον is subjoined to Ἰησοῦν, because, in mentioning his name thus formally, it was proper to add, what had, indeed, become a usual appellation; see Mark xvi. 6. Acts iii. 6. x. 36. — ἄνδρα ἀπὸ—δυνάμεως.] The construction is, ἀνδρα ἄποδ. εἰς ὑμᾶς εἶναι ἀπὸ Θεοῦ. Δυνάμισι, τέρασι, and σημείοις, are nearly synonymous, but combined to strengthen the sense, as including every sort of supernatural work.

23. τῇ ὠρισμένῃ βουλῇ καὶ προγν.] The best Commentators are agreed, that τῇ ὠρισμ. βουλῇ
 means the determinate, and consequently immutable, counsel of God (so Luko xxi. 22, κατὰ τὸ ὠρισμένον); and that προγνώσει signifies decree;
 a signification common both to Hellenistic and Classical Greek. Ἐκδοτον δοῦναι or λαβεῖν
denotes to give up, or receive, at discretion, to treat at one's pleasure; and is used of those who are given up to their enemies. The expression διὰ χειρῶν ἀνόμων, as conjoined with *τῇ ὠρισμ.
 βουλῇ—Θεοῦ*, is meant to suggest, that God's counsels and decrees did not absolve the Jews of guilt in putting Jesus to death, since they were still free agents. Προσπήξαντες scil. σταυρώ- σας, is added, to show that the putting to death was
 by the most cruel and ignominious mode.

— ἀνείλετε.] A good many MSS. have here ἀνείλετε (as also ἀνείλετο at vii. 21, and ἐξείλετο at xxiii. 27), which reading has been edited by Scholz; but on insufficient grounds. At least he ought, in consistency, to have received ἐξείλετο at vii. 10, on stronger evidence. But indeed it is doubtful whether these Alexandrian forms, which swarm in the MSS. of the Alexandrian recension, were not introduced by the scribes.

24. λύσας τὰς ὠδῖνας τοῦ θαν.] The best Commentators, ancient and modern, are of opinion that ὠδῖνας denotes not pains, but bonds;
 a signification, indeed, scarcely known in the Classical writers, but occurring in the LXX. This interpretation, they think, is supported by the following λύσας, and especially by κρατεῖσθαι, and is confirmed by certain passages cited by Wetstein.
 But that λύσας may only mean removal, without any allusion to a bond, is clear from what I have annotated on the words λύσει τῶν δεσμάτων in Thucyd. ii. 101. So also Job xxxix. 2, ὠδῖνας αἱ ἐν τῷ ἔλκετι, and Lycophr. Cass. 1198, σφί ὠδῖνας ἐξέλυσε λαθραίας γονῆς. We may,
 therefore, with reason retain the common version,
pains, and merely suppose that in κρατεῖσθαι
 there is an allusion to the notion of tight bonds, as in Ælian, H. A. xii. 5, τοῦτε τῶν ὠδῶν λύσει δεσμοῦς.

— οὐκ ἦν δυνατόν, &c.] Meaning, morally

impossible, i. e. consistently with the circumstances of the case, the dignity of His person (as being 'the Prince of life,' iii. 15, and having life in himself, John v. 26; see also John x. 18), the nature of His undertaking, the accomplishment of the work for which He came on earth, the purpose of God the Father, and the prophecies of Scripture.

25. The Apostle now proceeds to show why it was impossible; and that by a reference to the word of God.

— εἰς αὐτόν] 'concerning,' or 'with reference to, him.' So Diod. Sic. (cited by Elsnor), εἰς οὐδὲν ἑτέρον ἢ τὸ παρὸν λέγειν. Whether this reference be primary or secondary has been disputed. The most eminent Interpreters, however, have long been of opinion, that the 16th Psalm has, in many of its parts, a double sense; one historical, of David, the other mystical and allegorical, of Christ. Be that as it may, the latter, if secondary in order, is primary in importance. It should seem that David spoke in the person of the Messiah.

— προωρώμην.] Προορᾶσθαι here signifies
 'to be so mindful of, as to set always before us.'
 The Aorist is expressive of what is perpetually and habitually done. By the Lord is meant his power to save. The words ὅτι ἐκ δεξιῶν μου ἐστίν are intended to show in what light the Lord is considered; namely, as a helper. In these some recognise an allusion to those παρά-κλητοι, who stood as any one's supporters when he was brought to trial; and we may compare the παρακληυστοὶ καθήμενοι mentioned in Thucyd.
 vi. 13. ἵνα μὴ σαλ., 'that I should not succumb under calamity.'

26. διὰ τοῦτο εὐφράνθῃ ἡ καρδ. μου.] This and ἡγαλλιάσατο ἡ γλῶσσά μου are meant to denote extreme joy, both that which is inwardly felt, and that outwardly expressed.

The διὰ τοῦτο refers to the reason for this exultation,—which was, that he should be preserved amidst the sorrows that were coming upon him, and could look forward with joy to the triumph which awaited him; see Hebr. xii. 2.

— ἐπ' ἐλπίδι] 'upon, or in, hope;' namely, of being raised up; see Rom. viii. 21. This use of ἐπὶ also occurs in Xenoph. Mem. ii. 1. 18.

27. εἰς ἄδου] scil. δόμον, or οἶκον; see Notes on Matt. vii. 18. Luke xviii. 23. v. 31. Οὐδέ δώσεις, 'nor wilt thou suffer.' For διδόναι, like the Hebr. נָתַן, denotes sometimes not a physical,

but a moral giving by permission. Τὸν Ὁσιόν σου. This is usually rendered, 'thy pious worshipper;' a sense which may very well suit David, but not CHRIST, with reference to whom the sense must be, 'me who am pre-eminently the Holy One; and thine, as united to Thee in the Godhead.' Ἰδεῖν διαφθοράν, 'to experience putrefaction,' i. e. to lie so long in the grave as to be exposed thereto.

28. Ἐγνώρισας—ζωῆς.] Render, 'Thou hast made known (i. e. opened out) paths of life,' i. e. the means of avoiding permanent death, and attaining unto life and glory; or, as referred to David, life everlasting. The next clause adverts to the state of glory, and the fulness of joy which should succeed to that 'earthly race which was set before him;' after which he should sit down at the right hand of God, and be blessed with his immediate presence.

29. The Apostle now proceeds to propound an argument, resting on the position that the Messiah is meant in the Psalm in question; and he does this by tacitly encountering an objection which might be made; q. d. These are the words of David, and are to be understood of him. In answering which the Apostle introduces the mention of David in highly reverential language, calling him Patriarch. 'I may be permitted (says he) freely to tell you concerning the Patriarch David, that he both died and was buried, and his sepulchre remains unto this day;' [and, indeed, remained, Jerome testifies, in the time of the emperor Adrian.] And as David died, was buried, and his body experienced corruption, so it followed that, in the passage adverted to, he could not have spoken of himself.

30. In this and the next two verses the Apostle clinches the argument. The sense may be thus expressed: 'Now he being a Prophet (i. e. one endowed with a supernatural knowledge of future events), and, in that quality, knowing that God had sworn a solemn oath to him, that from the fruit of his loins (i. e. from his posterity) Christ should, as to his human nature, descend, in order to sit on his throne; he, foreseeing this event, spoke (in the passage in question) of the resurrection of Christ, when he said that his soul, &c. On this promise see 2 Sam. vii. 11, 16, and the other passages adduced in the references. The expression ὄρκῳ ὤμοσας, as applied to God, of course denotes only His 'fixed and immutable purpose;' q. d. sanctissime promisit.

The words τὸ κατὰ σάρκα—Χριστόν were rejected by Mill and Bengel, and have been cancelled by Griesbach, Lachmann, and Knapp; but on very slender authority—only that of three MSS.; for, as to the reading of the Cod. Cantab., it is evidently an emendation. And that the words were formerly in that MS., is plain from their being found in the Latin Version which accompanies it. Of the three MSS. which are said not to have the words, the Barb. I is of no authority; and the other two (the Cod. Alex. and the Cod. Ephr.), though very ancient MSS., yet bear perpetual marks of the liberties taken with the text by some biblical Critics of an early period. This added to the fact that the words are found in all the other MSS. (not very far short of 200), including the most ancient of MSS., the Cod. Vaticanus, and (as we have seen) the Cod. Cantab., à primâ manu, makes the external evidence against the words very slight. And as to the internal, it is surely far more probable that the words should have been accidentally omitted in two or three MSS., than that they should have been forced into all the other MSS. The evidence, indeed, of the Versions—consisting of the printed Syriac (Peschito), the Vulg., Coptic, Æthiopic, Armenian, and Arabic—may seem adverse to the words. But as to the first, though the printed Syriac has them not, yet the MSS., I am informed, have. And the authority of the Vulg., which might seem weighty, is, in fact, far otherwise in cases like the present, where it is unsupported by the ancient Italie; and that the words were read in that Version, is plain from what is brought forward by Sabatier; see Matthæi. As to the authority of the other Versions, it is but slender. Again, the evidence of the Fathers against the words is any thing but determinate; since, while some of them adduce the verse without the words, others (as Theophylact, Theodoret, and especially Chrysostom) cite it with them. Indeed, it may be said that the evidence of Fathers, in cases like the present, of words supposed to have been inserted, is the less to be relied on, since citing, as they perpetually do, from memory, they often omit words, especially such as are not to their purpose.

As to what has been urged against the words by Heinrichs and Kuinoel, that they are placed differently in different MSS., the truth is that in only some two or three MSS. are they thus composed, and that evidently from the carelessness of scribes. Finally, as to their argument, that the omission of the words produces a more difficult reading, and therefore such as is the more likely to be genuine; this, though of greater weight than the former, is far from being conclusive; also even that Critical canon has its exceptions. It cannot, for instance, well apply in cases like the present, where the more difficult reading is found in only two or three MSS. out of a very great number; for then it is more probable that the reading in question arose from alteration, than that a false reading should have crept into all the other MSS. And if those few MSS. be such as abound in unauthorised and rash alterations of all sorts, the suspicion of alteration in such a case is greatly increased.

I have therefore felt fully justified in retaining the words, especially as they are considered genuine by Scholz. Comp. Rom. i. 3. 2 Tim. ii. 8. Rom. ix. 5.

32. τοῦτον τὸν Ἰ. &c.] The evidence for this resurrection is now adverted to, and that by a reference not only to the positive testimony of the Apostles, disciples, and other eye-witnesses (as contrasted with the want of evidence for the assertion of the Jews, that he did see corruption, and did not rise), but to that testimony of his resurrection, and consequent Messiahship, which was afforded by his exaltation to the right hand of God; by his having obtained, agreeably to the promise, the sending of the Holy Spirit and the copious effusion of his gifts,—producing effects such as they now see and hear, and which, by their miraculous nature, attest the Divine character of Him who procured them.

—ἐπαγγελίαν τοῦ ἁγ. Πνεύμ.] φορτὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἐπαγγελμένον. By τοῦτο we are to understand the whole of the transactions before narrated.

34. οὐ γὰρ Δαυὶδ, &c.] The Apostle's argument is this: 'That David speaketh not concerning himself, but the Messiah (see ver. 25, et seq.), is manifest from what he says Ps. cx. 1, where he speaks of a Lord who was to be at God's right hand till all his enemies were subdued. For that patriarch himself is not raised from the dead, and ascended into the heavens, to sit at God's right hand; therefore he must have spoken this of some other person; namely, of Jesus Christ, who hath set forth this which ye now see and hear.'

The concluding words of the quotation ('until I make thine enemies,' &c.) suggest the inevitable destruction they would bring upon themselves, if they continued to reject the Saviour.

36. Here we have the conclusion, that this was Jesus, whom they had crucified, was the divinely constituted Lord and Christ.

—ἀσφαλῶς γινώσκειτω.] With this phrase

Wetstein compares from Eunap. Proem., εἰδότες ἀσφαλῶς. The phrase also occurs in Thucyd. i. 37, ἵνα ἀσφαλίστηεν προειδότες. By οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ is meant the Jewish nation; and πᾶς extends the declaration to every individual thereof.

37—44. Here are described the effects produced on the people by the above discourse.

37. ἀκούσαντες.] Supply τοῦτο.

—κατενύγησαν τῇ καρδίᾳ] 'were pierced to the heart.' Κατανύσσειν signifies 'to be pricked through with some sharp instrument;' and is used figuratively of the emotions of violent grief, or deep remorse, whether expressed outwardly, or felt inwardly; see Gen. xxxiv. 7. Ps. cviii. 16. Sept. Ecclus. xii. 12. xlvii. 20. Several examples, too, are adduced by Wetstein and Kypke from the Classical writers. Of these, however, only two are quite to the purpose; namely, Simplicius on Epict., ὡς τοὺς μὴ πάντως νεκρωμένους νύττεισθαι ἐκ τῶν λόγων, and Plutarch, de Animi Tranq. p. 476, where he says that the conscience of evil doers τῇ ψυχῇ μεταμίλειαν αἰμάσσουσιν αἰ καὶ νύττεισθαι ἐναπολείπει.

—τί ποιήσωμεν.] So it is said infra ix. 6, τί με εἴλεως ποιῆσαι; Here must be supplied, from the subject-matter, some such words as are expressed infra xvi. 30, τί με δεῖ ποιεῖν ἵνα σωθῶ;

38. μετανοήσατε.] This repentance must, of course, be supposed to include reformation, by an abandonment of their former preconceived opinions, and by acknowledging Jesus to be the Christ, and embracing his religion by baptism (see Matt. xxviii. 19, and Note), and thereby engaging to observe all his injunctions both of faith and practice. Comp. infra iii. 19, and Bp. Bull's Harm. Apost. p. 9.

—βαπτισθῆτω ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰ. Χρ.] The expression βαπτίζεσθαι ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι τινος is equivalent to εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τινος (which could not here have been used without involving tautology), or ἐν ὀνόματι τινος. In all which cases the preposition denotes dependence on, denotedness to, and obedience to (as 1 Cor. x. 2, βαπτίζεσθαι εἰς τὸν Μωϋσῆν), and should be rendered, not into, but unto. Ὀνόμ. Χρ. is thought to be for Χριστοῦ; but there is rather a reference to the words of Christ at Matt. xxviii. 19, containing the form in baptism, wherein ὄνομα is by no means without force.

38. τὴν δωρεάν τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύμ.] Meaning, chiefly it should seem, not the miraculous gifts
before adverted to, but, as appears from what follows, the ordinary aids and influences of the Spirit, given to every man to profit withal.

39. ὑμῖν ἐστιν ἡ ἐπαγγελία, &c.] 'to you pertains the promise,' namely, of sending the Spirit.

— πᾶσι τοῖς εἰς μακράν.] This is by many recent Expositors taken to mean the Jews dispersed abroad among the nations. But there is no good reason why the expression may not mean, as the ancient and most modern Commentators suppose, the Gentiles, a view strongly confirmed by Ephes. ii. 13. 17, where by οἱ μακράν are denoted the Gentiles, also designated as 'aliens from the commonwealth of Israel.' And it is no sufficient objection to say, that Peter was as yet unacquainted with the truth, that the Gentiles were to be admitted into the Christian covenant. For it appears that the Jews did not deny that the Gentiles were to be admitted to the Messiah's religion, but they thought they could alone become such by becoming proselytes to the Jewish faith. This sense, indeed, seems required by the words following, unless we suppose (what perhaps it may be best to do) that the Apostle had here in view both the dispersed of Israel, and the strangers from the covenant of promise; i. e.
both the dispersed Jews and the Gentiles who as yet stood afar off. That he meant to include the former is probable from a similar mode of expression in Ezek. xi. 16. Mic. iv. 7. Zech. vi. 15, and especially Ezek. vi. 12, and Dan. ix. 7, 'unto us belongeth confusion of faces; unto all Israel,
those that are near, and those that are far off,
through all the countries whither thou hast driven them.' The words ὄσους ἂν προσκαλέσεται Κύριος ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, seem added to further develop this secondary sense of τοῖς μακράν;
q. d. 'all, I say, even as many as the Lord our God may call upon' [to embrace 'the glorious gospel of Christ'].

40. διεμαρτύρετο καὶ παρ.] 'did he earnestly charge and exhort'; see 1 Tim. v. 21.

— σωθήτε ἀπὸ τῆς γ. &c.] This is by some rendered, 'separate yourselves from,' &c.; by others, 'suffer yourselves to be saved.' Yet these cannot be called versions; they are rather para-phrastic glosses. The literal sense is, 'be reserved'; or, taking it as passive or reciprocal,

'save yourselves.' Though by a sensus pragmaticus, suggested by the ἀπὸ, there is here included the idea of separation from, as the means of preservation from, the moral contamination of the world.
We may compare a similar expression in 2 Cor.
vi. 17, ἐξέλθετε ἐκ μέσου αὐτῶν, καὶ ἀφορίσθητε. Numb. xvi. 21, ἀποσχίσθητε ἐκ μέσου τῆς συναγωγῆς; and Ezra x. 11, διαστάλητε ἐκ λαῶν τῆς γῆς. Σκολιάς signifies perverse and generally twisted, by a metaphor taken from what is crooked as opposed to straight. The phrase is borrowed from Deut. xxxii. 5, γενεὰ σκολιὰ καὶ δυστραμμένη.

With respect to the doctrine hence to be inferred, suffice it to say that the air of exhortation here observable, implies at once the necessity for exertion, and also that the power of exertion is present with man to 'work out his salvation.'

41. ἀσμένως.] This—not found in a few ancient MSS. and Fathers—has been by some Biblical Critics supposed spurious; but without any good reason; for it was evidently either omitted by the scribes through inadvertence, or cancelled by the ancient Critics, as seeming to them unnecessary. The μὲν οὖν just before may be rendered whereupon; having a continuative and slightly illative sense. The μὲν is in aposto-sis with the δὲ at the next verse; as Mark xvi.
19. John xix. 24. sq. supra i. 6, and often in this book. Ἀποδέχασθαι, as used of things, signifies 'to approve,' &c., and is often accompanied with ἀσμένως.

— ἐβαπτίσθησαν.] In the first age of Christianity, those who acknowledged Jesus to be the Messiah, were received, by this solemn rite, into the Church; so that a fuller instruction did not precede, but follow baptism. Προσετίθοντο,
'sece adjunxerunt.' Pass. for Middle, as often in this verb. The use of ψυχαὶ for persons is common to the Classical as well as Scriptural writers (so Eurip. Hel. 52, ψυχαὶ δὲ πολλαί), as the Hebr. נַפְשׁ for אָדָם. Indeed the idiom is found in all languages.

42. Having recorded the amazing increase to the members of the visible Church, the Apostle takes occasion to notice their manner of living;
and by προσκαρτ. τῇ διδαχῇ he intimates that they continued steadfastly to adhere to that profession which they had so suddenly taken up.

— ἦσαν προσκαρτ. τῇ διδαχῇ.] So προσ-

— τῇ κοινωνίᾳ—προσυχαι.] On the sense of the words considerable difference of opinion exists. Many eminent Expositors, ancient and modern, take κλάσι τοῦ ἄρτου of the Eucharist; which opinion may seem confirmed by the preceding τῇ κοινωνίᾳ; that term being frequently used of the Lord's Supper. Thus they in general take τῇ κοινωνίᾳ καὶ τῇ κλάσει, by a Hendiadys, for 'the common participation of the Eucharistic bread broken and distributed.' Some, however, understand κοιν. of association for religious purposes: while most of the recent Commentators understand by κοιν. social intercourse; and by τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου, the exercise of mutual hospitality; which, they think, is supported by the expression κλῆν ἄρτου at ver. 46. But that sense is little agreeable to the context, which certainly requires something far more. Nor is there any authority for such a sense of κοινωνία in Scripture; nor perhaps of τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου; for ver. 46 (to which they appeal) may very well bear another sense. Some, again, join κοινωνία with the words preceding, namely, τῶν ἀποστόλων, q. d. 'in intimate society with the Apostles.' A construction very harsh, and a signification quite unauthorized. It must undoubtedly be taken with what follows; and τῇ κοιν. καὶ τῇ κλάσει seems put, by a hysteron proteron, for τῇ κλάσει καὶ κοιν.; or, by hendiadys, for 'by a common participation of bread broken.' Now this might be understood of the Eucharist; yet as verse 46 undoubtedly has reference to the same subject, but certainly cannot be so understood, as appears from the words following; so it should seem that in both that passage and this we are to understand the common participation of meals, taken in charitable communion and religious thankfulness, and followed by prayer. This view is confirmed by what is said at ver. 46. So St. Paul, 1 Tim. iv. 4, 5, says (with reference, it may be supposed, to these religious meals), that every kind of food is good, if it be taken μετὰ εὐχαριστίας (for he adds) ἀγιάζεται διὰ λόγου καὶ ἱστειύσεως. By these religious meals we need not, however, with some, understand the Agape, or Love-feasts, which used to precede the Eucharist; for those were probably not yet in being; having, it should seem, originated at a somewhat later period, when the custom of having all things in common,—practicable only in a small society,—was afterwards discontinued; and, in the place of it, was substituted a formal communion at certain stated religious meals, which preceded the celebration of the Lord's Supper; see Rom. xiv. 6.

43. πάσῃ ψυχῇ] 'every person,' i. e. of the multitude at large, mentioned at ver. 46. Ἐγένετο ἡ φόβος, as often. Φόβος, 'reverential awe.'

44. ἦσαν ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό.] This is generally taken of 'being collected together for divine worship.' And although the great number (3120) of the disciples has been urged as an objection to that view, yet we need not suppose all to have been assembled at the same time, nor perhaps all at the same place. As, however, a certain degree of harshness attaches to that interpretation, it seems better, with some eminent Expositors, to understand the expression of perfect unanimity and concord (as Ps. cxxxii. 1, and elsewhere in the Sept.); which is confirmed by iv. 34, and a passage of Thucyd. i. 79, ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ αἱ γνώμαι ἐφέρον. What, however, is chiefly meant, seems to be, that 'the believers all kept together as a society distinct from the Jews;' which view is supported by the words following.

— εἶχον ἅπαντα κοινά.] The earlier Commentators, in general, understand by this an entire community of goods; while many recent Expositors think that the words are to be taken only in a popular sense, such as that of the adage πάντα κοινά, denoting great charity and beneficence. The next verse, however, excludes this latter view, though it does not necessarily imply an absolute community by distribution. Some of the rich, it seems, sold their property in part, in order to have more to give immediately to their poorer brethren; but the money accruing from thence (as is plain from infra iv. 32. v. 4. xii. 12) did not cease to be at their own disposal. That all did not sell their property is evident from the fact, that there were soon afterwards rich and poor among the Christians; see ix. 36. xi. 29. xx. 35. 1 Cor. xvi. 1. Eph. iv. 28. It is plain that this so called intercommunity of goods was voluntary, limited in extent, and produced by the peculiar circumstances of the infant Church at Jerusalem,—composed as it was, in a great measure, of foreign Jews sojourning there, and detained by the natural wish of acquiring a thorough knowledge of the religion which they had adopted, and yet whose funds might, by their detention so much longer than they had expected, have fallen short, and thrown them on the charitable assistance of their richer brethren. As to the native Jews, the poorer converts were peculiarly objects of consideration to their richer brethren; since all charity on the part of those who adhered to the Jewish religion would be denied them, and they would have scrupled to partake of the relics from the Temple sacrifices, which were distributed to the poor. Nay, their means of supporting themselves might occasionally be taken from them by bigoted employers or customers. Under these circumstances no relief or aid could be expected, except from their Christian brethren, who therefore, it seems, agreed not only to contribute much of their ready-money, but occasionally and in part, as need might require, to sell their possessions; and in general were induced by the admonitions of the Apostles to regard their wealth as held in trust for the benefit of their poorer fellow Christians.

45. κτήματα.] The term properly denotes possessions or property in general; but here it must be understood of the bona immobilia (lands and houses), as ὑπάρξεις (for the more Classical τὰ ὑπάρχοντα) may be of the mobilia, personal property.

46. προσκαρτ.] Προσκ. is put for προσκ. ταῖς προσευχαῖς, which occurred a little before. Reader: 'They persevered in attending the Temple service every day,' i. e. (as is implied) at the stated hours of prayer.

— κλώντες τε κατ' οἶκον ἄρτον.] This is by many understood of the Eucharist, or at least of the agapæ which preceded the Eucharist; while others understand it of common meals taken by companies at certain houses in rotation. And certainly there is much to countenance this in what follows. Yet, if we consider the preceding words, it will seem more probable that the meals in question were the charitable and religious meals, taken in common, treated of supra ver. 42. At κατ' οἶκον supply ἕκαστον; meaning, 'in groups assembled at different houses; for no one apartment was now large enough to contain the whole.

— ἐν ἀγαλλιάσει καὶ ἀφελότητι καρδ.] This phrase denotes the disposition of mind in the partakers, whether rich or poor, respectively; ἀγαλλιάσει being intended chiefly of the latter, and ἀφελότητι, principally, though not exclusively, of the former. It is meant that 'the rich cordially rejoiced in exercising liberality to the poor, and that the poor were heartily thankful for their liberality.' The one class was as far removed from grudging or ostentation, as the other was from envy or ill-will.

47. αἰνοῦντες—λαόν.] This may signify, in a general way, 'They were [in their mode of life] much occupied in prayer, and were in favour with the people.' As, however, αἰνοῦντες is grammatically connected with μετελάμβανον, it seems better to suppose the sense to be: 'And these common meals (namely, those mentioned supra ver. 42) they held with prayer to God; and by the use of them, and by their general conduct, they were in favour with the people at large,' i. e. all except the Rulers, the Priests, and their party.

— προσετίθει τοὺς σωζομένους.] On the exact sense of these words considerable difference of opinion exists. Our authorized Version renders 'those that should be saved;' but it is now almost universally agreed that this mode of rendering cannot be admitted, since it would require, not σωζομένους, but σωθησομένους. The version in question must therefore be rejected; not (as Wetstein thinks) because it introduces a Calvinistic doctrine, but because such a sense cannot be shown to be inherent in the words. The sense had been saved, which some Anti-Calvinistic Commentators propose, is equally inadmissible. If we keep close to the propriety of the language

(which, where a doctrine is concerned, we are bound to do), we cannot, I think, translate better than (as Doddridge and Wesley do) 'the saved,' meaning 'those who were being saved;' which is supported by the authority of the Pesch. Syriac Version. The expression must of course denote those who hearkened to the earnest injunction, ver. 40, 'Save yourselves from this perverse generation,' namely, by withdrawing from community with them, renouncing Judaism, seeking admission into the Christian Church, by baptism, and thus being 'saved from their sins by the washing of regeneration,' and put into a state of salvation; whereby, through the grace of the Holy Spirit, imparted under the Gospel, they might be actually saved both from the guilt and the power of sin. See Dr. A. Clarke and Dr. Hales. Indeed (as Bp. Pearce observes) we find the converse, upon their repentance towards God, and faith in Jesus Christ, often spoken of in the New Test. as persons already saved; i. e. rescued from that eternal misery to which they stood exposed, and they were baptized: ex. gr. Tit. iii. 5, ἵνα σωσῶμεν ἡμᾶς διὰ λουτροῦ ὕδατος ἐν ῥήματι. See also 1 Cor. xv. 2. and Luke xix. 9. Consequently, οἱ σωζόμενοι will be equivalent to οἱ πιστεύοντες. So in a kindred passage, Acts v. ¹⁴, πρόσ-ετίθειτο πιστεύοντες τῷ Κυρίῳ. Thus also at 1 Cor. i. 18, τοῖς σωζομένοις, meaning those who had received the Christian faith, as opposed τοῖς ἀπολλυμένοις, to the Jews, who reject it; and also at 2 Cor. ii. 15; also Revel. xxi. 24, καὶ τὰ ἔθνη τῶν σωζομένων, ἀπλὴ believers in the Gospel, ἐν τῷ φωτὶ αὐτῇ περιπατήσουσι.

III. This seems meant to connect with ii. 43; vv. 44—47 being in some degree parenthetical. St. Luke now returns to what he had been saying about many miracles having been worked by the Apostles; and of these he adduces one by way of example,—namely, that of a cripple from his birth.

1. Ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ must here mean together, in company, and be taken after ἀνέβαινον, 'was going up.' So Josephus, cited by Krebs, μὴν Ἀντιόχειας ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ παρῆλθον. The use of ἐπὶ with an Accus. in the sense ac. is found also in the Classical writers, and especially with nouns of time.

2. ἐκ κοιλίας μητρὸς] for ἐκ γαστρὸς. See John ix. 1. 'Ἐκ γαστρὸς occurs in the Pseph. Theogn. v. 307. Ἐτίθουν. The sick and poor were, both among Jews and Gentiles, usually laid, or placed themselves, at the portals of the

Temples, to ask charity of the worshippers; though sometimes at the gates or doors of rich men. See Luke xvi. 20, and Note.

—[Ὠραϊαν.] So I have chosen to edit, with almost every Editor up to Wets. Those after him wrote Ὠραϊαν; but wrongly, I conceive; for Ὠρ. is a proper name, being one of that class which become such by an adjective with the Article having so defined some one of a class of things, that it is pointed out as single and apart from the rest. In that stage the adjective should be written with a small initial letter. But when the Article is omitted, it becomes a proper name, and consequently must have a capital. Which gate of the Temple is here meant, the Commentators are not agreed. Most of them suppose it to have been the Eastern gate, leading from the court of the women to that of the Israelites, which was overlaid with Corinthian brass (a material far more valuable than gold itself, and wrought with exquisite art); also called the gate of Nicanor, and of which mention is made in Joseph. Bell. v. 5. 3. vi. 5. 3. It has, however, been shown by Wagenseil, Bengel, and Walch, that this involves much of improbability. (See an abstract of their arguments in Kuinoel.) Hence the learned have for some time been generally agreed that the gate here meant is that which was called lily, from lily (the lily), also the name of a royal city in Persia, and, as we learn from Athenæus, p. 573, so called διὰ τὴν ὠραιότητα. And did Constantinople had a gate so called. Accordingly Ὠραϊα would be a good representation in Greek of lily in Hebrew. Of the reasons given for the above supposition, the most weighty are, 1. that, after the healing of the cripple, Peter and John repaired to Solomon's Portico, which it appears from Joseph. Ant. xx. 8, compared with xv. 14) was very near the gate Susan. 2. This lame mendicant would doubtless choose a place where he would be likely to get most alms, and that would be where most persons might be expected to enter. Now at the gate Susan there was a far greater concourse of people than elsewhere; since there were the tabernacles, in which wine, salt, flour, oil, doves, and other things necessary for sacrifice, were sold. Moreover, it was the custom of the Sacred writers to name Hebrew names, even those which by use had taken the nature of proper names, into appellation. —[ἀπὸ τῶν ἐλεημοσύνων λαβεῖν.] Many MSS.

and some early Editions have not λαβεῖν, which was by Pricæus considered as insinuating. But Bos, Alberti, Wetstein, Kypke, and especially Valcknaer, have proved, by many examples derived from Greek writers of various times, that there is here an idiom, by which λαβεῖν and other terms are elegantly pleonastic after verbs of asking. 'Ελεημ., 'alms,' meaning the sum given; a signification of the word found only in the later Greek writers, from Callimachus downwards.

4. ἀτενίσας εἰς αὐτόν.] See Note on Luke xxii. 56.

5. ἐπέιχεν α.] Supply ὀφθαλμούς.

6. ὁ δὲ ἔχω, τοῦτό σοι δίδωμι.] I would compare Aristoph. Lysist. 671, ἔπερ οὖν ἔχω, δίδωμί σοι, and Soph. Elect. 450, σικκρά μιν τὰδ', ἀλλ' ὅμως ἄ' ἔχω, δός αὐτῷ. By ὁ ἔχω is meant, 'out of such power as I have committed to me (namely, from Jesus Christ) I bestow the benefit I am now doing.'

—ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι.] Meaning, 'by the authority of Jesus.' Here, it has been justly remarked, a striking difference may be seen between the manner in which miracles were worked by Jesus, and that by his Apostles. The former acted in his own name, and by virtue of his own power; the latter, merely by a delegated authority. See Note on Mark xvi. 17, 18, and John xiv. 12.

7. πιάσας αὐτόν, &c.] This was an action done, not, as some Expositors say, more Medici, but as a symbolical one, representing the cure, and giving a gracious assurance of it; such as our Lord was pleased often to exert. See Mark vii. 33.

—βάσεις.] Βάσις signifies, 1. the act of walking; 2. the effect of it, in the step taken. 3. the part whereon we rest in taking it, namely, the foot; as here, and in Soph. Aj. 692, and often in the later Greek writers. The following term σφυρά is explanatory of the foregoing one, and denotes the malleoli, or ankle-bones, by which the bones of the foot exert their force.

8. ἐξαλλόμενος.] Not so much for joy, as many Commentators imagine; nor, as Eusebius thinks, to try whether he could walk; but, it should seem, at first from ignorance how to walk, by which his essays would be rather leaping than walking; just as the imperfect glimmer of the newly acquired sight of the blind man at Mark viii. 24, made him first 'see men as trees walking.' 'Εξαλλόμενος well describes the headlong eagerness of incipient action, as ἔστη, καὶ περιεπατεῖ, the other stages of it: 'he first leaped, then walked

11. κρατοῦντος.] Render, 'keeping close to'; as in Col. ii. 19, & 2 Sam. iii. 6. Here for the vulg. τοῦ λαβίντος χωλοῦ, Griesbach, Matthæi, Vater, and Scholz, have edited αὐτοῦ on strong evidence, external and internal.

12. ἀπεκρ. πρὸς τὸν λ.] 'made [this] address to the people.'

— πιστ. τοῦ περιπ. α.] There is here an anomaly of construction, which some Commentators seek to remove by supposing an ellipsis of πρῶτος and ἕνικα; others, by resolving πιστ. into ποιηταῖς οὐσι; comparing Acts xxvii. 1, ὡς δὲ ἐκρίθη τοῦ ἀποκτεῖν ἡμᾶς, and xx. 3. Yet this principle of resolution is seldom effectual, being hypothetical, and explaining nothing solidly. The ellipses, too, are liable to the same objection. It should seem that the present idiom proceeded originally from the employing of the Infinitive with ὥστε or εἰς τὸ, denoting end or aim. This construction was afterwards changed to its equivalent τοῦ with an Infin., which is often found in the LXX., and was then changed, in most cases, to the simple Infinitive.

13, 14. The Apostle now suggests the real cause of the cure, calling their attention to Christ. The general meaning is, that 'the purpose of God, in the miracles which he ordained to be wrought by the Apostles, was to show forth the glory of his Son Jesus Christ.' Hence it follows that men are here not to extol Peter or any one else. It is CHRIST only who is to be exalted. See John iii. 30. (Calvin.)

13. ὁ Θεός—ἡμῶν.] The repetition of ὁ Θεός is emphatical; and the mention of the God of their fathers was introduced to show that they taught no new religion which should dismiss them from the God of Israel. (Doddridge.)

— ἐδόξασε.] Namely, by his resurrection and ascension.

— ὃν ὑμεῖς μὲν παρεδώκατε.] With denial is necessarily intermixed reproof. (Calvin.) After ὑμεῖς I have, with Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz, on good evidence, introduced μὲν into the text.

— κρίναντος ἐκείνου ἀπολ.] 'when he had determined that he should be let go.' With reference to the words of Pilate, Luke xxiii. 14, ταπεινῶσαι οὖν αὐτὸν ἀπολύσω.

14. τὸν Ἅγιον καὶ Δίκαιον] 'the Holy and Just One.' A designation of the Messiah (as in iv. 27. Rev. iii. 7. John x. 36.) formed on ὁ Ἅγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ, which occurs at Mark i. 24. Luke iv. 34, and John vi. 69.

— ᾗτήσασθε ἄνδρα φονέα χαρ. ὁμῆς.] I would compare Heaiod, Epy. 150, μᾶλλον δὲ κακῶν βεκτῆρα καὶ ὕβριν ἄνδρα τιμωσαν. The sense of χαρ., 'to be given up for justice,' is not unfrequent in the later writers.

15. τὸν ἀρχ. τῆς ζωῆς] 'the author of life'; namely, as being the first to rise from the dead, he was thereby the cause of all men rising again. See John i. 4. v. 21. xiv. 6, and the Notes. So Heb. ii. 10, ἀρχ. τῆς σωτηρίας.

16. καὶ ἐπὶ—αὐτοῦ.] Render, 'And his name (i. e. the power accompanying the invocation of his name) through faith in his name (i. e. his) hath made strong this man, whom ye see and know.' Ὁλοκληρίαν, 'complete soundness and health,' as in Is. i. 6, and sometimes in the Classical writers.

 21 ὃν δεῖ οὐρανὸν μὲν δέξασθαι ἄχρι χρόνων ἀποκαταστάσεως (Supra 1. 11.)

17. οἶδα ὅτι κατὰ ἀγνοίαν ἐπράξατε, &c.] When we consider the numerous miracles of our Lord, and the other ample proofs which the Jews had of his being the Messiah, it may seem difficult to understand how they could be said to have done what they did through ignorance. To remove this difficulty, some would refer the words ὥσπερ καὶ οἱ ἄρχοντες ὑμῶν, not to ἡγνοίαν, but to ἐπράξατε, in the sense, 'I know but through ignorance ye were induced to do as our rulers did.' But this is violating the construction, and forcing on the passage a sense not inherent in the words. Besides, the ignorance in question extended to both classes. Nor is there any occasion to resort to such a harsh method, since the expression may be taken as said popularly, and consequently need not to be too rigorously interpreted, but only supposed to mean, 'I am aware that you did what you did, under the influence of error, prejudice, and other carnal passions.' The Apostle does not mean that this ignorance was without blame; for as it resulted from pride, prejudice, and worldly-mindedness, and was co-existent with ample means of information, it was criminal; yet though criminal, he estimates it admitted of some extenuation. For the character of the Apostle's expressions is exoneratory, like the words of his Lord, when interceding for his murderers: Πάτερ, ἄφεσι αὐτοῖς· ὃ γὰρ οἶδασι τί ποιοῦσι, Luke xxiii. 34.

18. ὃ δὲ Θεὸς—ἐπλήρωσεν οὕτω] q. d. 'God hath used that ignorance for good, by permitting that you should commit this crime; and moreover, since thus would be fulfilled the declarations of the Prophets concerning the calamities with which the Messiah should be oppressed.' The Rabbins themselves acknowledge that all the Prophets prophesied of the Messiah.

19. We have now the application of the whole discourse; in which the Apostle exhorts them to repentance and newness of life, by a true conversion of the heart. For as μεταν. denotes change of mind, so does ἐπιστρέφω the change of conduct resulting therefrom, and inseparable from true conversion. See Bp. Bull's Harm. Ap., p. 9.

—εἰς τὸ ἐξαι. ὑμῶν τὰς ἁμ.] Ἐξαλείφειν ἁμαρτίας, 1. to wipe off oil from any thing; 2. to wipe off characters chalked on a board, or traced in a slate; 3. to obliterate any writing, whether on waxed tablets, or written on parchment, either by scratching out, or crossing out. And, as crossing out accounts in a ledger implies that the sums are discharged, or the payment forgiven, so the word came to mean, in a figurative sense, to wipe off offences, as in 1s. xliii. 23, ἰγὼ εἰμι ὁ ἀλείψων τὰς ἀνομίας σου; also 2 Macc. xii. 6, and Eccles. xlv. 20. And Lysias, cited by Origen, ὅπως ἐξαλειφθεῖν αὐτῶν τὰ ἁμαρτήματα.

most modern Expositors taken to mean when, or after that (for ἐπειδὴν); by others it is interpreted until, i. e. 'waiting until.' The latter rendering, however, involves a harsh ellipsis; and as to the former, though examples of ὅπως in the sense of time are frequent, yet not with ἂν, and only as used of time past. Indeed, the sense thus arising is far from satisfactory. Hence it is better, with the Syr., and many eminent Commentators, from Luther downward, to take it in the sense so that, in order that, as Luke ii. 35, Matt. vi. 5, et alibi. Render, 'that so the times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord;' i. e. 'that ye may see with joy the time which the Lord hath appointed as the period of refreshing.' Ἀναψύξις denotes, 1. a refreshing one's breath after it has been interrupted; 2. a breathing-time from some labour, a rest from trouble, or deliverance from evil generally; 3. (by implication) the happiness occasioned by such a change. What particular period is here designated, Expositors are not agreed. It must, of course, be at the coming of the Messiah; but some refer that to his coming at the destruction of Jerusalem; others, to his coming at the end of the world; and others, again, his coming in the Millennial reign. As to the first view, it is, I apprehend, untenable. The third has been ingeniously, but not satisfactorily, defended. It seems safest to adopt the second; by which the ἀναψύξις of the present passage will be the same with the ἀνέσις at 2 Thess. i. 7, ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ μετ' ἀγγέλων, 'the restitution of all things.' In the expression ἀπὸ προσώπου τοῦ Κυρίου we have a Hebrew periphrasis, for ἀπὸ Κυρίου, which means, 'by God's providence.' Instead of the common reading προκεχειρισμένον, some of the most ancient MSS., most of the ancient Versions, and all the early Editions, except the Erasmus, have προκεχειρισμένον, which is confirmed by several of the ancient Fathers, has been approved by most Commentators, and has been received by almost every Editor from Bengel and Wetstein downwards; and justly; for the common reading seems to have been either a false alteration of some Critics, who did not understand the expression, or a gloss thereon. Render, 'him who was of old destined and appointed for you (i. e. for your relief and salvation), even Jesus Christ.' Thus, in the later writers, προχειρίζω τινα τιμὴν signifies 'to set any one apart to any office.' Some would here sink the προ, which, indeed, in Classical Greek, is merged in the proper signification of the word; but this is not permitted by 1 Pet. i. 20, προγεγενημένου (Χριστοῦ) πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου.

21. ὃν δεῖ οὐρανὸν μὲν δέξασθαι, &c.] Of these words the true scope is to anticipate a possible objection,—that if Jesus had been the Messiah, he would have continued on earth, at least after his resurrection, and then founded his kingdom. To this the Apostle indirectly replies, that it was necessary (i. e. for the purposes mentioned at John xvi. xvii. and xviii.) that for the present he should abide in Heaven, there to remain till the time of restoration; literally, 'that heaven should hold or possess him, and not earth,' the general sentiment being, that, 'removed from the sight of men, he is conversant with God, having been raised to supreme majesty and blessedness.' Of course implying that he is THE MESSIAH.

21. ἀχρι χρόνων ἀποκαταστάσεις π.] 'Αποκατάστασις (properly signifies a restoration of any thing to some former state; and, by implication, for the better) is capable of several interpretations, according to the view taken of the foregoing verse. According to the first it will denote the final completion of the happiness of the righteous consequent on the last judgment; according to the second, it will denote the consummation of all things at the end of the world. On the expression τῶν ἀγίων προφ. see Note at Luke i. 70, which passage will serve to confirm the insertion here of τῶν, introduced into the text by the most eminent Editors; and also the cancelling of πάντων by Griesbach and Scholz.

22—26. The connexion of these verses is as follows: 'Moses announced the Messiah; and all the Prophets, from Samuel to our own days, have foretold those times of restoration. To you belong these prophecies, and the promise given to Abraham, that in his seed should all the nations of the earth be blessed. To you God hath sent his Son Jesus Christ, and on you he would bestow blessedness, if you would but lay aside your carnal views, and turn from your evil ways. Repent, therefore, and be converted; acknowledge Jesus as the Christ, and receive his religion, lest ye suffer worse consequences of your obstinacy and unbelief.'

22. ὅτι προφήτην ὑμῖν ἀναστήσει, &c.] By quoting these words of Moses the Apostle means to say, 'that they should hearken to Christ, as the Prophet "like unto" Moses, of whom Moses predicted.' For that the passage has reference to Christ cannot be doubted, since St. Peter affirms it, as does also St. Stephen, Acts vii. 37. Indeed, there will be no difficulty in so doing, if we consider the chief scope of it, in which (as Schoettg. observes) the peculiar points of resemblance are intimated at the ὡς αὐτόν, 'like unto himself;' namely, 1. in being the minister of a new covenant, as Moses was of the old, which the Prophets (especially Jeremiah) had distinctly announced should be done away; 2. in His close communication with God. And, as Moses conferred much with God, so did Jesus Christ, who was in the bosom of God his Father. Though, after all, Moses may not have had directly in view this reference; and accordingly, this may be of the number of those passages of the Old Test., 'which (as Bp. Middleton says) are capable of a two-fold application; being directly applicable to circumstances then past, or present, or soon to be accomplished; and indirectly, to others which Divine Providence was about to develop under a future dispensation.'

The passage before us is not an exact quotation; and yet the variations that occur are not such as to affect its fidelity. In the first verse the words are placed in another order, and οὗ is altered to ὑμῖν, in order to put the case still plainer. And so indeed Moses evidently meant it. After ἀκούσεσθε the words κατὰ—ὑμῖν are added by Peter to show the extent of the injunction. In the next verse the variations are greater both from the Hebr. and the Sept. Yet the general sense of both is expressed; for (to advert to the principal discrepancy) the ἐξολοθρευθήσεται (ἐκδικήσω ἐξ αὐτοῦ mean, 'I will require it at his hands, i. e. I will punish him for it' (namely, his disobedience). Thus the words ἐξολ. ἐκ τοῦ λαοῦ (denoting utter extermination) are meant to illustrate a somewhat obscure phrase, and to point to the nature and extent of that punishment, the greatest known under the Jewish law.

24. καὶ πάντες δὲ] 'quinetiam,' but also; as in John vi. 51, and other passages adduced by Kypke. Πάντας, meaning, in a restricted sense, 'a very considerable part.' Ἐλάλησαν, 'have spoken;' i. e. prophetically; for λαλεῖν is a term often used of prophecy. Of this construction of the Genit. belonging to ὅσοι, but coming after it, I have noted the following examples: Antiph. Plut. v. 1052, ἐν τῷ προσώπῳ τῶν ἰσχυρῶν ὅσας ἔχει, and Eurip. Med. v. 476, ὡς ἰσχυρῶν Ἐλλήνων ὅσοι ταῦτόν συναισθίσαντο Ἀργεῖοι σκάφοι.

25. οἱ υἱοὶ τῶν προφητῶν, καὶ τῆς διαθήκης] Meaning, 'those to whom the prophecies belong (by being addressed to you), and to whom the covenants pertain.' So Luke xx. 36, καὶ οἱ ἀναστάσεις. Various examples are adduced by Weiststein from the Rabbinical writers, in one of which occurs the very expression 'sons of the covenant.'

The following citation is made, with some variation, from the Sept. For the ἴθνη of Gen. xxii. 18, we have here πατριαί. Both expressions, however, come to the same thing; πατριαί denoting (like the φύλαι of the similar passage, Gen. xii. 3) nations derived from one common ancestor; consequently the terms are convertible; the same Hebrew term בְּרִיטָה being rendered by both; see my Note on Thucyd. iii. 65. 14. Here, then, the Apostle means to affirm the same thing as St. Paul, Gal. iii. 16, that by the Messiah, as the descendant of Abraham, shall all nations be blessed; much more shall they his countrymen. 'Εν before τῷ σπέρματι, found in all the early Editions, some Versions and Fathers, has been received by almost every Editor from Bengel and Weiststein downwards.

26. ἴμιν πρῶτον.] The sense of these words will become clearer by supplying the particle οὖν. 'Unto you, then;' which very aptly introduces the conclusion from what has been said. 'Αναστήσας. The word is here used as supra v. 22. R. 30, and infra vii. 37, and Deut. xviii. 18, of the providential bringing into existence of Prophets. Εὐλογοῦντα ὑμᾶς is best taken as put in apposition, or as standing for ὡς εὐλογ., 'as one who should bless you.'

— ἐν τῷ ἀποστρ. ἕκαστον, &c.] 'Αποστρ. may here be taken either in a transitive or in an intransitive sense. The former is generally adopted. But as it occasions some harshness of construction, and involves something objectionable in sense (unless action be taken for intention), the latter view is preferable. And ἐν τῷ may be taken for εἰς τὸν, denoting purpose; or for ἐπὶ, q. d. 'on every one of you turning from his iniquities,' i. e. if every one of you shall turn. This is confirmed by the words of ver. 19, μεταμέτετε καὶ ἐπιστρέψατε; and by Isaiah i. 16.

IV. We have now narrated the result of all the successful dissemination of Gospel truth. The Sadducees now joined cordially with the Pharisees, since the testimony of the Apostles to the resurrection of Jesus was subversive of their doctrines; and therefore they readily aided in attempts to strangle the truth in its infancy, by persecuting unto the death the Apostles, as they had before done Jesus Christ himself.

1. ἐπίστησαν αὐτοῖς] superstenerunt illis. 'Επίστημι properly signifies 'to be presented to the view of any one,' in which is sometimes inherent a notion of suddenness, which occasionally (as here, Luke xx. 1, and elsewhere) implies somewhat of hostility. On ὁ στρατηγὸς τοῦ ἱεροῦ, see Note on Luke xxii. 4.

2. διαπονούμενοι.] Διαπονεῖσθαι significa, 1. to be wearied out; 2. (as here) to feel aggrieved, be vexed or annoyed, bear with impatience; a sense found in the Sept. at Gen. vi. 6, but not in the Classical writers. The words διὰ τὸ διδάσκειν αὐ. τὸν λαόν refer to the Priests; and καταγγέλλειν—νεκρῶν to the Sadducees. 'Εν τῷ Ἰησοῦ, by or in, i. e. 'by the example of Jesus, as exemplified in Jesus.'

3. ἴθνητο εἰς τήρη.] Some Expositors think that τήρησις here means the custody of certain persons to whose charge they were committed. But the common interpretation, a prison, is established beyond doubt by v. 18, ἴθνητο αὐτοὺς ἐν τήρησι δημοσίᾳ. This use is, however, confined to the later writers; for in the passage cited by the Commentators from Thucyd. vii. 86, it merely denotes the act of keeping in custody (see iii. 3, and my Note on i. 131). Such, indeed, is the primitive sense of the word, as also of the Latin custodia; though both words came, in process of time, to denote a place of custody, carcer.

4. ἐγενήθη—χιλ. πέντε.] The Commentators are not agreed whether this number is inclusive of the 3000 before converted, or exclusive of them. Yet no persons thoroughly conversant in the idiom of the Greek language can fail to perceive that the former is the sense intended. 'Εγενήθη signifies was become, a signification of γίνεσθαι which often occurs in the New Test. and LXX. 'Ανδρῶν signifies not men, but persons of both sexes; it being put for ἀνθρώπων, as Luke xi. 31. James i. 20.

5. αὐτῶν] scil. τῶν Ἰουδαίων, to be supplied from the context. By τοὺς ἄρχ., &c., are denoted the Sanhedrim. Εἰς Ἱερ., for ἐν Ἱερ.

6. ἐκ γένους ἀρχ.] Some understand the chiefs of the 24 Sacerdotal classes. Others, more properly, it should seem, the family of those who had lately served the office of High Priest. For besides that the former interpretation does violence to the phrase, this is strongly confirmed by a similar use of the very same phrase in Josephus, Antiq. xv. 3. 1, where, speaking of Ananel, the first High Priest appointed by Herod, he says he was ἀρχιερατικοῦ γένους, i. e. of the High-Priestly race, being descended from an ancestor who had borne the office of High Priest; namely, as I understand it, among the Jews in Babylonia, of the Eastern dispersion. So that there is no occasion, with some, to read οὐκ ἀρχ., merely because Josephus says he was ἱερεὺς ἐκ τῶν ἀσημοτέρων. He might be a priest of the lower orders, and yet be of Arch-priestly descent.

7. ἐν ποίᾳ δυνάμει—ὀνόματι.] To determine the sense of this passage, we must ascertain the scope of the interrogation. Now ἐποιήσατε τοῦτο might refer, as some say it does, to the general conduct of the Apostles in their ministry. But from ver. 9 it is plain that it refers to the miraculous cure lately performed. Ἐν ποίῳ ὀνόματι further illustrate the sense. The name of a person is indeed often put for the person himself. See also iii. 16. Thus it may mean, 'by the power of such a person.' But as it is certain that the Jews believed very wonderful works, even miracles, to be performed by magic arts and incantation (i. e. invoking the names of certain angels or illustrious Patriarchs), the full sense of ὄνομα may here be retained.

9. εἰ ἡμεῖς σήμερον ἀνακρ.] El, significum, a signification found often in the New Test., Sept., and Classical writers, and here to be preferred to the ordinary one, as being more energetic and pointed. Render, 'since we are called to account this day.' Ἀνακρίνεσθαι is a forensic term, signifying to be examined by interrogation. Εὐεργεσία ἀνθρώπου ἀσθ. is for εὐεργ. εἰς ἀνθρώπου ἀσθενή, 'on account of the benefit done to the sick man,' a Genit. of object. At ἐν τίνι supply ὀνόματι. Comp. vv. 7. 10. Σέσωσται, 'was made well,' as Matt. ix. 21.

11. See Note on Matt. xxi. 42.

12. οὐκ ἔστιν—ἢ σωτηρία.] Many eminent Commentators, from Whitby downwards, have argued from the context that ἢ σωτηρία means, 'this healing;' and interpret σωθῆναι, 'to be restored to health;' a sense, indeed, found elsewhere, but which is here not admissible, because the verb cannot well have a sense different from that of the noun ἢ σωτηρία just before, which cannot mean 'the healing;' such a signification of the word being found nowhere in the Scriptural, nor, I believe, in the Classical writers. And certainly there is nothing to compel us to adopt it here. The use of the Article by no means requires it; for to render, 'the healing in question,' yields a sense little apposite. Indeed, there is no proof that the Article is here meant to exert any particular force, much less to be emphatic. I know of no passage in the New Test. where it has such a force, but several where the noun is used in its most abstract sense; in which case the force of the Article is merged in that of the noun. So John iv. 22. Rom. xi. 11. Hebr. vi. 3. Rev. vii. 10, ἢ σωτηρία καὶ ἡ δόξα καὶ ἡ τιμὴ—τῷ Θεῷ. That it must be understood of salvation, not of healing, is certain from the words following, ἐν ᾧ δεῖ σωθῆναι ἡμᾶς, which show the σωτηρία in question to be general, and therefore spiritual and eternal; though, at the same time, it also, as Dr. Smith shows, involves an eventual deliverance from every physical and temporal evil.—τὸ δεδομένον.] Said to be for ὁ δέδωκεν. But there is rather an ellipsis of καὶ, quod est ad. ad. ad. ad. here signifies locus, permanens et, 'it is fit or proper,' as in Luke xiii. 14, and sometimes in the Classical writers.

13. τῇ παρρησίᾳ] 'the freedom' or boldness of speech; meaning an unequivocal avowal of their doctrines, without any attempt to conceal or qualify them.

— καταλαβόμενοι.] 'having perceived,' or learnt. A sense of the word occurring also at Acts v. 34. xxv. 25. Eph. iii. 18. 'Ἀγράμματοι, unlettered, i. e. 'ignorant of, or but slightly versed in literature,' especially that kind of it which the Jews alone prized, namely, of the Scriptures, τὰ γράμματα, as explained by their Rabbinical interpreters; comp. John vii. 15. By the other expression ἰδιῶται are meant private persons, as opposed to those who held any office, ecclesiastical or civil. With both terms ἀγράμματοι καὶ ἰδιῶται Valcknaer compares Athen. p. 176, ἰδιώτης καὶ ἀναλφάβητος. By ἐπεγίνωσκον is meant, 'knew by sight,' 'recognised.'

— σὺν τῷ Ἰησοῦ ἦσαν.] 'had been adherents of Jesus,' as Mark xiv. 67, καὶ σὺ μετὰ Ἰησοῦ ἦσθα. The idiom was probably one of common life and colloquial phraseology.

14. ἐστῶτα.] 'standing on his feet;' not, as before, a cripple; see supra iii. 7, 8, and compare Mark v. 15, Σκωροῦσι τὸν δαιμονιζόμενον καθήμενον, καὶ ἱματισμένον καὶ σφραγισμένον.

— οὐδὲν εἶχον ἀντειπεῖν.] A popular phrase, of which examples are adduced by Weistien.

15. κελεύσαντες—ἀπελθεῖν.] This bidding them to withdraw was not meant by way of insult, but in order that they might consider in private what was best to be done. The expression often occurs in the Historians, where ambassadors, after delivering their message, are desired to withdraw, in order that the Council may deliberate upon it; see Thucyd. v. 112.

— συνέβαλον.] Sub. γνώμην, or βουλευόμενα, expressed in Eurip. Phœn. 700.

17. ἅλλ'.] 'nevertheless.' A sense not unfrequently either in the Scriptural or Classical writers. Ἄς διανεμηθῇ supply τούτου, scil. τὸ σημεῖον, the report of this miracle. Thus διανέμειν, which properly signifies to be distributed among several, will here, as used of a report, have the sense to be spread abroad. Or rather, we may by τούτου understand 'this matter,' namely, respecting the Messiahship of Jesus and the doctrine taught in his name. And in διανεμ. we may suppose a medical metaphor, with allusion to those ulcers called ἱκτυντικά, which are said νέμεισθαι, ἐπινέμεισθαι, and πρόσω νέμεισθαι, and accordingly διανέμεισθαι. Thus ἐπὶ πλείον διανεμηθῇ will mean 'spread in populum.' Compare Virg. Georg. iii. 469, priusque Dira per incautum serpsit contagia vulgus. See 2 Tim. ii. 16, 17.

By λαόν is meant the people at large, as opposed to the Priests, Pharisees, and higher classes.

— ἀπειλῇ ἀπειλησώμεθα, &c.] The full sense is, 'let us strictly enjoin them under menace of punishment.' This use of ἀπειλ., followed by an ἰνφινίτιν, is so rare, that even the best Lexicons scarcely adduce an example. I have, however, noted it in Josephus, Antiq. x. 7. 4, 'Ὁ δὲ ἀπειλαί (scil. αὐτοῖς) πρὸς τοὺς πολεμίους φυγεῖν, and Theocrit. Idyll. xxiv. 16, ἀπειλήσασα φαγεῖν βριφος Ἡρακλῆα.

— ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι τούτῳ.] upon, i. e. resting on the name and authority of Jesus, as the primary and ultimate Teacher and Author. So Demosthenes, 495. 7, ταῦτ' ἐπὶ τῷ τῶν Σιῶν ὀνόματι ποιεῖν.

18. παρήγγειλαν τὸ μὴ φθίγγειν.] Lit., 'they interdicted to them to speak.' Διδάσκειν is explanatory of φθίγγειν. Καθόλου is for παράπαν.

19. εἰ δίκαιον, &c.] So Plato makes Socrates similarly address his judges: πείσομαι τῷ Σεφ μᾶλλον ἢ ὑμῖν;

20. οὐ δυνάμεθα.] The full sense is: 'We, for our parts, cannot [consistently with what is right and just]; for, as Papinian (cited by Weistien) says, 'quæ facta lædunt pietatem, nec facere nos posse credendum est.' This is one of those few passages in which two negatives do not strengthen the negation, but have an affirmative force. The Grammarians account for it on the principle that the negatives belong to two different verbs. But, in a case like the present, that explains nothing. It is better to say that the two negatives belong, strictly speaking, to two different clauses, and are suspended on finite verbs, or infinitives, either expressed or understood, as in οὐδαίς (sub. ἐστι) ὅστις οὐ ποιήσει.

21. μηδὲν εὐρίσκοντες τὸ πῶς, &c.] Some here suppose an ellipse of αἰτίων, which is expressed in Luke xxiii. 14. Others avoid the ellipse by taking μηδὲν for μή, and πῶς for ὅπως, regarding the τὸ as pleonastic. But it is surely better to admit the ellipse, than suppose such a harshness. Thus the words following, τὸ πῶς, &c. may be considered as exgetical, and meant to further evolve the sense. Yet the πῶς is not (as some suppose) in apposition with μηδὲν, but depends upon κατὰ, quod attinet, understood. Nor does the τὸ belong to the πῶς, but to τὸ πῶς, &c.; for the words τὸ πῶς—αὐτοὺς form grammatically a separate clause. Διὰ τὸν λαόν belong to ἀπέλυσαν αὐτούς.

23. τοὺς ἰδίους] i.e. 'their associates,' the other Apostles and the disciples at large; as Acts xxiv. 23. John xv. 19. So Philo 630, ἐθάρσυνε τοὺς ἰδ.

24—30. This noble supplicatory hymn, poured forth at once by the whole Christian people, under the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit, is worthy of that inspiration from whence it flowed. (Bp. Jebb.) The learned Prelate well points out that vv. 27, 28 form a prophetic quotation of ἴνα τί—αὐτοῦ. And he rightly refers the γὰρ to a clause left to be understood; q. d. ['This prophecy is now fulfilled,] for of a truth, &c. Thus the verses are not, as some imagine, parenthetical. In οὐ ὁ Θεός, &c. there is a periphrasis for 'the Lord of the universe;' with which Wetstein compares Joseph. Ant. iv. 3. 2, Δέσποτα τῶν ἐκ' οὐρανοῦ τε καὶ γῆς καὶ θαλάσσης.

25. As they had, in the first sentence of the prayer, expressed their sense of God's power to save them, and his right to dispose of them as he saw fit for his own glory, so, in the second, they appeal to a prophecy; thereby intimating their just expectation of aid in the work they had in hand.

—ἐφρύαξαν.] We have here, as sometimes in the Classics, a metaphor taken from the snoring, and other sounds of impatience and rage, emitted by high-mettled horses, and therefore very applicable to proud and tyrannical men.

Of καὶ ἐμελέτῃ, κενὰ the sense is, 'and have formed vain plans,' i. e. which have turned out to be vain. So the proverb in Suidas, κενὰ καὶ λογιζονται. The sense, then, is: 'Why do they rebel against the Messiah, why endeavour to shake off his yoke?'

26. παρέστησαν.] Meaning (as the parallelism requires), 'they stood side by side for mutual help in opposition to;' meaning, 'they banded together against.'

27. συνήχθησαν γὰρ, &c.] Here 'the brethren, the peoples, the kings of the earth, and the rulers, (that is, all the rebellious personages of the second Psalm,) are brought forward, as fulfilling whatsoever it was pre-appointed they should do.' (Bp. Jebb.)

I have not ventured to follow several eminent Editors in introducing into the text (from many MSS., Versions, and Fathers) the words ἐν τῇ πόλει ταύτῃ, not so much because, as Bp. Jebb remarks, 'they have no equivalent in the prophecy,' as because it is difficult to account for their omission, but easy for their addition.

28. ποιῆσαι ὅσα, &c.] The sense is: 'For the purpose of doing—what? why no other than what thy overruling power and predisposing wisdom pre-determined to be done.' (Bp. Jebb.)

29. The sense is: 'And, as thy wise counsel pre-determined that, through the confederacy of Jews and Gentiles, of kings and rulers, Christ should suffer, so let the same wise counsel be now made conspicuous, in the undaunted preaching of Christ crucified.' (Bp. Jebb.) 'Ἐπίδε, i. e. so look upon their threats, as to ward off their execution, and grant us deliverance.'

30. ἐν τῷ τὴν χειρά σου ἐκτ.] 'while thou art stretching forth thine hand (i. e. exerting thy power) for healing, and while signs and wonders are performing;' for ἐν τῷ must be repeated.

31. ἐσαλεύθη.] This term is well adapted to suggest the idea of an earthquake; a phenomenon regarded both by Jews and Gentiles as betokening Divine presence and favour. See Is. xxix. 6. Ps. lxxviii. 8. Virg. Æn. iii. 90. Ovid, Metam. xv. 672. So Jamblichus, de Myster. ii. 4. (de apparat. Deorum) τὴν τε γῆν μηκέτι δύνασθαι ἐκτάσει, αὐτῶν (scil. τῶν θεῶν) κατιόντων. Plutarch, Publ., p. 101. And finally a Rabbinical writer, cited by Schoettgen, 'totus ille locus commotus est.'

— Πνεύματος ἁγίου.] The interpretation of some recent Commentators, "filled with sacred ardour," is a mere Unitarian gloss. Yet we need not, and, if the propriety of the Article be considered, we must not, take Πν. in its personal sense, with Doddridge and Benson, but suppose, with Bp. Middleton, that it denotes the influence of the Holy Spirit, as communicating special and eminent gifts. Indeed, a sensible illapsoe is implied.

32. ἦν ἡ καρδιά—μία.] A proverbial description of close amity, as in Plutarch: Δύο φίλοι, ψυχὴ μία, and other similar expressions. Οὐκ ἔλαυνεν ἴδιον, 'did not call them his own,' or allege that as a reason why his poor brethren were not to be assisted therewith. This shows that their property was really considered as their own, and consequently that the expression κοινά in the words following must be taken with limitation; meaning that they were common, not by possession, but by use. See Note supra ii. 45.

33. μεγάλη δυν.] Wolf, Heintz, and Kuinoel think that the expression is to be understood only of the power of the Apostles' eloquence, &c.

But, although I would not exclude the force of that inartificial, but impressive, eloquence, which, founded in conviction, and supported by the consciousness of Divine favour, would give their words an effect rarely to be found in the most polished oratory; yet I must maintain, that there is chiefly meant in the expression an allusion to what would, above every thing else, enable them to speak with such effect,—namely, the miracles which they were occasionally enabled to work. In short, the expression may be said to denote force as regarded the speakers, and efficacy as respected the hearers.

— χάρις τε—αὐτοῖς.] Some Commentators understand χάρις of the favour of God; others, of the Jewish people: q. d. 'the favour of the people rested upon them.' But though this be countenanced by ii. 47, yet there the interpretation first mentioned seems preferable; because if the αὐτοῖς be referred to the Apostles, it will give a reason for the force and efficacy of their preaching. Perhaps, however, the αὐτοῖς is to be referred to the people at large; χάρις being understood of the grace of the Holy Spirit. So Luke ii. 40, καὶ χάρις Θεοῦ ἦν ἐπ' αὐτό. Indeed, thus alone can the γὰρ of the following clause be accounted for; which Translators and Commentators explain merely to mean καὶ. Calvin has alone seen that the γὰρ is, as usual, causal.

34. ὅσοι γὰρ κτήτορες—ὑπῆρχον.] Not, 'as many as had possessions,' for it is not πάντες ὅσοι, but 'such as had,' i. e. some of those who had: the ὅσοι being here, as often, put indefinitely.

— τὰς τιμὰς τῶν πιπρασκομένων.] 'the prices of the things sold.' So Appian, p. 1088, cited by Wetstein, τιμὰς τῶν ἐπὶ πιπρασκομένων, and Demosth. cont. Aphob. 1, τῶν ἀνδραποδῶν τῶν πιπρασκομένων—τὰς τιμὰς ἐλαμβανεν.

35. ἐτίθουν παρὰ τ. π.] Τίθιναι παρὰ is a phrase signifying to commit to the care or disposal of; but when joined with παρὰ τοὺς πόδας, it implies the reverence with which the deposit was made.

(ὁ ἐστὶ, μεθερμηνευόμενον, Υἱὸς παρακλήσεως) Λευίτης, Κύπριος τῷ γένει, ὑπάρχοντος αὐτῷ ἀγροῦ, πωλήσας ἤνεγκε 37 τὸ χρῆμα, καὶ ἔθηκε παρὰ τοὺς πόδας τῶν ἀποστόλων. V. ^b Luke 22. 3. & ver. 4.

36. ἀγροῦ] 'an estate.' That as a Levite he should be a land-proprietor, is not inconsistent with the Divine regulation respecting the Levites, Numb. xviii. 20, seqq.; for that merely has regard to the Levites as a tribe (as such they were to have no landed property appropriated to them out of the division of Canaan); it has nothing to do with individuals, who were not prevented from holding lands by purchase or inheritance, whether in Judæa or in foreign countries. I have written Υἱὸς with a capital, as propriety requires; and I would render 'Son of consolation.' To render 'the Son of consolation,' or 'a Son of consolation,' is alike indefensible. Our Translators, indeed, have failed to see this. Yet, in the similar expression at Mark iii. 17, Abp. Newcome rightly renders 'Sons of thunder.' On the same ground I have written Κραυλὸν τόπος at Matt. xxvii. 33, and John xix. 17; and χωρίον αἵματος at Acts i. 19, and Ἀγρὸς αἵματος at Matt. xxvii. 8.

V. After the liberality of Barnabas, is given an example of the contrary in the case of Ananias and Sapphira. The crime of which these two persons were guilty, and which brought down so awful a visitation on the offenders, must, at the most moderate estimate, be regarded, even on principles of natural religion, as one of no ordinary magnitude,—being a compound of fraud and hypocrisy. So Cicero, Off. i. 13: 'Totius injustitie nulla capitalior est, quam eorum qui cum maxime fallunt, id agunt ut viri boni esse videantur.' The older Commentators, indeed, consider the crime to have been sacrilege, which was one punishable with death; but a just distinction is made by Mede between the species facti and the circumstantia facti—namely, hypocrisy and desire of vain-glory, &c., which was perhaps the chief motive that tempted them to the offence. Be that as it may, it well merited the punishment with which it was visited—a punishment, indeed, more especially necessary in the then state of things, in order to prevent the Christian religion from being discredited by the hypocrisy of worldly-minded professors.

2. ἐνοσφίστατο ἀπὸ τῆς τ.] Supply μέρος, 'appropriated part to his own use.' Νοσφίσασθαι signifies 'to take away the property of others, and apply it to one's own use.' So Josephus, Ant. iv. 8. 29, μὴ νοσφίξασθαι ἀλλότρια. This construction with the Genitive is rare, but it is found in Joah. vii. 1, ἐνοσφίσαντο ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀναθήματος.

— συνειδυίας.] Supply τοῦτο. The word is expressed in Thucyd., vol. ii. 92. 7. Ed. Bekk. ἔννιδίως τοῖς ἑτέροις τὸ ἐπιβούλῳ.

3. ἐπλήρωσεν—τὴν καρδίαν σου.] Many recent Commentators, comparing this with that at v. 4, ἔθου ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ σου τὸ πρᾶγμα τοῦτο, take it to mean no more than 'Why was thy heart filled with that diabolical plan?' But this is unjustifiably sinking the personality of Satan, and his power, as well as will, to suggest evil thoughts to the minds of men. The two expressions above mentioned are by no means inconsistent; for while the assaults of Satan incite the hearts of men to sin, their own natural corruption is quite sufficient of itself to suggest evil thoughts. Nor will there be any difficulty in the interrogation διατί, &c., if we consider that the full force of πληρῶν τὴν καρδίαν τινός, which is πληροφορεῖσθαι, implies (as we know Satan's power is limited) such a yielding to the temptation, as, while it argues the free agency of man, makes him at the same time strictly accountable for the act. Πεύσασθαι signifies to attempt to deceive by a lie; the attempt being, as often, not for the performance. This offence towards the Apostles involved the same crime towards the Holy Spirit, under whose inspiration they acted.

4. μένον] 'remaining' (yours) i.e. unaltered. ἔλ ἔμεινε. A dativus commodi, 'remained at thy disposal,' to sell or to keep. At πρᾶθην we must supply χωρίον: but when repeated as the nominative to ὑπῆρχε, we must take it, by metonymy, for the χρῆμα or money produced by it. So the Pesh. Syr. well expresses it, 'the price thereof.' Here I agree with Mede, De Dieu, Wolf, and the framers of our English Version, in considering the sentence as consisting of two clauses, each interrogative (see Luke xxi. 1, πότε οὖν ταῦτα ἵστανται; καὶ τί τὸ σημεῖον ὅταν μὴ ταῦτα γίνεσθαι;) which suits well with the διωκτικὴ and τίθεος of the address; though, perhaps, the latter clause may be declarative; a variety not unsuitable to the nature of the address, and of which example might be adduced from Thucydides.

At τί θρι supply γίγνομαι or ἵστανται, for τί ἵστανται. The Commentators compare with this in τί θρι in Aristophanes, and θρι θρι in Philo. The expression τίθεσθαι ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ, as in τῇ καρδίᾳ, signifies, 'to deliberately plan and determine on any thing.'

5 Ἀκούων δὲ ὁ Ἀνανίας τοὺς λόγους τούτους, πεσὼν ἐξέψυξε.
καὶ ἐγένετο φόβος μέγας ἐπὶ πάντας τοὺς ἀκούοντας ταῦτα.
6 Ἀναστάντες δὲ οἱ νεώτεροι συνέστειλαν αὐτὸν, καὶ ἐξενέ-

ἰδοὺ, οἱ πόδες τῶν θαψάντων τὸν ἄνδρα σου, ἐπὶ τῇ θύρᾳ,

— οὐκ ἔψυξεν.—Θεῶ.] From a comparison of this verse with the preceding one [where Ananias is said to have lied against the Holy Ghost], as well as several other passages [John iii. 8, compared with 1 John v. 4. Acts xiii. 4. 2 Tim. iii. 16, with 2 Pet. i. 21. John vi. 45, with 1 Cor. ii. 13. 1 Cor. iii. 16, seqq. with 1 Cor. vi. 19], the best Theologians have in all ages justly inferred that the Holy Ghost is GOD. Wetstein, indeed, has remarked that ὁ Θεὸς with the Article is always confined to God the Father. But Bp. Middleton has shown that no such distinction is observed; ὁ Θεὸς and Θεὸς being used indiscriminately, except where grammatical rules interfere.

The οὐκ—ἀλλὰ is by most recent Commentators rendered non tam—quam. Perhaps, however, οὐκ may here be taken for οὐ μόνον, as in Thucyd. iii. 45, where see my Note, and also iv. 92, where see Duker. The Dative after ἔψυξεν is not, as Bp. Middleton supposes, put for the Accus. It is rather put for the Accus. with εἰς, or the Genit. with κατὰ, which yields a much stronger sense, and hence was used in a connexion which required something more energetic.

5. Εἰσῆλθεν.] Supply πνεῦμα. That the death of both these persons was by a Divine judgment, and not, what the Neologians attempt to show, from excessive fear, is manifest from the very circumstances of the case. For that so extraordinary an occurrence should have happened to two persons at once, were in the highest degree improbable. As to what has been urged, that the Apostle did not foresee, threaten, or even allude to Ananias's death, that admits of a satisfactory explanation; since whatever previous knowledge Peter might, by Divine inspiration, have to threaten the death of Ananias, it would have been, in the present circumstances of the Church, highly imprudent to have used it, as giving the magistracy that handle against the Apostles which they desired. And hence there is no cause for the wonder expressed by some, that the Sanhedrim should take no cognizance of the matter; since, from the prudent course pursued by the Apostle, it was impossible for them to have any hold upon him.

6. οἱ νεώτεροι.] Called at ver. 10, οἱ νεανίσκοι, and supposed, by Hammond, Mosheim, and Kuinoel, to have been inferior Church officers (something like our Sacristans and Vergers) appointed to perform various duties, such as sweeping and cleaning the Church, preparing for the Lord's supper and the agape, attending at funerals, &c. An opinion somewhat confirmed by the term νεανίσκοι, denoting, in Alexandrian Greek, servants, and which is countenanced by the use of the Article. No proof, however, have been adduced of the existence of such officers at so very early a period; allusions to whom, had there been such, might have been expected to be found in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers. There is, indeed, no necessity to depart from the common interpretation, which supposes οἱ νεώτεροι to mean the younger part of the congregation present. And that the same persons are, a little after, called οἱ νεανίσκοι, is no proof of the existence of such officers. It is possible that the more laborious services of the Church might at that early period not have been appropriated to particular persons, as officers, but discharged by the younger men in rotation. Nothing, however, can be inferred from the use of the Article; since it may here be employed as in οἱ νεώτεροι, Tit. ii. 6, for which we have 1 Tim. 5. 1, and 1 Pet. v. 5, νεώτεροι without the Article.

— συνέστειλαν.] This is for περιστέλλαν, 'wound him up;' probably, only in a cloak. Of this use, extremely rare, of συνεστῆλιν (with which may be compared περιστέλλω in Ezek. xxix. 5. Josephus, Ant. xvii. 3. 5. Herodotus, ii. 90) only one example has been adduced, namely, from Eurip. Troad. 376, οὐκ—ἐν πέλοις συνεστάλησαν. I add ver. 108 of the same drama: ὃ πολὺς δγκος συνεσταλλομένων προγόνων, meaning, 'shrouded,' i. e. departed.

Burial on the same day with the death was (and still is) usual in the East; and I have in Recena. Syn. shown that the custom was not unknown among the Greeks of the earliest ages, having probably been introduced by the Cadmo-Phœnician colonists; see Eurip. Alc. 345.

7. ὡς ὥρων τριῶν διάστ.] Probably at the next prayer-time.

— καὶ for ὅτι, like the Hebr. ו. A use not without example in the Classical writers. So Thucyd. i. 50, ἥδη δ' ἦν ὀψι, καὶ πρῶμαν ἔκρουοντο.

8. ἀπεκρίθη δὲ αὐτῇ] 'addressed her.' Ἀποδόσθαι, 'to sell.' In the use of the ἀπό I would not, with Kuinoel, suppose any reference to the money to be received as the price. The preposition has merely the force of away, ἀποδίδωμι of itself only denoting to give up or away, just as does our sell, from the Ang.-Saxon syllan, to let go; lit. 'to deliver up to another for our own profit.'

9. συνεφωνήθη ὑμῖν.] Similar to this is an expression of Josephus, Ant. xvii. 12. 2, Θεασάμενος οὖν συμπνευσμὸν ἐπὶ ψευδολογίᾳ διδασκάλου καὶ μαθητοῦ.

— πειράσαι τὸ Πνεῦμα Κ.] i. e. 'to try whether the Spirit of God would detect your hypocrisy and fraud.'

regard this as a Hebraism for the persons themselves, οἱ θάψαντες; the Hebrews often expressing a man by some member of his body instrumental to some action in question. I have, however, shown in Recens. Synop. (by references to Eurip. Hipp. 657. Orest. 1205. Suppl. 90, and Herc. Fur. 336) that this idiom is found among the Greek Classical writers. See Note on Rom. x. 15.

9. καὶ ἐξοίσουσί σε.] This is not to be considered as a threat, much less (as Porphyry represents) an imprecation, but a prediction, i. e. 'will carry thee out.' The same Holy Spirit which revealed to Peter the fraud, made known the punishment that would follow it.

12—14. καὶ ἦσαν ὁμοθυμαδόν, &c.] In this passage there is an appearance of contradiction, or, at least, discrepancy, and a seeming incoherence in the clauses respectively; to obviate which, various methods have been adopted. Some, considering the passage as incurably corrupt, propose to cancel the whole; while others resort to the less violent course of placing the latter part of ver. 12, καὶ ἦσαν, &c., and the whole of vv. 13 and 14 in a parenthesis. Yet that is contrary to the laws of parenthesis, as observed by the ancients, and is of too violent a nature to be admitted. Others (as Bp. Sherlock, Dr. A. Clarke, and Mr. Townsend) attempt to remove the difficulty by transposing the verses and clauses thus: v. 14, v. 12, 2d clause; v. 13, v. 12, first clause, v. 15. But though 'transposition of words is (as Porson observes) the safest of all modes of conjectural emendation,' a transposition of clauses and sentences very remote from each other, is a sort of emendation the most licentious, being nearly the same as re-writing a passage. And as, in the present case, the transpositions are of the most violent kind, and wholly unsupported by any evidence, external or internal (for how could the passage have been so transposed, and the transposition have been transmitted to all the MSS. and Versions?), the method in question must by no means be thought of. Nor is there any thing so inextricably confused in the passage as it now stands; which is of a similar kind to those at i. 14. ii. 1. 44. (see also xii. 20.), in all of which the expression εἶναι ὁμοθυμαδόν denotes the meeting together for public worship. And here the words ἅπαντες and ἐν τῇ στοᾷ Σολ. are added, because now that the believers were become so very numerous, they could no longer hold any general assemblies for divine worship in the ὑπερῶν, which they had before occupied, but were obliged to resort to the porch of the Temple here mentioned. Of course, by ἅπαντες are meant the Christians at large; not, as some have thought, the Apostles. And as τῶν λοιπῶν is opposed to ἅπαντες, it must denote the rest of the worshippers, i. e. those who were not Christians. These, it is said, did not venture κολᾶσθαι, i. e. προσίρχισθαι, to approach or come near them, whether for interference or otherwise. For that κολᾶσθαι and προσίρχισθαι are synonymous terms, is plain from x. 28, ἀβίμωτος ἐστὶν ἀνδρὶ Ἰουδαίῳ, κολᾶσθαι ἢ προσίρχισθαι, &c. (where see Note); and the former is here taken for the latter by the Psch. 87. Translator. The reason why they did not venture to do this may be attributed to the awe with which we find, from what precedes, the people had been struck by the miracles worked by the Apostles.

The next words, ἀλλ' ἐμεγάλ. αὐτοῖς ὁ λαός may be rendered, 'But the people at large (as opposed to the Rulers) held them in great reverence.' Ver. 14 is parenthetical, and meant to show that this awe or respect had, in some cases, induced them to join the Christian society. Render: 'And believers in the Lord were more and more added.' The ὥστε, of course, connects with ἐμεγάλυνεν at v. 13; meaning, that such was the reverence of the people, that, &c.

15. ἐπὶ κλινῶν καὶ κρ.] Of these two terms the latter denotes a small and mean couch, the former a larger and better one, like our sofa. Hence it appears that persons of all classes were resorted to the Apostles for aid.

— ἵνα ἐρχομένου αὐτῶν.] The approval of this action, which was a superstitious one (as implying that the power of healing was concentrated in the Apostles, and not, as it really was, adventitious, and procured at their prayers,) is by no means to be inferred, even if it were true that the persons in question were healed; for that would be procured by their faith, without the intervention of the Apostles. However, from what is said in the next verse and at xix. 12, it seems (as Kuinoel admits) highly probable that most of the persons in question were healed; at least where the faith was strong enough to qualify them for that mercy. And in such a case the superstition would be forgiven, and the faith accepted.

16. συνήρχετο τὸ πλῆθος τῶν περὶ πόλεων. Render: 'The bulk of the population of the surrounding cities flocked to Jerusalem.' At περὶ there is an ellipse of κειμένων or the like, common in all languages, though sometimes the complete expression occurs.

— ὄχλ. See Note on the kindred phraseology at Luke vi. 18. It is plain that the demoniacs are distinguished from the sick.

17, 18. So far we have read of the increase of the Church in the numbers of believers added to it, and of the various gifts and miracles by which it was distinguished; and, in a general way, the flourishing condition of Christ's kingdom. Now we have related the mad fury of the wicked consequent thereupon, and the renewed persecutions exercised by the enemies of Christ. (Calvin.)

17. ἀναστὰς. This is regarded by De Dieu and Kuinoel as a Hebrew pleonasm, while Casaubon and Heuman, more rightly, take it for διεγερθεῖς, i. e. κινηθεῖς, scil. ἐπὶ τοῖς γινόμενοις. In the words following it is implied, though not expressly said, that the High Priest was a Sadducee. And that some of the High Priests (as well as most persons of high rank) were such, we learn from Josephus. Σὺν αὐτῷ seems to be for μετ' αὐτοῦ, denoting to be of any one's party. See iv. 13. and Note. Some, however, take οἱ σὺν αὐτῷ to denote 'those who were his colleagues' in his official duties, or of council with him. But those could not be many; and the πάντες seems to exclude that view. Αἵρεσις denotes a taking up any thing, as a choice, or an opinion; 2. the opinion so taken up, whether in religion or philosophy; 3. as here, the party maintaining it, in which sense it often occurs in the later Classical writers, especially the Philosophers. Ζῆλος here

denotes a combined feeling of envy, malice, and wrath, on the cause of which see iv. 2. and Note.

18. ἐν τηρήσει δημοσίᾳ is for εἰς τήρησιν δημ., the common prison, as supra iv. 3, where see Note.

19. ἄγγελος. Render, 'an angel.'

20. σταθέντες λαλ. Beza and Kuinoel regard σταθ. as a Hebrew pleonasm, while Grotius thinks it has reference to constancy. But it rather seems to be a forensic term, used of those who are set up to speak, either as orators and advocates, or as prisoners pleading their own cause. See Acts xvii. 22. xxv. 18.

— τῆς ζωῆς ταύτης 'of this doctrine or religion which leads to salvation.' So John vi. 68, ῥήματα ζωῆς αἰωνίου. See vii. 38.

21. ὑπὸ τὸν ὄρθρον 'about day-break.' So Thucydides has ὑπὸ τὴν ἑω. On the term ὄρθρον see my Note on Luke xxiv. 1. and Thucyd. iii. 12.

— τὴν γερούσιαν. This is supposed to have been added by way of explaining to foreigners the true meaning of τὸ συνέδριον just before; q. d. 'even the whole Senate of Israel.' The word was, however, one so commonly in use with the Greeks, that it could need no such explanation. It should rather seem that γερούσιαν is added, as being a term especially applied to the Sanhedrim; and so it occurs in Philo and Josephus, though it is also used by Dionysius Hal. and Pausanias to express the Latin senatus.

23. κεκλεισμένον. Not, 'shut,' but 'fastened, or 'barred.' See Note on John xx. 19.

— ἐν πάσῃ ἀσφαλείᾳ for σὺν πάσῃ ἀσφ., or μετὰ πάσης ἀσφαλείας in Cebes. An adverbial phrase for the adverb ἀσφαλίστάτως. Ἐξω, not found in many MSS., Versions, and early Editions, is cancelled by almost every Editor from Wetstein downwards.

24. ὁ ἱερεὺς.] Taken κατ' ἔξοχην for the High Priest, as in Heb. v. 6, and sometimes in the Septuagint and Josephus. By οἱ ἀρχ. are meant the 24 heads of the sacerdotal class. See Note on Matth. ii. 4. On στρατηγὸς τοῦ ἱεροῦ see Note on iv. 1. and Luke xxii. 52.

— τί ἂν γένοιτο τ.] Some render this 'quomam hoc evasurum esset;' others, 'quomodo hoc factum fuerit.' But no proof has been adduced that such a sense is contained in the words; which are, I conceive, best rendered by Grotius, Wetstein, and Valcknaer, 'quid hoc esset rei;' διηπόρουν τί ἂν γίν. being a popular form of expression (importing, 'did not know what to think of the matter:') expressive of wonder at some circumstances connected with any thing; as, for instance, the means, manner, or event of it. So x. 17, διηπόρει τί ἂν εἴη τὸ ὄραμα.

26. ἵνα μὴ λιθ.] According to the punctuation and construction adopted by all the Editors and Commentators, ἵνα μὴ λιθ. is suspended on ἔφοβούντο. But that surely involves an unprecedented harshness of syntax; φοβεῖσθαι being often construed with μὴ, but never with ἵνα μὴ. And to omit the ἵνα from some MSS. were but cutting the knot, which may be untied by simply placing ἔφοβ. γὰρ τὸν λαόν in a parenthesis.

28. παρηγγείλαμεν.] See Note on iv. 18. Pearce, Rosenmuller, and Kuinoel take ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι τ. to mean 'respecting this person.' Yet ἐπὶ has never that sense in the New Test., nor, I believe, in the Classical writers. It is plain from many similar passages of the New Test., that ἐπὶ must here denote 'resting on the authority of,' or 'by;' in which latter sense ἐν is indeed more usual, though sometimes no preposition is found, as Matt. vii. 22, Mark ix. 38. The recent Commentators generally take ὀνόματι as here put per periphrasin for person. But though this may, in a popular view, be admitted, it is better to suppose the word to signify authority, &c. (as often elsewhere), and τοῦτο to be put, by a common hypallage, for τούτου. This is required by a kindred passage at Acts iv. 7, ἐν ποίῳ ὀνόματι ἐποιήσατε τοῦτο; The teaching ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνό-ματι τούτῳ implied, in the Messianicship of the person in question, his unjust condemnation, and the accountability of the chief priests for his being put to death.

— πεπληρώκατε, &c.] With this expression Wetstein compares similar ones in Liban. Ep. 721, οὐκ ἔδηνον—πᾶσας πόλεις ἐπέπλησεν τὸν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν λόγον. Justin, xi. 7, 14, 'Midas Phrygiam totam religionibus implevit.'

— ἐπαγαγεῖν ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, &c.] Ἐπάγω ἐπὶ τινα is a phrase signifying 'to bring any thing (always something evil) upon a person;' and it is used frequently in the later writers, of dangers, or punishments, and also of criminations brought upon any one. So Demosth. in Mid. αὖ ἐπεισιπνέμενός με φόνον καὶ τοιοῦτο πρᾶγμα ἐπαγαγόν. Here, then, the sense is: 'impute to us, make us answerable for.'

29. εἶπον] i. e. through the medium of Peter, as is suggested by the use of ἀποκριθεὶς, not ἀποκριθῆντας. Indeed, that is often ascribed to many which belongs only to one. See Matt. xv. 15. and Note. This is, however, a mode of speaking not confined to the Scriptures, but also occurring in the Classical writers. Thus in Thucyd. ii. 52, we have ἐπελθόντας ἱλθον τοιάδε, though the speech was delivered by Astymachus alone.

— πειθαρχεῖν.] A term used of implicit obedience to the orders of those who exercise authority of any kind,—parents, rulers, &c. On the sentiment, see Note on iv. 19. The reason implied in the preference of the obedience is the same as in a kindred passage of Soph. Antig. 74, 'Ἐπεὶ πλείων χρόνος, Ὅρ δαίει' ἀρξάντων κάτω (scil. τοῖς θεοῖς) τῶν ἐπὶ δαίει. 'Ἐπεὶ γὰρ αἰεὶ καίσομαι.

30. διεχειρίσασθε.] Διαχειρίζεσθαι is the middle form, but used in a deponent sense, signifies, 1. to take a business in hand, so as to dispatch it; 2. to dispatch, kill. This use is only found in the later writers. The earlier ones use διαχρήσασθαι. Ζήλον denotes, not a zeal, but a post, gabel, cross, as x. 39. Gal. iii. 13. It properly signifies a hewn log or a club. So Aristid. Onir. iv. 33, ἐπὶ τῇ τῇ κεφαλῇ ζήλον.

31. ἀρχηγόν καὶ σωτήρα.] These words are in apposition with τούτων, and may be regarded as put for eis archē, or eis τὸ εἶναι. But it should rather seem that they stand for eis archē; for though apposition is generally employed to supply something for the completion of a definition, it often contains, not so much an explanation, or fuller determination of the former, as the design of it.

With ἀρχηγόν καὶ σωτήρα here may be compared the expression supra iii. 15, where Jesus is called ὁ ἀρχηγός τῆς ζωῆς. There is, however, this difference, that in that case the expression is figurative; here it designates the actual exercise of office, as King Messiah.

— δοῦναι μετάνοιαν, &c.] i. e. ‘to be the means of producing repentance by his doctrine and the Spirit, and effecting remission of sins by his all-atoning merits and sacrifice.’ So Joseph. Bell., δοῦναι μετάνοιαν ἐπὶ τοῖς πεπραγμένοις. Here is afforded a strong attestation to the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ.

32. τῶν ῥημάτων.] Some take ῥήμ. for πραγμάτων, by Hebraism, as referred to the things mentioned at vv. 30, 31. Others take ῥήμ. to denote the ῥήματα τῆς ζωῆς at v. 20; which is preferable, especially as the doctrines implied the things. Καὶ—δὲ, ‘quin imo, nay too.’ At τοῖς πειθαρχοῦσιν we need not, with Kuinoel, suppose an ellipse of ἡμῖν, the ἡμῖν being merely expressed through modesty.

33. διεπρίοντο.] Διαπρ. signifies properly to be seen through. And here almost all the Commentators are of opinion that the sense is, ‘were filled with fury, and, as it were, gnashed their teeth;’ a metaphor taken from gnashing the teeth, as when one draws a saw. But from the more fully worded expression at vii. 54, διεπρίοντο ταῖς καρδίαις αὐτῶν, καὶ ἐβρυχον τοὺς δόντας ἐπ’ αὐτόν, it is plain that there is nothing more than a metaphor. As in Plautus, Naech.: ‘Heu cor meum finditur!’ Istius hominis ubi quoque fit mentio?

34. ἀναστάς.] Namely, to address the assembly.

— Γαμαλιήλ.] A frequent name among the Jews. It is, however, generally agreed that this was the celebrated Gamaliel, son of Simon, and grandson of Hillel, and Paul’s master.

— τίμιος παντὶ τῷ λαῷ.] So Hom. Od. κ. 88. (edited by Wetstein) πᾶσι—τίμιός ἐστιν ἀνθρώπων. Dionys. Hal. v. 11, ἀνὴρ τῷ δήμῳ τίμιος. Joseph. Bell. vi. 13, οὗτος τῷ δήμῳ τίμιος.

— ἐκέλευσεν—ἀποστόλους.] Ἐκέλευσε may mean, as often in Thucydides, ‘counselled, urged.’ Ἐξω ποιῆσαι, ‘to remove,’ (lit. to make go forth, foris.) is used according to that idiom by which ποιεῖν is employed with various adverbs of place, as ἴσω, ἐξω, ἐντὸς, πρόσω, by an ellipse of some verb of motion in the infinitive. Both propriety and custom required that, during deliberation upon the guilt or the punishment of a criminal, he should be withdrawn from the presence of his judges. It should seem, however, that their rage made them, on this occasion, forget decorum, till they were reminded of it by Gamaliel, a Pharisee, and (as some suppose) a secret follower of Christ, a man of great prudence and moderation, and who, after the Apostles had departed, took the opportunity of giving counsel to abstain from all violent measures, and to leave the issue of these new doctrines to God.

35. προσέχετε ἑαυτοῖς, τί μέλλετε πράσσειν ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀνθρ. τ.] The construction is: προσέχετε ἑαυτοῖς, τί μέλλετε πράσσειν ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀνθρ. τ. Examples of this use of ἐπὶ (concerning) τινι after πράσσειν are adduced by Wetstein.

36. ἀνέστη] i. e. rose up into rebellion, insurrexit.

— Θεοδᾶς.] This cannot be the Theudas mentioned by Joseph. Ant. xx. 5, 1, as leader of an insurrection, and destroyed, with all his forces, by Fadus the Procurator; for that event took place 14 years after the time of Gamaliel’s speech. This difficulty some (as Abp. Usher, Capellus, Bp. Pearce, and Wetstein) attempt to remove, by supposing the Theudas of St. Luke to be the same with the Judas of Josephus, Ant. xvii. 12, 5, who raised an insurrection a little after the time of Herod the First, but was defeated and put to death. And they compare a similar interchange of the names Judas and Thaddæus. This, however, is quite a gratuitous supposition. Hence it is better (with Scaliger, Casaub., Lightf., Grotius, Hamm., Krebs, Whithy, Lardner, and Kuin.,) to suppose, on the authority of Origen, contra Cels. i. 6, p. 44, that there were two persons of the name of Theudas, though there may be some doubt as to the period when the insurrection of the first Theudas took place. The second they suppose to have been son or grandson of the first, who again brought together his scattered adherents. Yet, as Dr. Lardner observes, there were several persons of the same name who were leaders of insurrections within no very long time: four Simons within 40 years, and three Judas within 10. And as the references in Wets. show that the name Theudas was by no means an uncommon one, there is no occasion to suppose the second to have been a son of the first. Indeed, considering the case of the Simons and Judas, may we not suspect that some of the succeeding demagogues took the name of their predecessors, though not related to them? as knowing how prevalent a name, in such cases, always is. From the small number of adherents mentioned (namely 400) it is plain that the insurrection of the first Theudas was not of any great consequence, and therefore was passed over by Josephus.

36. λέγων εἶναι τινα ἑαυτὸν.] At τινα supply μέγαν, implied in this emphatic use of τις, on which see Matth. Gr. Gr. § 487. The word is expressed at Acts viii. 9, λέγων εἶναι τινα ἑαυτὸν μέγαν.

— προσεκολλήθη.] Instead of this, about six MSS. and Versions have προσεκλίθη, which is preferred by Morus, Hemsterh., Valckn., Schleusner, and Kuinoel, as being too rare a word to have come from the scribes, and therefore changed into one more common. But the scribes rarely changed at all. The changes in the MSS. of the New Test. are chiefly to be ascribed to the ancient Critics, who frequently altered common terms into more elegant ones. And when we consider that προσκολλάσθαι is of frequent occurrence both in the Old and New Test., and that προσκλίνεισθαι occurs not once, there can be little doubt but that προσεκλίθη proceeded from the Alexandrian Critics. That the framers of the Versions read προσεκλίθη is by no means certain; for they may, as often, have translated liberally. If προσεκλίθη be the true reading, we may account for the sense it bears thus. Προσκλίνεισθαι signifies to incline oneself to, and hence to be attached and join oneself to. Προσκολλάω properly signifies 'to glue one thing to another,' as Joseph. Ant. vii. 12. 4, and unite any thing closely. Here the Aor. 1. Pass. is used in a middle sense, and signifies 'to join oneself to any one as a companion or follower;' and so it is used in the Septuagint, and occurs occasionally in the Classical writers.

— διελύθησαν.] Διαλύσθαι is often used of the disbanding of an army, or the dispersion of a multitude; as Thucyd. iv. 74. v. 50. viii. 34. Γίνεσθαι εἰς οὐδέν is for the Classical ἔκκειναι εἰς οὐδέν, occurring in Eurip. Hec. 622.

37. τῆς ἀπογραφῆς.] See Note on Luke ii. 1; though the taxing here spoken of is by the best Commentators supposed to be quite distinct from the census there mentioned. So Josephus, Ant. xviii. 1, 1, calls this ἀποτίμησις οὐσίῳ.

— ἀπόστητε] 'drew away into insurrection.' A signification frequent in the Classical writers, from Herodotus downwards; but never, I believe, used by them with ὁπίσω αὐτοῦ after it.

38. τὰ νῦν.] Supply οὐτα and πράγματα. Ἀπόστητε ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνδρ. An euphemism, as infra xii. 29, for 'put them not to death, nor maltreat them.'

— ὅτι ἐὰν ᾖ ἐξ ἀνθρώπων, &c.] Similarly it is said, Herodot. ix. 16, ὅτι δαὶ γινώσκειν ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἀμύχανον ἀποτρέψαι ἀνθρώπῳ. Of εἰ δὲ ἐκ Θεοῦ ἐστίν the sense is, 'But if it be, as it seems.' An idiom also found in the Classical writers.

39. μήποτε καὶ θεομάχοι εὐρεθῇτε.] It is not agreed whether these words connect with ἰάσατε, &c.; or whether there be an ellipsis of ὁρᾶτε. The latter opinion is confirmed by a plena locutio at Luke xxi. 34, and by Joseph. Ant. xvii. 4, 4, εἰ δὲ βασανίζομενον ἀληθῆ φανεῖται τὰ εἰρημικά, μήποτε κολάζειν ποθῶν τὸν ἀταλαίφρατον, ἐπ' αὐτὸν μᾶλλον καλοῖν τὴν δίκαν, ὡς καὶ αὐτὸν, and perhaps μήποτε; or at least μὴ ποῦ.

40. δείραντες.] Flagellation, though a punishment both among the Jews and Romans, infixed for even small delinquencies, was one ever considered the most ignominious. It seems to have been here selected by the Rulers for the purpose at once of casting a stigma on the Christian society, and saving their own credit, lest they should be thought to have apprehended them casually.

41. χαίροντες.] This is to be construed with ἐκ τῆς ἐξουσίας, &c. In κατηξιώθησαν ἀτιμὰς Casaubon notices the elegant use of the ἄνω ὀργισμον, which arises when two ideas, equivalent to each other are so joined, as not to be really so, but only to seem so. Several examples of this are given by Wetstein.

— αὐτοῦ.] This has been cancelled by Gies-

42 σθῆναι· πᾶσάν τε ἡμέραν, ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ καὶ κατ' οἶκον, οὐκ ἐπαύοντο διδάσκοντες καὶ εὐαγγελιζόμενοι Ἰησοῦν τὸν Χριστόν.

bach and Scholz, on the authority of several ancient MSS. and Versions.

42 κατ' οἶκον.] This, as it is opposed to ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ, plainly signifies in private houses; κατ' οἶκον being put in a generic sense for κατ' οἴκους, from house to house: since κατὰ here exerts a distributive force; though it is not perceptible in Acts xx. 20, δημοσίᾳ καὶ κατ' οἴκους.

VI. 1. πληθυνόντων.] This intransitive sense, by which πληθύνω signifies not only to multiply or make full, but to multiply oneself, increase, is not frequent; though it occurs in Exod. i. 20, 1 Sam. xiv. 19, and occasionally in the later Classical writers.

— ἐγένετο γογγυσμός.] See Note on John vi. 12.

— τῶν Ἑλληνιστῶν.] On the persons meant by these Hellenists, a difference of opinion exists. Some suppose them to have been Greek Proselytes to Judaism, and now converted to Christianity; while others think they were foreign Jews, whose residence was in Grecian cities, and who consequently used ordinarily the Greek language, but were occasionally sojourners in Judea. The latter opinion is by far the better founded; but we may, with Bp. Blomfield, Lect. in loc., include both the above classes of persons: an Hellenist being properly a person who has adopted Grecian habits, whether of speech or manners. Now the Jews treated both foreigners and proselytes with nearly equal contempt. Whence, it seems, arose the suspicion on the part of the Hellenists that their widows were neglected.

The Ἑβραῖοι were the Jews of Palestine, who spoke what was then called the Hebrew, namely, the Syro-Chaldee.

— παρεθεωροῦντο.] The word signifies, 1. to look aside from; 2. to overlook, neglect. Paropios is the term used by the earlier Classical writers; while παρεθεωρία occurs almost entirely in the later ones. The fault of the neglect in question rested, of course, with the guardians of the poor; who, it is commonly supposed, were persons appointed by the Apostles to attend in person, or as it might otherwise be convenient, to superintend the distribution of the funds for the poor. The best Commentators, however, are of the opinion of Mosheim, that they were certain persons always the same, and all Hebrews, who had hitherto been appointed by the Apostles, but were now to be elected by the people, and that to them were to be added seven persons of the Hellenists. Mosheim and Kuinoel think that the whole body of the Jerusalemite Christians was divided into seven divisions, for which there were as many places of public worship; and that hence also seven persons were elected for the purpose of taking care of the poor and of strangers, each division choosing one.

— ἐν τῇ διακονίᾳ.] The word here signifies distribution.

2. οὐκ ἀρεστόν ἐστιν.] Render, 'it is not proper.' So by ἀρεστόν the LXX. express the Hebrew צדק and נא, good and right. Τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ means the preaching of the doctrines of the Gospel. By διακονεῖν τραπέζαις is meant the collection and distribution of the funds for relief of the poor, or the care of money-matters, from τράπεζα, a money-counter, or bank. So Joseph. Ant. xii. 2, 3, οἱ δὲ λοιποὶ ἀπὸ τῆς βασιλικῆς τραπέζης κομιζόμενοι τὰ λύτρα.

3. ἐπισκέψασθε.] The word properly signifies to look at, survey; but here, from the adjunct, to look at for choice, to look out; a sense so rare, that not a single example has been adduced. Of the complete expression Munthe cites one example from Diod. Sic., p. 295.

— μαρτυρουμένους] scil. εἰς. See Note on Luke iv. 22.

— πλήρεις Πνεύμ. ἁγ.] This expression (unjustifiably lowered by those recent foreign Commentators who explain it merely of a holy ardour) may be supposed to denote the possession both of those gifts of the Holy Ghost (some of them supernatural) which were, in the Apostolic age, vouchsafed to many Christians, and of which St. Paul treats in his Epistles; and also of those graces of the Holy Spirit, so suitable to the situation of the persons in question, and especially what is specified in the next word. For by σοφία seems to be here meant, not so much divine wisdom (or knowledge of the Scriptures) as human wisdom, which was equally necessary for the proper discharge of the office—namely, sound judgment, prudence, and knowledge of business. Thus the term will be equivalent to σύνεσις in Thucyd. ii. 97, εὐβουλίας καὶ σύνεσιν περὶ τῶν παρόντων εἰς τὸν βίον.

That the persons in question were called to exercise an ecclesiastical, as well as a secular office is clear, 1. from the expression Πνεύματος ἁγίου; 2. from their being ordained by the laying on of hands; which points at an ecclesiastical, rather than secular office; 3. from the fact that some of those who were appointed, exercised spiritual functions,—as Stephen.

3. καταστήσομεν.] This (instead of the common reading καταστήσωμεν) found in many good MSS., some Fathers, and Versions, and nearly all the early Editions, has been received by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz. Χρείας. An expression simply denoting important business, as in Joseph. Bell. i. 11, 4.

4. προσκαρτ.] See Note on i. 14. By προσ-ευχῇ may be denoted, not only prayer, but religious meditation, as preparatory to the discharge of the ministerial duties in question. See Luke vi. 12.

5. πλήθους.] A Hellenistic expression formed on the model of the Hebrew מַלְאָךְ. So Deut. i. 23. 2 Sam. iii. 36. A Classical writer would have said ἤρσαν παντὶ τῷ πλήθει.

6. ἐπέθηκαν αὐτοῖς τὰς χεῖρας.] Selden and Wolf deduce the origin of laying on of hands from the age of Moses, referring to Numb. xxvii. 18. Hence the custom obtained in the Jewish Church, and was thence introduced into the Christian. As laying on of hands had always been used in praying for the good of any person present, in order to show, δεικτικῶς, for whom the benefit was entreated; so it was also, from the earliest ages, a rite of institution to office, which it conferred by symbol.

7. πολὺν τε ὄχλον τῶν ἱερέων ὑπ. τ. π.] This statement has to some appeared so improbable, that they have either taken refuge in conjecture, or adopted the reading of a few MSS., Ἰουδαίων. But the former is unauthorized, and the latter probably a mere error of the scribes, arising from ignorance of some abbreviation: besides, that is so inapposite, that scarcely any authority could justify it. Many eminent Commentators take ὄχλον to mean the multitude of the inferior priests, as opposed to the leaders of the 24 classes. But that would require the Article, and then only increase the difficulty; which may best be removed by taking πολὺν ὄχλον in a restricted and popular sense, of a considerable number. This is confirmed by Chrysostom, who interprets it by πολλοί. That a comparatively considerable number of the whole (which amounted to about 5000) should have become believers, is not strange, considering the miracles they had witnessed, both from Jesus and from the Apostles. The expression ὑπ. τ. π. is remarkable, and occurs so where else. It denotes the complete subjection of the mind as to the credenda of religion.

8. πίστεως.] Several MSS. and Versions, and some Fathers have χάριτος, which is preferred by most Commentators, and received by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz; but, I conceive, wrongly; for we may better account for the change of πίστεως into χάριτος, than the reverse. Besides, the MSS. are chiefly such as abound in alterations; not to mention that the number of those MSS. is comparatively small, and the testimony of the Versions of no great weight.

9. Λιβερτίνων.] It is a matter exceedingly debated, as to who were these Libertines. The most general opinion is, either that they were manumitted slaves of Gentile origin, but who had become proselytes to the Jewish religion, and had a synagogue at Jerusalem (and that there were many libertines, or freedmen, who became Jewish proselytes, is certain from Tacit. Annal. i. 8. Sueton. Vit. Tiberii, c. 36, and Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 3, 5); or, that they were Jews by birth, but had been taken captive by the Romans, when Pompey conquered Judaea, but were afterwards manumitted, and, in remembrance of their captivity, called themselves Libertini, and formed a synagogue by themselves at Rome. Of these two opinions the latter is perhaps preferable; but both involve considerable improbability. And as all the following denominations of persons (the Cyrenians, Alexandrians, &c.) are so called from names of places, so there is reason to suppose this the case in the present instance; especially as the Glossa Interlinearis has over the word Libertini the remark de regione, intimating that they were so called from a country. And Scia, doubtless with reference to this passage, ἐπὶ Λιβερτίνου· ὄνομα ἰθιου. Moreover, the Pesh. Syr. Version has ܠܝܒܝܪܬܝܢܐ, those of Libertina.

Hence preferable to either of the two preceding opinions is that of Bp. Pearce and others, who suppose that by the Libertines are meant Jews of Libertum, or Libertina; a town in Proconsular Africa, near Carthage. This, however, is a place so obscure, that it is difficult to prove its existence at all, and certainly not at this early period. Nay, supposing that it did exist, it would be little likely to have been classed with Cyrene and Alexandria, as having had a synagogue. There is reason, then, to think, with Beza, Spanheim, Le Clerc, Reland, and Valcknaer, that some corruption in spelling has here crept in, and that the true orthography is (as Gothofred conjectured) Λιβυστίνων, meaning (as we can prove from Steph. Byz.) the inhabitants of Libya proper, a territory adjoining to Cyrenaica, and situated between that and the Alexandria, or territory of Alexandria. This tract is in Arrowsmith's Atlas called Libyarchia: in fact, the very country meant supra. 10. by the designation τὰ μέρη τῆς Λιβύης κατὰ Κυρήνην (where see Note). It should seem, then, that the Synagogue in question was appropriated to the reception of Jewish sojourners from Libya proper; and was erected by the Jews of that country for the use of their brethren when residing at Jerusalem, as chapels have been erected in London by various foreign nations for the use of their countrymen, whether as sojourners or residents. Perhaps, however, the Cyrenians and Alexandrians are meant to be included as joining at the Synagogue in question. An opinion strongly confirmed by there being no Article before Κυρηναίων and Ἀλεξανδρίων; while there is such before ἀπὸ Κιλικίας καὶ Ἀσίας, i. e. the Asiatic Jews, who are therefore considered separately. It may well be imagined that countries so contiguous as Libya, Cyrene, and Alexandria, and each thickly peopled with Jews, should join at a Synagogue. Indeed the Jews of Libya (meaning probably to include Cyrene) are often mentioned together with those of Egypt. So Syncellus, p. 347, says: 'Ἰουδαῖοι κατὰ Λιβύην καὶ Κυρήνην, καὶ Αἴγυπτον καὶ Ἀλεξάνδρειαν, where, however, the last words cannot be right; since this would be to separate Alexandria from Egypt. Hence I would read Αἴγυπτον κατ' Ἀλεξ. 'at Alexandria in Egypt.'

I will only add, that though no authority exists for the above reading in the MSS. extant, yet it was certainly found in those from which the Armenian Version was formed. May we not suppose the error to have arisen from a careless pronunciation of Λιβυστίνων, as if written Λιβυτίνων, which in time had found its way into writing? Then from Λιβυτίνων the transition would be easy to Λιβυτίνων.

10. τῇ σοφίᾳ καὶ τῷ πνεύματι, &c.] It is purely an unjustifiable lowering of the sense to explain this merely, as it has been done by many recent, and especially foreign Commentators, 'ar-

dour and energy.' From the evident allusion here existing to what was said at ver. 3, that the Deacons were to be πλήρεις Πνεύματος ἀγίου καὶ σοφίας, and to what is ascribed to Stephen, ver. 5, that he was πλήρης πίστεως καὶ Πνεύματος ἀγίου, it will, I think, plainly appear that by πνεῦμα is here meant 'the influence of the Holy Spirit;' which will, of course, determine the sense of σοφία to be Divine wisdom. We have here, indeed, a kind of Henadiads, which Calvin seems to have recognised, by explaining, 'Non poterant resistere sapientie quam Spiritus Dei suggererat.' Nay, it may be added, even Grotius acknowledges this to imply the Divine power directing his words, agreeably to the promise of Christ, Luke xxi. 15, 'I will give you a mouth and wisdom (στόμα καὶ σοφίαν) which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor resist;' for (as it is said, Matt. x. 20,) 'it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you.'

11. ὑπέβαλον.] Ὑποβάλλειν signifies, 1. to put under; 2. to introduce a supposititious child to a mother; 3. (as here and in the later writers) to suborn, privily introduce an accuser. So Appian, i. 663, ὑπεβλήθησαν κατηγοροί.

— λαλοῦντος ῥήμ. βλασφημία εἰς Μωϋσῆν καὶ τὸν Θεόν.] It is said against Moses and God, because, under the old Jewish theocracy, to speak evil of the founder of their religion was considered tantamount to blasphemy against God himself, by whose direction the Law had been promulgated by Moses; and, as combining the crimes of treason and blasphemy, was always punished with death. So Joseph. Bell. ii. 8. 9. (of the Essenes) τίβας δὲ μέγιστον παρ' αὐτοῖς, μετὰ τὸν Θεόν, τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ νομοθέτου· καὶ βλασφημία τις εἰς τοῦτον, κολάζεσθαι θανάτῳ. (Read κολάζεται.)

12. ἐπιστάντες.] See Note on iv. 1. This must be referred to the people, elders, and scribes, not to the suborners; the subject being here changed, as often in Scripture and the best Classical writers. Render: 'and they, having come upon him,' &c.

13. μάρτυρας ψευδεῖς.] So called, as intermingling falsehood with truth in their depositions; exaggerating what he did say, and perverting his words to a sense not intended by him.

— βλάσφημα.] This, not found in very many ancient MSS., has been cancelled by Griesbach and Scholz, but retained by Matthæi. Internal evidence is quite against it; and that of ancient Versions, especially the Pesh. Syr., discountenances it.

— τούτου.] This, not found in many MSS.,

[Dan. 9. 26. κατὰ τοῦ τύπου τοῦ ἁγίου [τούτου] καὶ τοῦ νόμου· ἄκη- 14

VII. Εἶπε δὲ ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς, εἰ ἄρα ταῦτα οὕτως ἔχει; 1 and some Versions, and the Ed. Princ., has been cancelled by Griesbach, Matthæi, and Scholz.

14. ἀλλάξει.] This implies the notion of abrogating, by the introducing of some other law in their place.

15. εἶδον—ἁγγέλου.] Some Commentators think that Stephen's face was made to shine supernaturally, by a visible glory like that of Moses (Exod. xxxiv. 29.) But the far greater number, and the more eminent, are, with reason, agreed in interpreting this as a popular form of expression, indicating majesty and divine grace, such as might inspire reverence and awe. And they appeal to Esth. v. 2. 2 Sam. xiv. 17 : xix. 27. Gen. xxxiii. 10. Certainly there is nothing here said to lead us to suppose that this was a supernatural glory, like that of Moses; and as to the passage of Exod., the air and manner of it differ materially from those of the present. At the same time, the majesty and angelic innocence which shone forth in the countenance of this great protomartyr, can only be ascribed, as to its origin, to the power of the Holy Spirit; and therefore the case of Moses may, not improperly, be compared with it.

VII. In this Apologetical Speech of St. Stephen there is much which to us appears obscure, though, doubtless, sufficiently intelligible to those to whom it was addressed. Various hypotheses have, indeed, been hazarded, to remove, or at least lessen, the difficulty; which, however, after all, may be more apparent than real. And if we take into consideration the scope of the address, the character of the composition, and the circumstances under which it was delivered, it will not seem surprising that there should be found something which may seem abrupt, and even not quite apposite or conclusive in the reasoning. To advert to the scope, this appears to have been, 'to practically refute the charge made against him of contempt of their Lawgiver and the Temple, and to retort on his accusers the charge they were bringing forward against himself; namely of endeavouring to destroy the Jewish religion.' The speaker intended to show, by a brief review of the history of the Jews, and a detail of their various rebellions against God, that it was themselves rather who were guilty of contempt of their Law; and by their own perverse disobedience had been the real occasion of the destruction of the first temple, as they might be of the second. In order to establish his position, he first reviews the early history of their nation, and points out various instances of their disobedience to God: showing, moreover, that, though the rites of the Mosaic Law were appointed by the command of God himself, yet that the Israelites were not approved unto God solely by those observances. That their temple might be destroyed; and yet the true worship of God be carried on acceptably to him: that it even would be destroyed, unless they should repent.

To advert to the other particulars,—first, as to the character of the composition, if we consider the peculiar circumstances under which the address was delivered, we shall be at no loss to account for an occasional abruptness and want of coherence. As to the appropriateness of the arguments and illustrations, it must be observed that they were sufficiently apposite for the persons addressed, and quite according to the Jewish manner; the character of the composition being altogether Jewish. Finally, as to the inconclusiveness of the arguments objected to by some, it must be remembered that the course of argumentation was interrupted and broken off in the middle by the infuriate multitude. Had it been brought to a conclusion, there would undoubtedly have been nothing left incomplete, as to that which was intended to be proved. The remainder of the address would doubtless have been occupied in applying the foregoing narration in order to prove fully what was meant to be evinced. It being, we may suppose, the purpose of the speaker to convict them of the guilt they imputed to him, and to show that the true and acceptable worship of God was not to be confined to any particular place; since God dwells not in temples made with hands (ver. 48); and the worship of the Patriarchs before the Temple was erected was accepted by him. See v. 2.

Before concluding the present sketch, it may be proper to advert to a charge somewhat more difficult to answer,—namely, that in detailing various particulars of the Jewish history, Stephen has here added some circumstances which seem contradictory to the accounts in the Old Test. These will be briefly considered in the notes on the passages themselves; in which it will be shown, 1. that the discrepancies in question have been greatly exaggerated; 2dly, that they are, in general, far from being irreconcilable; and 3dly, that if, in one or two instances, they may be really such, yet if we consider that the speaker is speaking with the people, according to Jewish ideas, and on Jewish principles, and alleging facts which they themselves recognized, there is nothing which can reasonably impeach the veracity, or cast a slur on the inspiration of this great Protomartyr: for in those few particulars it is admitted that he spoke on the authority of those Rabbinical traditions whose authority his hearers regarded as unquestionable. Indeed, as it is well observed in the Quarterly Review for 1834, 'if these discrepancies were far greater than they are, they need not perplex our faith; since the whole speech of Stephen—the whole view of the history of his forefathers, which it relates with such pregnant brevity, is obviously framed according to the accredited and received notions then prevalent

Ἄνδρες—πατέρες.] By Ἄνδρες ἀδελφοὶ meant the multitude in general; and by πα-τες, the members of the Sanhedrim. The is elegantly pleonastic.

ὁ Θεὸς τῆς δόξης.] A Hebrew expression
note 'the glorious God.'

πρὶν ἢ κατ., &c.] To remove a seeming gap between what is here said and the ent of Moses, the best Commentators are ed that Stephen here followed the Jewish tion (adopted by Philo), that God appeared to Abraham,—1st, when living in Chaldea, Babyl., when resident at Charran. 'The stateent of Stephen (says the writer in the Quarterly ew, ubi supra) strictly harmonizes with the sling notions of the time; and, indeed, with great difficulty, may be brought into accord-with the Scriptures, and this without removing Haran beyond the boundaries of Mesopotamia;
ph, in fact, the situation of Haran is a quesion of very slight importance. The Jews support the first call of Abraham to have taken place, not in Haran but in Ur, of the Chaldees.
The latter rested that belief on Gen. xv. 7. So in Gen. ix. 7; and though the general course of the narrative in Genesis would lead to the opinion, that the call took place till after the first migration from Haran and the death of Terah, yet the decision of the call begins, in our version, with Gen. xii. 1. "Now, the Lord had said unto Abraham, leaving the date of the transaction indefinite; and Rosenmüller observes on the Hebrew text: "Dixitque, vel potius, dixerat autem, quæ quæ esset in Chaldæâ, priusquam Carthago esset." That this was the established opinion we have the authority of Philo de Abraham, vol. ii. p. 11, and of Josephus, Antiq. i.
VOL. I.

7. 1. But the most remarkable evidence that the Jews of the later times, at least, drew a distinction between the land of the Chaldeans and Mesopotamia, though the former must have been comprehended within the latter, is to be found in the book of Judith.'

3. δεῦρο.] Sub. ἐλθῆ, which is expressed in Aristoph. Thesm. 324. Such ellipses are frequent in verbs of motion.

4. κακείθεν—μετώκησεν.] Again there is a trifling discrepancy between this account and that in Genesis; the best solution of which seems to be that which proceeds on the supposition that here Stephen followed the tradition of the Jews, founded on Gen. xv. 7. and Nehem. ix. 7, and adopted by Philo, that Abraham was twice called.

5. οὐκ ἔδωκεν.] The best Commentators are agreed that ἔδωκεν is to be taken in a pluperfect
sense, and that the οὐ is for οὐκ. Οὐδὲ βῆμα ποδός is a proverbial expression corresponding to our idiom, 'not even a foot of land,' for none at all. See Deut. ii. 5. Εἰς κατάσχεσιν. Supply αὐ-τῇ, for ὥστε κατέχειν αὐτήν, to occupy, i. e.
possess it. So Joseph. Ant. ix. 1, 2, οὐ τὴν ὑπ' αὐτοῦ δοθεῖσαν γῆν εἰς κατάσχεσιν ἀφελίσθαι πάρισιν αὐτοῦ. As Abraham himself did not possess the country, we may suppose the promise figuratively fulfilled in him through his posterity;
or rather the καὶ may be regarded (with the best recent Commentators) as explicative, for nempe, scilicet. The sense, then, may be thus expressed:
'and yet had not given him any possession in this land, not a foot of it, and yet he promised the possession of it to him, namely, to his posterity,
although he had as yet no offspring.'

6, 7. The passage is from Gen. xv. 13, 14, and is cited from memory. Accordingly there are several variations from the Sept., all of them, however, unimportant, except that, 1. we have added in the Sept. καὶ ταπεινώσουσιν αὐτοὺς after κακ.
Yet the words are not in the Hebrew, and seem to have come from the margin as a gloss, probably from Judith v. 11, or perhaps they were a different version of Gen. 12. 2. The words, εἰπὼν ὁ Θεός, are found neither in the Hebrew nor LXX. But they form no part of the quotation, being a parenthetical remark, such as we often find interposed in citations from the Old Test. Again the words ἔδωκε μετὰ ἀποσκευῆς πολλῆς are found in both the Hebrew and the LXX., but not in the New Test. Yet this is no real discrepancy; because Stephen evidently did not mean to adduce those words, but stops at ἐξελεύσονται. There is, indeed, a seeming discrepancy in the words καὶ λατρεύσουσί μοι ἐν τῇ τῷ τούτῳ, which are neither in the Hebrew nor the Sept. But though these are not there, something very similar occurs at v. 16; and Stephen does not adduce the words as immediately following the preceding. Surenham, too, has proved that it was a custom with the Jewish doctors (and hence was sometimes adopted by the writers of the New Test.), when they cited any passages of the Old Test., to occasionally add words elsewhere employed on the same subject, and now and then with a slight variation of them for adaptation. And, besides that the words are found in substance at v. 16, they seem to have been suggested by a kindred passage at Exod. iii. 12, ἐν τῇ ἐξαγαγεῖν σε τὸν λαόν μου ἐξ Αἰγύπτου, καὶ λατρεύσει τῷ Θεῷ ἐν τῇ ὁρί τούτῳ. Thus there is, on the principles of Jewish writing, no actual discrepancy.

Πάροικον well expresses the Heb. נָכְרִי, because, as the latter is a participial noun, so is the former properly an adjective, as appears from Herodot. vii. 235. Thus, in the Heb. נָכְרִי נָכְרִי, we may suppose a participial noun and the verb substantive as put for the finite verb, from which the participial noun is derived.

— τετρακόσια.] The Chronological difficulty here involved is not so much in the thirty years' difference between this estimate and that of Josephus (because τετρακ. may be taken as a round number; and even Josephus himself sometimes makes it 400), as how to reconcile this with the fact that the Israelites were in Egypt at the most but 243 years. Nor can this difficulty be removed by the parenthesis which Markland would introduce; nay, the construction of the Hebrew will not permit it. The difficulty may best be obviated by bearing in mind that the subject of the verbs τῶν and οὗ, and also of δουλώσουσι and κακώσουσι, is to be sought in the nouns γῆ and γῷ respectively; and thus it will be 'the inhabitants of that land.' And if the truth of chronology limits the abode of the Israelites in Egypt to 243 years, and assigns 400 as the time which elapsed between Abraham's leaving Chaldaea and the period when they were established in Canaan, I see not how we can suppose otherwise than that the verbs above-mentioned, though having a common subject in γῇ, yet have a two-fold reference,—in the former verb to the Egyptians, in the latter to the inhabitants of the countries wherein they sojourned in affliction from the time they left, to the time they were settled in Canaan. Thus we may render, 'And they (i. e. the Egyptians) shall enslave them, and they (i. e. the Edomites, Canaanites, &c.) shall afflict them.' It is true that most Commentators, with our common Version, take τῶν as a verb sentent; a view also maintained by Rosenmüller. Yet he is obliged to suppose (what involves great harshness) the suffix □ as put for the separate form □. But that is surely counting a difficulty; since the verb may be taken in an active sense, as it was by the LXX., and is done by Montanus and Gesenius, who in his Lex. gives several examples, and resolves the suffix □ into □; though ellipsis, rather than resolution, seems to be the principle here to be resorted to. — κρινῶ] 'I will punish': a signification arising from the adjunct. See Pearce.

8. διαθήκην περιτομῆς.] Meaning, 'the covenant sealed by circumcision,' as its distinguishing mark. On which see Horne's Introd., vol. iii. p. 27. Most of the recent Commentators, however, interpret it, 'a precept or rite of circumcision.' But the authority for that sense is but slender, and the necessity for it here not very urgent; since the objections raised by Kuinoel to the common version do not apply to the above. This use of the Genitive is frequent.

— καὶ οὕτως] 'and so,' i. e. in virtue of that covenant. Πατριάρχας. So called as being the primogenitors and heads of the τετρακ., or tribes.

9. ἀπέδοντο εἰς Αἴγ.] So Herodot. ii. 101, τὴν μὲν αὐτῶν εἰς Αἴγυπτον, τὴν δὲ εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα ἀπέδοντο, and several other passages which might be adduced. In all these cases there is an ellipsis of the particip. fut. of a verb of motion (denoting removal) as ἀπάγεται or ἀφαιρέται. Or rather in ἀπόδ. there is a sensus praesens, including the object of action.

In the expression ζηλώσαντες (used with allusion to Gen. xxxvii. 11.) the speaker doubtless meant to hint at his own case; for Joseph, though peculiarly favoured by God, was yet hated by his brethren.

10. ἦν μετ' αὐτοῦ.] Importing protection and favour, as at Matt. xxviii. 19, μετ' ὧν εἰμι ἀπὸ νῦν. — χάριν καὶ σοφίαν.] The most common

χαίε ἰβδ.] Here there is no occasion for the arbitrary ellipsis of συμιστα- indeed, ellipsis of any kind. For in of Deut. x. 22, on which the present is stands for σύν, and 2 has the accompanied by. So Numb. xx. 20.
 the best mode of removing the seeming in the number is that of Ham-ton, and others, who think that the

 of Manasseh and Ephraim born in that these were omitted by Moses,

because they were born after Jacob's departure, but by the LXX. at Gen. xlii. 20, are expressly added from 1 Chron. vii. 14.

16. ὃ ὠνήσατο.] For ὃ, many ancient MSS., Theophylact, and the Ed. Princeps, have ὧ, which has been received by Griesbach and Scholz; while Matthæi and Vater, rightly, I think, retain ὃ.

To advert to the discrepancy between the present account and that in Gen. xlix. 30, the best Critics are of opinion that Ἀβραὰμ is spurious, and that μετετέθησαν and ἐτίθησαν are to be referred to the words of πατέρες ἡμῶν only, not to Ἰακώβ also; and that at ὠνήσατο we must supply, from the preceding, Ἰακώβ. The reading of some very ancient MSS., ὁ πατὴρ ἡμῶν, attests that, at an early period, Ἀβραὰμ was not here, and that something was thought to be wanting; which was, it seems, supplied in two ways.
 To understand Ἰακώβ from the preceding, is not near so harsh as in many examples which might be adduced from Thucydides. And indeed there is the less harshness here, since Jacob is the chief subject of these two sentences: the other is only incidental.

17. καθὼς] 'when,' a very rare sense, but occurring in 2 Macc. i. 31, and formed on that of ὥς, when. It may best be rendered as soon as.

18. οὐκ ᾔδει τὸν Ἰ.] 'had no respect for Joseph, or his merits,' was ill affected to him and his memory; as 1 Thess. iv. 4. v. 12. Matt. xxv.
 12.

19. κατασοφισάμενος τὸ γένος ἡμῶν.] Meaning, 'plotting our destruction by crafty devices.'
 This sentiment (founded on Exod. i. 10. Sept.)
 is further evolved in a similar passage of Judith,
 v. 11, καὶ ἐκάνισθη αὐτοῖς ὁ βασιλεὺς Αἰγύπτου, καὶ κατασοφίσαντο αὐτοὺς ἐν πόνῳ καὶ ἐν κλίθῳ, καὶ ἐκάνισαν αὐτοὺς, καὶ ἔθνητο αὐτοὺς εἰς δούλους, and Joseph. Ant. vi. 11, 4, μεμφομένου τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτῶν, ὅτι σώσεις μιν τὸν ἰχθὺν αὐτοῦ, κατασοφίσαντο δ' αὐ-τόν. Ang. omitted him.

— τοῦ ποιῆν.] The Genitive here expresses O o 2

purpose. Ποιεῖν ἔκθετα is for ἐκτιθῆναι, a term commonly applied to the abandonment of infants. Here we have an illustration of the crafty policy of Pharaoh just spoken of; which was to reduce the Israelites to a state of such extreme misery, that they might be driven to the step in question, and the population, at any rate, be kept down, even by infanticide.

19. εἰς τὸ μὴ ζῶειν.] 'that they might not be preserved,' namely, to experience the miserable fate of their parents. On the same principle as that on which the North American Indian women often destroy their female children.

20. ἀστῆιος τῷ Θεῷ.] 'Asterios is from the dat. sing. of ἀστυ, and properly signifies (like the Latin urbanus) polite, as opposed to ἀγροῖκος. And as the inhabitants of cities are supposed to exceed those of the country not only in politeness, but in comeliness, so ἀστῆιος came to mean handsome. Τῷ Θεῷ after ἀστῆιος is referred to a Hebrew idiom, by which, to express the excellence of any person or thing, the name of God, or of the angels, is subjoined in the Genitive or Dative to the Positive, which thus attains a Superlative sense. The Greeks effect this by an adjective derived from some name of God. Thus Josephus, Ant. ii. 9, 7, calls Moses παῖδα μορφῇ Θεοῦ.

— ὃς ἀνέτρ.] 'Ὁς is to be resolved into 'and he.' Αὐτοῦ. This, not found in many MSS. and some early Editions, has been cancelled by Griesbach, Matthæi, and Scholz; but I think wrongly. The word may very well have been thrown out by certain Alexandrian Critics, from its being more agreeable to elegant Grecism to omit the pronoun.

21. ἐκτεθέντα δὲ αὐτόν.] These words are commonly regarded as Accusatives absolute; though recent Commentators prefer supposing a pleonasm of αὐτόν; which, however, within so short a distance, can hardly be admitted. Perhaps it may better be referred to the rule of Matthæi, Gr. Gr. § 426. 3, by which, to a substantive expressing the leading idea of a proposition, and put at its beginning, is supplied quod attinet ad. 'Ἀνελίσθαι properly signifies to take up, and is often used of raising up drowning men from the sea, or taking up corpses for burial; but sometimes, as here, of taking up and taking care of exposed children. So Aristoph. Nub. 531, κάγω 'Εξίθηκα, καὶς δ' ἰτίρα τις λαβοῦς ἀνιλετο.

22. ἐπαιδεύθη, &c.] 'was educated in,' &c. In adverting to this circumstance, Stephen, as before, seems to follow the tradition of the Jews; for nothing to this purpose is found in Scripture. Of παιδεύεσθαι with the dative (in being understood) examples are adduced by Wetstein, ex. gr. Isocr., τοῖς νεωτέροις ἦσαν π. With the expression παιδ. πάσῃ σοφίᾳ Αἰγ. Pricus compares Lucian Philop., Συνάμειν τὴν σοφίαν, καὶ τὴν παιδείαν πᾶσαν Αἰγυπτίων ἴδεν. This wisdom consisted (as we learn from Philo, in his life of Moses), in a knowledge of astronomy and astrology, the interpretation of dreams, magic, mathematics, medicine, &c.; nay, as Dr. Warburton also avers, in the science of Legislation and Civil Policy. Indeed, all the greatest writers of antiquity agree in calling Egypt the mother of arts and sciences. Inasmuch that at 1 Kings iv. 30, the wisdom of Solomon is only compared to that of the Egyptians.

— δυνατὸς—ἔργοις.] This may seem inconsistent with the impediment which Moses is known to have had in his speech. Inasmuch that at Exod. iv. 16, we find Aaron his spokesman to the people. But δυνατὸς and ἐν λόγοις may denote persuasive, and therefore powerful, though not eloquent, oratory. And that Moses had this faculty, we learn from Joseph. Ant. iii. l. 4. Considering, too, what he relates, Ant. ii. 5, that Moses had the command of an expedition against the Egyptians, we may not improbably suppose what is here said of Moses to be nearly equivalent to what Thucydides, i. 139, says of Themistocles, that he was λίγυς τε καὶ πρῶτος δυνατώτατος, i. e. a powerful orator and able statesman.

23. τεσσα. χρόνος.] This circumstance, too, is founded solely on Jewish tradition, of which writings are found in the Rabbinical writings. On the expression ἀνέβη, &c. see Note on Luke xxiv. 38.

24. ἀδικούμενον] 'suffering wrong.' — ἡμύνατο] scil. αὐτόν. Ἀμύνεσθαι with Accus. signifies to ward off; with a Dative, to defend. 'Ἐποίησεν ἰδίαν.' is an Hellenistic phrase for ἐξεδίκησεν. Περὶ δὲ. Reader, 'by slaying;' which sense is supported by the Pesh. Syr. So also the word is used at Matt. xxv. 12, Mark xiv. 27, and in the Sept., formed on the same use of the Hebr. נָסַף, which, in its turn Kal, gave birth to the Latin nocere. Τὸ ἀπονομνύνειν. Meaning, 'the aggrieved party.' So 2 Macc. viii. 2, ἐπὶ τῶν ἐν τῷ πόλεμῳ ἀπονομνύνειν λαόν. That Moses intended to slay the Egyptian, cannot be proved; though Greek shows it was justifiable, both from the word of God (Gen. ix. 6.), and from law in general, and especially a law of Egypt, mentioned by Diod. Sic. i. 77, Ἐάν τις ἐν οὐκ κατὰ τὴν χώραν ἰδὼν φονιζόμενον ἄνθρωπον ('being murdered'), ἢ τὸ καθόλου πάσχοντα, μὴ ῥύσασαίτο, δυνατός ἐσθ, θεοὶ αὐτῶν περιτίσειν ὀφείλει.

25. συνίναί—σωτηρίαν.] They knew in general from tradition what God had promised to Abraham; and might imagine or hope that the time of their deliverance drew near. Hence from the proof given by Moses of his readiness to venture his very life to serve them, they might have concluded that he was appointed of God to be the means of their deliverance. And Moses might easily suppose that they would so conclude.

26. συνηλάσει—εἰρήνην.] Συνηλάσειν signifies properly to compel a person to go any where by hedging him in, and leaving him no other issue. It is, however, in the later writers used for compulsion generally; and sometimes, as here, for moral compulsion, of earnest persuasion is meant.

27. τίς σε κατέστησεν—ἡμᾶς.] This has the force of a proverbial expression, and may be compared with similar expressions in Gen. xix. 9. and Luke xii. 14. So also Joseph. Bell. i. 23. 5, ἄριστον ἐμὲ, καὶ δικαστὴν κατέστησεν. Both here and here δικαστὴν means, not judge, but arbitrator; as in Thucyd. iv. 83, δικαστὴν ἐφ' ἡμῶν τῶν σφαιτέρων διαφορῶν ἀγαγεῖν.

30. Σινᾶ.] In the Mosiac account it is Horeb, as it appears from Burckhardt and Laborde, as the mountain had, like Parnassus, a double summit, forming two peaks, one Horeb, the other Sinai.

ἐν φλογὶ πυρὸς βάτου.] Literally, 'in a bush of a bush of fire,' i. e. on fire; the Genit. being used for an adjective.

It is in fact that certain foreign Commentators, by speculating on the nature of this phenomenon, seek to lower it to the level of a natural phenomenon, and to account for it on merely natural principles. The preternatural here displays itself in characters too plain to be overlooked; inasmuch that none but those who deny it elsewhere, can fail to recognise it here. Well, indeed, were it if such as think themselves too wise 'to believe all that the prophets have spoken,' would here learn a lesson from those heathen sages, the theme of their too indiscriminate admiration. Wise is the saying of Pindar, Pyth. x. 76, ἔμοι δὲ, Σαυμάσια (for such ought undoubtedly to be read, instead of Σαυμάσαι) θεῶν τελεσάντων, οὐδὲν ποτε φαίνεται ἔμιν ἀπιστον. And true are the words of Eurip., Bacch. 374, τὸ σοφὸν δ' οὐ σοφία, τό τε μὴ Σηητὰ φρονεῖν.

31. ἱθαύμαζε.] This, for the common reading ἱθαύμασε, is found in many ancient MSS., and the early Editions; and has been with reason received by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz; for internal evidence is quite in its favour; it being the less frequent usage of the New Testament. Κατανοεῖω properly signifies to master any thing in thought, so as to understand it; but here, by a usual interchange of the notions of internal and external sense, it means to behold in order to examine; of which sense examples have been adduced by the Commentators.

32. ἐντρομος γενόμενος, &c.] It might seem strange that words so full of consolation should thus produce fear, rather than comfort and encouragement. But it was good for Moses thus to fear at the presence of God, that he might thus be impressed with a deeper feeling of reverence. (Calvin.)

33. λύσον τὸ ὑπόδ., &c.] In order to secure a due cleanliness in the performance of any of the offices of religion, it was, from the earliest ages, directed that the worshipper should take off his sandals before he entered a temple. And the custom still continues in the East, where, doubtless, it originated. From thence it seems to have passed to Egypt, where it was noticed and borrowed from thence by Pythagoras; who, among his other maxims, enjoins θεῖν ἀνυπόδειτον καὶ πρὸς ἑαυτὸν προσίεναι.

34. ἰδὼν εἶδον] 'planissimè cognovi.' This idiom, (by which to a verb is subjoined a participle, either of the same verb or one of cognate signification), esteemed by most Commentators a Hebraism, is yet pure Greek, though of rare occurrence. So in Lucian, Dial., cited by Wetstein, we have ἰδὼν εἶδον, and in Arrian, Indic. iv. 15, ἰδὼν οἶδα. The idiom was, no doubt, of Oriental origin, and the few examples found in the Classical writers are among the vestiges of the Oriental origin of the Greek language.

— κάκωσιν.] A rare word, of which Wetstein adduces only one example, from Plutarch. Yet I have noted it also in Thucyd. vii. 4. and 82. ii. 43.

35. This rejection of Moses' claims is introduced to remind them what they had been all along doing, by that stiff-necked obstinacy, characteristic of their nation; and is especially intended to bear upon the case of their rejection of Jesus Christ.

— λυτρωτήν.] The word properly signifies one who redeems another from captivity by paying his λύτρον, or ransom.

36. οὗτος.] The word is very significant, q. d. vir ille magnus. For Αἰγύπτου, Αἰγύπτῳ, found in many MSS. and early Editions, has been approved by Matthæi, and received into the text by Griesbach and Scholz.

— ἐν Ἐρυθρᾷ Θαλάσσῃ.] Said by the learned to be so called from the red tinge, imparted by the weeds with which it abounds, inasmuch that it is called in Genesis יְרֵקָה, 'the weedy sea.' And such is the name given it by the Pesch. Syr. Translator. Rosenmüller, however, is of opinion that it ought to be called the sea of Madrepores, from the submarine substances so called which occupy the bottom. A view also adopted by Laborde, Travels in Petrea, p. 264, who quotes

Giovanni Finati, as saying, that the water is so transparent that he amused himself in observing the peculiarity of the depths below him, when weeds and corals grow to such a size as almost to have the appearance of groves and gardens.

37. ὑμῶν.] This, not found in several ancient MSS. and Versions, has been cancelled by Griesbach and Scholz; but wrongly. See Note vi. 13.

— ὡς ἐμέ.] Supply ἀνστήσει, taken from ἀναστήσει preceding. See iii. 22. and Note. The words ὡς ἐμέ intimate that Christ is the end of the Law, Rom. x. 4.

38. ὁ γενόμενος—μετὰ τοῦ ἀγγέλου] 'who communicated with the angel;' namely, by acting as mediating interpreter between God and the ἐκκλησία, i. e. the assembly of Israelites congregated on Mount Sinai at the promulgation of the Law. The construction is γενέσθαι μετὰ τοῦ ἀγγέλου καὶ (μετὰ) τῶν πατέρων ἡμῶν. On ἄγγελος, denoting the Angel-Jehovah, see Note on v. 53.

— λόγια ζῶντα.] Λόγια is a term properly used of the Scriptures of the Old Testament. Its primary signification being something uttered, it came to be confined to oracular responses (as Herodot. iv. 178. Thucyd. ii. 8.), and was therefore well adapted to denote any revelation of God to man. Hence Procopius, p. 157. 17, applies it to the Scriptures of the New Testament. ζῶντα may here mean either, as in Heb. iv. 12, effluvia; or be taken for σωστικόν, as John vi. 51. and Heb. x. 20, 'soul-saving.' So in Deut. xxxii. 47, the Law is said to be ζῶν. Thus the general sense is: 'For even this Moses,' who acted as the mediator between the Angel-Jehovah and the congregation of the people, and who received these living revelations of Divine will at the hand of God, even he could not secure their obedience to his authority. On the contrary, they rejected his authority, desired to return into Egypt, and seduced Aaron to make the golden calf, trusting on the authority both of Moses and God. See Note supra, v. 33.

39. ἰστράφησαν—Αἴγυπτον.] This is by some Commentators taken to mean, 'they were sent on returning.' (See Exod. xvi. 3. xvii. 3.) by others, 'their affections reverted back to Egypt, a sensuality and idolatry.' See Ezek. xi. 8. The two senses may be included.

40. οἱ προπορ. ἡμῶν.] It was customary with the Oriental nations of antiquity for the images of the gods to be borne before the people in journeys or military expeditions, since they fancied they thus enjoyed their more effectual protection. See Numb. x. 33, compared with Deut. xxxi. 8. Sam. iv. 3. (Heins. and Kuinoel.)

— ὁ γὰρ Μωϋσῆς, &c.] An anacoluthon, to be filled up in translating by quod attinet ad.

41. ἐμοσχοποίησαν.] They had seen in Egypt divinities worshipped under certain visible forms; and they were led to choose that of a golden calf, or bullock, for a symbol of the true God, because the Egyptians worshipped Osiris, the inventor or introducer of agriculture, &c. under the form of a bull (Apis), as the symbol of agricultural labour. Kuinoel.)

— ἀνήγαγον θυσίαν.] Ἀνάγειν signifies to lay up, and, from the adjunct, to lay upon; and is often used, especially in the later writers, of offering the victim on the altar. Εὐφραίνοντο ἐν βόσκειν, 'celebrated sacrificial feasting to the honour of.' See Exod. xxxii. 6.

42. Ἐστρεψε δὲ ὁ αὐτοῦς ἐστ, active for passive; or as avertit, active for reflexive, 'turned himself from them.' Παρέδωκεν λ. 'gave them up (i. e. suffered them) to serve.' Στρατιᾷ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, τῶν πλανητῶν καὶ ἀστέρων. Ἐν βιβλῳ τῶν προφ.; i. e. the twelve minor (or latter) Prophets.

— μὴ σφάγια, &c.] An interrogative sentence inserted in by μή (answering to the Hebr. ו) has generally the force of a negation. But as it appears from Scripture that the Israelites did offer sacrifices to God in the desert, some other mode of explanation must be adopted. And it should be noted that the idiom has here the force of assertion: 'Did ye indeed offer to me sacrifices for forty years in the wilderness? [yes:] and yet [καὶ καὶ τῶν] so little real was your piety, that [in conjunction with my worship] ye raised the tabernacle of Moloch.' The above view is supported by Bornemann on Luke xvii. 9, who says μή is sometimes found so used elsewhere; referring to Amos v. 35, and this passage.

This citation is evidently from the Sept., and in the main agrees with it; the only variations being, that οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ is transposed, probably by citing from memory. For Ῥεμφάν the Sept. has Ῥαιφάν, and for Βαβυλῶνος has (together with the Hebrew) Δαμασκῶν; which variations are discussed on the next verse.

43. τὴν σκηνὴν τοῦ Μολ.] On the subject which of the gods the Israelites worshipped under the name of Moloch, some suppose Saturn; others, the Sun (the King of heaven), which is the more probable opinion, since Μολ. signifies King. Now all the nations of antiquity applied terms indicative of royalty to their gods. Thus, besides Moloch, Bel or Baal. Moloch was an image of immense size and hollow, of brass gilt, with the face of a calf or bullock, and the hands outstretched; very much like the Mexican idols described by Humboldt. This, however, only answers to the description of the idol in after times. At the period in question the idol was, no doubt, of small size, to admit of being easily hidden from the view of Moses and Aaron; and the σκηνή will thus denote a sort of case to inclose and convey it in, formed in imitation of a real tabernacle, and like those small models of the temple of Diana at Ephesus, mentioned at Acts xix. 24, where see Note. Ἀνελάβετε refers to the bearing it on the shoulders, as in religious processions, or when raised and placed aloft at the celebration of divine worship.

— τὸ ἄστρον τοῦ Θεοῦ ὑμῶν] i. e. the image of him whom ye account as a god, and worship under the image of a star.

— Ῥεμφάν.] Of the various hypotheses formed by the learned to reconcile the apparent discrepancy here between the Hebrew, the LXX., and New Test., a summary may be seen in Towns. Chr. Arr. As to the Sept. and New Test., it is plain that the same name is meant by both. The chief diversity is in the μ, which should seem not to be correct. The Ῥεμφάν of many MSS. of the New Test., or the Ῥαιφάν of the LXX., seems to be the true spelling. All the most learned inquirers are agreed that by Ῥεφάν, or Ῥαιφάν, was meant SATURN, of whom it was one of the names. And they are almost alike agreed in considering the CHILUN of the Hebrew as only another name of the same idol-deity. MOLOCH is also, with probability, supposed to be another. On the star, see Faber ap. Townsend.

— καὶ] ‘and so,’ i. e. because of your idolatry and sinfulness, and that of your forefathers. Μετοικιῶ. The word generally imports no more than to cause to emigrate, but must here be understood of compulsory removal. Ἐπέκεινα is a compound expression, by an ellipse of μέρη, used for a preposition, and sometimes becomes a mere adverb.

Instead of Βαβυλῶνος, the Sept. has Δαμασκού; a remarkable discrepancy, not easily accounted for. Some consider it as a slip of memory; which is little probable, and indeed quite inadmissible. It may possibly be (as Br. Pearce supposes) an alteration of the speaker, accommodated to the fact; for, as the Israelites were carried so far into Media (see 2 Kings xvii. 6), which country lay not only beyond Damascus, but beyond even Babylon, Stephen, who knew that to be the fact, might justly say, as he does here, beyond Babylon; thereby fixing the place of their captivity more explicitly than the Prophet did, who spoke before the event had taken place. I am, however, rather inclined to suppose that the present reading is erroneous, and derived from the margin, where it was meant to state the place of the exile. And although the prophecy may be said to be fulfilled, as regards Babylon as well as Damascus, yet certainly there seems no reason why the speaker should have exaggerated. Nor are there wanting other instances of a gloss expelling the ancient reading.

44. The purpose of the speaker in this and the three next verses is to moderate that self-complacent pride, which the Jews entertained with respect to their Temple, by reminding them that, after the giving of the Law, their ancestors had worshipped God not in a magnificent temple, but in a moveable tabernacle. And therefore, that as the place for Divine worship had been changed at the pleasure of the Deity; so the worship of Him is not so bound to one place, but that it might again be changed from the present Temple to some other place.

— ἡ σκηνὴ τοῦ μαρτυρίου.] By this the LXX. express the Hebr. מִקְדָּשׁ לְמֹשֶׁה at Numb. xvii. 8, so called either with reference to the tables of testimony contained therein; or from its being the place where God gave witness of his glorious presence. See Exod. xxv. 40. Heb. viii. 5.

— καθὼς διετάξατο, &c.] The construction is elliptical; and the sense, expressed in full, would have been, ‘(so built) as He who had conversed with Moses (i. e. Jehovah) had commanded him to build it.’ See Exod. xxv. 40, compared with Heb. viii. 5.

45. διαδιξάμενοι] scil. σκηνήν, ‘having received it as handed down from their ancestors.’ The words μετὰ Ἰησοῦ are to be construed immediately after οἱ πατέρες. The best interpreters are agreed that ἐν τῇ κατασχέσει is for eis τὴν κατάσχεσιν, as Numb. xxxii. 5, δοθέντα ἡμῖν ἡ γῆ ἐν κατασχέσει. And so the LXX. render for πάντα.

Ἀπὸ προσώπου is a Hebraism corresponding to מִפְּנֵי in the Hebrew; indeed, the idiom is found in an ancient Punic inscription preserved by Procopius.

46. ᾤησάτο] ‘asked for himself.’ De Dieu and Kuin. meet the difficulty involved in οὐκ by a device of construction which is very harsh, and, indeed, unnecessary; for it may be effectually removed by a reference to Ps. cxxii. 5, in which the expression here is founded, and where ΠΥΣΤΟΝ ΜΕΣΟΝΤΩ may be rendered, by supplying what is necessary to the sense from the preceding member (of which this is an exegetical parallelism), ‘Until I have found out a (place for; i. e. wherein I may build a) habitation,’ &c. For all the former member as far as ὅ is to be repeated in the latter.

48. ἀλλ’ οὐχ ὁ ὕψιστος ἐν χειροπ., &c.] This is not said with reference to Solomon; for he sufficiently recognised the truth that God is to be sought in heaven, and that thither the minds of believers must ascend, by faith. (See 1 Kings viii. 27.) The intent of the words is to reprove the stupidity of the popular notion respecting the Temple, which was such as to suppose that God could be confined to place. (Calvin.) Hence it is meant that as God needs not such a temple, because ‘He has heaven for His throne, and earth for his footstool;’ so that temple might be done away with, and the mode of worship also be changed.

— ναοῖς.] This word, not found in seven MSS. and several Versions, has been cancelled by Griesbach. And indeed internal evidence is against it. 49, 50. The variations here from the LXX.

will vanish, if λέγει Κύριος be taken as interposed from what comes after. In the concluding words, indeed, instead of οὐχὶ—πάντα; we have in the LXX. πάντα γὰρ ἐποίησεν ἡ χεὶρ μου, which is countenanced by the Hebrew; where, if our present copies be correct, the sentence is expressed, not interrogatively, but declaratively. I suspect, however, that the text is slightly corrupt, and needs the emendation which it may receive from this passage of St. Luke. The corruption, if I mistake not, rests on ὡς, which seems little apposite; for to take the ὡ in the sense for, is a most forced interpretation. And to leave out the word ὡ from some MSS. is only cutting the knot. I suspect that the Prophet wrote ὡς, nomae? which occurs in Gen. iv. 7, and elsewhere.

In the words immediately following, our common version, 'and all these things have been,' cannot be justified, since it contains no suitable sense, nor such as the Hebrew words oblige us to adopt. Still less can that of Bp. Lowth, 'and all these things are mine.' He, indeed, supposes ὡ (which he thinks absolutely necessary to the sense) lost out of the text, and to be supplied from the LXX. and Syriac. But this is very rash: not to say that ὡ would not be good Hebrew. We may rather suspect the ἐμὰ of the Sept. to have arisen from an attempt to make out the sense by the aid of the context. So far, however, from the addition being indispensable, there will be nothing wanting if the passage be (as it ought to be) thus translated: 'All these things did not my hand create? and [accordingly] they all of them were [brought into being].' The passage, indeed, seems to have been in the mind of St. John, Rev. iv. 11, ὅτι σὺ ἔκτισας τὰ πάντα, καὶ διὰ τὸ θέλημα σου ἦσαν καὶ ἐκτίσθησαν.

51. There is here an abruptness of transition, which has led some to maintain that something was now said which has not been recorded by St. Luke. The best Interpreters are, however, agreed that this change of manner, and transition from calm narration to sharp rebuke, was occasioned by some interruption and insult on the part of the auditors. Yet that might not be, as they imagine, by open tumult, and clamours for the death of the prisoner, but rather (as Doddridge and Kuinoel suppose) by low but deep murmurings, or hisses, and threatening gestures; which will account for and justify the severity of the language following. See Scott.

— ἐκκληροστράχηλοι. Obstinacy and perversity are, in most languages, expressed by terms derived from the idea of stiffness or hardness. In the present instance we have a metaphor taken from refractory ossein or mules. So Philo, de Educ. § 4, has σκληραύχυνες, probably the more Classical term. In the expression following, ἀπερίτμητοι τ. κ., the words τῇ καρδίᾳ are added to show that the term is to be taken figuratively. For as circumcision was a symbol of moral purity, so περιτομή is, in Scripture, often applied to the mind and heart. See Jer. iv. 4. Thus by ἀπερίτμητοι τῇ καρδίᾳ are meant those who are actuated by the carnal mind, which is 'enmity against God,' Rom. viii. 7. Comp. Levit. xxvi. 41, and Ezek. xlv. 9.

By ἀπερίτμητοι τοῖς ὠσίν are meant those who turn a deaf ear to all calls to repentance and reformation, 'whose ear (in the words of Jerem. vi. 10) is uncircumcised, and they cannot hearken.'

— αἰὶ—ἀντιπίπτετε] 'ye perpetually resist the Holy Spirit,' i. e. the testimony of those who speak by the Holy Spirit; which is regarded as tantamount to resisting the Holy Spirit himself. See Matth. x. 40, and the parallel passages. Their forefathers had in like manner rejected the prophets sent from God, and inspired by the Holy Spirit. Ἀντιπίπτειν is properly used of one body falling foul of another, but figuratively signifies to act in opposition to any one.

52. τοῦ Δικαίου] 'the Messiah;' the term being used κατ' ἐξοχὴν to denote Christ. See iii. 14, 22, and Note on Luko xxiii. 47. That the name was used by the Jews to denote the expected Messiah, Bp. Middleton has fully proved.

— προδύται καὶ φονεῖς γεγέν. The former they had done by delivering him into the hands of Pilate,—the latter by requiring him to be put to death on false charges.

53. εἰς διαταγὰς ἀγγέλων.] By διαταγὰς ἀγγ. many eminent Commentators understand troops or hosts of angels; q. d. 'hosts of angels being present, as witnesses, at the promulgation thereof.' But though that view is supported by Deut. xxxiii. 2, and Ps. lxxviii. 17, yet we have no proof of διατ. ever having had such a sense. And as to what the above Expositors urge against the sense promulgation,—that to God alone, and not to angels, is the promulgation of the Law suited,—the argument has in reality no force. It is truly observed by Calvin, that the best explanation of the present passage is one of St. Paul, Gal. iii. 19, where it is said that the Law was διαταγὰς δι' ἀγγέλων, as also at Heb. ii. 1, λαληθεὶς δι' ἀγγέλων. This may justly be thought to determine the interpretation here. I would therefore render (with others), 'Ye who have received the Law at the appointment of angels,' i. e. angels being appointed as ministering instruments or agents for its promulgation. And that διατάσσω sometimes signifies, in a forensic sense, to enact or promulgate, is certain. So Hesiod, Op. et D. 276 (cited by Eloner), τόνδε γὰρ ἀνθρώποισι νόμον διέταξε Κρονίων. Thus the expression may be considered as equivalent to ἐλάβετε τὸν νόμον διαταγέντα δι' ἀγγέλων. In such a sense, too, the passage was taken by the ancients generally; and this view is confirmed by a similar expression of Joseph. Ant. xv. 3, ἡμῶν τὰ κάλλιστα τῶν δογμάτων καὶ τὰ ὁσιώτατα τῶν ἐν τοῖς νόμοις δι' ἀγγέλων τοῦ Θεοῦ μαθόντων. The plural διατάγας is put for the singular, with reference (as Dr. Pearce says) to the several parts of the Laws of Moses, which were given at different times, and were therefore so many several διατάγαι.

The circumstance of so magnificent and solemn a promulgation of the Law, while it was such as to give it an additional majesty in the eyes of those who received it, tended likewise to aggravate their guilt in having broken it.

53. οὐκ ἐφυλάξατε.] Here the discourse seems to have been interrupted; otherwise there would have been adduced the inferences and the application from what had been thus far spoken: on which see Note at ver. 1.

54. See Note supra v. 33.

55. Πνεύματος ἁγίου.] Meaning the influence of the Holy Spirit, animating and supporting him under the trial he had to encounter.

— εἶδεν δόξαν Θεοῦ.] Many recent Commentators here recognise no more than a strongly figurative mode of expression, importing full persuasion of what he did not see, as if he actually saw it. But the words will not, without great violence, admit of such a construction; and, indeed, this is at once forbidden by the words φολιούσιν, ἰδοὺ θεωρῶ, in which is a positive assertion of something really seen. By the δόξαν Θεοῦ we may, with most Expositors, understand the Shekinah, or symbol of the Divine presence; supposing the visual faculties of the illustrious Proto-Martyr to have been, miraculously, so strengthened, that the heavens and the throne of God were made visible to him.

— Ἰησοῦν ἐστῶτα ἐκ δεξιῶν τ. Θ.] This, it has been justly supposed, was intended to suggest to the holy martyr the present help and support he might expect from the Divine power.

57. συνέσχον τὰ ὦτα.] Συνέχων τὰ ὦτα signifies properly, not to stop, but to close up the ears by driving them together, called in the Classical writers ἐπιλαβεῖν, καταλαβεῖν, or ἐπιχεῖσθαι τὰ ὦτα. This was meant as a symbolical action, expressive of detestation and abhorrence; as is plain from the passages of the Classical and Rabbinical writers adduced in Recena. Syn. 80 Plutarch, vol. ii. p. 1095, τὰ ὦτα καταλήψῃ ταῖς χερσὶ δυσχεραίνων καὶ βδελυγτόμενον; That κράξαντες must be considered in the same light, and not be viewed as merely meant to denote the voice of Stephen, is plain from a passage of Irenæus, cited by Wetstein.

58. ἐκβαλόντες] 'having hurried him out of the city.' Comp. Luke iv. 29.

— ἐλιθοβόλουν.] Since we have a little further on καὶ ἐλιθοβόλουν τὸν Στ., Markhad complains of an unnecessary repetition of the same thing. The difficulty, however, may be removed by either (with Heinr.) considering the first ἐλιθοβ. as denoting preparation for action; i. e. 'they set about stoning him,' or (with Elzer, Pearce, Rosenmüller, and Kuinoel,) by taking the thing as expressed more Historically, first generally, and then (after an insertion respecting the keeping of the clothes by Saul) particularly; narrating by whom he was stoned, and describing some circumstances which attended the stoning.

— ἀπέθεντο.] A necessary preparation, since the stones destined for such a purpose were exceedingly large. This laying aside the garments, in order to be lighter for any office, was usual with the long-vested inhabitants of Greece as well as of the East, and is alluded to by Aristoph. Vesp. 408, ἀλλὰ νομάτια βαλόντες, εἴτε, καὶ βοᾶτε, καὶ—ἀγγίλλετε.

Though the whole proceeding was illegal and tumultuary, yet (as Beza and Grotius observe) the actors conformed to the letter of the law; which directed that, in cases of stoning, the witnesses should cast the first stone,—doublets to denote their responsibility for what was done.

— νεανίου.] This term is used of men even in the flower of their age, and sometimes of those who have attained its maturity.

59. ἐπικαλούμενον, &c.] Bentley and Yalke propose to insert Θεόν. The ON, they think, might easily have been absorbed by the preceding ON. But that this should have happened is al

the MSS. is very improbable; not to say that the Article would be wanted. If, indeed, we were compelled to suppose invocation to God, it is difficult to see how any thing short of the express insertion of the word could be admitted. That, however, is not the case; and why the Commentators should have been so anxious to make Stephen offer up invocation to God, I know not; since, as Markland truly observes, 'it were contrary to Stephen's intention;—which was to die a martyr to the Divinity of Jesus Christ. So that it is only Him he invokes.' There is surely no reason why Κύριον Ἰησοῦν should not be supplied from the following words of the invocation, Κύριον Ἰησοῦ. Substitutions from the context being, even in the Classical writers (especially Thucydides), sometimes taken from the words which follow.

That ἐπικαλεῖσθαι can have no other sense than addressing by prayer and supplication, has been established beyond all controversy by Bp. Horsley against Priestley, and Dr. P. Smith, Serip. Test. vol. iii. p. 38. Equally plain is it that Jesus is the object to which this prayer was addressed; a point, indeed, fully admitted by Kuinoel, who here compares Rev. xxii. 29, where, in the words ἰδοὺ, Κύριον Ἰησοῦ, it is certain that Jesus is addressed in prayer, as he is here, in terms which necessarily imply Divine power, and nothing short of DIVINITY; even in language borrowed from his own holy example. See Luke xxiii. 34.

— δέξαι τὸ πνεῦμά μου.] Meaning, as the best Commentators are agreed, 'receive my soul into the mansions of the blessed.' A mode of expression to denote the being 'with Christ, where He is, and to behold his glory.' 'Thereby,' as Dr. Smith observes, 'asking the greatest good that immortal existence can receive, or even Omnipotent Love bestow.'

60. μὴ στήσῃς α. τὴν ἁμ. τ.] Ἰστημι, like the Hebr. ḥan, signifies, by an ellipse of χρησθῶ (sometimes expressed), to weigh, and also (as the custom of remote antiquity was to weigh out, not number, money) to pay. And as the Hebrews, and even the Heathens, represented God as weighing the actions of men, by placing the good and the evil ones in a pair of scales separately (see Dan. v. 27. Ps. xc. 8), so the best Expositors take the phrase to mean, 'Do not examine their sin in the balance,' and consequently visit it with punishment. But we may more simply explain the sense to be, 'Do not put to the balance this their sin,' i. e. do not put it into the scale which contains their sins, do not impose it to them, lay it not to their charge; as our authorized version renders.

— ἰκοιμήθη.] This is both an euphemism, and meant to suggest the composure with which this Protomartyr met so violent a death.

VIII. 1. Σαῦλος—αὐτοῦ.] These words are closely connected with the preceding, from which they ought not to have been disjoined by the division of Chapters. Συνοῦδ. properly signifies to approve of any thing with another. The word is rarely used, as here, with a dative of thing. In that case it signifies 'to be pleased with and approve of any thing.'

— πάντες.] This must be received with limitation, for a very considerable number; since there is little doubt that many of the lower ranks were suffered to remain in Jerusalem.

— πλὴν τῶν ἀποστόλων.] They remained, in order at once to support the courage of those who stayed behind, and by their steadfastness confirm the faith of those who had fled; being protected by the especial providence of God, for the purpose of building up the Church at Jerusalem by their zeal and energy, and governing it by their wisdom.

2. συνεκόμισαν.] The word properly signifies 'to bring together;' but is specially used as a funeral term, like the Latin componere; denoting not only the laying out of the body, but other preparations for its interment; nay also, as here, the funeral rites themselves. This sense is very rare in the Classical writers. An example, however, occurs in Soph. Aj. 1068, τούδε τὸν νεκρὸν χειροῖν μὴ συγκομιζέιν.

— εὐλαβεῖς.] It is a point somewhat disputed, whether these persons were Christians, or not. Most Commentators are of opinion that they were religious Jews, or Hellenistic proselytes, and perhaps secret friends to Christianity. They probably consisted of religious men, both Christians and well-disposed Jews. So Luke ii. 25, such a one is called δίκαιος καὶ εὐλαβής.

— ἐποιήσαντο κοπ., &c.] What is said (formed perhaps on Gen. i. 10) is meant to show, by example, the great honours shown him. Κοπιετός denotes deep lamentation, such as is usually accompanied in the East with beating of the breasts.

3. ἐλυμαίνετο τὴν ἐκκλ.] Λυμαίνεισθαι signifies properly 'to ravage and destroy,' as a wild beast; but is often used of brutal men. As said of things, it signifies 'to waste or spoil;' as said of persons, 'to destroy and persecute.' Thus the sense of ἐλυμ. here is that of ἐπάθουσι, Gal. i. 13.

In the words following, the construction is not quite regular, but requires a τὴ after κατὰ, which is expressed in the Arabic Version. The words, κατὰ τοὺς οἴκους ἐισπορευόμενος—φυλακῇ, are exegetical of ἡλμαίνετο before : and consequently the words κατὰ τοὺς οἴκους εἰσπορευόμενος must not be taken (as they have been by many) with what precedes, but with what follows. Σύρω is a usual term to express the apprehending of any one and carrying him before a magistrate, or to prison. It does not appear from any of the passages adduced, that the word conveys the idea of personal violence : it seems merely to denote compulsion. So in Josephus, Bell. i. 23. 3, we have τὸν δὲ σύρας μέχρι Γάμης, ἔκρινε ἐπὶ Καισαρίας. Consequently the versions huling and dragging are not correct. Of κατὰ τοὺς οἴκους the sense is, not 'into every house,' but 'house by house;' the κατὰ having (as often in this book, and at Luke viii. 1, κατὰ πόλιν) the distributive sense. Thus the expression, expressed more at large, would have been εἰσπορ. εἰς τοὺς οἴκους κατ' οἶκον.

4. διήλθον.] The Commentators usually suppose an ellipse of τὴν χώραν or τὰς χώρας. But it is better to repeat κατὰ τὰς χώρας, or at least τὰς χώρας, from the preceding.

5. εἰς πόλιν τῆς Σαμ.] It is not agreed whether by Σαμ. is meant the country, or its metropolis of the same name. The latter is with reason supposed by all the best Commentators ; since the former view seems excluded by ver. 14 ; for to say that the country had received the Gospel, when it had been only preached at one city, would be an exaggeration. The Article at πόλιν is not necessary, since in such a case it is usually omitted, being implied. That some of the most ancient MSS. have the Article, will at least show the antiquity of this interpretation ; and we may well suppose, that although the name of the city had been recently altered to Sebaste in honour of Augustus (see Joseph. Ant. xv. 7. 7), it still retained popularly its original appellation.

— ἐκήρυσσεν αὐτοῖς τὸν Χρ.] Meaning, it should seem, the preaching of the Gospel publicly, and offering admonition or exhortation privately. On the distinction between κηρύσσειν and εὐαγγελίζεσθαι see Hammond. Their authority to do this may very well be rested on their having the extraordinary and miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit.

6. προσεῖχον.] Supply τὸν νοῦν. The best Commentators are in general agreed, that this is for ἐπίστανον, 'had faith in the Gospel.' A sense, indeed, required by the context ; the term being interchanged at ver. 14 with πιστεύειν. Examples of this signification of the word have been adduced from 1 Macc. vii. 11. Eccles. xxviii. 17. Philo 104. A. Joseph. Ant. viii. 15. 4.

where πιστεύειν and προσεῖχον are conjoined, as also of the opposite terms μὴ προσεῖχον and ἀπισταῖν in Joseph. c. Apion. i. 1. So Eccles. xxii. 24 we have ὁ μὴ πιστεύων νόμον, προσέχει ἐντολαῖς. 'Ὀμοθυμαδὸν must be construed with προσεῖχον.

— ἐν τῷ ἀκούειν α.] Literally, 'on their hearing.'

7. πολλῶν — ἐξήρχετο.] The construction (somewhat obscure by transposition) is as follows : πνεύματα γὰρ ἀκάθαρτα (ἐκ) πολλῶν τῶν ἐχόντων (αὐτὰ), βοῶντα μεγάλη φωνῇ ἐξήρχετο. In ἐξήρχετο we have an example of the use of the neuter for the passive ; the sense being 'were expelled.'

— φωνῇ μεγάλῃ.] This, for the common reading μεγ. φωνῇ, found in many of the best MSS. and the Ed. Princ., has been rightly received by Griesbach, Matthæi, Vater, and Scholz.

8. χαρὰ μεγάλη.] Meaning, as Calvin explains, joy in the Holy Ghost, as the fruit of faith. Indeed, ver. 8 may be said to connect with ver. 6 ; the intervening one being, in some measure, parenthetical. The γὰρ there is illustrative : where also we have an example of ἐκ without a μὲν preceding ; a use extremely rare. Here, however, χαρὰ may have a double sense—1. joy at the miraculous cures effected on so many deplorable objects ; and 2. joy at the wonderful spread of the Gospel.

9. Σίμων.] Expositors in general are agreed that this is Simon the Cypriot, mentioned by Joseph. Ant. xx. 5. 2, as being a pretender to magic. Προὔπῃρχεν is by some Commentators taken by itself, in the sense, 'had been staying ;' but by others is joined with μαγεύων ; and rightly, as appears from Luke xxiii. 12, προὔπῃρχον ἐν ἔχθρᾳ ὄντες, where see Note. The sense is, 'had been professing magic.' On μάγην in the original sense, see Note on Matt. ii. 1. 'The appellation was (observes Kunoel) then applied even to strolling mountebanks, pretending to a knowledge of medicine, natural philosophy, and astrology (which included fortune-telling by the stars), all of them being accompanied with the mummery of pretended incantations, and other devices, for evoking departed spirits and expelling demons.' This Simon, however, was, it should seem, a person of a very superior order to the common run of such pretenders, being probably endued with much real knowledge of natural philosophy ; though he, it seems, abused it to the purpose of working on the minds of the vulgar by pretended prodigies ; throwing them into amazement, doubtless, by the exhibition of certain phenomena known only to himself; and which may be imagined from certain details in Sir Walter Scott's Essay on Demonology, and Dr. Hibbert's book on Apparitions.

Some of the Ecclesiastical historians tell us that he pretended to be God the Father, though others say the Messiah, or the Paraclete. He was no doubt willing to pass for whatever the multitude should please to account him. And they probably regarded him, if not as the promised Messiah, at least as a divine legate.

— ἐξίσταται· 'thrown into amazement.' See Note on Matt xii. 23 and Luke xxiv. 23. So Athen., cited by Wolf: ὅς περ τε αὐτόματον ἑποιοῖ ἀναφύεσθαι, καὶ ἄλλα πολλά φάσματα ἐκτράχτο, ἀφ' ὧν ἐξίστατο τὰν ἀνθρώπων τὴν διάνοιαν.

— λέγων εἶναι τινα ἑαυτὸν μέγαν· 'affirming himself to be some extraordinary person.' See Note supra v. 36.

10. πάντες ἀπὸ μικροῦ ἕως μεγ· Meaning, 'all of every age and station;' for μικροὶ τε καὶ μεγάλοι.

— οὗτός ἐστιν ἡ δύναμις, &c.] Meaning, by hypallage, 'the mighty power of God energizes in him.' Literally, 'this is the manifestation of the power of God.' So also the name Γαβριήλ, which means ἡ δύναμις τοῦ Θεοῦ, i. e. 'one invested with authority from God.' To the present purpose is what Porphyry, de Abstin. l. iii. p. 203, says of demons: βούλονται εἶναι θεοί, καὶ ἡ προσαρτάσα αὐτῶν δύναμις ('the power which rules over them') δοκεῖν Θεοὺς εἶναι ὁ μέγιστος, καὶ βούλειται.

Before μεγάλη several ancient MSS. and Versions and some Fathers have καλουμένη, which has been received by Griesbach and Scholz; whose examples, however, I cannot follow: the external evidence for this reading being by no means strong (for Versions and Fathers have but little weight in a matter of this kind), and the internal, singularly weak; the reading having every appearance of being a mere marginal gloss, as indeed is obvious from another class of MSS. having λαλομένη.

12. τοῦ.] This, not found in very many ancient MSS., Chrysostom, Theophylact, and the early Editions, has been cancelled by Griesbach, Matthæi, Vater, and Scholz.

13. ἦν προσκαρτερῶν τ. Φ.] 'used to closely attend on Philip,' namely, as a disciple. See x. 7. In so doing he appears to have been influenced solely by secular views.

— δυνάμεις καὶ σημεῖα.] This, for σημεῖα καὶ δυνάμεις μεγάλας, found in very many MSS., Versions, Fathers, and early Editions, has been received by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz; perhaps rightly.

14. ἀπέστειλαν πρὸς αὐτοὺς τ. Π. καὶ Ἰ.] It is plain from what follows, that their primary purpose in sending the Apostles was, that they might lay hands with prayer on the new converts, and thereby impart to them the gifts of the Holy Spirit. For the Apostles (says Kuinoel) seem to have laid down a rule, that converts, after being baptized and catechized, should have the imposition of hands, accompanied with prayer, in order to their receiving gifts of the Holy Spirit.

16. ἐπιπεττωκός.] This word is used of what falls with abundance, as x. 44. xi. 15. The expression is formed on Ezek. xi. 5, ἐπέπεσαν ἐπ' ἐμὲ πνεῦμα Κυρίου.

— μόνον δὲ βεβαπτ., &c.] Render, 'but they had only been baptized unto the name,' &c.

17. ἐπετίθουν τὰς χ.] On the several uses of imposition of hands, see Dr. Hammond on 1 Tim. iv. 14, and the present passage, who shows that the expression here must comprehend both the rite of Confirmation and Ordination for the ministry of the word.

18. Θεασάμενος.] Many ancient MSS. and some Fathers have ιδῶν, which has been received by Griesbach, Scholz, and Lachman; but wrongly. For though ιδῶν is the more usual expression (occurring infra xii. 3, ιδῶν ὅτι ἀριστὸν ἐστὶ), yet the other is also found; as John vi. 5, Θεασάμενος ὅτι πολὺς, &c.; and, though rare, ought, on that very account, not to be dismissed to make way for what is common.

20. τὸ ἀργύριον—εἰς ἀπώλειαν.] On the exact nature of this expression, some difference of opinion exists. By many learned Expositors it is regarded as a form of imprecation; with which they compare similar forms in the Classical writers,—as ἀπόλοιο, or βάλλ' ἐς κόρακας, or ἐς ὄλεθρον. But it is surely inconsistent with the Spirit of the Gospel to imprecate perdition on any man, however bad; and although the above forms were often used as little more than expressions of petulance and ill humour, yet no such diminution of sense can be thought of in an Apostle. In fact, there is nothing in the passage before us that can, properly speaking, be regarded as imprecation. As to the words τὸ ἀργύριόν σου σὺν σοὶ εἴη, they need not, and, I think, ought not, to be closely united in sense with εἰς ἀπώλειαν; since they merely import (by a use of the Optative for Imper.) 'may your money rest with yourself; keep your money to yourself [I will have nothing to do with it].' Thus in a similar passage of Joseph. Antiq. x. 11. 3, Δανιὴλος δὲ τὰς δωρεὰς ἡσίου αὐτὸν ἔχειν· τὸ σοφὸν γὰρ καὶ τὸ θεῖον ἀδωροδόκητον εἶναι· where, though the MSS. present no variation, I have no doubt that the true reading is, not αὐτόν, but αὐτῷ, which, indeed, seems to have been in the copy of the ancient Latin Translator. This emendation, indeed, is placed beyond doubt by the passage of Dan. v. 17, which Josephus here followed, and which might also be in the mind of the Apostle: Καὶ εἶπε Δανιὴλ ἐνώπιον τοῦ βασιλέως· Τὰ δόματα σοι ἔστω (or, as the Alexandrian and other MSS. have, σὺν σοὶ), καὶ τὴν δωρεὰν τῆς οὐκίας σου ἐτίμω δός. Now the latter clause there expresses a sense, which in the passage before us is left to be understood. Again, neither does the phrase εἰς ἀπώλειαν imply imprecation. By Whitby, Markland, A. Clarke, and others, it is taken to import prediction, namely, of what would befall him if he did not repent. Yet there is, I apprehend, nothing in the words from which prediction can be directly elicited. The nature of the expression must depend upon the εἰς, which here seems to denote tendency; as at Rom. v. 16, εἰς κατάκριμα, and vi. 16, ἀμαρτίας (φειδύσης) εἰς θάνατον. Thus it is intended to warn him of the consequences of so employing money, unless (as he gives him to understand at ver. 22) he averts the danger by timely repentance. Perhaps, then, the term denunciation will best express the full import. The full sense seems to be: 'Keep your money to yourself—for your own perdition [unless you repent], not mine; σου being here supplied from σοι preceding.

The above view of the sense is, I find, supported by the authority of Calvin, who observes that St. Peter does not imprecate, but 'justam vindictam Dei, incutiendi terroris causā, demulcat prope impendere.'

21. οὐκ ἔστι—κλῆρος.] This seems to have been a common phrase, since it occurs in Deut. x. 9. 2 Sam. xx. 1. Τῷ λόγῳ τούτῳ, this matter; for λόγος and ῥῆμα, after the example of the Heb. דָּבָר, often signify a thing.

—ἡ γὰρ καρδιά—Θεοῦ.] Formed on 2 Kings x. 15, and denoting that his profession of Christianity was insincere and hypocritical, or corrupted by pursuing bye-ends.

22. εἰ ἄρα ἀφεθήσεται, &c.] Εἰ ἄρα is by many learned Commentators taken in the sense of, as εἴπω at Phil. iii. 11, and sometimes in the Classical writers. And so the Heb. וְאִם, si forte, is rendered וְאִם by the LXX. at Eccl. xxxii. 30. But to so rare a signification it is better not here to resort, especially as it weakens the sense. The phrase may, indeed, be taken according to its ordinary import. In order, however, to understand the sense fully, it is to be observed that εἰ ἄρα, when occurring any where except at the beginning of a sentence, is elliptical; and some participle (usually πειρώμενος, or some equivalent term) is to be understood. So Mark xi. 13, εἰ ἄρα εὐρήσῃς τι. Acts xvii. 27, εἰ ἄρα γε ψηλαφήσῃς, and vii. 1. Sometimes, too, this is the case with the simple εἰ, as in Eurip. Heracl. 640, πάλαι γὰρ ὠδίνοντα τὴν ἐφγμύνην, ψυχὴν ἐτίκον, πόσους εἰ γινώσκεις. 'Animo tabescebas, (dubitans),' &c. Thus the full sense is: '[trying] whether,' &c.; and the doubt implied (as Grotius and Doddridge observe) is not whether, on sincere repentance, Simon would be forgiven, but whether he would sincerely repent. This is clear from the words of the next verse, εἰς γὰρ χολὴν, &c., which are illustrative of the matter, and show that the doubt rested on the state of Simon's heart towards God.

Ἐπίνοια signifies not so much thought, as contrivance, or device; being usually taken in a bad sense. Perhaps it is here slightly emphatic—intimating how heavy a guilt would have attended the execution of such a design.

23. εἰς γὰρ χολὴν—δύναμις.] These words are commonly taken as put for ἐν γὰρ χολῇ, &c. The best Commentators, however, from Albert and Wolf down to Kuinoel, have been of opinion that εἰς χολὴν is for χολῇ, as Acts xiii. 24, 4. vii. 21. Eph. ii. 15; q. d. 'I see thou art a man an evil person, like to a bitter and poisonous plant, a pest to Christian society.' So Anthol. ix. ii. 11, πᾶσα γυνὴ χόλος ἐστίν. In like manner σύνδεσμος they take to mean 'a sore bundle of iniquity.' Yet whether this be the real sense of the words, may be doubted. Certainly it is not established by the passages above adduced; for there sis is for ῶστε, and here is an ellipsis of αἰας; which is not the case here. Besides, the style of unmeasured reproach involved in the interpretation in question is by no means characteristic of the sacred writers; whose language, like that of our Lord, is sometimes severe, but never opprobrious. I would therefore rather acquiesce in the common interpretation, which yields a sense, though strictly just, yet little less severe,—namely, 'thou art immersed in wickedness of the vilest sort, and fast bound in the chains of sin and Satan.' It may be taken for in, as often in the New Test. and the Classical writers; and χολὴν πικρίαν, by Hebrewism, for χολὴν πικροτάτην. See note on Matt. xxvii. 34.

24. δεήθητι ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ.] Thus admitting his sin unworthiness. See John ix. 31. By his using the plural number, we may suppose that sin was present. That his repentance, however, was not real, we have every reason to believe, from the circumstances of the case, as well as from his subsequent conduct, as recorded by early Ecclesiastical tradition, which informs us that he was the author of Gnosticism.

25. διαμαρτυράμενοι.] Διαμαρτ. signifies to give on good evidence, and, by implication, to speak earnestly and forcibly impress on the mind.

26. Ἀγγελοι—ἐλάλησι.] Many recent Commentators suppose this communication to have been made by a dream. But there is surely nothing in the air of the passage to warrant this supposition; and it is no wonder that Philip should have been admonished sometimes (as at 9 & 30) by the internal suggestions of the Holy Spirit, and sometimes (as here) by the personal address of an angel. Κατὰ μεσημβ., 'towards the south'; as infra xxvii. 12, and Phil. iii. 14; and here denoting direction upon or towards any object.

—αὕτη ἐστὶν ἔρημος.] These words have occasioned no little perplexity to Commentators; so much that Wesseling, Valcknaer, Heinrichs, and Kuinoel are ready to cut them out as an interpolation from the margin. In endeavouring to explain them, some, referring the words to Γάζαν, suppose that there were then two towns—New Gaza and Old Gaza, destroyed by Alexander; the latter of which they think is here meant. Yet that two places so near to each other should have had two roads, leading from Jerusalem to each of them respectively, is improbable. Besides, why a road should be carried to a place nearly uninhabited, it is not easy to see. That sense, too, would require the Article to ἔρημος. Others, (consisting of the most eminent Commentators, ancient and modern,) referring the words to τὴν ὁδὸν, suppose that there were two roads leading from Jerusalem to Gaza; one farther about, and carried along the valley of the rivulet Eschol; the other shorter, but traversing the rough tract of mount Casius, and therefore desert and unfrequented. Yet that there were two roads, rests wholly on conjecture; and indeed thus perspicuity, and even propriety, would require ἥτις ἐστὶν ἔρημος.

The above harsh modes of removing the difficulty will be unnecessary, if, with Rosenmuller and others, we suppose, as we very well may, that these are the words, not of the Angel, but of St. Luke himself; and, referring them, as we must then do, to τὴν ὁδὸν, &c., we regard them as a remark of the sacred writer, similar to many such in the New Test. (see John vi. 10, and Note) and the Classical authors; intimating that 'it might seem strange that one so desirous as Philip to do the work of an Evangelist, should be sent upon so unfrequented a road as that from Jerusalem to Gaza.' As to the objection of Reland, that no reason can be imagined why that road should be called ἔρημος, any more than any other road in Judæa—that is supposing far more knowledge, than we can now possess of the state of the country in those times. Nay, the learned Geographer himself could not prove that the road was not such. If it was carried in a straight course, it must have passed most of the way over a hilly and barren tract, through no city or town of any note. And therefore the epithet ἔρημος, which merely means uninhabited, or very thinly peopled, would be suitable enough. So Arrian, Exp. Alex. iii. 21. 11, Οἱ δὲ εἰδέναι μὲν ἵφασσαν (they said they knew a road), ἔρημον δὲ εἶναι τὴν ὁδὸν δι' ἀνυδρίαν, and Thucyd. ii. 17, τὰ ἔρημα τῆς πόλεως.

27. I have placed a comma after Αἰθίοψ, because ἀνὴρ Αἰθ. stands for a substantivum (the ἀνὴρ being almost redundant), and thus cannot well qualify εὐνοῦχος. Εὐνοῦχος signifies properly cubicularius, 'chamberlain, prefect of the bed-chamber or harem,' especially the royal one. And as such were generally castrati; so it came to mean spado, 'an eunuch.' And from such persons being, for their supposed fidelity, generally promoted to other confidential court offices, the term came at last to mean, in a general way, an officer of state (so here a Treasurer, as we find from what follows) whether an eunuch or not. Thus Potiphar, Gen. xxxix. 1, though called εὐνοῦχος Φαραώ, yet had a wife. In the same sense, too, the word occurs in Joseph. Ant. xvi. 8. 1. Δυνάστης signifies properly 'one who has great power or influence' (and so we have μέγας εἶναι τινα frequently occurring in the ancient writers): whence it comes to mean magistratus, 'a grandee.' Wolf and Wetstein have proved from Pliny, Dio Cass., and Strabo, that Cunduce was a family name, common to the Queens of Æthiopia Superior, or Meroe, like Pharaoh to the kings of Egypt.

This person was, no doubt, a Jewish proselyte; as appears, not so much by his reading the Prophet Isaiah, as by his coming to Jerusalem to worship there. As to his being called εὐνοῦχος, that by no means precludes the supposition; since the expression (as we have just seen) is not to be understood in the physical sense. Otherwise, indeed, he could not have been a proselyte, since eunuchs were not admitted.

27. ἐπὶ πάσης τ. γ.] Sub. τεταγμένος, which is sometimes expressed. Γάζα is a word of Persian origin, and signifies treasure.

28. καὶ καὶ—ἀνεγίνωσκε.] I have in this passage adopted a punctuation somewhat varying from any former Edition; yet, I apprehend, demanded by propriety and the nature of the context. Render, 'who had gone to Jerusalem to worship there, and was returning; and, as he sat in his chariot, was also reading,' &c. The second καὶ, however, is not found in many good MSS. (including the Alexandrian and Cod. Cantabr.) and some Versions, as the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg.; and arose probably from the confusion occasioned by the true construction of the sentence being misunderstood. In thus reading the Scriptures, and, as it appears from the next verse, aloud on a journey, the proselyte was, probably, following the directions of the Jewish Masters; who (as we learn from Schoettg.) said, that 'when any one was going on a journey, and had not a companion, he should study the Law.' That students used to read aloud, appears also from several citations from the Rabbins adduced by Schoettg.

29. εἶπε δὲ τὸ Πνεῦμα.] Many ancient Commentators, and, of the modern ones, Bp. Pearce, take this to mean the angel mentioned at ver. 26. A view most harsh and improbable. It is better, with the most eminent modern Expositors, to regard the words as a popular manner of expression, only denoting that such was the suggestion of the Holy Spirit; so communicated (like the afflatus of the Prophets) as that the inspired person could always distinguish such Divine suggestions from those of his own mind. And thus the Holy Spirit might, in a certain sense, be said to speak the words to him.

—κολληθήτι τῷ ἄρμα. τ.] Κολληθῆναι with a passive form has (like the Hebrew conjugation Hothpahal, which is at once passive and reflexive) a reflexive sense, and signifies to attach oneself to, join company with. So the Heb. חָבַט 2 Sam. xx. 2. 2 Kings xviii. 6. Ruth i. 14, where the LXX. use ἀκολουθεῖν. Thus at Ruth ii. 8. καλληθήτι μετὰ τῶν κορασίων, where the sense is, 'join company with my maidens.' The chariot is here (by an usual popular idiom) put for the person in the chariot; just as, in the Classical writers, αἶμα are put for the sailors in them. Thus in Thucyd. vii. 52. fin. we have, αὐτὸν τε διαφθίρουσι καὶ τὰς μετ' αὐτοῦ ναὺς ἐπισπομίναι.

30. γινώσκεις ἃ ἀναγινώσκεις:] Most Commentators from Grot. downwards suppose a paronomasia; yet such, in the present case, would surely be most jejune, and alike unsuitable to the gravity of the speaker, and the importance of the subject.

31. πῶς γὰρ ἂν δυν. &c.] The γὰρ refers (as often) to a negative sentence, for brevity's sake, omitted; as, even in the Classical writers, is not unfrequently the case with short clauses, whether negative or affirmative, referred to by γὰρ. Ὀδῆγ. is used in the figurative sense instruct, also occurring at John xvi. 13, and Ps. xxv. 5.

Calvin here remarks on the modesty of the eunuch, in not taking offence at what might be thought a reproach of his ignorance. So far from that, he rather seeks information.

32. περιοχὴ.] This word usually signifies a summary of what is contained in any book, &c., but here it means, as often, a passage or section.

—ὡς πρόβατον ἐπὶ σφαγῇ—(καὶ αἶμα)] These words are taken from Is. lxi. 7 and 8, and allow the Sept. Version exactly; the verbal discrepancies which occur not being found in the Alexandrian and other good MSS. of the Sept. between the Sept., St. Luke, and the Hebrew, here is, indeed, considerable difference, but not such as materially to affect the general sense. The various modes of reconciliation are fully detailed by Townsend, who laudably endeavours to remove the discrepancy without resorting to any conjectural emendation of the Hebrew. But to strictly reconcile the discrepancy is perhaps impracticable. It will, however, greatly contribute veritas, if we suppose that the LXX. read ἡ ταπεινώσει αὐτοῦ. The αὐτοῦ and αὐτοῦ are easily conjoined. A αὐτοῦ might easily be lost before another, and αὐτοῦ might easily arise from the αὐτοῦ following. That the LXX. had αὐτοῦ after ταπεινώσει, we may infer from its being found in the New Test. in almost every MS. This, however, involves no real discrepancy from the Hebrew: for the αὐτοῦ may be taken with the preceding, quite as well as with the following word. And such, I suspect, is the true reading of the Hebrew. Whether the Hebrew had originally αὐτοῦ before ταπεινώσει or αὐτοῦ, is a matter I more doubt, because αὐτοῦ may mean at, under, &c. See Gesen. Lex. in v. That there should be a full stop after ταπεινώσει, cannot, I think, be doubted. Thus the Hebrew may be rendered, 'He opened not his mouth under his oppression. From judgment was he hurried off [to death].' Bp. Lowth, indeed, and Kuinoel take αὐτοῦ with the words following, and render, 'By an oppressive judgment was he cut off.' But the kindness thus involved is very harsh; and they are obliged to cancel the αὐτοῦ. If we were allowed to do that, the sentence would proceed better without the Hendiadys. But the LXX., I doubt not, had the αὐτοῦ, and attached to ταπεινώσει. And considering these words with what follows, they stumbled at ταπεινώσει; and not knowing what to make of the first αὐτοῦ in the MS., they passed it over, and when finding an αὐτοῦ after ταπεινώσει in their MSS., or in supplying it, to make up the sense, rendered it well as they could, and thus gave a sense ('he is deprived of a just judgment') very applicable to Christ, but not, I conceive, intended by the original.

The words τὴν δὲ γενεάν αὐτοῦ are, like the correspondent Hebrew ones (of which they are a literal rendering), so obscure, that their true sense cannot be fully determined. Hammond, Doddridge, Kuinoel, and most recent Commentators, take the sense to be, 'Who can describe the guilt of the men of his time [from whom he suffered such things]?' But this is negatived by what follows. Bp. Lowth renders, 'and his manner who would declare?' i. e. bear witness in his favour? q. d. 'No one.' This sense of τι has countenance in the Arabic. The circumstance was manifestly fulfilled in Christ; and the point of Hebrew antiquities on which it depends is admirably illustrated by Dr. Kennicott and Bp. Lowth. The interpretation, too, is much confirmed by the words following, and is probably the true one.

In the words ὅτι αἵρεται αὐτοῦ the sense is the same as in the Hebrew; but the Sept. Translators either read otherwise, or translated freely.

35. ἀρξάμενος ἀπὸ τ. γ. τ.] Compare a kindred passage of Luke xxiv. 27. Γραφή, as used of a single passage of Scripture, occurs in Mark xv. 58, and elsewhere. In ἐηγγέλισατο αὐτῷ τ. ἰ. it is implied that he commenced by referring the words of the prophecy to Jesus, and from thence introduced whatever else he had to communicate. In Ἰησοῦν we have (as often) the person put for the thing, as Luke iii. 18. Acts xvi. 10. Gal. i. 9. 1 Pet. i. 12.

36. τὴν ὕδωρ.] Probably some fountain or pool, formed by a brook either running into the ol rivulet, or formed at a bend thereof.

— Ἴδου, ὕδωρ—βαπτισθῆναι:] From this we may infer that Philip had fully instructed the Eunuch on the nature and necessity of baptism as an initiatory ordinance of Christianity, and that the Eunuch had professed his wish to receive, and Philip his willingness to administer it at a fit opportunity. In τί κωλύει the sense must not be prevented upon; since, from the examples of that phrase and οὐδὲν κωλύει, and also the quid vetat or prohibet of the Latin, it is probable that the sense meant to be expressed by the Eunuch was this: 'Here is an opportunity for the thing to be done forthwith.'

37. There has been no little debate as to the authenticity of this verse, which is not found in many of the best MSS. and most of the ancient Versions, including the Peschito Syriac, and is omitted in several citations of the Fathers, as also in the Edit. Princ. Moreover, in some of the MSS. which do contain it, it is found with great diversity of reading. Hence it is cancelled or rejected by Grotius, Mill, Wetstein, Pearce, Matthæi, Newcome, Griesbach, Tittman, Knapp, Kuinoel, Gratz, and Vater. It was, indeed, defended by Whithy and Wolf—strenuously, but not, I think, successfully. It is surely not, as Wolf contends, necessary to the context. The external evidence against it is certainly, if not equal to that for it, at least pretty strong. And the internal is decidedly against it; for no good reason can be imagined why it should have been thrown out, or omitted inadvertently; whereas, for its insertion we may easily account,—namely, from the anxiety of well-meaning but misjudging persons to remove what they thought an abruptness, and to somewhat qualify what they deemed too favourable to haste in administering baptism; moreover to take away a stumbling-block, from the rite not being described as performed in due form. As to Whithy's argument, on the ground that the verse was probably omitted in later times, because it opposed the delay of baptism which the catechumens experienced before they were admitted into the early Church, it has no force whatever. For surely if the verse be removed, the delay of baptism would seem to be still more opposed. The strongest argument brought forward in favour of the authenticity of the passage is, that it was read by Irenæus, by Cyprian, nay, as Mill and others say, by Tertullian. But, upon referring to the passage (de Baptismo, c. 18), I find not a shadow of proof that the verse was read by Tertullian, but rather a probability that it was not. Again, as to the authority of Cyprian, it is by no means great; for he generally does but follow the Vulgate, and that Version has the verse. Finally, its being cited by Irenæus is by no means sufficient to establish its genuineness. Indeed, the authority of Fathers for the authenticity of disputed passages or clauses, is most precarious, because, in their quotations, unless the context require the presence of the words or clauses in question, we cannot be sure that they were not foisted in by scribes and critics of the middle ages from the common text.

38. ἐκέλευσε στήναι τὸ ἄρμα] 'He gave orders for the carriage to be stopped.'

—ἐβάπτισεν αὐτόν.] No doubt, with the use of the proper form; but whether by immersion, or by sprinkling, is not clear. Doddridge maintains the former, but Lardner ap. Newcome the latter view; and, I conceive, more rightly. On both having descended into the water, Philip seems to have taken up water with his hands, and poured it copiously on the Eunuch's head. It is, indeed, plain from various passages of the Gospels, that baptism was then administered by the baptizer, after having placed the person to be baptized in some river or brook. And that abundance of water was thought desirable, we learn from John iii. 23. But though this may seem to favour immersion, yet the other method might as well be adopted. Water might, indeed, be placed in a vessel, for the purpose of pouring it on the head of the person. Yet that it should not, may be accounted for by a reference to the climate, customs, and opinions of the people of Palestine, without rendering it necessary to suppose that nothing but a purpose of immersion could originate the custom for the baptizer and the baptized to both go into water of some depth.

39. Πνεῦμα Κυρίου ἤρπασε τὸν Φ.] In some ancient MSS. and late Versions are inserted between Πνεῦμα and Κυρίου the words ἔγνω ἐπίκειναι ἐπὶ (or εἰς) τὸν εὐνούχον, ἔγγλην δέ: which reading is approved by Hammond; but without reason; for it is a manifest interpolation of those who thought the meeting up of Philip more suitable to an angel than to the Holy Spirit. And there might be some ground for this, if we were to understand, with several Commentators (as Doddridge and Scott), that Philip was caught up and carried through the air naturally; for examples of which they refer to 1 Kings xviii. 12. 2 Kings ii. 16. Ezek. iii. 14. There is, however, no necessity to suppose that to have been the case here. Nay, according to Beza, Malleton's Canon, the personal sense here in Πνεῦμα is inadmissible; while, as Mr. Rose observes on Parkh. p. 700, if ἤρπασε be translated 'caught away,' it seems required. I quite agree with Parkhurst and Mr. Rose, that nothing miraculous is here intended. ἤρπασε may very well be understood of the imperative suggestions of the Holy Spirit; which Philip doubtless well knew how to distinguish from the motions of his own mind. All, then, that seems intended by the expression is, 'hurried him away;' though there may be an allusion to the rapid feeling with which Philip left the Eunuch, and went to Azotus. So it is said in Herod. iv. 13, ἔφη δὲ Ἀριστάρχο—ἐτίθετο ἐν Ἰσσηδόνας, φοιβάλαμπτος γενόμενος. Similarly αἶρειν is occasionally used in the Sept. of the influence of the Holy Spirit; as 1 Kings xv. 12, καὶ πνεῦμα Κυρίου ἔπει σὺ εἰς τὴν γῆν οὐκ οἶδα; and 2 Kings ii. 16, μή ποτε ἔσται τὸν πνεῦμα Κυρίου.

40. εὐρίθη εἰς Ἄζ.] The rendering was found (was found) is so little satisfactory, that most recent Commentators adopt that of Drusius, fat extitit (was, or abode), of which sense they adduce several examples, principally from the Sept., but not one from the New Test. We may but suppose, with Beza, that the passive is used in a reciprocal or reflective sense, 'made his appearance;' exactly corresponding to the Hebrew idiom, by which passive forms often have a reciprocal sense, as נשחן. And so even in Greek. Thus in Herodot. iv. 4, we have the similar expression φανίτα αὐτὸν ἐν Ἰπρόν.

IX. 1. There is great reason to think that what now related took place before the baptism of a Eunuch, nay, even before the journey of Peter and John into Samaria.

— ἐμπνέων ἀπ. Markland sees not how ἐμπνέων, or even ἐκπνέων, can mean 'breathing & threatening'; and he would conjecture ἐκπνέων. But no alteration is necessary. 'Εμπνέων signifies, 1. to inhale, and, by implication, exhale with the nostrils; 2. to breathe. Now to do so with quickness and vehemence implies strong action, especially that of anger. So Aristen. i. πνέων θυμοῦ. In the later Greek writers the word denoting the kind of passion is expressed in a Genitive, with an ellipse of ἀπὸ, signifying ὡς, causa, &c. In the earlier writers the Acc. is chiefly used.

2. ἐπιστολὰς] i. e. letters credential.
— τῇ ὁδοῦ.] Article for Pronoun. For ὁδὸς τῇ ὁδοῦ, as John vii. 17. 'Ὁδὸς δὲσς not only a way of life, but a way of talking (as Judith v. 8, ἐκβῆναι ἐξ ὁδοῦ τῶν λόγων), and hence, as applied to persons, a sect, either in philosophy (as Lucian, Herm. p. 577), in religion, as here and in xxii. 4, ταῦτα τὴν ὁδὸν ἰδίωσα, and xxiv. 14. From a populousness of Damascus, its constant communication with Jerusalem, and its being, probably, the place whither most of those who fled the murder of Stephen took refuge, the number of Christians was likely to be considerable. It was the authority of the Sanhedrim with a foreign Jews, that they readily submitted to decrees in all matters spiritual; as, for instance, a suppression of what was esteemed heresy, especially as the then Ruler of Damascus, Aretas, King of Arabia, was either, according to some, a Jewish proselyte, or at least was well affected to a Jew, and permitted the exercise of this authority in things spiritual, on the part of the Sanhedrim.

3. Certain foreign Theologians, building on the old and half-developed views of De Dieu, Elsas, and Hammond, attempt to show that the circumstances of the conversion of St. Paul, here related, were not miraculous, but produced solely by certain terrific natural phenomena; which, they suppose, had such an effect on the high-spirited imagination, and so struck the alarmed conscience of Saul, as to make him regard as a pity what was merely produced by fancy. An hypothesis which cannot be too strongly reprobated, and of which I have, I trust, fully shown a fallacy in my Recent. Synop. Suffice it here to say, that however ardent might be the temperament, and vivid the imagination, of the illustrious convert, it is impossible that he could have so far deceived himself as to suppose the conversation here recorded (which he himself relates at large in his speech before Agrippa, and which he describes as in the Hebrew language,) really took place, if there had been no more in the case than the above Commentators would suppose. Nay, if he could have been so worked upon by his own high-wrought feelings, that could not have been the case with his attendants. Now it is said that 'they also, struck dumb with astonishment, heard the voice, though they saw no one.' Again, to advert to a few more particulars in the present account, and that of the Apostle himself, infra xxvi., if φωνὴ there could be taken to denote thunder (though no proof of such a case is established), what were more absurd than 'I heard a clap of thunder saying?' And his fellow-travellers, on hearing the—what?—the clap, and seeing no one, (whom, in such a case, could they have expected to see?) were mute with astonishment. Moreover, the expression φῶς, as applied to lightning, is quite unprecedented; nor is lightning any where said περιήστραφτεν. And the description given of this φῶς, that it exceeded the brightness of the mid-day sun, how can it apply to lightning? The light was doubtless like that δόξα Θεοῦ presented to the view of Stephen, supra vii. 55; consisting (to use the words of Dr. Henderson) in 'the rays of Christ's glory, which resembled the dazzling effulgence of the Schachinah, or the visible symbol of the Divine presence among the ancient Hebrews.'

Finally, the natural and corporeal presence of Christ on this occasion is required both by the testimony of Ananias and Barnabas, and by that of Paul himself, 1 Cor. ix. 1. xv. 8, where the grand purpose in view is to establish the fact of the resurrection of Christ; to which his own evidence, when added to corroborate that of other witnesses, must be of the same kind with theirs. Indeed (as Dr. Henderson observes, Lect. on Insp. p. 104) 'if he had not seen the real body which was raised from the dead, but only a semblance of it, or if the vision was nothing more than an image of it impressed upon his imagination, he could not, with any propriety, have borne testimony to his resurrection, and consequently must have been disqualified from being an apostle. In short, it may truly be said that a more complete tissue of gratuitous assumption was never thrown around any hypothesis, than the above; and we are warranted in affirming that it is impossible, either psychologically or historically, with the least degree of consistency, to interpret the language of this passage on any other principle than that of its obvious literal meaning.

5. σκληρόν σοι πρὸς κέντρα λακ.] A proverbial form, common alike to the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin; expressive of bootless resistance to superior strength. See Pind. Pyth., Od. ii. 173. Æschyl. Prom. 331. Ag. 1633, and Eurip. Bacch. 791. It is, as the Scholiast on the passage of Pindar observes, a mode of speaking derived from rebellious working cattle kicking against the goads of the ploughman. The words σκληρόν—πρὸς αὐτόν are not found in a considerable number of the best MSS. and Versions, including the Peschito Syriac; nor in several citations of the Fathers, nor in the Edit. Princeps; and they are rejected by almost every Critic of eminence, from Erasmus, Beza, and Grotius, down to Tittman and Vater. Rightly; for notwithstanding what Wolf urges in defence of the passage, there can be little doubt that it was introduced from the parallel passages at xxii. 10. xvi. 14. It might well be expected that the historians should be less circumstantial than the personal narrator of facts.

6. Sequitur illius oburgationis fructus, quā diximus oportuisse Paulum duriter quassari, ut ejus durities frangeretur. (Calvin.)

—τί με θέλεις ποιῆσαι.] Supply ἴνα σωθῶ, expressed infra xvi. 30, where see Note.

7. εἰστήκεισαν ἑννεοί.] As this seems at variance with the words πάντων καταπεσόντων ἡμῶν εἰς τὴν γῆν in the account of his conversion, by St. Paul himself, to Agrippa, Acts xxvi. 14, Commentators have endeavoured in various ways to reconcile the discrepancy. The most approved one is that of Valla and others, who suppose that they had first fallen down, and then risen again. But though this is preferable to that of Beza and others, who remove the difficulty by almost explaining away the εἰστήκεισαν, rendering it scere, yet it is liable to several objections, which I have urged in Recens. Synop. The best solution may be, to suppose that Paul's companions, at first, stood fixed, and mute with astonishment; and then, struck with awe at what they regarded as indicating the presence, however invisible, of a supernatural Being, fell with their faces to the ground, as Saul had done. So ἵστημι is used at 2 Kings xxii. 3. John vi. 22. viii. 44. Acts xxvi. 22. 1 Cor. x. 12. Gal. iv. 20. 'Ἐννοιῶν', 'dumb,' and, by implication, 'senseless.'

—ἀκούοντες μὲν τῆς φωνῆς.] This seems at variance with the account at xxii. 9, τὸ μὲν φῶς ἰδέσθαι, τὴν δὲ φωνὴν οὐκ ἤκουσαν τοῦ λαλοῦντός μοι. Of the various modes of removing the discrepancy, the most satisfactory one is to take ἤκουσαν (with Grotius, Bowyer, Valkenær, Dobree, Kuinoel, and Schlensker.) in the sense understood, a signification of the word often occurring in the New Test. and Sept. (as Gen. ii. 7.), and sometimes in the Classical writers. They heard the sound of the voice which addressed Saul, but did not, it seems, fully understand the sense of what they heard; either from imperfect acquaintance with the Hebrew language, or rather because the words would not to them carry their meaning so plainly, as they did to the conscience-stricken Saul.

8. οὐδένα ἔβλεπε] 'saw no one'—neither Jesus, whom he opened his eyes to see, nor even his companions; as much as to say, he was blind. That on rising and opening his eyes, he had lost the power of seeing any one, whether Jesus or his companions, is also clear from xxii. 11, ὅτι οὐκ ἐνέβλεπον ἀπὸ τῆς δόξης τοῦ φωτός ἑαυτοῦ. On the continued blindness of Saul, the above Commentators again exert themselves to exclude all supernatural agency; but in vain. See Recens. Synop. To suppose merely the existence of a temporary amaurosis, induced by excess of light, involves endless and insuperable difficulties. For, 1. How is it consistent with what we read further on,—that scales had grown over the eyes? 2. This amaurosis is, as they themselves admit, an affection which lasts but a very short time; whereas Saul's blindness continued about three days. 3. How are we to account for a blindness, so complete as to be accompanied with scales over the eyes, leaving Saul as one,—nam, immediately on Ananias's laying his hands on him? 4. How is it that Saul alone, and none of his companions, was struck with this amaurosis?

It should seem that in the case of Saul, as in that of Elymas, the blindness was not only judicial, but typical and emblematical. In the former case it was probably meant, by withdrawing his attention from external thoughts, and turning them inward, to favour reflection and self-examination, and thus lead to repentance.

—χειραγωγοῦντες δέ.] Several MSS., too Versions, some Fathers, and early Editions have χειραγ. τε, which has been received into the text by Matthæi and Scholz; but injudiciously; for it has the appearance of being a mere marginal gloss of those who supposed the δε to be put for τε, which was afterwards adopted by those fastidious Critics who objected to three δε's in succession. In truth, the δε is not here put for τε (and perhaps never really is), but is exegetical, serving for explanation or illustration, as at Mark iv. 35, εἰ γίνεταί λαίλαψ ἀνέμου μεγάλου τὰ δὲ κάρπια ἐπὶ βάλλα, &c. and xvi. 8, εἴχε δὲ αὐτὸς τρε-

μοι. In fact, it is used nearly as in certain passages of the Scriptural and Classical writers, where δι is said to be put for γὰρ. Accordingly the purport of χειρᾷ, δι here may be thus expressed: 'He was indeed stone-blind, so that they had to lead him by the hand to Damascus.' The circumstance of their thus leading him is, like that infra xiii. 11, introduced by way of showing his utter blindness. So Artemid. Oneir. v. 2, τυφλὸς ἐγένετο, καὶ ὑπὸ τοῦ δούλου ἰχειραγωγεῖτο.

— εἰσάγαγον εἰς Δ.] Probably they were not far from the city at the time; for in the East travelling commences at a very early hour of the morning, and is over by noon.

9. ἡμέρας τρεῖς.] We need not understand three complete days, but may suppose that among these three days is to be reckoned that on which Saul reached Damascus, and that on which Ananias came to him and removed his blindness. Thus when it is said that Christ was in the sepulchre three days, we know it was, in fact, but one whole day and a part of two others.

— οὐκ ἔφαγεν οὐδὲ ἔπιεν.] We might, in any other case, understand this of extreme abstinence. But to suppose it here (with several recent Commentators) were an unwarrantable license of interpretation; as, indeed, in most of the passages to which they appeal as examples of this hyperbole, as they term it. Complete fasting was very suitable for one under Saul's present awful visitation, which he could not know would ever be removed. Indeed the terror and remorse he felt, and the total absorption of his mind on a new and momentous subject, with the exercise of self-examination and earnest prayer for mercy and pardon, would leave him no inclination to eat and drink for the time mentioned, even had not his body been too disordered to admit of it. See Calvin.

11. Εὐθείαν.] I have so edited, with Beza, Weststein, and others, for εὐθ., because the word approaches very near to a proper name. Several similar instances might here be adduced. The following will suffice. Joseph. Bell. i. 21. 11, where, speaking of the many public works done to various cities by the liberality of Herod, he says, Τὴν δὲ Ἀντιοχείαν Πλατείας οὐ—κατέστρωσε ξιστῇ μαρμάρῳ;

— Σαῦλον ὄν.] Sub. ἄνδρα, and perhaps καλούμενον. The manner in which Saul is mentioned here and at v. 13 quite disconcerts the conjecture of many recent foreign Commentators, that Saul and Ananias were acquainted with each other.

12. προσεύχεται] 'is praying,' i. e. for pardon and deliverance from the just judgment of God.

13. ὁ Ἀν.] A few ancient MSS. and early Editions omit the Article, which is cancelled by almost all Editors from Matthæi to Vater; but without reason; it being far more likely that the Scribes should inadvertently omit than insert it.

— τοῖς ἁγίοις σου.] A periphrasis simply denoting Christians, as the Jews were styled Ἰσραῆλ. Both expressions denote what is supposed to be the case in persons so designated, and are meant to suggest what they ought to be.

14. ᾧδε] 'in this place.' As Heb. xiii. 14.

— ἔχει ἑξουσίαν παρὰ τῶν ἀρχιερέων, &c.] How this came to the knowledge of Ananias, we are left to conjecture; and the thing has been accounted for in various ways by different Commentators. Wolf and Rosenmüller suppose Ananias to have received letters from Jerusalem, apprising him of the mischief which was brewing up. Yet counsels such as these are usually kept secret; and little probable is it that the Christians would be acquainted with it in time to apprise the Damascene Christians of their danger; for we find there was so little connexion between the cities, that the intelligence of Saul's conversion was a very long time in reaching them. It may rather be supposed that the design of Saul's journey to Damascus was divulged by his companions, and thus came to the ears of the Christians. And Ananias might justly doubt whether so bitter an enemy to Christianity could have so suddenly changed, and become disposed to receive that doctrine.

15. σκεῦος ἐκλογῆς.] A Hebraism for σκ. ἐκλεκτόν, 'a chosen instrument to work my purposes.' For though σκεῦος (as also the Hebrew כֵּל) properly denotes an utensil, or piece of furniture, yet (like כֵּל in Is. xiii. 5.) it sometimes denotes ὄργανον, in both its literal and metaphorical sense, i. e. a person well adapted to the execution of any purpose. Thus Polyb. xiii. 5. 7, Δαμοκλῆς δὲ ἦν ὑπηρετικὸν σκίυος εὐφύας, καὶ πολλὰς ἔχον ἀφορμὰς εἰς πραγμάτων οἰκονομίαν.

15. βαστάσαι] 'to carry [forth] and make known.'

16. It is not expressly said that Ananias should lay hands upon Saul; but that was implied, and Ananias could not but perceive that the affair was to take place in coincidence with the vision. Hence he tells Saul that the Lord hath sent him for that purpose.

17. ὅπως—πλησθῇς Πν. ἁγ.] Jesus had not indeed told Ananias this, but he well knew it was impossible that Saul could be able to effect what he was to effect without a coriopsis effusion of the Holy Spirit, as implied in πλησθῇς.

18. εὐθέως ἀπέπεσον—λεπίδες.] In vain is it to attempt (as some have done) to account for this on natural principles. Nothing can be plainer than that St. Luke means to represent the removal of the blindness, as he had done the infliction of it, as supernatural. It may be very true that there is a disorder of the eyes, sometimes occurring in the East, called λεύκωμα, produced by certain humours in the eyes, which, becoming concrete, form as it were scales. See Foes. Œcon. Hippocr. But this is admitted to be a disorder which comes on very gradually; whereas the phenomenon in question having been sudden and without any natural cause, must therefore be regarded as miraculous.

19. ὁ Σαῦλος.] These words, not found in very many MSS., have been cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz.

—ἡμέρας τινάς.] Meaning, not certain days, but some days. On the chronological difficulty supposed to be involved in this and the following verses, see Note on Gal. i. 17.

20. Χριστὸν.] Several ancient MSS., most of the Versions, and Irenæus, have 'Ἰησοῦν, which is preferred by Grotius, Mill, Bengel, Michaelis, Morus, Valla, Rosenmüller, and Kuinoel, and has been edited by Griesbach, Knapp, Titman, and Scholz. But I rather agree with Matthæi in retaining the common reading. Χριστὸν seems entitled to the preference, as being the more difficult reading; whereas the former may be justly suspected to be an emendation, coming from those who stumbled at τὸν Χριστὸν, by taking it to denote the same with Υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ, and not being aware that τὸν Χριστὸν may stand for τὸν Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν; and that that is sometimes only a proper name, even in the Gospels and Acts, as has been proved by Bp. Middleton. See Note on Mark xi. 41, where he observes, that 'the commonness of the name Jesus among the Jews, both rendered an addition necessary, and also contributed to the gradual substitution of that addition for the real name.' Thus Χριστὸν may be considered as equivalent to Ἰησοῦν; and no change is necessary.

21. πορθήσας.] Nearly equivalent to λαλεῖν μεσθαι, supra viii. 3, where see Note.

22. συμβιβάζων] 'convincing,' as in 1 Cor. ii. 16. Συμβιβάζειν properly signifies to put together, as carpenters' work. And since he who proves any thing, does it by showing the connection, and tracing the chain of facts or reasonings, so it comes to mean to demonstrate, a unity which occurs in the above passage of 1 Cor., and sometimes in the Sept.; but very rarely in the Classical writers. Kypke has, however, added one example from Ocellus Lucanus, de Ÿniverso, c. 3. p. 530, εἰπερ ἀληθὺς ὁ λόγος συμβιβάζει, μὴ μόνον τὰ μέρη συνσπάρχειν τῇ ἀσφῇ, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὰ περιεχόμενα τοῖς μέρεσι.

—ὁ Χριστός.] Render, 'the Messiah'; for here it is plainly an appellation, descriptive of that office. See Note supra v. 20.

24. ἰγνώσθη—αὐτῶν.] This clause, from its disturbing the construction, has been removed by the Syriac Version and Wakefield, and placed after παρετήρουν—ἀνέλωσι. But rather than suppose so very harsh a transposition, I would regard the clause, with Abp. Newcome, as parenthetical. Yet thus παρετήρουν will be brought into the closest connexion with οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι as its Nominative. And the statement will run counter to that in 2 Cor. xi. 32, where St. Paul says not that the Jews, but that the soldiers of the Ethnarch of King Aretas occupied the gates, that he might not escape. Some Commentators, indeed, (as Kuinoel,) attempt to remove this discrepancy by supposing, either that the Jews may be said to have done what they did, by another, they having suggested the thing; or that the Jews by the authority of the Ethnarch, watched the gates in conjunction with the soldiers. Of these two solutions, the second is preferable; but it may be doubted whether it be quite satisfactory. I would rather suppose that οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι is not the true Nomin. to παρετήρουν, but rather ἐθναρχοῖς understood, by a very common ellipsis. Thus the sense may be expressed as if the verb had been impersonal, 'A watch was set at the gates, that he might be apprehended.' By this means the discrepancy will be effectually removed. That the Governor of the city should suffer a few lawless foreigners φρουρεῖν τὴν πόλιν, i. e. τὰς πύλας, was little probable.

25. καθῆκαν διὰ τοῦ τείχους.] Doddridge and Wakefield translate, 'by the side of the wall,' which is at least more perspicuous than our common version, 'by the wall.' Yet how this could be done, it is not easy to see. From a comparison with the parallel passage at 2 Cor. xi. 33, καὶ διὰ θυρίδος, it should rather seem that διὰ must here mean διερχομῶ, i. e. by an aperture. So Luke v. 19, διὰ τῶν κεράμων καθῆκαν αὐτόν. I would here compare Athen. p. 214, διὰ τῶν τοίχων αὐτοὺς καθιέχουσας, &c. Paleph. de Inscr. 9, καθεῖν ἱαντόν διὰ θυρίδος. Aristoph. Vesp. 579, ἐξάγει διὰ τῆς θυρίδος τὸ καλῶδιον, εἰτε καθίμα δῆσαι σαντόν. 1 Sam. xix. 12, κατάγει ἡ Μ. τὸν Δαβὶδ διὰ τῆς θυρίδος, where, as a past tense is required, and found in the Hebrew, and κατάγειν is a term little proper, I suspect that the LXX. wrote, not κατάγει, but καθεῖν.

By the θυρίδος, however, thus supposed alluded to, we are not to understand a window in the wall itself (for the exceedingly thick city walls of the ancients scarcely admitted of windows), but in some turret on the wall, or perhaps a window of some house connected with the wall, so as to have part of the house above it. For that this was sometimes the case, is clear from Thucyd. ii. 4, and the passages of the Classical writers cited by me in the Note there. It may be added, that this custom of connecting a city wall with dwelling-houses was an Eastern one, exceedingly ancient, as appears from Josh. ii. 15 (of Rahab and the spies), where some of the Greek Translators render καὶ κατεχάλασεν αὐτοὺς διὰ τῆς θυρίδος ἐν σχοινίῳ, ὅτι ὁ οἶκος ἦν ἐν τῷ τείχεϊ. So a Rabbinical writer cited by Wets. on 2 Cor. xi. 33, 'Domus in manibus constructa, cujus paries exterior est murus urbis.'

26. παραγενόμενος—εἰς Ἱερ.] Not immediately, but after having gone (for the second time, it should seem) into Arabia. See Note on Gal. i. 17. This circumstance Luke omits, because he only meant to narrate such parts of St. Paul's history, and more public ministrations, as especially illustrated the providence of God over him, and the mode in which he was brought to devote himself to the conversion of the Gentiles.

27. Βαρνάβας δέ.] Paul is supposed to have been previously known to Barnabas; nay, to have been his fellow-disciple under Gamaliel.

—ἐπιλαβόμενος.] To render this, with the earlier Commentators, 'taking him,' makes the expression a mere pleonasm. And for the sense, 'receiving him into hospitality,' assigned by Schleusner and others, authority is wanting. The meaning should rather seem to be, by an idiom found in our own language, 'taking him by the hand,' i. e. 'giving him his countenance, society, and aid,' which is what the Syriac Translator intended to express by συγκρύ. This signification of the word is rare: but an example may be adduced from Eccles. iv. 11, ἡ σοφία υἱὸς αὐτῆς ἀνύψωσι, καὶ ἐπιλαμβάνεται τῶν ζητούντων αὐτήν.

—ἤγαγας.] As we should say, introduced.

28. εἰσπορευόμενος καὶ ἐκπορ.] An expression of which the sense is the same as supra i. 21, εἰσῆλθε καὶ ἐξῆλθε ἐφ' ἡμᾶν, where see Note. Render, 'versatus cum eis,' scil. familiariter. The construction is: καὶ ἦν μετ' αὐτῶν ἐν Ἱερ. εἰσπορ. καὶ ἐκπορ.

—παρρησιαζόμενος.] Repeat ἦν. Thus it stands for ἐπαρρησιαζέτο, and connects well with ἐλάλει and συνεχῆται following; the sense being, as at Eph. vi. 20, that 'he used freedom and boldness in the cause of Jesus, and the dissemination of the Gospel.]

30. κατήγαγον.] Said perhaps with reference to the situation of Caesarea (by which we are to understand not, as Doddridge supposes, Caesarea-Philippi, but Caesarea in Palestine, which is always meant when the name occurs without any addition); that being on the sea-coast, and accordingly low, compared with the upland region of Damascus. In which view Wetstein cites Plutarch, Vit. Cic. αὐτὸν οἱ τε δυνατοὶ πάντες ἀπὸ τῆς οἰκίας κατήγαγον εἰς τὸ πᾶδιον. Perhaps, however, the sense may be, 'conducted him down,' as in Thucyd. iv. 78, οἱ ἄγωγοι—κατέστησαν αὐτὸν ἐς Δίον; and Acts xvii. 15, καθιστάντες τὸν Παῦλον ἤγαγον εἰς Ἀθηνῶν.

31. αἰσθύνου.] Meaning, not rest, but quiet and tranquillity, as opposed to the harass of persecution, or the fear of it.

—οἰκοδομούμεναι, καὶ πορευόμεναι, &c.] The more regular construction would have been: καὶ οἰκοδομοῦντο, πορευόμεναι τῷ φόβῳ τοῦ Κυρίου, καὶ τῇ παρακλήσει τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύματος πληθύνοντο. Many, indeed, refer the words τῇ παρακλήσει τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύματος, as well as τῷ φόβῳ τοῦ Κυρίου, to πορευόμεναι; and consequently take ἐπληθύνοντο of increase in numbers; as Acts vi. 1. But this supposes a most harsh construction. Much more naturally may the words be referred to the following ἐπληθύνοντο, which will then yield the far better sense of abounding, i. e. in the grace of the Holy Spirit; as at Matt. xxiv. 12. Acts xii. 24. And so 1 Pet. i. 2, χάρις ὑμῖν πληθυνθείη.

In οἰκοδομούμεναι we have an architectural metaphor; though some difference of opinion exists as to whether it should be taken in the physical sense, of increase in number of persons, or, in a moral sense, of increase in spiritual knowledge and the grace of God. The former view is generally adopted by the earlier Commentators, while recent ones, with reason, prefer the latter; which is supported by numerous passages of the New Test. When applied to Christian communities, the expression has usually reference to the promotion of peace, order, and unity in the Church, and the establishing and strengthening, by the exercise of perfect charity, that household of God which is built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets; Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone, Eph. ii. 20. Here, however, it should seem to refer to the individuals composing each of the congregations respectively, namely, (as Calvin explains) 'from their receiving new gifts and a greater confirmation of piety.' Of course implying, together with increase in grace and spiritual knowledge, a corresponding increase in Christian practice, which seems intimated by the foregoing πορευόμεναι τῷ φόβῳ τοῦ Κυρίου; by walking being meant habitual manner of life and conversation.

32. From this verse to ch. xi. 18, are related the journeys undertaken by Peter (who had hitherto confined his Evangelical labours to Jerusalem, with the exception of a short visit to Samaria, related at viii. 14,) for the purpose of visiting and confirming the churches founded in Palestine, and, by his preaching, increasing the numbers of their members.

33. Αἰνέα.] From the name, he seems to have been an Hellenist; and, as the air of the passage seems to suggest, a Christian.

34. στρώσον σεαυτῷ.] Supply κλῖμα. In this and the expression of Herodot. vii. 17, αἶτον ποιεῖσθαι there is reference, not to such portable couches as cripples were laid upon, to excite charity, but to a κλῖμα, or sofa, suited to Aeneas's respectable station in life. Here Clarendon, Calvin, and Doddridge remark on the different mode in which this miracle was performed, as compared with Christ's. 'By this speaking (says Calvin) Peter meant to openly declare that he was only the instrument, while the miracle was performed by the virtue of Christ, that he might thus give the glory to Christ alone.' See more in Clarius and Doddridge.

35. αὐτοὶ ἐπέστρεψαν.] Some Commentators take ἐπέστρεψαν in a prospective sense, rendering

36 Ἐν Ἰούπῃ δέ τις ἦν μαθήτρια ὀνόματι Ταβιθὰ, ἡ διερμηνευομένη λέγεται Δορκάς· αὕτη ἦν πλήρης ἀγαθῶν 37 ἔργων καὶ ἐλεημοσυνῶν ὧν ἐποίει. Ἐγένετο δὲ, ἐν ταῖς
ἡμέραις ἐκείναις ἀσθενήσασαν αὐτὴν ἀποθανεῖν. λούσαντες
38 δὲ αὐτὴν ἔθηκαν ἐν ὑπερῷῳ. Ἐγγὺς δὲ οὔσης Λύδδης τῇ Ἰούπῃ, οἱ μαθηταὶ ἀκούσαντες ὅτι Πέτρος ἐστὶν ἐν αὐτῇ, ἀπέστειλαν δύο ἄνδρας πρὸς αὐτὸν, παρακαλοῦντες μὴ ὀκνήσαι 39 διελθεῖν ἕως αὐτῶν. Ἀναστὰς δὲ Πέτρος συνῆλθεν αὐτοῖς· ὃν παραγενόμενον ἀνήγαγον εἰς τὸ ὑπερῷον, καὶ παρέστησαν
αὐτῷ πάσαι αἱ χῆραι κλαίουσαι καὶ ἐπιδεικνύμεναι χιτῶνας 40 καὶ ἱμάτια, ὅσα ἐποίει μετ' αὐτῶν οὔσα ἡ Δορκάς. Ἐκβαλὼν
δὲ ἔξω πάντας ὁ Πέτρος, θείς τὰ γόνατα προσηύχато· καὶ ἐπιστρέψας πρὸς τὸ σῶμα, εἶπε· Ταβιθὰ, ἀνάστηθι. Ἡ δὲ ἤνοιξε τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς αὐτῆς· καὶ ἰδούσα τὸν Πέτρον ἀνε-41 κάθησε. Δοὺς δὲ αὐτῇ χεῖρα ἀνέστησεν αὐτήν· φωνήσας δὲ 42 τοὺς ἀγίους καὶ τὰς χήρας, παρέστησεν αὐτὴν ζῶσαν. Γνωστον δὲ ἐγένετο καθ' ὅλης τῆς Ἰούπης· καὶ πολλοὶ ἐπίστευ-

'and all the inhabitants of Lydda and Saron who had turned to the Lord, saw him.' But that yields a very awkward sense; as if no others had seen the person, when healed, but the Christian converts: whereas all must have seen him. And that is what Luke seems to have meant to say; and after that, to describe the effect which the miracle had on the inhabitants of the place where it was worked, and its district. Comp. v. 42.

36. μαθήτρια.] A Hellenistic or common Greek term for the Classical one, μαθήτριας. It is, however, found in Diog. Laert. iv. 2.

— πλῆρης ἀγαθῶν ἔργων] 'abounding in, studious of good works.' So John i. 14, πλῆρης χάριτος.

37. ἀσθενήσασαν.] See Note on John v. 3.

— λούσαντες δὲ αὐτήν.] As it cannot be supposed that men would perform such an office, (though there are passages in Herodotus which prove that it was in Egypt often performed by men;) we may, with Pearce and Markland, take λούσαντες as put for λούσασαι, by reference to ἀνδρεςποιοὶ understood, that being a general term and including females. That women are here meant, there is the more reason to think, since we learn both from the Scriptural and ancient writers in general, that women were employed on such offices, even towards men. So Ennius, cited by Wetstein, 'Tarquinii corpus dona femina levit et unxit.' And Socrates (as we learn from Plato, Phaed.) chose to take a bath just before he drank the fatal cup, ὥστε μὴ πράγματα ταῖς γυναιξὶν παρέχειν. Accordingly we cannot doubt that women always performed such offices to women. This is, indeed, proved by a passage of Apuleius (cited by Pricens and Wetstein), 'Familiaris miserae Charites accuratissime corpus ablutum, unita sepulturâ, ibidem marito perpetuam conjugem reddidero.'

38. μὴ ὀκνήσαι] 'not to delay coming.' A sense rare in the earlier, but frequent in the latter writers. We may hence clearly infer they had a hope of Peter's being able to bring the dead person to life.

39. ὑπερῷον.] See Note supra i. 13.

— ἐπιδεικνύμεναι—Δορκάν.] The sense is: 'Showing coats and garments such as Dorcas used to make when she was with them.' The use of the Imperfect to denote custom is not unfrequent. It is not certain whether the garments shown were, as the common opinion is, stocks of clothes provided for the poor; or (which is the opinion of several recent Commentators, and some of the ancients), such garments as the widows then had on. The latter, however, seems countenanced neither by the words themselves (for thus the article would be requisite at χιτῶνας and ἱμάτια; and ἀ, not οὔσα, would have been used), nor by the air of the context; not to say that there is something not a little jejune in the latter view, while the former is perfectly natural and appropriate. The widows meant to justify, as it were, their grief, by showing Peter how industriously active Tabitha had been in her domestic duties, and how much she would be missed. That the women of ancient times, even those of the higher ranks, used to manufacture garments for the family use, is well known, and established by numerous proofs. There is no doubt, too, that these works were, by benevolent and charitable mistresses of families, carried on, not for the use of the family alone, but to give to the poor, and such as could not make them for themselves.

With the simplicity and pathos of the expression μετ' αὐτῶν οὔσα we may compare something similar in the beautiful passage of Eurip. Alc. 901, φίλα μὲν ὅτ' ἦν γε μεθ' ἡμῶν, and Hieracl. 9, ὅτ' ἦν μεθ' ἡμῶν.

40. ἐκβαλὼν ἔξω.] See Note on Matt. ix. 25, and compare 2 Kings iv. 33.

41. παρέστησεν αὐτὴν ζῶσαν.] There is great elegance in this use of παρίστημι, exhibeo, of which Wetstein adduces an example from Sext. Emp. 254, ὅτε Ἀδμήτω οὐ Ἡρακλῆς τὴν Ἀλκιστὴν γῆθεν ἀναγαγὼν παρίστησι.

43. παρά.] Not 'with,' but 'in the house of,' as the French say chez soi; there being an ellipse of ἐπιζόμενος, expressed at x. 6.

X. 1. This Chapter introduces a most important part of the transactions recorded in the present book. Hitherto the Gospel had been preached to the Jews only, who supposed that salvation was to be restricted to their own nation alone. Accordingly none had been, thus far, admitted by baptism into the Christian Church, but Jews and Samaritans,—or at least proselytes, all of them circumcised persons, and bound to observe the Ceremonial Law. But the time had now come, when it pleased God that the Gentiles should be openly called to share the privileges of the people of God, without being proselyted to Judaism, either before or after their conversion to Christianity. In order, however, to preserve suitable decorum, and to meet the prejudices of the Jewish converts, it was ordained that the person with whom the change commenced, should be, though uncircumcised, a worshipper of the one true God. It is, indeed, a question not a little debated, whether Cornelius was a mere Gentile, or a proselyte of the gate. The former is maintained by many eminent Commentators, as Doddridge, Lardner, Valcknaer, and Kuinoel; who altogether deny that there were any such class of persons as proselytes of the gate. Others, however, not less competent to judge, affirm that there were; and, indeed, the Talmud and the Rabbinical writers would seem to prove it. After all, however, it should seem rather a question of terms, involving no difference of thing. For the persons spoken of, though renouncing idolatry, and worshipping the one true God, and observing the seven precepts of Noah, or the moral precepts of the Mosaic Law, were by no means regarded as Jews or thoroughly clean, and consequently could not be, properly speaking, proselytes at all. Yet they might, in a popular sense, be so called, and no doubt were. At any rate, they were held in some respect by the Jews, and occupied an intermediate place between the Jews and proselytes proper (or of justice), and the Gentiles. It was, indeed, (as has been observed) the natural course of things, that those who stood midway between the Jews and heathens, should have preceded the latter in the reception of the Gospel privileges, as those had been preceded by the former. Hence Cornelius was a proper person, being so much of a Gentile, and also so much of a Jew, as to form the connecting link between both. He was evidently a truly God-fearing person, and probably more attentive to spiritual and internal religion than persons of his class had ever been.

—σπείρη τῆς καλ. Ἰταλ.] So called, as being formed chiefly of Italians, in contradistinction to others composed of provinciales, such as were most of the corps in Syria and Palestine. By σπείρα many (chiefly of the earlier Commentators) understand a legion, supposing this to be the same with the Italian Legion mentioned by Tacitus, Dio Cassius, and Josephus. But besides that there is reason to think that the legion of that name was not yet in existence, the term σπείρα will not admit of such a sense. Σπείρα can only mean a cohort; though, from what has been adduced by Biscoe, Valcknaer, and Kuinoel, it seems we are not to understand a legionary cohort, but one similar to the Prætorian cohorts of the Roman emperors, and forming the body-guard of the President of Syria, and garrisoning Cæsarea. Of this Italian cohort mention is made by Arrian, Tact. p. 73 (cited by Wetstein), προεστάχθησαν δὲ αὐτῶν οἱ τῆς σπείρης Ἰταλικῆς πεζοί, whence it appears that the cohort consisted both of infantry and cavalry.

2. δεόμενος τοῦ Θεοῦ] for δ. πρὸς τὸν Θεόν, as Dan. vi. 11, and supra viii. 22, where λόγ. τοῦ Θεοῦ is interchanged, in the next verse, with δ. πρὸς τὸν Κύριον. The passages of Mat. ix. 38, and Luke x. 2, do not quite fall under this idiom; since, although there the object of the prayer is adverted to immediately after, the Genitive rather depends upon an ἐκ understood; the sense being, 'praying of or from the Lord.' Διαπαντός is not to be rendered always, but continually; as at Luke xxiv. 53. So Eph. v. 20, and Col. i. 3, πάντοτε περὶ ὧν προσευχόμεθα. Comp. Luke ii. 37.

3. εἶδεν ἐν ὁράματι, &c.] The terms here employed, εἶδεν and φανερῶς, as also the hour of the day when this circumstance took place, and the duty in which Cornelius was engaged,—all preclude the notion of certain continental Critics, who would resolve the whole into natural causes, and suppose that Cornelius was deaf. It was plainly a real angelic appearance (such as that to Zechariah, Luke i. 11), and the ὄραμα not a mere vision, but a real spectacle and supernatural representation, like several others recorded in this book.

4. τί ἐστὶ, κύριε; 'What is it, Sir?' A popular form of respectful answer to the call of a superior, though sometimes to that of an inferior, varying according to the tone of voice with which it is pronounced. Kuinoel aptly cites Eccl. v. 1, τί ἐστὶν, ἔσθ' ἢ; Thus there is an ellipse of words as αἰτήμα σου, which is supplied in 2.

μαρτυρία—ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ.] Merely an ad figurative way of expressing that we come to the knowledge of God; really implying the Jewish notion, that our acts are carried up by angels to God in a ale μνημ. (for ὡς αὐτὴ μνησθῆναι) we Hellenistic use of μνημόσυνον for μνημόσυνον according to the Heb. מִנְחָה.

† Now then.] for ξενοδοχεῖται, 'is with as a guest occurring elsewhere in the Acts, Epistle to the Hebrews, and rarely in the later writers.

† The Attic writers used βυρσο-ally a skin-softener, corresponding to

With them βυρσεῖς only denoted though there can be little doubt of the ancients, the two trades were mixed, as far as the rougher sorts of work concerned; and both were proverbial occupations, and held in such contempt among the Jews, that various laws were in force against the exercise thereof. See Rec. of the house being by the sea-side (i. e. to the harbour, and consequently out of the law) was in conformity to a law which forbade them to have their workshops outside the city. See Artemid. i. 53, νεκρῶν ἀπτεται βυρσοδόψης, καὶ τῆς πόλεως ἀπέχεται. Misch. T. iv. p. 64, 'Cadavera separant, et coriarium L. cubitos a via; these, then, were always placed near the sea, for the convenience of water, for their trade.

—ποιεῖν.] These words do not appear in the best MSS., Versions, and Fathers, in the Edit. Princeps, and are written recently in others, that almost all Critics are agreed that they are from the margin of ix. 6. xi. 14. xxii. 10.

προσκαρτ. a.] Pricæus, Schleusner, take προσκαρτ. to mean 'of those who are over him.' But there is perhaps no reason to abandon the common version who waited upon him, namely, as for it seems that centurions were also some of their soldiers in that capacity. It is confirmed by the use of the word supra viii. 13, and is perhaps required by the ἐκείνων at ver. 10, where see Note.

9. τὸ δῶμα] 'the flat roof.' The usual situation chosen by pious persons to perform their devotions. So Taanith, fol. 23, 'ascendamus in tectum, et imploremus misericordiam.' And Beracoth, p. 34, 'conscendit superius cœnaculum, Deumque per se oravit.'

—κατὰ ὥραν ἔκταν.] A usual time for prayer among the Jews.

10. πρόσπεινος.] A word said to occur nowhere else, though κατάπεινος, ἐκπεινος, and ὀξύπεινος are found. The προσ has an intensive force, as derived from the signification in addition to. I know no other example of προσ with an adjective, except it be προσήνης.

—ἤθελε γεύσασθαι.] Supply τροφήν or such like, which is sometimes expressed. This absolute use of the word (also found infra xx. 11) is rare. The expression signifies to take a meal, without reference to the quantity of food taken. See my Note on Thucyd. ii. 70.

—ἐκείνων.] Several MSS. and Origen have αὐτῶν, which seems to have greater propriety, since ἐκείνος is rarely found in this absolute use; but it is perhaps an emendation, especially as it comes from a quarter fruitful in such. Besides, ἐκείνων may even have greater propriety, if we consider it as having reference to the τῶν προσκαρτερούντων αὐτῷ supra v. 8.

—ἐκστασις.] Render, 'an ecstasy or trance.' The word properly signifies a removal of anything from any former situation or state; but it is here applied to that removal of the mind from the body by which, even though awake, we are insensible to external objects, and our senses are so far from conveying to us the impressions of those objects, that the mind seems, as it were, to have retired from the body, and to be wholly absorbed in the contemplation of internal and mental images; with which it is so fully engrossed, that it regards them as absolute realities and matters of fact.

There were (observes Lightfoot) seven ways in which God formerly revealed himself to men: 1. by dreams; 2. by apparitions while they were awake; 3. by visions while they slept; 4. by a voice from heaven; 5. by the Urim and Thummim; 6. by inspiration, or auricular revelation; 7. by a sort of rapture or ecstasy (as here and Gen. ii. 21), which was of all other modes the most excellent, and by which a man was snatched into heaven (2 Cor. xii. 2), and was in the Spirit (Rev. i. 10).

11. σκευός.] The word signifies, in a general way, any article of furniture which is adapted to contain any thing—a vessel. 'Οθόνη may mean either a sheet, or a wrapper to throw over any thing or person. So Aristoph. Vesp. 595, τῷν δ' αἱ μὲν λεπτὰς ὀθόνας ἔχον, οἱ δὲ χιτῶνας.

On the purport of the various parts of this symbolical vision, see Hammond, Whitby, and Druyning in the Dutch Edition of the Critici Sacri. Without refining so much as is done by the writer last mentioned, it may be sufficient to suppose that as the vision was simply intended to inculcate a truth which it was highly necessary for the Apostle to learn,—that the distinction between Jews and Gentiles was to be done away,—so it was chiefly meant to intimate (what it was calculated forcibly to designate) the abrogation of the distinction between meats, which had, more than any thing else, kept Jews and Gentiles apart. And of this, and no more than this, Peter might, at the time, understand it; which he would be the more likely to do, since the Jewish Rabbis themselves admitted that at the coming of the Messiah the distinction of meats would be done away. But the event showed that a far higher truth—though not directly taught in the vision—was to be learnt by him, namely, that the distinction of nations in the sight of God was to pass away, together with the distinction of meats and the ceremonial law, originally intended to keep the Jews distinct from the other nations of the world, but now in Christ to be abrogated, and the middle wall of partition to be broken down, and both Jews and Gentiles admitted to the One God and Father of all.

—ἀρχαῖς.] In order to determine the exact sense of this controverted term, it may be proper to premise that the word properly signifies the extremity of any thing of an oblong form, each end thus being considered as a beginning. See Galen. ap. Rec. Syn. And, as in things of the form of a parallelogram (as in a web of cloth), each end, having two angles, may be said to have two of these ἀρχαί; thus ἀρχαί might here be rendered extremities, or corners; though 'ends' is the more accurate version. Wakefield, indeed, renders 'by four strings,' referring, for an example of that signification, to a passage of Diod. Sic. And Bp. Middleton regards this as 'a singularly happy criticism, and as probably worth all that remains in his New Testament.' I can neither agree with the learned Prelate in his commendation, nor (low as I rate the value of Wakefield's labours on the New Test.) in the version which it implies. After carefully examining all the authorities which have any bearing upon the point in question, I cannot discover any proof of the signification which Wakefield and Bp. Middleton adopt. The passages to which I allude are the following: Galen, de Chirurg. ii. Exod. xxviii. 23. Diod. Sic. i. 109, ἀρχὴ σχοίνου. Lucian iii. 63, δεσμὸν ἀρχάς. Herodot. iv. 60, τὴν ἀρχὴν τοῦ στρόφου. Eurip. Hipp. 772, πλεῖστές τισμάτων ἀρχάς. Philo-Jud., vol. ii. p. 117, διδοε τὰς ἀρχάς. But the first and second passages only prove that either or both ends of any oblong body may be called ἀρχαί. The rest show that it was not unfrequently used of the end of a rope or band. On which see Jacobs on the Anthol. Gr. T. xi. p. 50. So far, the proof only amounts to this,—that ἀρχή may denote the end of any thing, and, with the addition of a word signifying band, the end of a rope; but there is no proof that it ever meant simply a rope. The passage of Diod. Sic. was thought indeed by Bp.

Middleton to supply this proof, but without reason.
It respects the manner of harpooning the hippopotamus, and the words are these: εἰς τὴν ἐμπηγίντων ἐν ἅπτοισι ἀρχὰς στυντίαι, ἀραῖσι μίχρσι δὲ παραλυθῇ. But the very words Wesseling, in his Note, determines it to mean
'hempen cable-ends.' These were probably stronger than the rest of the cable; and they were, no doubt, fastened together for the purpose of holding fast the hippopotamus; hence the plural is used. Of this sense of ἀρχή, to denote end, Wesseling adduces two examples from Platarch and Philo-Jud.; and finally, he so explains the present passage of Acts. Assuredly there is no proof made out that ἀρχή can of itself denote a rope; which would involve an intolerable anachronism. The two learned Critics were deceived by not attending to the nature of the term δεσμῶν, which has often, as here, a significative
prægnans, including the sense ἀνδρὸς or ἰσχυρίου. So Matt. xxi. 2, εὐρήσετε ὄνον δεσμένον.
Mark xi. 4, τὸν πῶλον δεδμῶν. In this case the ἀνδρὸς or ἰσχυρίου must be understood according to the sense be suspension from (as in the present passage), or tying to, as in the foregoing. Thus we may render 'at the four ends.' Bp. Middleton, indeed, objects to the introduction of the the,
because there is no article in the Greek; forgetting that he thus falls into the very error for which he so often censures Wakefield; that of not bearing in mind those many cases where the aleness
of the Article affords no presumption of the noun being indefinite. The present falls under the case of nouns which, though by their very definite sense they point only to certain individuals of a genus may yet (that being well understood) safely dispense with the Article. And this is still more frequently the case when the noun is accompanied with an adjective, and preceded by a preposition. Here ἐπὶ is understood.

ἀσθηρία the wild ones, γιντ γιντ. So Orphan.

erally, both wild and tame. Exactly so in Her-

San, we have λεμῶν—ἐπιτίλει κραιὼν
ὅων πόντων τῶν τετραπόδων.

12. θύσον 'alay' (not sacrifice, as Dr. A. Clarke takes). So the word is used at Matt. xxii. 4.
 See xv. 30. Acts xi. 7, and sometimes in the N.T.

14. οὐδέποτε—πᾶν κ. This Hebraistic use of οὐδέποτε for οὐδαίς is frequent in the New Test.;
 cf. Luke i. 37. Rom. iii. 30. The term κοι- νός properly signifies what belongs to all, as in
 p. vii. 3, κοινὸς ἀήρ. But the Hellenists applied it (like the Heb. חַי) to what was profane,
 i. not holy, and therefore of common and profane use; as Ex. xlii. 20 (where it is opposed ἁγίον), and Joseph. Ant. xii. 12, 13, τὰ ῥεία ῥείων ἐπὶ κοινῶν ἀνθρώπων. They also used the term to what was impure, whether morally or legally (as in Mark vii. 2, compared with 1 Macc. i. 47, 62.); and finally, it was used of meats forbidden, or such as had been partaken
 by idolaters, and which, as they rendered the user thereof impure, were themselves called ῥεία and ἀκάθαρτα, terms also applied to the ῥεία. (Kuinool.)

15. πάλιν ἐκ δευτέρου.] A sort of pleonastic expression, of which examples from the later
 Jews have been adduced by the Commentators.
 Earlier authors similarly use πάλιν αὖ and ἄλλοτε.

16. ἐκαθάρισε.] Meaning, by an idiom common to Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, whereby any thing is said to do a thing who declares it to be so, 'hath declared pure,' or made so by repealing the law which forbade its use. So Gal.
 2.2, ἐνέκαλεισε. And so in Schemoth Rabbi, 118. 3, on the words of Job xxxi. 32, 'the anger did not lodge in the street,' it is said:
 'enim Deus κοινός, profanum iudicat quemque, homines omnes sed recipit.'

17. ἐπὶ τρεῖς.] The vision was thrice repeated, in order to show its certainty and importance. So, Gen. xii. 32, Pharaoh's dream is doubled, to show that it is from God.

17. διηπόρει τί ἂν εἴη 'was doubting what it might mean.' Of this several examples are adduced by Kypke; the most apposite of which are the following: Joseph. Ant. ii. 3, τί πότε εἴη τὸ φάντασμα παρ' ἡμαυτῷ σκοπῶν. Pa-laph. de Incred. c. 32, ἐθαύμαζον τί ἂν εἴη τὸ
γεγονός.

Here, as Dr. A. Clarke well points out, we have an admirable display of the economy of Divine Providence by an arrangement of events to fit each other, and to harmonize one with another; it being, in the present case, so ordered, that in the very moment when Peter's mind was in doubt about the full meaning of the vision, the very event occurs which shall remove his perplexity.

—διερωτήσαντες τὴν οἰκίαν Σίμωνος.] Not,
 'had made inquiry for,' but 'had inquired out,'
 'made out (δια) by inquiry.'

18. φωνήσαντες 'addressing,' namely, the servants, or that particular one who opened the door. See infra xii. 13.

19. διεθυμουμένου.] This, for the common reading ἐνθυμ., is received by almost all the Editors from Bengel and Wetstein to Scholz, on the authority of very many MSS., Versions, Fathers, and the Edit. Princ. Indeed compounds are often changed to simples by the scribes. See Note on Matt. i. 20.

—εἶπεν αὐτῷ τὸ Πν.] Meaning the influence or inspiration of the Holy Spirit. See Note supra viii. 29.

20. μηδὲν διακρ. 'without hesitation,' i. e.
 making no scruple that thou art called to visit a heathen. The same expression also occurs at James i. 6. 'Ἀλλὰ is here an hortative particle (like the Latin age or agedum), and is often thus followed by verbs of motion in the Imperative.

21. τοὺς ἀπεσταλμ. ἀπὸ τοῦ Κ. π. α.] These words, not found in very many MSS., Versions, and Fathers, have been with reason cancelled by almost every Editor of note.

Matt. 28. 8.

21. ἐγὼ εἰμι ὃν ζητεῖτε.] So Eurip. Orest. 374, 38' εἰμ' Ὀρίστης—ὃν ἱστορεῖς.

23. καὶ τινες τῶν ἀδελφῶν] in number six, as we learn from xi. 12, doubtless taken as witnesses of what took place.

—τῆς.] This, not found in very many MSS. and early Editions, has been cancelled by Griesbach, Matthæi, Vater, and Scholz.

24. τῇ ἐπαύριον] on the morning after the day he had set out; for the journey, being one of 15 hours' distance, was too great for one day.

—τοὺς ἀναγκαίους φίλους.] Οἱ ἀνάγκαιοι, like necessarii in Latin, denotes, 1. relations by consanguinity; 2. those by affinity; 3. persons connected by the bonds of friendship. When φίλοι is added, the sense is more determinate, and means confidential and intimate friends, as Eurip. Alc. 650, and Joseph. Antiq. vii. 11.

25. εἰσελθεῖν.] Supply τοῦ, as dependent on ἔνεκα understood, which is expressed in many ancient MSS. and early Editions, and is received by Griesbach, Matthæi, Vater, and Scholz. But it is so manifestly a marginal gloss, that I must, with Tittman, reject it.

—προσεκύνειν.] This carried with it a prostration of the body to the earth, and was a mark of profound respect, which was paid in the East not only to monarchs, but also to other persons of high dignity; though by the Romans it was rendered to the Deity alone. Certainly Cornelius, who was εὐσεβὴς καὶ φοβούμενος τὸν Θεόν, could not intend to offer any mark of respect inconsistent with his duty to God. He no doubt regarded Peter (as having been the subject of a preternatural communication) in the light of a Divine legate, and, as such, entitled to a mark of reverence like that offered to the Deity himself; especially as he must have been aware that Oriental custom allowed of such a mark of profound reverence being shown from man to man. Peter, on the other hand, bearing in mind the very different custom of the Romans, with unfeigned religious humility declined it.

28. One may observe, with Whitby and others, how admirably adapted was Peter's discourse to bring about the conversion of the persons addressed; his arguments being exactly fitted to the condition of persons acquainted with the fundamental principles of true religion, though they had not embraced the Law of Moses. These persons, however, were so much more advanced than proselytes of the gate usually were, that Peter addresses them in nearly the same way as he would the Jews. Compare also Rom. ii. 11. v. 12.

—ἀθέμιτον.] This is not well rendered 'unlawful,' as 1 Pet. i. 3; for the thing was not forbidden by the letter at least of the law, though such was implied in its injunctions. See Joseph. c. Apion. ii. 28, 36, and Antiq. xvi. 11. The word is rather ἀσεβὴς or ἀνόμιον, nefas est. Πραερχεσθαι, 'to enter any one's house,' is a tabu evolving of the sense contained in καλλίστην, on which see Note on v. 13.

—ἄλλοφύλῳ.] The word properly means only a foreigner; but, as Kuinoel observes, it is in the Sept., Philo, and Josephus used (as here) in a peculiar sense, so as to denote such as are not Jews, either by birth or by religion, and are elsewhere styled ἔθνη or ἀλλόθνη, Gentiles.

—καὶ ἐμοί.] The καὶ is for καίτοι, and yet. 29. ἀναντιβήτως] 'without scrupling.' The word occurs only in the later writers. Τίνι λόγῳ on what account, cause, or reason; as 1 Cor. xii. 2, τίνι λόγῳ ἐξηγγελισάμενος ὁμῶν. So Enchiridion, τίνι λόγῳ περιβήμενοι;

30. ἀπὸ τετάρτης—νηστεύων.] Several recent Interpreters take this to mean that Cornelius had fasted from the time of his vision to the time when Peter arrived. And this would seem to be called for by the correspondence of ἀπὸ and μέχρι. But it involves a great improbability, and adverts to a circumstance which Cornelius would not have been likely to mention. Besides, it is liable to other and verbal objections, which are well stated by Kuinoel, who would take the ἀπὸ for πρὸ, as xv. 7. 2 Cor. viii. 10. ix. 2. and τὸ in Prov. viii. 23, and elsewhere. Yet ἀπὸ can never, properly, be said to be put for πρὸ. Where it seems to be so used, there is an ellipse of some preposition, as κατὰ: κατὰ τὴν τετάρτην ἡμέραν ἀπὸ ταύτης τῆς ἡμέρας. And the sense is: 'At the 4th day from to-day (i. e. four days ago) I was fasting up to this hour.'

—λαμπρᾷ] not 'bright,' but 'white,' as at Luke xxiii. 11, περιβαλὼν αὐτὸν ἐσθῆτα λαμπρᾶν, and sometimes in the later Classics.

31. προσευχῇ.] At ver. 4 we have the plural, but the sense is the same; προσευχή being here, as very often, put in a generic sense, for a continued custom of prayer.

33. καλῶς ἐποίησας παραγ.] A form of approbation. So Herodot. v. 24, εὖ ἐποίησας ἀφικόμενος.

34. προσωπολήπτης] i. e. one who is partial in his attentions, and shows his favours with preference to rank, dignity, or other grounds of external superiority, to the neglect of those who are destitute of those advantages. See Luke xx. 21.

35. ἀλλ' ἐν παντὶ ἔθναι—ἐστίν.] This use of ἐργάζεσθαι, like that of πυν or λυν, with δικαιοσύνη, and other words expressive of actions or moral dispositions, involves a notion of habit. The expression is very emphatic, denoting the performance of our duties towards men. In like manner we find Josephus, Ant. xvi. 6. 8, distinguishes natural religion and morality from positive institutions in all countries, and gives the preference to the former. Whence (as observes Whiston) he was nearer Christianity than were the Scribes and Pharisees of his age.

In order, however, to avoid the dangerous notion which has been founded on these words,—as if to fear God and work righteousness, under any form of religious belief, were the only duties essential to salvation,—see the remarks of Dr. Hales and Mr. Townsend. And to avoid the opposite error, see Bp. Bull's Harm. Ap., ch. ii. § 5, and also the Note of Dr. A. Clarke on this passage.

36. The Apostle now briefly adverts to the principal particulars of the Gospel history, their design and certainty, and states the nature and sufficiency of the evidence of Christ's resurrection—his authority as the Judge of quick and dead—and the testimony of the Jewish prophets (whom they had been taught to respect), that, through his name, whosoever believeth in him, shall receive remission of sins.

—τὸν λόγον ὃν ἀπέστειλε, &c.] There is here a certain perplexity of construction, which Commentators have endeavoured in various ways to unravel, either by making some slight alteration, or by taking the Accusative as put for a Nominative. But, after all, the only satisfactory method is to connect τὸν λόγον with οἶδατε in the next verse, and place οὗτος—Κύριος in a parenthesis; thus repeating ῥῆμα, as synonymous with λόγος, and in apposition with it. At ἀπέστειλε repeat ὁ Θεός from the context. Λόγος here signifies the doctrine of Christ; as infra xiii. 26.

—εὐαγγελιζόμενος εἰρήνην] 'proclaiming or announcing peace,' (see Is. xl. 9.) meaning the way whereby man being reconciled to God, might find peace, pardon, and acceptance.

—πάντων Κύριος] 'Lord of all;' meaning both Jews and Gentiles; since, as Lord of all, he must alike intend the salvation of all. So Rom. x. 12, ὁ γὰρ αὐτὸς Κύριος πάντων, both Jew and Greek. See Smith, Scr. Test., vol. iii. p. 251. Κύριος suggests that high dignity of the Redeemer, which is more distinctly expressed supra v. 31.

38. Ἰησοῦς τὸν ἀπὸ N.] This is suspended on the οἴδατε preceding; and in οἴδατε Ἰησοῦς, ὡς ἔχρισεν αὐτόν there is a common Greek idiom. Ἐχρίσεν, by a metaphor taken from the mode of inaugurating kings, signifies invested and endued, namely, at his baptism. See iv. 27, or Luke iv. 18. In Πνεύματι ἁγίῳ καὶ δυνάμει there is a Hendiadys; and the sense is, 'with the powerful influence of the Holy Spirit for the work of the Messiah.' See Matt. iii. 16, 17. The general sense couched in ἐνεργειῶν is particularized and exemplified in the words following, καὶ ἰώμενος—Διαβόλου.

39. ὃν ἀνείλον κρεμ. ἐπὶ ξύλου.] Render, 'whom they slew by hanging on a gibbet.' See Note supra v. 30. Before ἀνείλον, καὶ is found in many of the best MSS., several Versions and Fathers, and in the Ed. Princ., and is rightly admitted by Bengel, Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz; since it is strongly supported by internal, as well as external evidence.

41. οὐ παντὶ τῷ λαῷ, ἀλλὰ, &c.] To have appeared to all the people would indeed have been impracticable, and unnecessary for the purpose in view.

—προκεχειροτ.] I would not, with Kuin. and others, take this for the simple χειρ., since, as χειρ. imports appointment, so does προ. denote previous destination. Μετὰ τὸ ἀναστῆναι αὐ. ἐκ ν. some Editors and Commentators join with v. 40, placing the intermediate words οὐ παντὶ—συνεπίομεν αὐτῷ in a parenthesis. This they are induced to do, because, they urge, we do not find that our Lord drank, however he might eat, with his disciples after his resurrection. Yet though that be not directly said, it seems implied at John xxi. 13.

42. ὁ ὠρισμένος ὑπὸ, &c.] See Bp. Sherlock in D'Oyly and Mant, and especially Bp. Pearson on the Creed.

43. ἀφεισιν ἁμαρτιῶν—αὐτόν.] From the anomalous nature of the construction here, several recent Editors write αὐτόν..., to indicate that the sentence was left incomplete, namely, by the falling of the Holy Spirit on the hearers, and their breaking out and speaking in new tongues. This method, however, as it is hypothetical, so is it unnecessary; for the words in question, though containing a slight irregularity in the construction (which is a Latinized one), yield a complete sense; being, I conceive, intended to show the subject and substance of that testimony, namely, that whosoever, &c. The passages of the Prophets here meant, are such as Is. xxviii. 16, and Zech. xiii. 1, where he says that a fountain shall be opened for sin, &c. Thus from μαρτυροῦσιν we must take μαρτυροῦντες (to usher in the next clause), understanding it in the sense declaring, as at John iv. 44, ἡμαρτύρησιν, ὅτι προφῆται ἐν τῇ ἰδίᾳ πατρίδι τιμὴν οὐκ ἔχουσιν. Moreover, πάντες, which the Commentators say must be taken restrictedly, for very many, may have its usual force; for all the prophets, more or less, testify of Christ. So Luke xxiv. 27. All, indeed, either directly or by implication, in the promise of a Messiah, teach that 'whosoever believeth in him shall not be confounded.'

44. τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον.] Meaning the influence of the Holy Spirit, which has been before spoken of (see Middleton), implying its extraordinary gifts, and especially, as we learn from v. 46, the speaking in languages foreign and before unknown to them. See supra ii. 4, and Notes; from a comparison of which passage with the present, it is plain (notwithstanding what Heinicke and Kuinoel allege) that by γλώσσας is here meant (as there) ἐπίσταντος γλώσσας, and (as is plain from the context) καθὼς τὸ Πνεῦμα ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς ἀποφθίγγασθαι, as is there expressed. And so infra xix. 6, ὡλοῦν τε γλώσσας

πάντας τοὺς ἀκούοντας τὸν λόγον. Καὶ ἐξέστησαν οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς πιστοὶ, ὅσοι συνῆλθον τῷ Πέτρῳ, ὅτι καὶ ἐπὶ τὰ ἔθνη ἡ δωρεὰ τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύματος ἐκκέχυται· ἤκουον γὰρ αὐτῶν λαλούντων γλώσσαις, καὶ μεγαλυνόντων τὸν Θεόν. Τότε ἀπεκρίθη ὁ Πέτρος· Ὁ μὴ τὸ ὕδωρ κωλύσαι δύναται ἡ ἐξουσία τοῦ Θεοῦ. Τίς τοῦ μὴ βαπτισθῆναι τούτους, οἵτινες τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον ἔλαβον, καθὼς καὶ ἡμεῖς; Ὁ προσέταξέ τε αὐτοὺς βαπτισθῆναι ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ Κυρίου. Τότε ἠρώτησαν αὐτὸν ἐπιμεῖναι ἡμέρας τινάς.

XI. ἮΚΟΥΣΑΝ δὲ οἱ ἀπόστολοι καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ οἱ ὄντες κατὰ τὴν Ἰουδαίαν, ὅτι καὶ τὰ ἔθνη ἐδέξαντο τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ. Καὶ ὅτε ἀνέβη Πέτρος εἰς Ἱερουσόλυμα, διεκρίνοντο πρὸς αὐτὸν οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, λέγοντες· Ὅτι πρὸς ἄνδρας ἀκροβυστίαν ἔχοντας εἰσῆλθες, καὶ συνέφαγες αὐτοῖς. Ἀρξάμενος δὲ ὁ Πέτρος ἐξετίθετο αὐτοῖς καθεζῆς, λέγων· Ἐγὼ ἤμην ἐν πόλει Ἰόππῃ προσευχόμενος, καὶ εἶδον ἐν ἑκστάσει ὄραμα, καταβαίνον σκευός τι, ὡς ὀθόνην μεγάλην τέσσαρσιν ἀρχαῖς, καθιεμένην ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, καὶ ἦλθεν ἄχρις ἐμοῦ· εἰς ἣν ἀτενίσας κατενόουν, καὶ εἶδον τὰ τετράποδα τῆς γῆς, καὶ τὰ θηρία καὶ τὰ ἑρπετὰ, καὶ τὰ see Note. Comp. also 1 Cor. xii. 30. xiv. 5, 6, 18, 25, 39. To have heard them speak praises of God and Christ in their own language (Greek or Latin) would have conveyed to them that they had received the gift of the Holy Spirit. Besides, compare v. 47 with xi. 16. Again, ἐκστάσει we have a term appropriated to denote the influence of the Spirit. So Ezek. xi. 5, ἐκστασὶ ἐν' ἐμὲ πνεῦμα Κυρίου. Finally, ἡ γὰρ at v. 46 has reference to a clause omitted, as the following; 'and that it had been poured forth on these persons is certain; for,' &c.

[Ὁ μὴ τὸ ὕδωρ κωλύσαι δ. τ.] Wherever λέω takes (as here and in Luke vi. 29, and sometimes in the Classical writers) the Accusative as thing, the verb may be supposed to have a passive pragmatis, including that of another person, namely, one of taking or using. The τοῦ βαπτ. is for ὅτι μὴ βαπτ. In this idiom μὴ is said to be pleonastic, and extends to all the which involve a sense of denial, especially the of hindering. See Matth. Gr. Gr. § 533. n. 2. The nature of the expression ὕδωρ κωλύει (which simply means, 'Who can forbid water should be brought?') would seem to be to water being brought by the hand, and consequently imply that they were baptized, not immersion, but by affusion.

[Ὁ βαπτισθῆναι.] It is not said by whom they were baptized; but there can be little doubt that persons who baptized them were some of those whom Peter brought with him from Joppa. The Apostles themselves rarely baptized. See in iv. 2, 1 Cor. i. 14, and Notes.

XL 1—18. We have here narrated the result of foregoing transaction, in the extreme dissatisfaction of the believers of the circumcision (including the Apostles); and in Peter being publicly called upon to give an account of his conduct, in which he rests his defence on a simple statement of the circumstances (attested by the Christians of Joppa whom he had brought with him) which led to the step he had taken, in admitting Gentiles into the Church by baptism. On hearing which, they acquiesced in the justice of his reasons, and glorified God.

1. κατὰ τὴν Ἰουδαίαν.] 'in Judæa.' This use of the preposition is found also in the Classical writers; though not, I think, with proper names; and, if appellatives, only a few particular ones, as πόλις, ἄγρος, and οἶκος.

2. διεκρίνοντο πρὸς αὐτὸν.] 'expostulated with him, litigating the question.' The word answers to the Heb. וַיִּפְּקֹד and וַיִּפְּקֹד, and signifies properly to be impleaded in a suit with another—then to be opposed in argument.

3. ἀκροβ. ἔχοντας.] Synonymous with ἐν ἀκροβυστίᾳ ὄντες, 'those who are uncircumcised.'

5—15. ἰγὼ ἤμην, &c.] Thus showing that the thing did not proceed from himself, but from God; q. d. 'He who caused me to fall into the trance, he it was who showed me the vessel. But I contradicted, and did not render prompt obedience. God sent me, but I did not go: God told me to baptize, but I did not even then baptize. It is God that hath baptized them all, and not I. For as I was yet speaking, the Holy Spirit fell on them, and they spake with tongues.' See Notes on x. 30, seqq.

5. τέσσαρσιν ἀρχαῖς.] The sense here cannot be made complete without supplying δεδεμένῃς, which is expressed in the passage supra x. 11. Q q

17. ^{sl} 'εἰκιδέμ,' 'if [as was the case].'

— ἐγὼ δὲ τίς ἦμην, δυνατός.] The δὲ is omitted in many MSS. and Versions, but, I suspect, from the difficulty of explaining it. Yet it may very well be rendered denique, then. There is great spirit in this turn of expression, τίς ἦμην (apparently a popular one), with which Wetstein compares from Lucian, ἥρῳτα τὸν Δ. τίς ὦν, χλευάζει τὰ αὐτοῦ; Δυνατός is, by a harsh ellipsis, put for ὥστα δυνατὸν εἶναι.

18. ἡσύχασαν.] Denoting silent acquiescence, for ἡσυχίαν εἶχον.

— μετάνοιαν.] Meaning, as at v. 31, the grace of repentance. See Calvin.

19. This verse introduces a new train of narration. And from this point the history takes a new direction; and from recording the preaching of the Gospel to the Jews only, it proceeds to narrate the labours of the Apostles to convert the Gentiles, commencing with their exertions at the important city of Antioch.

— οἱ μὲν οὖν διασπ.] The particles μὲν οὖν are resumptive, reverting to what was said supra v. 1. Ἀπὸ is here for ἐν, as often both in the Scriptural and Classical writers. On the force of the ἐπὶ a little after, some difference of opinion exists. It may be best rendered by post.

20. τοὺς Ἕλληνιστάς.] For this, two (and only two) MSS. (namely, A and D) have Ἕλληνας; which reading is, however, supported by the Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, Æthiopic, and Vulgate Versions; and, of the Fathers, by Chrysostom, Eusebius, Cassiodorus, Theophylact, and (Eusebius, and has been preferred by almost all Critics and Commentators except Pearce, Matthai, Newcome, and Wetstein; nay, has been edited by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz, certainly not on the strength of external evidence. For the testimony of Versions is, in a case like this, of no great weight; and that of the Fathers even less, especially as they in some instances cite Ἕλληνιστάς. Moreover, of the two MSS. which here have Ἕλληνας, the principal one (namely, the Alexandrian) has this very reading in the

he same may be said of two of the Versions.
nd surely what was a false alteration in one ne may be so in the other. As then "Ελληνιστῆς thus deficient in external evidence, the preference given to it must rest on internal. Whether it be sufficient to justify its reception, will appear by discussing its merits. The chief ground of preference rests on the opposition (as denoted by the μὲν and δὲ) which, it is alleged, subsists between the persons addressed by these teachers respectively; those at v. 19 addressing themselves to the Jews only; consequently those at v. 20 to such as were not Jews. This opposition, however, is far from being proved by the circumstance of the two verses being introduced respectively by μὲν and δὲ; for here the μὲν is coupled with καὶ, and has, in the present case, that use, which loosevoen de Part. speaks of, 'in transitions, when writer goes back to something which had been spoken to be treated on, but had been interrupted by some digression.' Of this he adduces several examples, namely, Aristot. de Repub. i. 7. Thu-cid. iv. 76, 77. Acts xxviii. 5; in all of which the sentence commencing with the resump-tive μὲν οὖν is followed by another commencing as here) with καὶ, which, however, is never an alternative, but always has a continuative force,
and may be rendered *and*em.

Having, then, shown the non-existence of this position as far as it rests on the μὲν and δὲ, let us see whether any opposition is intimated by the
καὶ. Those (it is said) who had been dispersed by the troubles which followed the martyrdom of Stephen, fled and traversed the country, some along to Phœnicæ, and some to Antioch. In their way thither (namely, in Syria) they (i. e.
both those who went to Antioch, and those who went to Cyprus) preached the Gospel to none but Jews. Those who went to Antioch, on their march thither, preached the word—to whom?— to the Hellenists, i. e. foreign Jews, speaking the Greek language; to whom, therefore, the Cypriots and Cyrenæans, who were Hellenists, would be very fit preachers. So supra ix. 29 we find Barnabas, who was a Cypriot, employed in preaching and disputing πρὸς τοὺς Ἑλληνιστάς; and very fitly, since he was himself an Hellenist.

Again, if v. 19 be, as it seems, resumptive of what the writer had been relating at viii. 4, it will appear that the events recorded in vv. 19 and 20
of this Chapter must have taken place immediately after those at viii. 4, which followed closely in the martyrdom of Stephen, and consequently came to pass before the vision of Peter and the conversion of Cornelius; so that the Gospel could not have been preached to the Gentiles, because there had hitherto been no authority so to do.
These latter remarks, indeed, will only show Ελληνιστῆς to be inadmissible, as understood in the sense Gentiles. It might, however, very well be interpreted of Gentile proselytes, as at John xvii. 20 (where see Note) and probably at Acts

xiv. 1. xviii. 4; in which case we should only have to suppose of "Ελληνιστῆς put for the more definite expression of σεβόμενοι "Ελληνιστῆς occurring at xvii. 4; the σεβόμενοι expressed in the latter, being, in the former, implied by the context. And if it be thought that any opposition does here exist at v. 20, so that the persons
there mentioned must be, in some sense, not Jews,
we might, while reading "Ελληνιστῆς, interpret Gentile proselytes to Judaism. Certainly it is no inconsiderable argument in favour of "Ελληνιστῆς, that the persons first mentioned at v. 19
under the name τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις, were, in fact, Hellenists, as resident among a Greek population;
thus "Ελληνιστῆς, if there be any kind of opposition intended, would seem inept, and, if there be none, jejune. Finally, supposing the persons here meant to have been the οἱ σεβόμενοι "Ελ-ληνιστῆς spoken of at xvii. 4, we are not to confound
these with the οἱ σεβόμενοι προσήλυτοι mentioned at xiii. 43, those being never regarded as, still less called, Jews. These were probably Jewish proselytes in the fullest sense, of whom, as appears from Joseph. Bell. vii. 3. 3, there were great numbers at Antioch. His words are: Αἱ ταὶ (scil. Ιουδαίαι) προσαγοόμεναι ταῖς θρησκείαις
πολὺ πλῆθος Ἑλλήνων, κακύνουσιν τρόπῳ τῶν μοίραν αὐτῶν πεποιήντα. Now to such persons, —being, as we have seen, in a manner Jews,—those dispersed preachers of the Word might feel themselves fully justified in administering instruction.

21. καὶ ἦν χεὶρ Κυρίου μετ' αὐτῶν.] An Oriental mode of speaking, to signify that they were aided by the power and support of the Lord (see Luke i. 66, and Note), namely, for the work of conversion spoken of in the words following.

22. ἠκούσθη δὲ ὁ λόγος εἰς τὰ ῶτα τ. ἐ.]
Meaning, 'came to the thorough knowledge of.'
A stronger expression than ἠκούσθη by itself,
and with which may be compared ἠκούσθη γὰρ
εἰς τὰ ῶτα, &c. Is. v. 9, and ἡ κραυγὴ—εἰσελεύ- σεται εἰς τὰ ὦτα αὐτοῦ, Ps. xvii. 6. Sept. By ὁ λόγος we are to understand the report of these things, as Luke v. 15.

23. τὴν χάριν τ. Θεοῦ.] Meaning, 'the favour and kindness of God'; namely, in its effects,— the admission of the Gentiles to the benefits of the Gospel, and also the fruits of the grace of the Spirit, in the converts 'walking worthy of their high calling.'

—τῇ προθέσει τῆς καρδίας.] The Genitive of the noun in regimen has here, as often, the force of an adjective; the sense being, 'with hearty and determined purpose and fixed resolution;' as Rom. xiii. 28. Eph. iii. 11. 2 Tim. i. 9.
A similar mode of expression is found in the Classical writers. So Herodian, cited by Wolf, has καθεὶν τινα ἀλθεῖ ψυχῇ διαθεῖται.
Προσμένειν signifies properly to remain by, and with a Dative of thing, denotes to persevere.

but, with that of person, to remain attached to. So Joseph, Ant. xiv. 2. 1, μόνων τῶν ἱερῶν Ἀριστοβούλῳ προσμενόντων. Here is denoted adherence on the part of the converts to their baptismal engagements, by a continued exercise of faith and obedience.

24. ὅτι ἦν ἀνὴρ ἀγαθός.] I cannot think, with Heinrichs, that this was intended to give a reason why the Christians at Jerusalem chose Barnabas for the mission to Antioch, nor that the words ὁ παραγινόμενος—τῷ Κυρίῳ are parenthetical. They may rather be referred, either to what immediately preceded at v. 23, or to what follows, as intimating a reason for his success. The former, however, is the more natural construction, and more suitable to the context. Barnabas' genuine philanthropy (for such is the meaning of the expression here applied to him, ἀνὴρ ἀγαθός, which is similarly used by Joseph. Antiq. xii. 9. 1, to denote not only integrity, but also benignity) would make him rejoice at the conversion of the heathen, and his plenitude of spiritual gifts would eminently qualify him to give with effect the exhortations necessary for the new converts. The next clause presents the result of his mission, in the accession of numerous converts to the faith. On the expression ἱκανός, see Note at Matt. xxviii. 12.

26. συναχθῆναι ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ.] Render, 'conversati sunt in cœtu'; meaning, 'they assembled, or assembled themselves, with the Church.'

—χρηματίσαι—Χριστιανούς.] Χρηματίζω signifies, 1. to dispatch business; 2. to so dispatch it as to obtain a name. Hence, 3. it came at length to mean 'to be named or called.' Of this sense (which occurs also in Rom. vii. 3) several examples from Philo and Josephus are adduced by the Commentators. It must, however, be allowed to involve a harsh catachresis.

There is another and more difficult question connected with these words,—namely, whether the followers of Christ gave this appellation to themselves, or whether it was bestowed on them by others? The best Commentators are of the latter opinion, and Wetstein and Kuinoel adduce many arguments why the former view cannot be admitted; not all of them equally cogent, but, upon the whole, sufficient to establish their position. It was, indeed, the interest of the Christians to have some name which might not, like the Jewish ones (Nazarenes or Galileans), imply reproach. And though the terms believers, or saints, might suffice among themselves, yet the former was not sufficiently definite for an appellation, and the latter might be thought to savour of vanity. They would therefore be not disinclined to adopt one. Yet the necessity was not so great as to stimulate them to do this very soon; whereas the people at large, in having to speak of this new sect, would soon need some distinctive appellation: and what so distinctive as one formed from the name of its founder? Thus we find from Philostr. Vit. Ap. viii. 21, that the disciples of Apollonius were called by the Greeks (it is not said by themselves) Ἀπολλωνῖαι. And it was likely that the Gentiles should resort to such a sort of appellation; since in that age, those who were followers of any sect, or partisans of any leader, were usually called after their teacher or leader, by a term ending in ior or ant. There is no reason to think, with Wetstein and Kuinoel, that the name Χριστιανοί was given in derision. When used by Agrippa (Acts xvi. 28), there is no proof that it was a term of reproach. Had he intended derision, he might have employed the term Nazarene, which was in frequent use among the Jews, and has continued in the East to the present day. Thus the followers of Christ would be the more likely to adopt the appellation Χριστιανοί, both for convenience, and to keep out a term of reproach. That they soon did adopt it, we find from 1 Pet. iv. 16, ὡς ἐὰν Χριστιανὸς (πάσχει), μὴ αἰσχυνέσθαι (will πάσχειν), where the appellation occurs as one applied by the followers of Christ to themselves as well as given by others.

27. προφῆται.] The term seems here to denote persons who, with more or less of the supernatural gifts of the Holy Spirit, applied themselves to teaching or preaching; and occasionally, under a more than usual influence of the Holy Spirit, foretold future events. This sense of the word is supposed to be confined to the Scriptures; but I have met with it in the Classical writers, ex. gr. Herodian v. 5. 21, ὑποδήμασι λίαν ἐνποιημένοις ἰχθύων, ἄσπερ οἱ κατ' ἐξέλιον τὸ χάρις προφητεύοντες, where Irmisch refers to Sext. Emp. p. 227. Lucian i. 391.

28. ἐσήμανε] 'he declared, or announced.' The term was often applied to the uttering of predictions, &c. So Josephus, Ant. vii. 2. ἐσημῶνεν τὴν ἐκ τοῦ παιδὸς ἐσομένην ἰσθμὸν. "Ολὴν τὴν οἰκ. Bishop Pearce has adduced many cogent reasons for supposing that this expression denotes not the whole world, nor even the Roman Empire, but Palestine alone, as in Luke ii. 1, where see the Note. The same view is adopted, and ably supported, by Walch, Doddridge, Kist, Michaelis, Hales, and Kuinoel, who adduce arguments of the four languages which history has recorded as happening in the reign of Constantine.

As, however, all the countries put together in which those famines prevailed, would not make up a tenth even of the Roman Empire, they think it plain that we must understand the words of that famine, which (as we learn from Josephus, Antiq. xx. 2. 6) overspread Palestine in the fourth year of Claudius' reign; and for the relief of the Christians suffering under which some money was being collected at Antioch.

29. καθὼς ἠπόρειτό τις] 'in proportion to the ability of each.' Sub. χρημάτων, which is sometimes expressed. Εὔπορος is a comparative term, and does not necessarily imply wealth, but only competence. So Thucyd. vi. 44, καὶ ὡς ἕκαστοι εὐπόρησαν. And Musonius (cited by Kypke) has ἄλλ' εὐποροὶ χρημάτων ὄντες· τίνας δὲ καὶ πλούσιους.

— ὤρισαν] 'determined.' The word signifies, 1. terminare; 2. determinare; 3. discernere, as often in the New Test., and sometimes in the Classical writers, as Thucydides, iii. 82.

— εἰς διακονίαν.] Literally, 'in subsidium,' 'for a service,' 'for the relief of.' So Act. Thom. § 56, ἐκόμισαν χρήματα πολλὰ εἰς τὴν διακονίαν τῶν χηρῶν. This relief was the more necessary, since, independently of the present famine, the Christians at Jerusalem were generally poor. In transmitting this bounty they did but imitate the example of the foreign Jews, who (as Vitranga has proved) used to send contributions for the relief of their poor brethren at Jerusalem.

30. τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους] Hanimond has here an able annotation on the origin and various uses of πρεσβύτεροι, showing that in the Christian Church of the Apostolic age (which was formed almost wholly on the model of the synagogue), the term πρεσβύτεροι (a term implying rather the wisdom of age, than age itself) was synonymous with ἐπίσκοποι. Their common office and duty (in the words of Forbiger ap. Schleus. Lex.) was in general to govern the Christian Church, not to teach; to preside over things sacred, to administer the sacraments, especially the Eucharist, to decide on ecclesiastical matters, to compose and settle differences, and finally to set an example to all, of rectitude of doctrine and sanctity of life; see xx. 17. 28. Phil. i. 1. 1 Tim. iii. 1. Tit. i. 5. 7.

XII. Here we have related a new persecution, raised against the infant Church by Herod Agrippa, and in consequence thereof the martyrdom of James, and the imprisonment and miraculous deliverance of Peter, events quickly succeeded by the death of the persecutor (v. 20—24). Whereupon the word of God prospers.

1. κατ' ἐκείνον τὸν καιρὸν.] Meaning, that of the famine.

— ἐπέβαλε τὰς χεῖρας κακῶσαι τ.] By the most eminent Expositors this expression ἐπιβάλλειν τὰς χεῖρας is regarded as simply put for ἐπιχειρεῖν, 'to take in hand, set about.' In confirmation of which they adduce the similar expression supra ix. 29, οἱ δὲ ἐπιχειροῦν ἀνέλθιν. Yet there the sense is endeavour. And as to the idiom in question, though it occurs in the Classical writers, yet there it always carries with it a notion of violence. Hence it is better to take the expression in its usual Scriptural sense, of forcibly apprehending; and suppose the construction to be, by a grammatical Attraction, for ἐπέβαλε τὰς χεῖρας ἐπὶ τινὰς, κακῶσαι αὐτούς. A view supported by the Pesch. Syr. Version.

2. ἀνέλε μαχαίρα] 'beheaded him.' This kind of death was, it seems, selected as being (see a Rabbinical writer cited by Wetstein) the most ignominious of the capital punishments among the Jews.

3. ἰδὼν ὅτι ἀρεστόν ἐστι τοῖς Ἰουδ.] By the Jews some understand the Sanhedrim. And, indeed, the word has that meaning in the Gospel of St. John; but never, I apprehend, in St. Luke's writings. We may therefore understand it of the Jews generally, both rulers and people. And that Herod was fond of obliging the Jewish people, we learn from Josephus, Ant. xix. 7. 3. Yet he may have been partly induced to practise this harshness towards the Christians, from his being a great zealot for the Jewish religion; for Josephus there says, τὰ πάτρια καθαρῶς ἐτῆρει; and adds, that he never omitted to attend on his religious duties at the Temple.

— προσέθετο συλλαβεῖν] 'he went on to seize,' 'he further seized.' A Hebraism from hpn, and a verb in the Infinitive preceded by the preposition ב, as often in the Old Test. The same idiom occurs in the Sept. at 1 Kings xviii. 29, καὶ προσέθετο σύλαβεσθαι ἀπὸ Δαυὶδ, and Eccles. xviii. 4. Josephus, Ant. vi. 13. 1. It is scarcely ever found in the Classical writers.

— αἱ ἡμέραι τῶν ἀζύμων] 'the days of the paschal feast, during which the Jews were ordered to have no leavened bread in their houses;' see Deut. xvi. 3. Exod. xii. 18. Before ἡμέραι several MSS., some of them ancient, have the

b Supra 5.
19.

Article, which is admitted by Matthæi, Griebach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz. Bp. Middleton, however, justifies the omission of the Article on the principle, that 'in propositions which merely affirm or deny existence, the name of the person or thing whereof existence is affirmed or denied, is without the Article.' So Matt. xiv. 6, γενεσίαν ἀγομίζων τοῦ Ἡρώδου, and John v. 1. That principle, however, is, I apprehend, too refined and far-fetched. It were better in such a case to say, that the Article is omitted because unnecessary,—the addition of the noun in the Genitive sufficing to establish the definiteness. Here, however, there is also an ellipsis, the complete phraseology being ἵσαν δὲ ἡμεῖραι, αἱ ἡμεῖραι τῶν ἀλύμων. Hence the Article would seem to be necessary; and accordingly I have admitted it.

4. τετραδαίοις.] The τετραδίον was, as we learn, Polybius, vi. 33, the regular number for a guard (as a file with us); and four such quaternions were thought necessary to guard the cell, and the approaches to it, and also to serve for necessary relief of guard.

— μετὰ τὸ πάσχα.] Render, 'after the Passover;' not Easter, as in our common Version. During this holy season it was thought unlawful to prosecute any capital trial; much worse to take away life.

5. ἐκτενὴς] 'intense, fervent.' So Luke xxii. 44, ἐκτενέστατον προσεύχεται. This metaphorical use (taken from a rope at full tension) is found also in the Sept. at Judith iv. 9, and 2 Macc. xiv. 38.

6. ἐμελλεν αὐτὸν προάγειν.] Supply αἱ ἐκκλησίαι, or αἱ δίκην, which words are expressed in Josephus, Ant. xvi. 11. 6. Vit. § 11, and Bell. i. 27. 2. And so the Latin producere, as in Cic. Ep. ad Fam. xii. 4, 'ad necem producero' (Krebs.)

— μεταξὺ δύο στρατιωτῶν—δυσί.] Prisoners, when thus carefully guarded, were usually,

among the Romans, secured with a single chain: one end of which was attached to the right hand of the prisoner, and the other to the left hand of the person who guarded him. So Josephus, Ant. xviii. 6, 7 (of Agrippa), ἡξίωσε τὸν συνδεδεμένον αὐτῷ στρατιωτῇ. In the present instance, for better security, there were two chains, each fastened to a soldier.

7. οἰκῷματι] for δεσμοτηρίῳ, by a frequent euphemism or υποκορισμός: see my note on Thucyd. iv. 47, No. 3. (Transl.) On the situation of this prison there has been no little difference of opinion. Wolf thinks it was near to the judgment-hall; De Dieu and Fessell, that it was in the court of Herod's palace, and was his private prison; while Walch supposes it to have been in one of the towers of the innermost of the three walls which surrounded the city, and the iron gate, he thinks, was at the entrance of the tower. This last opinion is the most probable, and is confirmed and illustrated by what I have said in my note on Thucyd. ii. 4.

— πατάξας] for νύξας; the sense being 'gently struck;' as is usually done in rousing persons from sleep. So Hom. Od. κ. 483, 'Ἄλλ' ὅτι δὲ τρίχα νυκτὸς ἦν, μετὰ δ' ἄστρα βεβήκει. Καὶ τότε ἰγὼν Ὀδυσῆα προσέειπεν ἱγυῖε ἴσταν, Ἀγχιὼν νύξας.'

8. περίζωσαι.] See Note on Luke xii. 35.

— υπόδησαι τὰ σανδάλιά σου.] This is, as Chrysostom remarks, a beautifully graphic circumstance; for, in the haste of his sudden departure, Peter would be likely to forget to bind on his sandals. The angel therefore tells him to do it; thereby intimating to him his perfect security.

9. ἰδοὶ δὲ ὄραμα βλ.] So Quint. Curt. i. 1. 23, 'somnia similis res Abdolomino videbatur.' See also Pa. cxxvi. 1—3.

10. πρώτῃν—σειρήνῃ.] Φυλακή here means one of the above parties on guard. We may suppose what is here called the first guard to have been the two soldiers stationed at the door of the cell; the second, those stationed at the door which led out of the building into a court-yard; and the third, those at the iron gate, which led out of the court into the city. Αὐτομάτη, literally, 'self-moved.' The word is used both of persons and things, and must be rendered accordingly. Prie. and Wetstein adduce several examples of the word in this sense, and as used of doors; ex. gr. Hom. II. c. 749. So the Latin writers (as Virgil, Æn. vi. 82) used the expression sub sponte.

11. γενόμενος ἐν αὐτῷ] 'having recovered from his surprise;' and thus become capable of reflection.

— πάσης τῆς προσδ.] Meaning, by metonymy, 'the thing expected by the people;' namely, his execution. Thus the sense, expressed at large, is, 'from what was fully expected by,' &c. Τοῦ λαοῦ τῶν Ἰουδαίων is said, because, at the time of the Passover, the whole nation, in a manner, was assembled.

12. συνιδὼν] 'on considering,' namely, his situation, and the circumstances connected with it.

13. κρούσαντος—τὴν θύραν.] This phrase occurs also in Luke xiii. 25, and often in the later writers; the earlier ones use κόπτειν. τὴν θύραν τ. πυλῶνος, the porch-door or outer gate, as opposed to the inner door which led immediately to the court around which the apartment was built. By παιδίσκη many Commentators understand the portress. But though that office was often performed by females, it is improbable, considering the narrow circumstances of the Christians at Jerusalem, that there should have been a portress at this house. Besides, that would require the Article. The sense seems to be simply 'a damsel,' i. e. a maid-servant; among whose other employments was that of attending to the door. For such is the general sense of the expression ὑπακούσαι, which signifies properly to listen; but when used of the office of a porter (which it often is in the best writers), it carries with it, by implication, other significations corresponding to the actions connected therewith; as, to inquire the name and business of the person knocking. So in Lucian, Icarom. p. 292, ἰκοπτον προσελθὼν τὴν θύραν ὑπακούσας δὲ ὁ Ἑρμῆς καὶ τοῦνομα ἰκτυθόμενος. It came, however, at length to have simply the sense above indicated; as in Theophrast. Char. Eth. iv, where it is given as one of the traits of the vulgar man, καὶ κόψαντος (scil. τινός) τὴν θύραν, ὑπακούσαι αὐτόν, and Xen. Symp. i. 11, κρούσας τὴν θύραν, εἶπε τῷ ὑπακούσαντι εἰσαγγίλλαι.

15. μαίνη.] A popular form of expression, used of any one who utters what is incredible. Διςχυρίζετο, 'positively asserted.'

— ὁ ἄγγελος αὐτοῦ &c.] Many eminent interpreters take this to mean 'a messenger sent from him.' But the word will not admit that sense; neither is it likely that Peter could have sent a messenger; still less that the maid should not have known the voice of a messenger from Peter's voice. The sense must be, 'his angel,' i. e. his tutelary angel, such as the Jews, and indeed the Gentiles, thought was appointed to every person, or at least every good person; see Matt. xviii. 10. They also supposed, that on the death of the person, this angel sometimes appeared in his exact form, and spake with his voice to the friends or acquaintance of the deceased.

17. κατασείσας—τῇ χειρὶ σιγᾶν.] Κατασείσαι signifies to wave the hand downwards; a mode of enjoining silence; see xiii. 16. xix. 22. xxi. 40.

17. ἔπορεύθη εἰς ἔσπερον τόπον.] Where, we are left to conjecture; the expression being quite indefinite. Some suppose Cæsarea; others, with more probability, Antioch; others again, Rome.

19. ἀνακρίνας τοὺς φύλακας, &c.] 'after examining the keepers [and finding they offered nothing in justification] he ordered them to be led away for execution.' Ἀπάγειν is a vox sol. de hac re, eis θάνατον or ἐπὶ θανάτῳ being generally expressed, but sometimes left to be understood, for death is in this formula always implied.

— διέτριβεν] scil. ἐκεῖ, which is implied in the preceding, as at xiv. 3. The word is generally expressed, as in John iii. 22. xi. 54.

20. Θυμομαχῶν Τυρίους.] Θυμομαχεῖν signifies literally, 'to have war at heart with,' 'to be hostilely disposed towards,' and sometimes to be at war with; which last signification is here adopted by some Commentators. Yet this involves such improbability, and is so destitute of historical support, that it is better to interpret the expression ᾗτουτο εἰρήνην, on which the foregoing view is founded, in a metaphorical sense, i. e. 'they sought to be friends with,' as εἶχον εἰρήνην supra ix. 31, and also εἰρήνην διώκετε, Heb. xii. 14 (for the word may be opposed to private quarrels as well as public hostility); thus taking θυμομ. in the first-mentioned and general sense, 'to be highly incensed with;' as in Diod. Sic. xvii. 33, and Polyb. ix. 40. 3.

Kuinoel, with great probability, traces the origin of this misunderstanding to commercial jealousies, arising from Herod's having formed so admirable a port at Cæsarea. Ὁμοθυμαδὸν, conjointly, i. e. both Tyrians and Sidonians. Πείσαντες Βλάστον. The full sense is, 'having prevailed on Bl. [to give them his aid in the business].' See Matt. xxviii. 14. Gal. i. 10.

— διὰ τὸ τρέφεσθαι] 'was supplied with corn,' &c. For the country of Tyre and Sidon being but a narrow strip of sandy and infertile land, and thickly peopled, they were dependent for many of the necessities of life to the interior country; which being in the possession of Herod, he could deprive them of that support.

21. τακτῇ] 'appointed,' as the day of public audience. So Dionys. Hal. ii. 74, τακτῇ ἡμέρᾳ. It appears from Josephus, Ant. xix. 1. 2, to have been the second day of the Games then celebrating in honour of Cæsar. βήματος meaning, not tribunal, as in Matt. xxvii. 19, but a raised suggestus, presenting the appearance of a throne, in the theatre, where Herod viewed the games and delivered the oration.

— πρὸς αὐτούς.] Not the people, as some imagine, but the ambassadors; which is required by what precedes, and δημηγούειν, as often in the later writers, signifies simply to deliver a speech.

22. ὁ δῆμος.] These being chiefly, if not exclusively, Gentiles (multitudes of whom inhabited Cæsarea), and set on by the courtiers and flatterers; as we find from Josephus; from whom we also learn that the persons in question did really profess to regard him as a God; no doubt in that qualified sense in which the Roman Emperors were called Dei, not only after their death, but even in their lifetime, and in which the Greeks sometimes applied the term to great personages (see Pind. Olymp. v. sub iml. Aristid. iii. 249, 250. Eunap. Proer. p. 120. 163. Appian, i. 635. Josephus, p. 533, ult.); but yet in such a sense as the Jews could not receive; and it clearly appears from Josephus, that the Jews were incensed with him for receiving this impious adulation.

23. ἐπάταξε] i. e. 'struck him with disease.' The expression ἄγγελος Κυρίου ἐπέταξε must certainly mean that the disorder was inflicted by a Divine judgment, and not what some recent foreign Commentators make it, brought on by dysentery arising from a cold caught. As to the circumstance of his thus becoming a prey to worms, it is by no means such as to prove the disorder to have been of human origin; for Divine power is continually found to act by second causes. And this will sufficiently reconcile the seeming discrepancy between the present account and that of Josephus. The historian narrates the secondary causes of Herod's death; the sacred writer considers the primary one, even the immediate interposition of Heaven. The same principle will hold good whether we take ἄγγελος literally or metaphorically; though it seems safer to take it (as does Doddridge) of the real, yet irresistible, agency of a celestial spirit; see 2 Sam. xxiv. 16. 2 Kings xix. 35. Nor is there any discrepancy as to the secondary cause of his death, namely, the disorder of which he died. For although Josephus only mentions most violent pains in the bowels, and dysentery, yet that is very consistent with St. Luke's account; since the dysentery might very well be occasioned by worms; especially as, in such a case, the dysentery is preceded by violent pains in the bowels; see Thucyd. ii. 49. 6. It is not certain, however, that Josephus meant to describe the disorder called dysentery. Possibly by the expressions ἀλγῆματι τῆς γαστρὸς and ἀλγῆμα κοιλίας he had reference to the violent pains occasioned by worms eating the bowels. So in 2 Macc. ix. 5, it is said of Antiochus (who confessedly died σκωληκόβρωτος), λαβὼν αὐτὸν ἀσκήιστος τῶν σπλάγχων ἀλγηδών, καὶ περικρατῶν ἰνδὸν βάσανοι. That Josephus has made no mention of worms may be attributed to motives of delicacy; especially as many tyrants, even the first Herod, had died of that, or a similar disorder, the morbus pedicularis; as, for instance, Antiochus Epiphanes, who had likewise arrogated Divine honours, and, like some others, had come to this miserable end; see Josephus, Ant. xvii. 8. Euseb. Eccl. viii. 16. Herodot. iv. 205, and other passages adduced by Wetstein. It is plain, however, from Josephus's manner, that he regarded Herod's death as brought on by Divine interposition. Thus he says that the exclamations of the adulators were οὐδὲ ἔκρινεν πρὸς ἀγαθοῦ. And he represents Herod himself as avowing his persuasion, that his death was a dispensation of Almighty Providence, to give the lie, as it were, to the impious assertions of the flattering multitude, and to punish him for accepting them.

— ἀνθ' ὧν οὐκ ἔδωκε τὴν δόξαν τ. Θ.] i. e. 'did not leave to God the honour due to Him alone,' but arrogated it to himself, at least by accepting the impious flattery of the people. Ἀνθ' ὧν is a causative phrase for a causative participle, because. Τὴν, not found in several MSS., Fathers, and Editions, has been cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, Knapp, and Scholz. And, indeed, the phrase is, I believe, always found without it; as Luke xvii. 18, and John ix. 24, and often in the Sept. But though the phrase in ascriptions of Divine honour seems not even to admit of it, yet it may always be employed with the force of renewed mention; which, I apprehend, is the case here; q. d. 'the Divine honour he had been receiving.' So in Rev. iv. 11, we have ἄξιός ἐστί, Κύριε, λαβεῖν τὴν δόξαν καὶ τὴν τιμὴν, where in τὴν there is a reference to the preceding ὅταν δάσωσι δόξαν καὶ τιμὴν. Now there the phrase has not the Article, because there is no reference.

25. πληρ. τὴν διακ.] Namely, that spoken of at xi. 29, 30, by delivering the money to the persons proper to receive it.

XIII. From this Chapter to the end of the Book, are narrated the various journeys of St. Paul, undertaken for the conversion of the Gentiles.

1. προφῆται.] See Note supra xi. 27.

— διδάσκαλοι.] Meaning, publicly appointed teachers in the Church, mentioned also 1 Cor. xii. 28, and Eph. iv. 11.

— Μαναὴν.] Hebr. מנחם, consoler. Supposed to be the son of the Essene who foretold to Herod, when a boy, that he would live to be a king.

— Ἡρώδου.] That this was Herod Antipas, and not (as Grotius supposes) Agrippa the second, son of king Agrippa the first, whose death was recorded at xii. 23, has been fully proved by Walch.

— σύντροφος.] This is properly an adjective, signifying 'brought up with'; but it is also used, in the later writers, as a substantive, equivalent to our foster-brother. That, however, sometimes implied also the notion of table-fellow and school-fellow. For it was not unusual in ancient times for children to be brought up with the sons of kings and great men; nay, the custom continued even to modern times, and even recent periods.

2. λειτουργούντων τ. Κ.] Λειτουργία denotes the discharge of some public office, whether civil or religious. By the Classical writers it is almost always used in the civil sense, but by the Scriptural in the religious. In the Old Test., and sometimes in the New (as Heb. x. 11), it denotes the ministration of the Priests and Levites. Here λειτουργεῖν might denote the discharge of all the duties of the ministerial office, both public and private (praying, preaching, teaching, exhorting, &c.), but it seems only to denote the public duties. Καὶ νηστεούντων is intended to intimate, that while they were thus engaged they were fasting; perhaps on an occasion of more than usual solemnity; (as xiv. 23.) when fasting had been added to prayer, &c.,—probably to ask a blessing on the means taken to spread the Gospel. The direction from the Holy Spirit was, it seems, communicated to them while thus engaged.

There is some reason to think (with Hooker and Hales) that both Paul and Barnabas were now set apart for their Apostleship, to supply the vacancies in the original number; one having been put to death by Herod, the other appointed bishop of Jerusalem.

— εἶπε τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον.] Here and at ἐκπεμφθῆναι ὑπὸ τοῦ Πνεύμ. τ. ἁγ. at v. 4 the Personality and Deity of the Holy Spirit are evidently implied.

Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον· Ἀφορίσατε δὴ μοι τὸν [τε] Βαρνάβαν καὶ τὸν Σαῦλον εἰς τὸ ἔργον ὃ προσκέκλημαι αὐτούς. Ὅτε 3 νηστεύσαντες καὶ προσευξάμενοι, καὶ ἐπθέντες τὰς χεῖρας αὐτοῖς, ἀπέλυσαν. 2. ἀφορίσατε δὴ μοι.] Ἀφορίζω signifies, 1. to separate; 2. (by implication) to destine; 3. to appoint, as here. With reference to this, St. Paul, Rom. i. 1, calls himself ἀφορισμένος. The δὴ is hortative, and may be rendered now. The μοι has the imperative force, as at Pa. cxviii. 19, ἀνοίξατέ μοι πόλιν. Thucyd. v. 10, τὰς πόλιν ἀνοίγω μοι. Eurip. Iph. Aul. 1340, διαχαλατέ μοι μέλαθρα. Soph. Œd. Col. 1475. Lucian i. 718. 645. The προσ ἐν προσκεκλημαι is not pleonastic, but signifies unto, as if it were written πρὸς δὲ κέκλημαι. The τε after τὸν, not found in very many MSS. and the Ed. Princ., has been rejected by all the Critical Editors.

3. νηστεύσαντες καὶ προσευξ.] Fasting is here put first, because the solemnity in question (following some time after that on which the injunction of the Spirit was received) was ushered in indictio jejuniu. So v. 2, λειτουργούντων καὶ νηστεούντων (where see Note), and xiv. 23, προσευξάμενοι μετὰ νηστειών.

6. μάγον.] See Note supra viii. 9. Ψευδο-προφ. Meaning one who falsely claims to speak under Divine inspiration, whether in foretelling future events, or in making known the will of God. Ὁλην is received before νῆσον by Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz, from several MSS., Versions, and Fathers. Yet the evidence of the two last is any thing but weighty, and the word has every appearance of coming from the margin, being intended to point out the full force of the δια ἐν διελθ., which means throughout; for in passing from Seleucia to Paphos, they would traverse almost the whole length of the island from West to East.

7. ἀνθυπάτω.] Supposed by Grotius and Hammond to be applied, by an error of title, for ἀντιστρατήγῳ. But Lardner and Kuinoel have vindicated the accuracy of the expression; proving, by reference to Dio Cass. and other writers, that those who presided over the provinces by the appointment of the Senate (and Cyprus was then of that number, though it had once been Prætorian) were styled Proconssules, though they had never filled the chair. That the title did really belong to the Roman governors of Cyprus, has, indeed, been placed beyond all doubt, on the evidence of ancient coins and inscriptions, by Dr. Marsh, Lect. P. v. p. 85.

— συνετῷ] sagax, 'a man of intelligence and ability.' Literally, as we say, 'a clever man,' in which sense the word occurs in Thucyd. i. 74. iii. 37. So Galen, cited by Wetstein, speaks of him as a person thoroughly versed in philosophy. Sergius had, probably, been learning something of natural philosophy, if not the Jewish religion, from Elymas. Hence it was likely that he should send for those who taught a religion professing to be an improvement on the Jewish.

8. Ἐλύμας.] From an Arabic word signifying doctus, or sapiens. So our wizar, from wise.

— διαστρέψαι.] At this term some Commentators stumble; and Valcknaer and Griesbach conjecture ἀποστρέψαι, but without any authority. The common reading is confirmed by a similar construction in Exod. v. 4, ἵνατί διαστρέφοντι τὸν λαὸν ἀπὸ τῶν ἔργων; The reason for the apparent anomaly in syntax is, that there is a significatio prægriana, namely, 'to pervert and turn,' i. e. to turn from the faith by a perversion and misrepresentation of it.

9. ὁ καὶ Παῦλος.] Sub. καλούμενος. With respect to the name Παῦλος, it is well observed by Wetst., that though Luke has before invariably called him Saul, now, no sooner has he mentioned the name of Paul, than Saul becomes so obliterated, that we no where find it used again, either by Luke, Peter, or Paul, in his Epistles. For this the Commentators are not a little perplexed to account. Some suppose that the Apostle had always borne both names. But then why should Luke have hitherto invariably used Saul, and now as invariably Paul? Others are of opinion that Saul changed his name after his conversion. But that is refuted by his being called Saul by Luke after that time, and up to the present. Saul must have himself changed his name; not, however, as some imagine, out of humility, and in deference to the Proconsul, but rather (as Ben. Grotius, Doddridge, and Kuinoel suppose), because he was now brought very much among Greeks and Romans, to whom the name Saul was unknown; while that of Paul was familiar, and, as being a Roman name, would be so much the more suitable to a Roman citizen. And as the reason for the alteration, on taking the solemn charge he had now received, would be stronger than ever, there can be no doubt that it was now made. It should seem, however, by Luke's expression, that while he adopted this name, he yet did not absolutely abandon the other. Though, as he was now the Apostle of the Gentiles, there was a propriety in Luke's henceforward giving him that name which he bore among Gentiles.

— πλησθεὶς Πν. ἁγ. 'filled with the influence and inspiration of the Holy Spirit,' not under the impression of spleen or anger.

10. ῥαδιουργίας. The word denotes, 1. falsity of action; 2. levity and carelessness, whether any action be good or evil; 3. villany or wickedness in general, or rather what is designated by our knavery or trickery. In short, the word corresponds to and is indeed the same with our rogue, anciently written ragerie.

— υἱὲ Διαβόλου. Meaning, 'assimilated to him,' as children to their parents. In Scripture the Devil is represented as the father of wicked persons, inasmuch as they act in his spirit, and follow as he leads them. So John viii. 44, ὁμοίως ἐκ πατρὸς τοῦ Διαβόλου ἐστὶ.

— διαστρέφων τὰς ὁδοὺς Κυρίου τὰς εὐθείας. It is somewhat debated whether τὰς ὁδοὺς Κυρίου should be understood as denoting the Lord's religion, or the ways and purposes of the Lord. The latter sense is preferable, since, as used in the former signification, the word is always in the singular; and indeed εὐθείας would thus be an expression little suitable. Render, 'misrepresenting the upright counsels and purposes of the Lord (lit., modes of proceeding) [for the salvation of men according to the Gospel system].' Here there is a tacit contrast between the conduct of the God of truth, 'just and right,' (Deut. xxxii. 4.) and that of the liar and impostor, Elymas, who was 'perverse and crooked in his ways.' See Prov. ii. 15. xiv. 2. xxviii. 6, 18. Ps. cxxv. 5. This interpretation of εὐθείας is, moreover, confirmed by Ps. xix. 8. (Sept.) τὰ δικαιώματα τοῦ Κυρίου εὐθεῖα, sc. ἵστι.

11. ἰδοὺ. As we say, 'Mind! take notice!' Χεῖρ τοῦ Κυρίου ἐπὶ σέ. A Hebrew phrase, denoting that Divine punishment is suspended over a person. See Exod. ix. 3. Job xix. 21. The τοῦ, not found in very many MSS., Fathers, and early Editions, has been cancelled by all the Critical Editors.

— ἔσθ' τυφλός, μὴ βλ. τ. ἥ. This is thought to be a Hebrew mode of asserting the same thing, both by affirmation and by negation of the contrary. But the idiom occurs also in the Greek and Latin writers, and is only a relic of primitive simplicity of diction. It does not involve pleonasm, for the latter phrase serves to explain and strengthen the former; as in a kindred passage of Luke i. 20, καὶ ἰδοὺ, ἔσθ' σιωπῶν, μὴ δυνάμενος λαλῆσαι. Here, however, μὴ βλέπων τὸν ἥλιον is so much stronger an expression than τυφλός (for all but persons born blind have some faint view of the sun), that there is a sort of climax, and we might render freely, 'thou shalt be blind—yea, stone blind!'

— ἄχρι καιροῦ. The Latin Versions render it 'usque ad tempus.' And so the Syriac and some Oriental ones. Yet that would require μέχρι, as is proved by Tittman de Synop., p. 37. Of ἄχρι καιροῦ the literal sense is, 'during some time.' Though, as duration for a certain time only necessarily implies termination at the end of that time, so ἄχρι χρόνου may be popularly taken for μέχρι χρόνου; q. d. 'for a season, to terminate at a certain time.' But although the words of the Apostle express no more than this,—yet, as καιροῦ is used (which chiefly signifies a point of time), not χρόνου, he meant, I apprehend, to hint at that sense which might be more correctly phrased by μέχρι καιροῦ; meaning by καιροῦ the time of his repentance and reformation. Whether that time would ever arrive, the Apostle, it seems, knew not; the Holy Spirit not having informed him. And he felt so much doubt, that he only just uses an expression which might fall short of driving the man into despair. Had he felt hope, he would perhaps have said (as at Heb. ix. 10), μέχρι καιροῦ διορθώσῃται.

— ἐπίπτει ἐπ' αὐτόν ἀχλὺς καὶ σκότος. Passing by the vain speculations of the Rationalists on the subject of this blindness, I would only observe, that there is here not a Heuidiady; but it should seem that the superposition of the blindness is graphically described, by various stages of the disease; as supra iii. 8, we have the various stages of recovery in the person born blind: καὶ ἔξαλλόμενος, ἔστη, καὶ περιεπάτει. First, a cloud or mist came over his eyes, such as that which obscures the sight of the dying (see Hom. II. v. 696. xvi. 344). This soon increased to darkness; which terminated in that 'total eclipse in which the sun is dark.'

In the next words, παραγών ἔζητει χειραγωγούς we have a graphic description of total blindness, as in Artemid. On. i. 50, τυφλοὺς ἐποίησεν, ἵνα (so that) χειραγωγοῖς χρῆσινται. And so in Gen. xix. 11, it is said, 'they smote the men with blindness, so that they wearied themselves to find the door.' The words ἐκπλησσομένου—Κυρίου are meant further to unfold the sense couched in ἰδὼν τὸ γεγονός, with reference to the miracle, and may be freely rendered, 'being amazed at this [authoritative] mode of teaching the Lord,' i. e. his religion; namely, 'when he saw its truth confirmed by such power [of miracles].' For it is not (what some have supposed) the internal evidence of the truth which is here had in view, but its external evidence. This, indeed, is placed beyond doubt by the authentic interpretation of St. Luke himself, in his Gospel, iv. 32, καὶ ἐξεπλήσσοντο ἐπὶ τῇ διδαχῇ· ὅτι ἐν ἐξουσίᾳ ἦν ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ.

13. οἱ περὶ τὸν Π.] This falls under one of the three classes, into which this idiomatical use of the Article masc. plur. with an Accusative of person is distributed; by which is meant 'the person (as principal) and his company.' But if we understand it of Paul and Barnabas only, it would seem harsh. May we not, then, suppose that some other persons had associated themselves with them, as subordinate helpers in the work of evangelization? That Mark had accompanied them, is certain from the next verse. The use of this idiom shows that Paul was already esteemed the principal, though Barnabas was, on many accounts, entitled to high consideration, and is mentioned first in the Divine appointment.

14. ἐκάθισαν] 'took their seat,' no doubt in the place of the doctors.

15. εἰ ἔστι—λαόν, λέγετε.] The full sense seems to be, 'If either of you have any word of exhortation or admonition to address to the people, speak it.' A sense of παρακλήσις required by the context, and found also at xv. 3, and 1 Thess. ii. 3. This exhortation was usually taken from the portions read out of the Pentateuch or Prophets.

16. κατασείσας τῇ χειρὶ.] See Note on xii. 17.

—εἰπεν· Ἀνδρες, &c.] In this address, which seems chiefly intended to illustrate the Divine economy in opening the Gospel gradually, and preparing the Jews, by temporal mercies, for others of a far higher nature, the Apostle 'reminds his hearers of the former mercies of God to the family of Abraham, and the prediction that their Messiah should be descended from David; and asserts that this Messiah was Jesus of Nazareth. He appeals to the well-known fact of the resurrection of Christ from the dead, as the principal evidence of the truth of his declaration, and concludes with enforcing that one important truth, in which the whole human race are so immediately interested, that forgiveness of sins is to be proclaimed through him alone; and that Christ alone can justify the Christian, not only from those offences from which they were typically purified by the ceremonial law, but from those sins also for which that law had made no provision.' (Doddridge and Townsend.)

—οἱ φοβ. τὸν Θεόν.] By these are meant the proselytes of the gate,—the οἱ σεβόμενοι προσήλυτοι. So Joseph. Ant. xiv. 7. 2 makes a similar distinction between Ἰουδαῖοι καὶ σεβόμενοι. These persons were such as, having abandoned idolatry, worshipped the true God, and therefore, though they did not receive circumcision, were yet permitted to attend at the synagogues. Those Gentiles who received circumcision were reckoned as Jews. (Kuinoel.)

17. ἐξελέξατο] chose as objects of his peculiar blessing. Ὑψωσεν Elsner and Doddridge well explain, 'raised them out of a calamitous state.' Comp. Ps. lxi. 14. Μετὰ βραχ. ὅσον λαοῦ, i. e. by the exertion of a mighty power.

18. ἐτροφοφόρησεν.] It is a point of no little difficulty to determine which of the two readings here found (ἐτροποφόρησεν, the common one, or ἐτροφοφόρησεν) is to be adopted. The latter has been retained by H. Steph., Cambrin, Mill, Pfaff, Hammond, Bengel, Ernesti, Pott, Wakefield, Valcknaer, Morus, Schleusser, Baumuller, Kuinoel, and Townsend, and has been edited by Griesbach and Knapp. On the other hand, the former has been ably defended by Grotius, Gataker, Deyling, Whitby, Wolf, Wetstein, Doddridge, Matthæi, &c. Many arguments are adduced by the disputants on both sides, which are either irrelevant or inconclusive. What increases the perplexity is, that the words may only be, and often are, confounded by the scribes. Nay, in certain senses which the terms admit, the ideas noted by the two words merge into each other. Hence some advocates for the common

reading have, in almost every passage cited as authority for ἐτροφοφόρησεν, maintained that ἐτροποφ. is the true reading; but without reason. There can be no doubt but that both words were in use. For though we may doubt whether τροφοφορίω be analogically formed, yet we must bend to the 'jus et norma loquendi,' and the similar form διτροφοφίω countenances the seeming anomaly. That π and φ are interchanged in pronunciation, is an argument which draws both ways; while that the two words are often confounded by scribes, is an argument which makes far more for the new than the old reading. Yet, upon the whole, external testimony is so decidedly in favour of the latter (ἐτροφ. being found in very few MSS.), that if that were all we had to consider, it ought to be preferred. Internal evidence, however, is likewise to be taken into the account, and that, I apprehend, is in favour of the new reading. It is the less usual and more difficult term, and is far more suitable to the context; ἐτροφοφ. consorting better with ὑψώσας and ἐξήγαγεν before. Nay, as Kuinoel observes, 'the other can scarcely be borne out by facts; for it appears from Ps. xcvi. 10. Heb. iii. 17, and other passages, that God did not very patiently bear their perversity.' Finally, that τροφοφ. is boni commutatio, is attested by its occurring also in Deut. i. 31, in 2 Mac. vii. 27, and in Macarius, Homil. 46. also τροφοφόρος in Eustathius. Thus the inferiority in external is fully balanced by the superiority in internal testimony; and, accordingly, this knotty point might remain undecided ad Græcos calendæ, were we not enabled to call in another principle, which may serve to turn the scale. No unprejudiced inquirer can doubt that the Apostle had in view Deut. i. 31. (Sept.); nay, Bengel and Kuinoel, with much probability, conjecture that Deut. i. and Is. i. were the two chapters of the Old Test. which had been read that day. But, upon inspecting the passage, it will be obvious that τροφοφορίω, and not τροποφορίω, is there the true reading. It is supported by 5-6ths of the MSS., and by Symm. and Aquila, and is required there by the context. Moreover, the great bulk of the MSS. and the Hebrew require that we should read, not τροποφορήσει, but ἐτροφοφόρησα, as the Apostle seems to have read. Ἐτροφοφόρησα is also confirmed by Numb. xi. 12. (Sept.) Λάβει αὐτὸν (scil. τὸν λαὸν τοῦτον) εἰς τὸν κύλπον σου, ὥστε ἂν αἰτῇσιν τὸν Σηλᾶζοντα, εἰς τὴν γῆν ἣν ἔωσας τοῖς πατράσιν αὐτῶν; for it is probable that this passage too was in the mind of the Apostle, and that the two passages contain respectively images of a father carrying his little son over the rough places of a road, and of a nurse carrying an infant in her bosom. There, I conceive, the image terminales, and does not extend to feeding, which some ancient Interpreters seem to have recognised in the present passage; as we may infer from the Const. Apost. vii. 36. Hesych., and the Peschito Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, and Æthiopic and Italic Versions.

19. κατεκληρονόμησεν.] Such (for the vulg. κατεκληροδότησεν) is the reading of many MSS. and several Fathers and early Editions; which has been adopted by almost every Critic and Editor of note: and justly; for though κατεκληροδοτίω is the less usual term, and therefore the other might seem a gloss, yet its authority is not very well established. It is found, indeed, in the LXX.; but there, too, the MSS. vary.

20. ὡς ἔτεσι τετρ. καὶ π.] As to the discrepancy between this number and that at 1 Kings vi. 1, we need not suppose an error either in one or the other, though the Apostle's number is confirmed by Josephus; but (with Mr. Townsend) take the words to mean, 'and after these things, which lasted about the space of 450 years, he gave them judges, until Samuel the Prophet,' i. e. from the time that God chose the fathers (which some fix to the birth of Isaac), to the time the land was divided to them by lot, was nearly 450 years; and then God appointed judges in Israel. Or we may suppose (with Lightfoot and Perizon.) that in this number are reckoned the years of the reigns of the tyrants who occasionally held Israel in subjection during the dynasty of the Judges; and which, when added, make up exactly 450.

21. ἐκείθεν.] This is properly used of place, but sometimes of time. The truth of this is attested by Josephus.

22. εὗρον—Σελήματά μου.] This is not a regular quotation, but gives the substance, with a slight modification, of what is said of David, 1 Sam. xiii. 14, and Ps. lxxxix. 20. On which mode of citation, see Note supra vii. 7. The latter clause is exegetical of the former.

—ἄνδρα κατὰ τ. καρδίαν μ.] viz. in his undeviating pursuit of the plans God would have carried into effect, and in accomplishing his purposes. For καρδία here signifies will or purpose. Nor is this use merely (as it has been thought) a Hebraism; since in Æschyl. Agam. 9 we have ὅδε γὰρ κρατεῖ γυναῖκος ἀνδρόβουλον ἐπιζῶν κίαρ, for so I would point the passage, which has been admirably emended by Bp. Blomfield; though, had the learned Editor recollected the force of κίαρ just mentioned, he would not have assigned to κρατεῖ the arbitrary and precarious sense of jubet, but would have perceived that it denotes simply 'has prevailed'; i. e. has obtained its purpose, namely, that it should be so; a signification of the word found in Thucydides.

23. τοῦτου ὁ Θεός, &c.] The mention of David gave the Apostle an occasion of introducing his grand subject; for the Messiah was foretold as 'the Son of David,' and Paul was prepared to prove that Jesus was the Messiah, 'the Son of David.' (Scott.)

— ἤγειρε—σωτῆρα [I.] Griesbach, Matthæi, and Scholz edit, from several MSS. and some Versions and Fathers, ἤγαγε, regarding the common reading as a gloss. But though this course may seem required by the Canon of preferring the more difficult reading, yet an exception is always allowed where that reading is at variance with the norma loquendi. Now ἄγειν σωτῆρα, as Wetstein observes, occurs no where; while ἔγειρεν σωτῆρα is found in Judges iii. 9. 15. Besides, the MSS. in favour of ἤγαγε are comparatively few, and it has little support from Versions; while ἤγειρε is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., and has been retained by Tittman and Vater. It should seem that ἤγαγε arose merely from an error of the Scribes, who often confounded εἰ (abbrev.) with α, and γ with ρ. Σωτ. does not, as Matthæi thought, require the Article; because (as Bp. Middleton suggests) 'nouns in apposition, not explanatory of the essence of the preceding noun, but of the end or object, are always anarthrous;' see also Luke ii. 11.

24. προκηρύξαντος.] The προ is not, what Kuinoel considers it, pleonastic; the term signifying 'to proclaim beforehand,' as a public crier does. So Josephus, Ant. x. 5. 1, ἱερεῖας τὰ μέλλοντα τῇ πόλει δεῖνὰ προκηρύξει.

— πρὸ προσώπου.] This corresponds to the Hebr. קֹדֶם, and simply signifies before. Εἰσόδου (for εἰσοδούοντος), 'entrance upon his office;' in which sense the word is used in the Classical writers. On βάπτ. μετανοίας, see Note on Matt. iii. 2.

25. ὡς ἐπλήρου.] Render, 'when he was finishing his course,' i. e. towards the close of his course, or ministry. An agonistic metaphor; as 2 Tim. iv. 7. 1 Cor. ix. 24; so also Virg. Æn. iv. 653, 'Vixi, et quem dederat cursum Fortuna, peregi.'

— τίνα με ὑπονοεῖτε εἶναι.] The τίνα is by many taken for ὅτινα, in the sense: 'I am not he whom you suppose me to be.' Of which force of τις several examples are adduced; yet not one where τις for ὅστις commences a sentence. It is therefore better to take the τις (according to the common interpretation) as interrogative, and then suppose, in the next sentence, an ellipse of οὗτος; which, when Christ is meant, is often, through reverence, suppressed.

26. ἀνδρες ἀδελφοί, &c.] The Apostle now earnestly exhorts his hearers, whether Jews or proselytes of the gate, to embrace the salvation offered to them through Christ.

27. οἱ γὰρ κατοικοῦντες, &c.] The γὰρ is not causal, but has reference to some clause omitted; q. d. 'These, indeed, (i. e. the Jerusalemites) put to death Jesus; nevertheless, he is the Christ, for God raised him from the dead.'

— τοῦτον ἀγνοήσαντες—ἐπλήρωσαν.] There is here a difficulty of construction; to remove which several eminent Commentators suppose a transposition; and taking κρίναντες with τοῦτον, and ἀγνοήσαντες with τὰς φωνὰς, they assign the following sense: 'They who dwell at Jerusalem in condemning Him, not having known the voices of the prophets, which are read every sabbath day, have fulfilled [the prophecies].' But this does too much violence to the construction to be admitted. It is better (with Grotius, Wolf, and Kuinoel) to take ἀγνοήσαντες as belonging to both τοῦτον and (by adaptation of signification) to τὰς φωνὰς τ. π., in the sense, 'not knowing Him to be the Messiah, and misunderstanding the words of the prophecy.' At κρίναντες (for κατακρ.) supply αὐτόν, taken from τοῦτον preceding, and render, 'by condemning.' Ἀγνοήσαντες cannot be again supplied at ἐπλήρωσαν, yet it is implied; the meaning being, that they unwittingly fulfilled the prophecy. So Josephus, Bell. iv. 6. 3, adverting to such prophecies, says of the Zealots; οἱς οὐκ ἐπιγινώσκοντες [I conjecture ἐπίγιν.] διακόνουσαν ἐπιδόσαν.

By φωνὰς τῶν προφ. are simply meant the essays of the prophets committed to writing; of which Kyrie adduces examples, as Theoph. Orat. p. 355, τὰς θεολογίας φωνὰς, τὰς σφίγ' ἐκείνους ἀναγινώσκουσιν.

[ἔστα.] This, instead of the common ἔστη, is found in many ancient MSS., the Ed. Princ.; and has been by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, &c. καθελόντες ἀπὸ τοῦ, &c. A difficulty been started; that the same persons did Jesus who had condemned him. Bp. Midgards this as a trifling inaccuracy of α, which the Apostle, hastening to the subject of the Resurrection, cared not to let may, however, be doubted whether any inaccuracy at all. It seems to be popular form of expression, by which any id to do what he procures or permits to by another. Those who brought about crucifixion might be familiarly said to bring a grave, though they did not deposit him what the Apostle meant to say is this,— as they had unwittingly done all that led to of him [up to his death], they had as down and buried [and thought there an end of him]. This last clause, though used, is perhaps alluded to in the adverb, which commences the next sentence, so;—God raised him,' &c.

[ἐς συναναβᾶν, &c.] Meaning the Apostles interioris admissionis, and the men who followed him and ministered to his substance; see 1 Cor. xv. 5, sq. & many ancient MSS. and Versions have as has been received by Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz. As, however, evidence is against it, I have thought (sth Maldonati and Vater) not to adopt it. [ἡμεῖς ὑμᾶς εὐαγγ., &c.] The difficulty construction here some have endeavored to remove by taking εὐαγγέλιον for the of the promise. Yet that is too much the sense. Preferable is the method of to suppose a sort of Hebrew synchysis, the ταύτην just after will be redundant down the construction as follows: ἔχουσα, ὅτι τὴν πρὸς τοὺς πατέρας εὐαγγελίαν ὁ Θεὸς ἐκπεπλήρωκε, *h*od they are induced to adopt, because ative of thing after that of person with as they say, unexampled. Yet this is contradicted (to say nothing of the pre) by Rev. xiv. 6, εἰδὼν ἄλλον ἀγγε τα εὐαγγέλιον αἰώνιον εὐαγγελίσαι τοὺς κατοικοῦντας ἐπὶ τῇ γῇ, in which construction the Accusative of person comes first. And indeed εὐαγγ. often occurs in the New Test. with the accusative of person. So Luke iii. 18, πολλὰ μὲν—εὐαγγελίζεντο τὸν λαόν. The Accusative of thing may depend on some preposition understood; or rather on ἀγγελλοντες to be taken out of the verb. Here, at any rate, it must be supplied before ὅτι ταύτην, &c. Those who have any thing promised them, are in Scripture peculiarly said εὐαγγελίζεσθαι. So Heb. iv. 2, καὶ γὰρ ἴσμεν εὐαγγελισμένοι, 'to us pertains that promise.'

33. Υἱὸς μου εἰ σὺ, ἐγὼ, &c.] It is not meant, that by raising Jesus from the dead, God begat him in the relation of a Son, but that by raising him, God declared him to be the Messiah, according to the promise made to the fathers, ver. 32; and also, that by so raising him, he declared him to be his only-begotten Son, according to what is written at Ps. ii. 7. Thus the Apostle states the resurrection as a proof that in Christ was fulfilled the promise made to the fathers, and the prophecy in Ps. ii. (Holden.) For though the words had probably a primary reference to David, yet they bore a secondary and more important reference to Christ; see Smith's Scrip. Test. vol. i. 289.

34. ὅτι δὲ—εἶρηκεν.] The reasoning seems to be this, that 'it might be inferred that the resurrection in question would be final and permanent, from the words which God had spoken by his prophet (Is. lv. 3) as follows: 'I will give you,' &c. The Apostle does not add, de suo, ὅτι δώσω ὑμῖν, but he merely introduces δώσω, because in the clause in question it is to be supplied from the sense of the preceding one, διαθήσομαι, &c.; as indeed is done in Bp. Lowth's version.

"Ὅσια" is by some Interpreters taken to signify mercies, by others benefits. Tittman, however, denies that the term can bear either of these senses; and he, with Bp. Pearce, takes the sense to be, 'the sacred things of David,' namely, the covenant made with David, and confirmed by an oath; meaning the performances of it. By which τὰ ὅσια τὰ πιστά will be equivalent to the ἔρκια πιστά of Homer. Yet unless we suppose the Septuagint translator (whom the Apostle follows verbatim) to have entirely mistaken the sense of ἔρκια, we may rather, with Schleiermacher and Wahl, take the sense to be, 'the benefits or favours sacredly promised to David, sure and certain.' The same Hebrew words are more plainly rendered at 2 Chron. vi. 42, τὰ ἰδίᾳ Δαυὶδ. So the expression must have been understood by St. Clement, who, on the Epistle to the Corinthians, chap. i., says (doubtless with allusion to the present passage), πᾶσα δὲ αὐτῷ ὀφειλομένη ὅσια; 'How many benefits do we owe to Him!' Finally, in this manner the Pesch. Syr. Translator must have taken the term. And vain is it to urge that the word cannot mean this. For though that be not its proper signification, yet that it may bear the above sense, who would venture to deny? Nay, that it is so used in the passage of the Sept. is plain from a comparison with 2 Chron. vi. 42. And there is the less to stumble at in this confessed harshness of expression, since it is a Hebraism, on which see Kuinoel.

The Apostle, then, argues that these merciful promises have been proved to be sure and true, by their fulfilment in the resurrection of Jesus; which resurrection (so accomplished as that, agreeably to the prophecy at Ps. xvi. 10, his body did not experience that corruption which results from permanent death) proved him to be the Messiah promised to the Fathers.

36. The Apostle here proceeds to show that those words are not applicable to David; and then leaves it to be inferred that the person there meant must be Jesus,—the only one who had been so raised from the dead, as not to return thither, or experience corruption. Here ὑπερτίσας may be construed either with ἰδίᾳ γενεᾷ, or with τῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ βουλῇ; but the latter is the more natural construction, and yields a better sense, and such as is very applicable to one who was 'the man after God's own heart,' by accomplishing his purposes; see ver. 22. It is also confirmed by the ancient Versions, where ὑπερτίσας is often followed by a noun signifying wishes, commands, &c. 'Ἰδίᾳ γενεᾷ,' in his own generation, or age, i. e. period of existence; see Luke xvi. 8.

— προσετέθη πρὸς τοὺς π.] An expression derived from the Old Test. (as Gen. xlix. 29. xxv. 8. Judges ii. 10), in which there is an allusion to those vast avens, or subterraneous vaults, in which the Hebrews (as also the Egyptians, Babylonians, and other Oriental nations) used to deposit the dead of a whole family or race; sometimes arranged in recesses by the side of the vault, and sometimes laid upon each other, until the place was quite full of bodies.

38, 39. The Apostle now applies the doctrine which he has already stated and proved, and proceeds, by inference, to show the exceedingly precious benefits to be obtained by faith in the Messiahship of Jesus, and to point out the great superiority of the justification and remission of sins to be attained through him over that supplied by the law of Moses; thus inculcating the great doctrine of justification by faith, treated on by St. Paul in his Epistles to the Romans and Galatians.

40. To this encouragement to faith, intended for the well-disposed, the Apostle subjoins a warning, meant for the refractory. 'Ἐκ τῶν προφ., meaning, that division of the Old Test. called the Prophets; see Note on John vi. 45.

41. Ἰδετε, &c. A citation from Habak. i. 5 (though a similar apostrophe in Is. xxviii. 14 may have been in the mind of St. Paul), in which a word is omitted not necessary to the sense, and one or two supplied to make it clearer. Both the Apostle and the LXX. vary from the Hebrew, as regards ὁ καταφρονηταί and ἀφανίσθητε, in the former instance preserving the true reading, which seems to be not עָוָה, but עָוָה which is read in some MSS., and confirmed by the Syriac and Arabic Versions. With ἀφανίσθητε there is more of difficulty. The common version 'perish' is generally considered indefensible, as not even warranted by the Hebrew; and Bux. Doddridge, Pearce, Wakefield, Schleusner, Wahl, and Kuinoel, render 'disappear,' viz., for shame and fear; a sense which Schleusner thinks reconcilable with the Hebrew, since עָוָה signifies both castari and stupere. If so, the LXX. took the wrong signification. But probably they read differently, namely, instead of עָוָה, they read עָוָה, and be exceedingly amazed. This I suspect to be the true reading in the Hebrew; for the letters might easily be confounded, and a ו lost after a י. Thus there will be a עָוָה; עָוָה or עָוָה being a far stronger term (namely, to be destroyed, i. e. die, with amazement) than עָוָה. What idea St. Paul himself would have affixed to the word, as it respected the perishers, we cannot know. But it should seem that he took occasion, from the ambiguity of signification, to hint to his unbelieving hearers a warning as to the consequences of their unbelief and rejection of the Messiah. The 'work' was the ruin of their country, which happened in their generation.

42. We have here related the effect of the foregoing speech on the Rulers; for that is what is meant by οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι; as often in St. John's Gospel.

Here almost all recent Editors are agreed in receiving αὐτῶν after ἐξιώντων δὲ, and cancelling ἐκ τῆς—Ἰουδαίων and τὰ ἔθνη, on considerable authority of MSS., Versions, Fathers, and early Editions. Matthæi, however, retains τὰ ἔθνη, which may certainly be tolerated, if the words be taken to denote the Jewish proselytes of the gate, mentioned in the next verse. But the words are probably from the margin; as also ἐκ τῆς—Ἰουδαίων. The whole passage may be thus rendered: 'As they (i. e. Paul and Barnabas) were departing from the synagogue, they (i. e. the congregation, or the Gentile proselytes) expressed a desire that these words might be spoken to them (i. e. that the same subject should be treated of) on the next Sabbath-day. And when the synagogue had broken up, many of the Jews and devout proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas.' There is no reason to suppose (as Kuinoel most unwarrantably takes for granted) that Paul and Barnabas went out before the conclusion of the service; for the service, except a brief concluding prayer, terminated with the discourse. We are only to understand that they went out first, accompanied probably by the rulers of the synagogue; the people meanwhile reverently keeping their seats; and on their having left the place, the whole congregation broke up and departed.

The words εἰς τὸ μεταξὺ σάββ. are by many Commentators supposed to mean, 'on some intermediate week-day.' But that sense is surely forbidden by ver. 44. The rendering of our common version (confirmed by the opinion of the best Expositors), 'on the following Sabbath-day,' is, doubtless, the true one. Μεταξὺ in the later writers has often the sense of μετέπειτα, post.

43. Αὐτοῖς after προσελούντες,—not found in many ancient MSS.—has been cancelled by Griesbach and Scholz, but injudiciously; since the word seems to have been thrown out by the Alexandrian Critics, for the purpose of removing a kind of tautology, though quite in the Scriptural style.

—ἐπιμένειν τῇ χάριτι τ. Θε. Meaning, perseverance in their belief of the Gospel, called also in 2 Cor. vi. 1. Phil. i. 7. Heb. xiii. 9, κατ' ἐξοχὴν, 'the grace of God,' as containing the richest display of his grace. See Rom. vi. 14. Col. i. 6.

For ἐπιμένειν very many MSS. have προσμένειν, which has been received by Griesbach, Knapp, Vater, and Scholz, and is countenanced by 1 Tim. v. 5, προσμένει ταῖς δεήσεσι. But the common reading is more agreeable to the usage of the New Test. So in Col. i. 23, we have ἐπιμένετε τῇ πίστει. Comp. also Rom. xi. 22, 23, and 1 Tim. iv. 16.

44. ἐχομένῳ.] So Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz well edit, from a few MSS., for the vulg. ἐρχομένῳ. For though it might be thought that ἐρχ. was altered to ἐχομένῳ by the Alexandrian Critics stumbling at the common Greek expression, yet that rests on mere supposition, and we have no proof that ἐρχόμενος was ever used in the sense next. For as the passage of Joseph. Ant. vi. 11. 9, adduced by Kuinoel (τῇ δ' ἐρχομένῳ); there the best MSS. have ἐχομένην, which Hudson, as appears from his Note, meant to edit; though he inadvertently left ἐρχ., which was carelessly reprinted by Oberthuer and Richter. There is, indeed, the more reason to think ἐχ. there the true reading, since Josephus elsewhere uses the phrase τῇ δ' ἐρχομένην. The same argument will apply to the passage before us, since τῇ ἐχομένῳ occurs in Luke xiii. 33 and Acts xx. 15. xxi. 26, and several times in the Septuagint, though the scribes not unfrequently wrote, through carelessness, ἐρχομένην.

Again, for δὲ, many MSS. and Theophylact and the Ed. Princ. have τε, which is adopted by Griesbach, Knapp, and Scholz; while Matthæi and Vater retain δὲ: and rightly; for τε seems to have proceeded from the scribes,—the two words being often confounded.

The Apostle here proceeds to show that those words are not applicable to David; and then leaves it to be inferred that the person there meant must be Jesus,—the only one who had been so raised from the dead, as not to return thither, or experience corruption. Here ὑπὲρ τῆς may be construed either with ἰδίᾳ γενεᾷ, or with τῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ βουλῇ; but the latter is the more natural construction, and yields a better sense, and such as is very applicable to one who was 'the man after God's own heart,' by accomplishing his purposes; see ver. 22. It is also confirmed by the ancient Versions, and by the use of the word in the Classical writers, where ὑπὲρ τῆς is often followed by a noun signifying wishes, commands, &c. Ἰδίᾳ γενεᾷ, 'in his own generation,' or age, i. e. period of existence; see Luke xvi. 8.

With ἀφαν. there is more of difficulty. The common version 'perish' is generally considered indefensible, as not even warranted by the Hebrew; and Ben. cate turn, such as is found in the best writers. So Arrian ii. 20, κάθευδε, καὶ τὰ τοῦ σκόληκος ποίει, ὡν ἄξιον ἔκρινας σιαντόν. Cic. Catal. i. 3, 'Quam longè videtur à carcere atque à vinculis absesse debere, qui se ipsum jam dignum custodiâ judicavit?'

46. στρεφόμεθα εἰς τὰ ἔθνη.] Not meaning that he gave up the Jews, and became the Apostle of the Gentiles only; for he became such much later, and even then never to the abandonment of the Jews. In fact, the Jews of Antioch alone are meant; and by τὰ ἔθνη not absolutely the Gentiles at large, nor the Gentiles of Antioch only, but chiefly the Gentile proselytes before mentioned; though the Gentiles at large may be included, since the Apostle would have been ready to admit them as converts, as he had been to admit the Proconsul. That he deemed himself at full liberty to do this, is plain from the application he gives to the words of Isaiah xlix. 6, which he now adduces as his authority.

47. τίθεικά σε εἰς φῶς, &c.] The words exactly correspond to the LXX., at least in the Alexandrian and other MSS., though the common text (formed on the Vatican MS.) has δέδωκα, for τίθεικα; the former of which is the more literal version of the Hebrew, while the latter is a free rendering. In the common text are added εἰς διαθήκην γένους, of which the sense is, 'as a bequest to the nation.' But the words may be suspected to have come from the margin. Τίθεικα should be rendered, 'I have appointed,' or 'ordained.' It is strange that Kuinoel should consider this passage as properly applicable to Isaiah only, and his calling to the prophetic office, and merely accommodated by St. Paul to his own case. The words are scarcely applicable to the Prophet at all; indeed there are many parts of the Chapter, from whence this passage is taken, that cannot possibly apply to the Prophet, and have no propriety but as referred to the MESSIAH, 'whose character and office (to use the words of Bp. Lowth) were exhibited in general terms at the beginning of Chap. xlii., but here is introduced in person, declaring the full extent of his commission; which is not only to restore the Israelites, and reconcile them to their Lord and Father, from whom they had so often revolted, but to be a light to lighten the Gentiles, to call them to the knowledge and obedience of the true God, and to bring them to be one church together with the Israelites, and to partake with them of the same common salvation, procured for all by the great Redeemer and Reconciler of man to God.' This passage of the Prophet might well be said to be their warrant for preaching to the Gentiles, and, by implication, contains an exclusion,—since the Messiah could only be a light and salvation to the Gentiles by the means of those who should spread his Gospel. St. Paul, however, had himself received a positive injunction, since (as we find from Acts xxii. 17—21) on his first visit to Jerusalem after his conversion, Jesus appeared to him in a trance, and said, 'Depart; for I will send thee hence far off to the Gentiles.'

48. ἰδοῦζόντων τὸν λόγον τοῦ Κ.] i. e. recognised the excellency of it, as worthy the impartiality of the God of the whole universe.

—καὶ ἐπίστευσαν ὅσοι—αἰώνιον.] There are few passages of which the interpretation has been more warmly debated than the present, and that from its being supposed to involve an important doctrine. Most Calvinistic Interpreters take τεταγμένοι εἰς to mean fore-ordained, or predestinated unto, by God's decree; the persons in question being represented as believing under that decree. In refutation of which, some Anti-Calvinistic Commentators rather apply themselves to show that the doctrines of Calvinism are untenable, than that they cannot be found here. But the only question before us is, what may be supposed to be the true sense of the words τεταγμένοι εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον in their present position. Now in tracing this, it will, I think, appear that there is nothing which necessarily conveys the idea of an absolute decree, or predestination. The expression is not προτεταγμένοι (much less, as invariable usage elsewhere would require, προορισμένοι), but simply τεταγμένοι. There is neither προ, nor any thing equivalent. We have besides no mention of God, no such addition as ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ. Objections, indeed, are sufficiently obvious, and have been strongly urged by Grotius, Hammond, Wolf, Whitby, and Adam Clarke; though, were that all that could be urged against the interpretation in question, it might perhaps be deemed insufficient to disallow it. For τεταγμένοι might (though there is no proof that it ever did, either in the Scriptural or Classical writers) mean destined; and if destined could be supposed to be the sense, the argument founded on the omission of ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ would not be of any great weight, since that might be thought understood, as in Eph. i. 11, προορισθέντες κατὰ πρόθεσιν, &c. Thus the sense which the above Commentators assign might, after all, be tolerated if the context would permit it. But that is by no means the case. There is assuredly nothing, either in the context, or in the language used by St. Luke, either in this Book or in his Gospel, that can lead us to suppose any such sense intended here; nay, there is not a little that utterly excludes it, as will appear from Hammond, cited in Rom. Synop. Suffice it to say (confining ourselves to the context), that such a construction is forbidden by the word ἐπίστευσαν, which, under the present circumstances, can mean no more than that they 'believed in the Lord Jesus, and received the religion which he came to promulgate.' Yet it cannot be supposed that all who did so were predestinated to eternal salvation. 'There was, doubtless, (as Schoettgen observes), among these believers many hypocrites and evil-livers, who eagerly enough embraced the theoretical truth, but cared not for the practical. These, then, will not be predestinated.' And we do not find that those who believed at other times were predestinated; some falling away, as is represented in the parable of the Sower. Nor is it likely that such as believed should come in all at once, but gradually. Ἐπίστανται, then, can have no reference to their persevering or not persevering. Besides, as the best Commentators are agreed, there is here an opposition, arising from a tacit comparison between the conduct of these Gentiles, on the one hand, and of the Jews on the other. The Gentiles (ταταγμένοι εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, and who accordingly received the Gospel) are contrasted with the Jews mentioned at v. 46, who, by rejecting it, acted as if they thought themselves not worthy of eternal life. In short, ἀπαθῆναι τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ is there opposed to ἰδέεσθαι τὸν λόγον τοῦ Κυρίου, and οὐκ ἔχοντες κρίνεται ἑαυτοὺς τῆς αἰωνίου ζωῆς τοῦ Θεοῦ. See Krebs and Wetstein. And as no absolute decree can, by the words οὐκ ἔχοντες ἀναγκάσει—λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ be supposed in the latter case, so none must be supposed in the former. The former act was voluntary, and so must the latter be.

49 μένοι εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον. διεφέρετο δὲ ὁ λόγος τοῦ Κυρίου

Having, then, seen what cannot be the meaning of the words, let us examine what is probably their real sense. And in order to that, let us advert to their construction. Now to connect εἰς ζωὴν with ἐπίστανται (as is done by some Interpreters of eminence) is too violent a method, and requires an unauthorized sense to be assigned to ζωὴν αἰώνιον. The natural construction must be preserved, and such a sense assigned to ταταγ. as may be suitable to εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, and be permitted by the usage of the Scriptural as well as the Classical writers. Now many Commentators trace in ταταγ. a military metaphor, and take the sense to be, 'those who had arrayed themselves for salvation,' namely, by hearing the word of God, and not resisting the work of the Holy Spirit on their hearts; thus taking the passive here in a reciprocal sense: than which nothing is more common. The sense hence arising will then be such as that expressed at 1 Cor. xvi. 15, εἰς διακονίαν τοῖς ἀγίοις ἵταξαν ἑαυτοὺς, and Xenoph. Mem. ii. l. 11, οὐδ' εἰς τὴν δουλείαν ἑαυτὸν τάττω. Yet in this interpretation, and the military metaphor it supposes, there is something not a little far-fetched. And the reason for its adoption seems to have originated in the endeavour to exclude the Calvinistic view, which might seem favoured by the Passive sense. Yet that does not necessarily suppose any over-ruling impulse from without. The expression τάσσεσθαι εἰς may here have the sense it sometimes bears, 'to be thoroughly disposed for, or purposed for, bent on;' like the similar one ἔθετος εἶναι εἰς, 'to be fully disposed for.' Of this signification several examples are adduced by Krebs and Loesner, as Max. Tyr. Dias. x. p. 102. Ed. Heins., ἐπὶ σαρκῶν ἡδονῶν συνταταγμένοι. So also Plato, de Legg. vi. p. 563, φύσει εἰς ἀρετὴν ταταγμένη. 2 Macc. vi. 21, οἱ δὲ πρὸς τῷ σπαραγμῷ ταταγμένοι, and Ps. lviii. 1, 'Are your minds set upon righteousness?' In all which passages the middle sense is very apparent; nay, Chrysostom goes so far as to say that the expression ταταγμένοι is employed to intimate that the thing is not a matter of necessity, or what is compulsory. And thus, far from favouring the system of an absolute decree, the words would lead to the opposite conclusion, that the Creator, while 'binding nature fast in fate, left free the human will.'

Such, then, may be thought to be the true sense of the passage; though, even if the sense ordained were retained, it would not necessarily involve the doctrine of predestination. For in this context such would be quite out of place. In that case we might, with the most eminent of the recent Commentators, as Morus, Schoettgen, Rosenmuller, and Kuinoel, suppose the expression meant according to the usage of common life, without any reference to metaphysical subtleties, and not to the exclusion of all conditions or all means on the part of man for obtaining salvation; it being, in the expression ταταγμένοι, understood and supposed that the cause of their being so ordained or destined was faith. This is confirmed by the Rabbinical citations adduced by Lightfoot, Schoettgen, and Wetstein, from which it is plain that the expressions 'to be ordained or destined to eternal life, or eternal destruction,' were in frequent use among the Rabbins, but not with any reference to any decree, or to the exclusion of conditions. Thus Kobeleth vii. 12, 'Quicunque non piger fuit ad planetum Rabbi, ordinatus est ad vitam sæculi futuri.' And Midrach Mischle, 16. 4, 'Si non facit penitentiam, ordinatus est ad iudicium gehennæ.' In his Note on the present passage, Calvin, as may be supposed, strenuously maintains the sense of predestination, but with singular want of success. What Dr. Hammond says of 'the no-reasons produced that incline the text that way,' is entirely applicable to Calvin's note. The only attempt at argument he makes is, that St. Luke does not say 'ordinati ad fidem,' but 'ordinati ad vitam.' But that is surely a most frivolous objection; for if such an expression had been employed, it would certainly have been one less pertinent than any other to be found elsewhere in the sacred volume; whereas that of ordinati ad vitam contains a sense at once profound and worthy of the Evangelist; the full meaning being—'whose minds were in a fit state to judge of the evidence for the truth of the Gospel, who were seriously concerned about their salvation, and were thoroughly disposed to make all sacrifices to obtain eternal life.' Indeed, it is plain that the sacred writer has here reference, not to a mysterious theological doctrine, but has respect to those powerful moral means and motives, which sway the will and thereby govern the man. Hopes and fears (as observes Dr. South) govern all things—being the two great handles by which the will of man is to be taken hold of, when we would either draw it to duty, or draw it off from sin. And the Divine law is the grand adamantine ligament, tying both of them fast together, by assuming rewards to our hopes, and punishments to our fears.' While, however, we contend that the doctrine of Divine decrees can by no means be found here, yet it is proper to bear in mind that the dispositions of the persons themselves could not have been what they were, still less have been originally such, from themselves; but must be ascribed to the preventing grace of God, to which alone it is owing that men are ever thoroughly disposed to embrace or obey the Gospel of Christ, or (as it is said, John vi. 37, 39) are 'given to him of the Father;' 'the grace of God, by Christ, preventing them, that they may have a good will, and working with us, when we have that good will,' according to the doctrine contained in the 10th Article of our Church.

50. τὰς εὐσχήμονας] 'women of rank.' See Note on Mark xv. 43. The καὶ before εὐσχήμονας, not found in several of the most ancient MSS. and some Versions, has been cancelled by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz; perhaps rightly. Its omission is supported by Acts xvii. 12, τῶν Ἑλληνίδων γυναίκων τῶν εὐσχημόνων. See also infra xvii. 4.

— ἐξέβαλον αὐ. ἀπὸ τῶν ὁρίων αὐ.] These may seem strong terms. But we need not suppose that force was employed in removing the Apostles; which, as no resistance was made, would have been unnecessary. The expression may merely mean, that they procured an order for their departure. This kind of order used indeed to be given in set form (so Eurip. Med. 274, Εἰπὼν [jubeo] γῆν ἔξω περᾶν, πρὶν δὲ σε γαίης τερμόνων ἔξω βάλλω), and there were sometimes officers appointed to superintend the execution of it, by conducting the person over the borders. So Thuc. ii. 12, καὶ ἐκέλευον ἐκτὸς ὅρων εἶναι αὐθημερόν, συμπίμπουσι τε ἀγῶνός.

51. ἔκτιναζάμενοι τὸν κοινορτὸν.] See Note at Matt. x. 14.

52. χαρᾶς] 'the consolations of the Gospel.' Πνεύμ. ἁγ. must be explained of the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit for sanctification, and not for working miracles, since hands had not been laid upon them for that purpose.

XIV. 1. κατὰ τὸ αὐτό.] The earlier Commentators suppose an ellipse of ἴδου. But it is better, with the later ones, to take it as equivalent to ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό, and equivalent to οὕτως (as in many passages of the Classical writers adduced by Kypke); both expressions being used by the LXX. to express the Hebr. כִּנּוּן. By Ἑλλήνων are meant τῶν σεβομένων Ἑλλ., as they are called at xvii. 4; equivalent, it should seem, to τῶν σεβομένων προσηλύτων at xiii. 43.

2. ἀπειθοῦντες] 'refusing belief, unbelieving,' equivalent to μὴ πιστεύοντες: a sense occurring also at xvii. 5, xix. 9, John iii. 36, Heb. xi. 31, but rare in the Classical writers. It occurs in Hom. Od. v. 43.

— ἐπήγειραν—ἀδελφῶν.] Kypke and Kr. maintain that the construction is ἐπὶ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν ἐθνῶν κατὰ τῶν ἀδ., καὶ ἐκάκωσαν. And it is true that τὰς ψυχὰς—τῶν ἀδ. are intended principally for ἐπήγειραν, as appears from xiii. 50. Yet perhaps those words are meant to be referred also to ἐκάκωσαν, two clauses being thus blended into one. Render, 'instigated and exasperated the minds of the Gentiles against the brethren,' of which sense of κακῶς examples are adduced by Krebs from Josephus.

3. παρρησιαζ., ἐπὶ τῷ Κ.] Most Commentators take this to mean, 'being bold in the profession of Jesus;' i. e. his doctrine and religion. But as that would rather require ἐν τῷ Κ., it is better, with others, to render 'speaking freely, in reliance on the Lord.'

The καὶ before δίδοντι is not found in many of the best MSS. and Versions, and in almost all early Editions. It crept into the later Erasmus Editions, and was thence introduced into the third of Steph. It has been, very properly, cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, Valet, and Scholz, both from internal evidence (since we may account for its omission, but not for its insertion) and from propriety of language; for (as Black observes) 'where a later participle is meant for the explication of a preceding one [and denoting by what means, i. e. how] the copulative is usually dispensed with, as at vv. 17 and 22.' See Note on ix. 28, and Middl. Gr. Art., iii. 3. 4.

4. ἐσχίσθη.] When σχίσθαι has the metaphorical sense 'to be divided in opinion,' γένος is generally added, by way of explanation, as in Herodot. iv. 119, and a passage of Galen cited by Wetstein. Sometimes, however, it is omitted, as here and in Xenoph. Sympoet. iv. 28, where

5. ὁρμή.] This is by some rendered impetus, assault. Yet that sense is negated by the συνιδόντες at v. 6. Others take it to denote impulse, of which sense Munthe adduces several examples. In those passages, however, the word is used with ἐντίκται, while here it rather seems to denote (as the Vulg., Bengel, Wetstein, and Kuinoel interpret) 'a set design, full purpose,' ὁρμή ἐγένετο being for ὁρμῶντο, scil. τὰ ἴθνη. So Thucyd. iv. 4, τοῖς στρατιώταις ὁρμή ἐπίπαις ἐκτελεῖσαι τὸ χωρίον, and James iii. 4.

6. συνιδόντες.] Menning, 'having taken consideration [respecting the matter, and what was best to be done].' So xii. 12, συνιδὼν τε ἤλθε.

—τὰς πόλεις τῆς Δ.] Here the Article is not without force, though it is not expressed by our Translators. Nor need the Commentators have supposed a transposition, thus: κατέφυγον εἰς Δ. καὶ Δ., τὰς πόλεις τῆς Δ.; for then the Article would have been improper, even in the Greek, Iconium being a city of consequence. The truth is, that Λύστραν and Δέρβην fall under the rule of apposition for definition's sake (i. e. to determine the whole by specifying the parts), and the use of the Article falls under that of insertions in hypothesis. Moreover, the words τῆς Λυκαονίας are added by way of explication. If the Article, however, be allowed its force, it would appear that Luke did not reckon Iconium as being in Lycania. And yet Strabo, Pliny, and Steph. Byz. describe it as being in that country. While Xenophon, in his Cyrop., reckons it as in Phrygia, though on the borders of Lycania. And probably so it continued till the Roman conquest; and even then was popularly regarded as in Phrygia (as, I apprehend, it was done by St. Luke), though properly belonging to Lycania.

8. ἐκάθητο.] To the sense sute many recent Commentators take exception, and assign that of 'was,' or 'dwelt'; supposing here a signification of the word derived from the Hebr. שָׁו, and found in a passage at Matt. iv. 16, cited from Is. ix. 1 and Luke i. 79, where that passage is alluded to. Yet what is very allowable in the figurative phraseology of poetry, is not so in plain prose, and especially that of narration. Nay, even in the passage of the Prophet, the word, strictly speaking, does not mean dwelt; but the term is a graphic one, to denote a posture especially appropriate to calamity and misery. So Ps. cvii. 10, 'such as sit in darkness, bound in affliction and iron,' and Is. xlii. 7, 'Bring them that sit in darkness out of prison.' Thus, then, ἐκάθητο here is in like manner graphic, with allusion to the miserable condition of him who had never walked or even stood upright. It is scarcely necessary to observe that, had ἐκάθητο really meant dwelt, it would have been placed immediately after Λύστοις. Finally, as the sacred writer here accumulates phrase upon phrase, to describe the miserable condition of the poor cripple,—it was the more likely that he should intend thus graphically to represent it by the above expression.

Ἀδύνατος τοῖς π. signifies, not disabled, but helpless in his feet, who had no use of his feet. Neither does χλωὸς mean lame (as Newcome and Wakefield render), but, as our common version expresses it, a cripple,—meaning (according to the real derivation of that word), one who can only creep, and not walk; q. d. a creepie, as the word was formerly spelt. This, indeed, is distinctly expressed in the next clause.

9. πίστιν ἔχει τοῦ σωθῆ. See Matth. ix. 21, 22, 28, and Luke vii. 50.

10. εἶπε μεγάλη τῇ φωνῇ.] Comp. John xi. 43.

—ἤλλετο καὶ π.] See Note on Acts iii. 8.

11. Λυκαονιστὶ.] On the precise nature and character of this language, not a little difference of opinion exists. Some suppose it to have been the same with that of the adjoining province of Cappadocia. But the most probable opinion is that it was of Greek origin (forming, as Gailing thinks, a branch of the old Pelagic), but by intermixture with the barbaric languages of Asia Minor, peculiarity of pronunciation, and other causes, had become almost a distinct language from the Greek. St. Paul evidently did not understand what was spoken, otherwise he would have prevented the preparation for sacrifice.

12. ἐκάλουν.—Ἐρμην.] From verse 13 it appears that Jupiter had a temple among them.

nay, it is probable from what is there said, that the city itself was sacred to him. And the ancients supposed the Gods to especially frequent those cities which were sacred to them. It was not improbable, therefore, that he should appear; of course, in a human form; as also that he should be accompanied by Mercury, since Jupiter was supposed to be generally attended on such visits by that god.

12. ὁ ἡγούμενος τοῦ λόγου] 'the leading speaker,' or he who had led the discourse. Thus Mercury is called by Jamblichus, de Myst., ἑὸς ὁ τῶν λόγων ἡγούμενος. And that he was, in the Heathen mythology, the god of eloquence, is well known. So Hor. Od. i. 10. 1, 'Mercuri, fœcundæ nepos Atlantis.'

13. ὁ ἱερεὺς] ἱερεὺς ἀρχιερεὺς. At τοῦ Διὸς Kuinoel supposes an ellipsis of ἱεροῦ, as in Aristophanes, Plut. 358, ἥκειν παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ, and often. Perhaps, however, there is no ellipsis at all, but only Jupiter is put for the temple of Jupiter, the god for the temple, by a common figure of speech; for Valcknaer has shown that it cannot be understood of a statue, since statues had no priests attached to them. The above view is, I find, supported by Bp. Middleton, who adduces an apposite proof of this idiom from Pausan. iv. p. 337. Μάντικλος δὲ καὶ τὸ ἱερὸν Μασσηλίου τοῦ Ἡρακλίου ἐποίησε, καὶ ἐστὶν ἐκτός τεύχους ὁ θεὸς ἱδρυμένος, which evidently means that 'the temple, in which stood a statue of Hercules, was without the wall.' The temple being situated in front of the city shows that Jupiter (thus πρόπολος) was accounted the πολιούχος or tutelary god of the place. So Æschyl. Sept. c. Theb. 150, ἐν τε μάχαις μάκαιρ' ἀνασσα πρό πόλεως. In ταύρους καὶ στέμματα there is a Hendiadys for ταύρους ἱσταμένους, as in Virg. Georg. ii. 192, 'Pateris libamus et auro.' That the oxen for sacrifice were crowned with a garland, is beyond all doubt. So Lycophr. Cass. 327, says the sacred bulls were στεφανίφοροι. It is not clear whether by πυλῶνας we are to understand the gates of the city, or the portals of the temple, most probably the latter.

14. διαβρῶξαντες τὰ ἱμάτια.] See Matt. xxvi. 65, and Note.

— ἐξεπήδησαν.] This, instead of the common reading ἐλεεον, found in many ancient MSS. and some Versions and Fathers, has been received by Griesbach, Knapp, and Scholz; rightly, I think;

for though ἐλεεον is more agreeable to the usage of Classical writers, yet ἐξεπ. is more assimilated to the Alexandrian and Hellenistic Greek, and is the stronger term. So, in a kindred passage of Judith xiv. 17, ἐξεπήδησεν εἰς τὸν λαόν, κρᾶζων, &c. 2 Macc. iv. 18, ἐξεπήδων ἐπὶ, &c. Josephus, Ant. vi. 9. 5, Σαῦλος καὶ πᾶς ὁ στρατὸς ἐκπηδῶσιν εἰς αὐτούς. The comparative rarity of ἐλεεον will account for its being changed by the scribes; and, indeed, ἐξ and ἐλε are easily confounded.

15. ὁμοιοπαθεῖς.] This is not well rendered by Doddridge and Newcome, 'of like infirmities'; nor by Wakefield, 'of like weaknesses.' Still less to be defended is the version of Pease and Weston, 'subject to death.' The word ὁμοιοπαθής (which is confined to the later writers) is, indeed, too complex a term to be adequately represented by any such special expression. In fact, the ἄνθρωποι is emphatic; q. d. 'We are only men, not Gods.' In this sense the word occurs in James v. 17. From the Classical citations adduced by Wetstein it is plain that ὁμοιοπαθής denotes the being subject to all those accidents which attach to mortality; namely, to the passions and affections, the wants and weaknesses, the liability to disease and death, 'which flēx is heir to'; all involving the very reverse of the idea connected with Deity.

— εὐαγγελιζόμενοι ὑμᾶς ἐπὶ, &c.] Here, it is well remarked by Calvin, we have an argumentum à repugnantibus; q. d. 'Does this miracle make an impression on you? Then yield faith to our words. The chief end of our mission is, that all the false divinities by which the world was heretofore deluded, should be done away with.'

— τούτων τῶν ματαίων.] Many take ματ. in the masculine, and understand it to mean statues of the god, spoken δεικτικῶς, which, they think, is required by the antithetical words ὁ θεὸς ὁ ζῶν. It is better, however, with others, to refer the words to the oxen and garlands; or rather, in a general way, to the rites and ceremonies of idolatry (as in 1 Kings xvi. 2, τοῦ παροργίσαι μετὰ τοῖς ματαίοις αὐτῶν, and Josephus, Ant. x. 4. 1, cited by Wetstein); for as idols are often in Scripture called vanity, or vain things, so too may the rites of idolatry be so called, as being unreal, and in strong contrast with the 'living and true God'; see Note on Matt. xvi. 16.

16. πάντα τὰ ἔθνη.] Not 'all nations' (which would not be agreeable to facts), but 'all the nations,' ἔθνη, the Gentiles. (Pearce and Mark-md.) ἔλασε πορεύεσθαι ταῖς ὁδοῖς α., 'permitted, or gave them up, to follow the course of their own imaginations' respecting the nature and worship of God; and to whom He had not given revelation of his will, either by Divine legates, or by Revelation.

17. οὐκ ἀμάρτυρον ἑαυτὸν ἀφ.] 'Αμάρτυροι signifies 'unwitnessed,' as to existence, nature, attributes, &c. There is here an elegant meiosis;
 in Thucyd. ii. 41, οὐ δὴ τοι ἀμάρτυρόν γε
 ἦν δόναμι παρασχόμενοι.

That God was sufficiently known to the nations, though without Revelation, in respect of his chief attributes, by his works of creation and evidence, is plain from the testimonies of their most celebrated writers. So Cicero, de Nat. D. i. 2 (said by Kuinoel), 'Et fruges, et reliqua quæ terra facit, et tempestates et temporum varietates, aliq̄ue mutationes, quibus omnia quæ terra gignit, maturata pubescunt, à Diis immortalibus lauantur generi humano.' The scope of these words is, as Calvin remarks, to take away all cause for ignorance, by showing them that God did never leave himself and his Divine attributes and perfections without a witness.

— ἀγαθοποιῶν.] Agreeably to the very nature of God, as the giver of all good. So it is said in Synes. 192, α. *ἔπει δὲ οὐν ἀπαξ γέγονε
 ἡ κακὰ, τῆς θεῆας σοφίας καὶ ἀρετῆς καὶ νόμου ἔργον ἵσταν, οὐ μόνον τὸ ἀγαθο-ποιεῖν (φύσις γάρ, ὡς εἰπεῖν, αὐτῇ οὐδ', ὡς τοῦ πυρὸς τὸ θερμαίνειν, καὶ οὐ φωτὸς τὸ φωτίζειν) ἀλλὰ κακῶς ἔλασε τὸ διὰ κακῶς ἐπιστηθέντων πρὸς τοὺς ἀγαθὸν τε καὶ χρηστὸν τέλος ἀποτελεῖν.*

— ἡμῖν.] For this many MSS., Versions, and Fathers have ὑμῖν; and a little after, for ὑμῖν, ὑμῶν. Both these readings are received (Griesb., Knapp, Tittm., Vater, and Scholz; and I could have followed them, notwithstanding the insufficiency of external testimony, had I not respected the readings to be emendations of the Alexandrian school. And though ὑμῖν and ὑμῶν would be more agreeable to strict propriety, yet ὑμῖν and ὑμῶν have more of nature and simplicity. The Apostle speaks, through delicacy, ὑμῶν, q. d. 'you as well as ourselves,' both of us. There is in οὐρανόθεν ὑετούς διδοὺς something almost poetic: and, indeed, οὐρανόθεν is a poetic term. So Aratus, cited by Grotius, ὕδατος ἔρχομένοιο Διὸς ἄρας.

— ὑετούς.] The plural is used with reference to the two periodical rains, called in James v. 7, πρώϊμον καὶ ὄψιμον, and by Philo, p. 390, καιροὺς ὑετίους. The plural is rare; yet Lucian,
 i. 104, has ὑετοὶ τε βροχαιοὶ καὶ βίαιοι, and Maximus Tyrius, in his Diss. xxv., alludes to all these various modes of beneficence in the Deity,
 by calling him τὸν ὥρων ταμίαν, τὸν καρπῶν τροφία, τὸν γενέθλιον, τὸν ὑτίον, τὸν ἐπικαρπίον.

— ἐμπιπλὼν—ἡμῶν.] There is no occasion,
 with Rosenmuller and Kuinoel, to take τὰς καρδίας ἡμῶν as put, by Hebraism, for ἡμᾶς. We have only to suppose a sort of expression expressed by a popular brevity, of which the sense, fully brought out, would be, 'filling our stomachs with food, and our hearts with gladness.' See Calvin.

'The Apostle (observes Dr. Hales) leaves them to draw the conclusion from these premises, that "it must be the height of ingratitude (and impiety) to transfer to the creature the worship
 due only to the Creator.''

19. καὶ πείσαντες—ἔσυρον.] The sense is here obscured by a blending of two sentences into one, and by a peculiar idiom in πειθ., by which it signifies 'to bring any one over to one's own views or wishes.' Thus the full sense is,
 'And having prevailed on the multitude (to permit them to stone Paul), and having stoned him, they drew him out of the city.' Σύρω is a vox solennis de hac re, having reference to the brutal insults offered to the dead bodies of executed malefactors, which were usually dragged by the heels (or by a hook struck into the body), out of the city gates (according to the law which enjoined their removal), and were rarely interred,
 but almost always cast forth as food for the dogs, or birds of prey. This may serve to show the exceedingly miserable state to which the Apostle was reduced; and to this, we may suppose, he alludes at 2 Cor. xi. 23, ἐν θανάτῳ πολλάκις.

— νομίσαντες αὐτὸν τεθνάναι.] There is surely no foundation whatever for the notion of Reichard and Wetstein, that Paul pretended to be dead. He was, no doubt, in a swoon and senseless; and when we consider that he had been stoned at least almost to death, we shall see that his being enabled to walk home, and the next day to set out for Derbe, can be regarded in no other light than something preternatural. See Calvin.

22. παρακαλοῦντες.] Render, 'by exhorting them.' See Note supra v. 3. In καὶ ὅτι διὰ, &c., there is an idiom, by which another word of cognate signification is to be supplied from one which has preceded; here λίσσονται from παρακαλοῦντες, as in Joseph. Ant. v. 1. 18, and other passages cited by the Commentators. In διὰ πολλῶν—Θεοῦ there is a general declaration intended for every age, showing that the working out of our salvation is not to be accomplished without numerous trials and tribulations. Comp. 1 Thess. iii. 4. Similarly we read in a Rabbinical writer, cited by Wetstein (Vajikra R.), 'Dixit David ad Deum S. B. Quenam est porta ad vitam futuri seculi? ex mente R. Jodan Deus Davidi respondit: Si debes in vitam ingredi, debes etiam afflictiones tolerare S. D.'

23. χειροτονήσαντες a.] Some (as Erasmus, Calvin, and Beza, and, more latterly, Knatchbull, Raphael, Doddridge, and, indeed, all Presbyterian Commentators) take the sense to be, 'having ordained their elders by the votes of the people. Others, however, consisting of the most eminent Interpreters, are agreed that χειροτονήσαντες here simply means, 'having selected, constituted, appointed.'

—κατ' ἐκκλησίαν.] Meaning, in the several churches they had founded; κατὰ here having the same sense as at Matt. xxiv. 7, κατὰ τόπους, and often in the present book.

—προσευξάμενοι μετὰ νηστ.] Meaning, 'after using prayer with fasting;' see Note supra xiii. 3.

—παρέθεντο αὐ. τῷ Κ.] 'committed them to the Divine protection;' as it is said infra xx. 32, παρατίθεμαι ὑμᾶς τῷ Θεῷ, καὶ τῷ λόγῳ τῆς χάριτος αὐτοῦ. Compare also 1 Pet. iv. 19.

26. ὅθεν ἦσαν παραδ.] Παραδ. is here synonymous with παρατίθεσθαι supra ver. 23. With the word ὅθεν Commentators have been not a little perplexed. Nay, even those mighty Grecians, Hemsterhusius and Valcknaer, thought the difficulty so great as to warrant critical conjecture. They would read ὅθεν ᾤσαν, 'whence they had gone.' To this, however, the MSS. afford no countenance: the Greek is questionable;

and the form is not in use in the New Test. The common reading must, then, be retained. And the difficulty which it involves may be best obviated by supposing a significatio pragmatum, arising from a blending of two expressions; q. d. 'whence they had been recommended, and from whence they had gone commended to the favour and protection of God.' Ἐπλήρωσαν, 'had fulfilled, or performed.'

27. μετ' αὐτῶν.] It has been disputed whether the sense be, 'by their means' (i. e. their instrumentality), or, 'to them,' μετ' αὐτῶν standing for αὐτοῖς. The latter mode of interpretation has been adopted by many eminent Expositors, and is supported by several passages of the Old Test.; but the former is far more agreeable to the following context, and is also confirmed by two passages further on, xxi. 12, ἐξηγείτο καθ' ἑκάστου ὡς ἐποίησεν ὁ Θεὸς ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι διὰ τῆς διακονίας αὐτοῦ, and xi. 12, ἐξηγουμένων ὅσα ἐποίησεν ὁ Θεὸς σήμας καὶ τέρατα ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι δι' αὐτῶν.

—θύραν πίστews.] Θύρα here metaphorically signifies promulgation, access, or opportunity for the spread of the Gospel.

28. ἐκεῖ.] This, not found in twelve MSS., and the Vulg., Arm., and Æthiop. Versions, has been cancelled by Griesbach and Schoth; but without sufficient reason. In a few MSS. a word so little essential might easily be omitted; which is far more probable, than that it should have been introduced from the margin into all the rest.

XV. In this Chapter we have recorded the dispute arising in the infant Church concerning circumcision, and the other observances of the Mosaic law, and the Apostle's counsel and decree in the matter; also the subsequent disagreement and consequently separation of Paul and Barnabas.

1. τινες.] These are supposed to have been Antiochians and Jewish converts, who had formerly been Pharisees (see ver. 5), and still retained an attachment to the forms of the Mosaic law. At εἰδασκον τοὺς ἀδελφούς must be understood λέγοντες; see Note supra xiv. 22.

—περιτέμνησθε.] Here, as in Joseph. Ant. xii. 2. 6 (cited by Wetstein), circumcise stands for the whole of the ritual law of Moses,

as being the principal ceremony, binding the person who underwent it to the observance of the rest. Τῷ ἰθαί Μ., 'conformably to the institution of Moses.'

2. στάσεις.] Notwithstanding what Bp. Pearce objects, there is no reason why στάσεις should not be rendered dissension, as at xxiii. 10, of which sense two or three examples have been adduced, yet only of the verb. Of the noun I have noticed one, in Æschyl. Pers. 744, Blomf. Ἀόγοι κρατὶ σαφηνῆς, τῷ δὲ γ' οὐκ ἔστι στάσις. — συζητήσεως 'mutual discussion,' or controversy. This seems meant to explain and qualify στάσεις. For συζ. Wetstein, Matthæi, Knapp, Gricbach, Vater, and Scholz edit ζητήσεως, from several MSS. and some Versions, and the Ed. Princ. But nothing is more common than for compounds to be changed by the scribes into simples. Besides ζητ. would here be a term not strong enough, and συζητ. seems required; which occurs at ver. 7, whence the Editors in question imagine the present reading to have been introduced. Ἐταξαν, scil. οἱ ἀδελφοί, the brethren at large, not the Presbyteri ecclesie, as Hammond supposes.

3. οἱ μὲν οὖν.] The article is here put for the pronoun demonstrative ('accordingly they, being,' &c.); an idiom, indeed, almost peculiar to the old writers, especially the poets, but which was likely to continue in use, in the common dialect, long after the time when it became obsolete in the language of books. That such is the force of the article, appears by the context. Otherwise the sense would be, 'And the persons conducted on their way,' &c.; which would be little to the purpose. I have pointed accordingly.

— προπαραβθέντες ['honourific deducti, set forward on their way,' a mark of respect usually rendered to eminent persons among the ancients; and always shown to Apostles, and of which we have mention further on in this book and in the Epistles. Ἐπιστροφὴν, 'conversion.' Formed on the use of ἐπιστρέφειν, as at xi. 21. xiv. 15. Ἐποίουν χαρὰν μεγάλην, 'occasioned great joy.' So Aristid. cited by Wetstein, ὁ δὲ Θεὸς ἐποίησεν ἡμῖν χαρὰν ἐνερμεγμένην.

4. ἀπεδέχθησαν ['were received with distinction,' as xviii. 27.

5. ἔξανέστησαν δὲ τινες—λέγοντες.] These words are so manifestly the words of St. Luke, that plain readers would be surprised to learn that any other opinion had ever been formed. And yet many eminent Commentators, stumbling at what they think the harshness of the answer being given before the question had been propounded, suppose the words to be those of the Jewish party at Antioch, reported by Paul and Barnabas. But although a transition from the oblique to the direct is occasionally found (as in i. 4. xvii. 7, and Luke v. 14), yet here it would be peculiarly harsh; and the ellipsis of ἔλεγον, which they propose, is inadmissible. Besides, ἔξανέστησαν would not be a suitable term. In fact, the difficulty is imaginary; for as the words ἀνῆλθον—αὐτῶν plainly import that 'they gave an account of what had happened to them in the exercise of their mission,' so the difficulty which brought them there could not fail to be mentioned; see Kuin., who refers to a similar brevity at Acts xi. 3. Thus all difficulty vanishes, and ἔξανέστησαν has peculiar propriety; q. d. 'then there started up,' not 'rose up,' as in most versions. The word is often used in Thucyd., Xenoph., and the best writers, in the sense to start forth from ambush, or suddenly. The Judaizing party, on hearing the matter first propounded, suddenly and hastily started up, saying that it was proper to, &c. This opinion, it is plain, was given, not at a public assembly, called for the purpose of considering the matter in question, but probably at a private meeting to receive them on their return. The assembly denoted by συνήχθησαν was plainly another, called for the purpose of deciding on the question after due deliberation.

— πεπιστευκότες.] We have here a participle for substantive, to be taken after τινες, as serving to determine the sense. The words ἐτι δα—Μωϋσέως are by many supposed to be not in oratione directa, but indirecta.

6. συνήχθησαν δὲ οἱ δώδε.] Thus was assembled what is called the First Council at Jerusalem, to counteract the baneful heresy which had περὶ τοῦ λόγου τούτου. ὁ Πολλῆς δὲ συζητήσεως γενομένης, ἡ ἀναστάς Πέτρος εἶπε πρὸς αὐτούς· Ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί, ὑμεῖς ἐπίστασθε, ὅτι ἀφ' ἡμερῶν ἀρχαίων ὁ Θεὸς ἐν ἡμῖν ἐξελέξατο διὰ τοῦ στόματός μου ἀκοῦσαι τὰ ἔθνη τὸν λόγον τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, καὶ πιστεῦσαι. Καὶ ὁ καρδιογνώστης Θεὸς ἐμαρτύρησεν αὐτοῖς, δούς αὐτοῖς τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, καθὼς καὶ ἡμῖν· καὶ οὐδὲν δέκρινε μεταξύ ἡμῶν τε καὶ αὐτῶν, τῇ πίστει καθάρισας τὰς καρδίας αὐτῶν. sprung up from the bitter root of Pharisaism, and disturbed the harmony and concord of the infant Church. On the time of this council, see Towns, ii. 177—179; and on its nature, Vitringe, de Syn. p. 598, sqq. On the circumstances which led to it, and the rise and progress of the heresy it was meant to counteract, consult Dr. Hales, iii. 513, sq.

6. ἰδοὺ περὶ.] This, by an idiom found in Hebrew, Greek, and English, signifies, 'to consider about.'

— περὶ τοῦ λόγου] 'concerning the matter spoken of,' which involved two questions; 1. Whether the Gentiles should be circumcised; 2. Whether they should observe the customs of the Mosaic law. The former was answered decidedly in the negative; the latter partly in the affirmative. The συζητήσεως, just after, must be understood of disputation between the Apostles and presbyters, and those persons who had at the former private meeting given their opinion so positively.

7, seqq. St. Peter argues, that God, by pouring out his Spirit on the uncircumcised Gentiles, as he had done upon the circumcised Jews, had plainly demonstrated that he made no discrimination between them and the Jews, in the distribution of the Gospel privileges; and that legal purification, which seemed wanting to them on account of their non-circumcision, he had abundantly supplied in purifying their hearts by faith. After this proof, therefore, that God did not require from them the Mosaic observances, it was nothing less than tempting God, and setting aside his counsels, to impose the yoke upon them. (Whitby.)

7. ἀφ' ἡμερῶν ἀρχῆς.] Some take this to mean, à principio, 'from the beginning of the Gospel.' Yet the purpose in question was not made known till the conversion of Cornelius; for to that the words διὰ τοῦ στόματος μου plainly allude. And the expression will appear to be not inapplicable to the period in question (thirteen or fourteen years before), if we consider that ἀρχαῖος is often used simply of what has happened heretofore, whether many ages, or only a few years before; of which abundant examples have been adduced.

In the words ἐν ἡμῖν ἐξελέξατο many recognise a Hebraism; וְעַל in Hebrew taking after it עַל. And thus it will be equivalent to ἡμῶς ἐξελ. That mode of solution, however, is precarious; and this occurrence of ἡμῖν καὶ μου in the same clause would be harsh. As to ἐν ἡμῖν, it is, after all, best rendered in our common version (confirmed by the Syr. and De Dieu), 'amongst us.' Then ἐμὴ may be supplied (as in the Syr. Version), which is suppressed through delicacy, to avoid egotism, as in very many passages which I could adduce from Thucyd.

8. καρδιογνώστης.] See Note on i. 24. By this the Apostle intimates, that God can best determine who are worthy of being admitted as Christians, and who not; as also on the rites and ceremonies to be enjoined on them.

— ἐμαρτύρησεν αὐτοῖς.] The sense seems to be, 'hath borne testimony in their favour,' 'hath testified his approbation,' namely, by giving them the Holy Spirit; for μαρτυρίᾳ with a Dative always implies, favourable testimony.

9. οὐδὲν δέκρινε.] 'made no distinction between us,' as to the benefit and gratuitous favour to be bestowed on believers. A remarkable idiom, of which the Commentators adduce no specimen example. The following, however, which I have noted, will supply the deficiency. Thucyd. i. 43. 7, δικαίκριτο οὐδὲν ἑταί. Diod. Sinop. ap. Athen. p. 239, οὐχὶ διακρίνας τὴν πενιχρὰν ἢ πλουσίαν. By ταὶ καρδίας are denoted, not their minds, but their hearts, souls, and consciences: these were sanctified by the Holy Spirit, and purified by the great truths of the Gospel.

— τῇ πίστει καθάρισας τὰς κ. α.] This clause answers to the foregoing epithet applied to God; as much as to say, that 'God, who knoweth all hearts, inwardly purified the Gentiles when he vouchsafed to adopt them, that they might be spiritually purified;' but he adds, moreover, that this purity is by faith. (Calvin.)

10. Here we have the second part of the speech; in which the Apostle shows how pernicious is the doctrine that the enemies of Paul would introduce; a doctrine such as would take away all hope from the pious. From the preceding clause, indeed, he infers and collects that God is tempted, if the Gentiles be compelled to observe the Law; but besides this he goes to the very reason of the thing. So far he has argued, that the Gentiles are wronged, by requiring of them more than God requires; and since he has bestowed on them the privilege of adoption, it were absurd to suppose they should still be rejected, and the goodness of God limited; in short, it is sufficient that they have faith, though ceremonies they have none. Now, however, he proceeds to show, that those who tie down men's salvation to the works of the Law, leave them nothing to hope; nay, indeed, the whole world is delivered up to destruction the most fearful, if it can attain salvation no otherwise than by observing the Law. (Calvin.)

— τί πειράζετε τὸν Θεόν.] Meaning, 'Why try ye the forbearance of God, by pertinaciously resisting his will?' So 1 Cor. x. 9, καθὼς καὶ τινες αὐτῶν ἐπειράσαντο. Heb. iii. 9, and often in the Old Test., as Exod. xvii. 2. 7. The argument being, that 'it is plainly the will of God that these persons should be received as Christians without such rites; that he has, in fact, already accepted them. Hence to attempt to impose rites which have been pleased to abolish, would be 'resisting his will;' which were as criminal as vain; see h. ix. 19.

11. ἀλλὰ διὰ τῆς χάριτος—κἀκεῖνοι.] It is here disputed to whom these words respectively allude. Some refer the ἡμεῖς contained in πεποιήσεν to the Apostles Peter and James; others, to Peter only. Again, κἀκεῖνοι some refer to the οἱ πατέρες at ver. 10; and others, to Paul and Barnabas. But it is, I think, plain that the words we and those, which are antithetical, must denote no other than the same persons with the αὐτοῖς (namely, the Gentiles) and ἡμῖν, similarly antithetical, at ver. 8; also the ἡμῶν and ὅτων at ver. 9, namely, the Jewish and the Gentile converts. At κἀκεῖνοι the true grammatical ellipsis would be πιστεύουσι. Though, indeed, among the other peculiarities of the Hellenistic style is that of anomalous ellipsis; as here ἡ σωθήσονται. Finally, the ἀλλὰ is adversative (answering an objection), and signifies inasmuch as, as in 2 Cor. vii. 11. Thus we may render: 'Yes, by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ alone do we trust we shall be saved; in which same way they too are alone to be saved;' comp. Gal. ii. 15, 16, and Rom. iii. 30. The inference is obvious, and therefore left to be supplied,—that a thing so unimportant to salvation, as the observation of the ceremonies of the Mosaic law, ought not to be exacted from the Gentile converts.

12. πλῆθος.] Not multitude, but assembly as Luke xxiii. 1, and elsewhere), consisting of persons convened for the special purpose of considering this question.

—ἐξηγουμένων] 'while recounting.' Namely, for the purpose of establishing the facts on which the validity of the Apostle's reasoning rested. The argument being, that 'as God had approved their work, by causing miracles to be worked by them, so what they had done in this matter had his entire approbation.'

13. ἀπεκρίθη] 'addressed the assembly.'

—ἀνδρες ἀδελφοί, &c.] The Apostle, after affirming what was just said by Peter, as to his calling of the Gentiles,—well aware that, in addressing Jews, it was always of great importance to ascertain whether any thing, which purporting to be the will of God, was in accordance with the predictions of Holy Writ,—further shows, yet however contrary to the prejudices of many

among them, yet that it was agreeable to the predictions of the Prophets,—instancing a remarkable one of Amos ix. 11, 12.

14. καθὼς] for ὡς, ὡς. Πρῶτον. Render, not, 'at the first' (for that would mean, at the beginning of the Gospel), but first. In ἐπεσκέψατο λαβεῖν, &c., we have a blending of two clauses into one, for ἐπισκ. τὰ ἔθνη (ὡς τε) λαβεῖν ἐξ αὐτῶν λαὸν i. e. τ. ὁ. α. On ἐπισκ., see Note on Luke i. 68. Ἐπὶ τῷ ὀν. α., 'in order to bear his name, and be called his peculiar people, by professing his religion.'

16, 17. This quotation varies from the Hebrew and the Sept. in the following unimportant particulars. For ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ there, we have here, to make the sense more plain, μετὰ ταῦτα. Ἀναστρέψω, too, though without having any thing corresponding to it in the Hebrew, is here, for the same reason, supplied. The next clause is compressed, by blending the two parts of the parallelism into one. Again, the words καθὼς αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ αἰῶνος, found in the Sept. Version, are here omitted; and with reason; since they make no sense. There is doubtless (though the Translators failed to perceive it) an ellipsis of καὶ at καὶ, i. e. between καὶ and καὶ, though καὶ καὶ (occurring in Mich. vii. 14, and Is. lxiii. 9) may have been considered as a sort of adverb. Finally, the words τὸν Κύριον are not found in the LXX., at least in the Vatican text. But in the Alexandrian text the words are supplied, and have been adopted by Abp. Newcome, as representing the true reading of the Hebrew text. Again, answering to καὶ ἐξ ἡθρῶν αὐτῶν ἀνθρώπων is καὶ ἐξ ἡθρῶν αὐτῶν ἡθρῶν, 'that they may possess the residue of Edom.' Yet that makes such bad sense, that the words would seem to be corrupt. And this suspicion is countenanced by the remarkable variety of readings; none of which, however, give any aid. The corruption seems to be anterior to the Masoretic recension, and may best be emended by reading (with Lightfoot) for καὶ, καὶ, and for καὶ, καὶ, which will thus agree with the words of the Apostle; the sense being, that 'after the return of the Jews, and their subsequent prosperity, they would extend the knowledge and benefits of their religion to other nations, even mankind at large; so that the Gentiles might be admitted to the privileges of the children of God.' At any rate, the Apostle follows the Sept., where, doubtless, τὸν Κύριον then existed.

περὶ τοῦ λόγου τούτου. ^d Πολλῆς δὲ συζητήσεως γενομένης, ⁷ ἀναστὰς Πέτρος εἶπε πρὸς αὐτούς· Ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί, ὑμεῖς ἐπίστασθε, ὅτι ἀφ' ἡμερῶν ἀρχαίων ὁ Θεὸς ἐν ἡμῖν ἐξελέξατο διὰ τοῦ στόματός μου ἀκούσαι τὰ ἔθνη τὸν λόγον τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, καὶ πιστεῦσαι. ^e Καὶ ὁ καρδιογνώστης Θεὸς ἡμάρ- ⁸ τήρῃσεν αὐτοῖς, δὸς αὐτοῖς τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, καθὼς καὶ ἡμῖν· ^f καὶ οὐδὲν διέκρινε μεταξὺ ἡμῶν τε καὶ αὐτῶν, τῇ ⁹ πίστει καθάρισας τὰς καρδίας αὐτῶν. sprung up from the bitter root of Pharisaism, and disturbed the harmony and concord of the infant Church. On the time of this council, see Towns. ii. 177—179; and on its nature, Vitring. de Syn. p. 598, sqq. On the circumstances which led to it, and the rise and progress of the heresy it was meant to counteract, consult Dr. Hales, iii. 513, sq.

6. ἰδοὺν περὶ.] This, by an idiom found in Hebrew, Greek, and English, signifies, 'to consider about.'

— περὶ τοῦ λόγου] 'concerning the matter spoken of,' which involved two questions; 1. Whether the Gentiles should be circumcised; 2. Whether they should observe the customs of the Mosaic law. The former was answered decidedly in the negative; the latter partly in the affirmative. The συζητήσεως, just after, must be understood of disputation between the Apostles and presbyters, and those persons who had at the former private meeting given their opinion so positively.

7. εἰπών. St. Peter argues, that God, by pouring out his Spirit on the uncircumcised Gentiles, as he had done upon the circumcised Jews, had plainly demonstrated that he made no discrimination between them and the Jews, in the distribution of the Gospel privileges; and that legal purification, which seemed wanting to them on account of their non-circumcision, he had abundantly supplied in purifying their hearts by faith. After this proof, therefore, that God did not require from them the Mosaic observances, it was nothing less than tempting God, and setting aside his counsels, to impose the yoke upon them. (Whitby.)

7. ἀφ' ἡμερῶν ἀρχ.] Some take this to mean, à principio, 'from the beginning of the Gospel.' Yet the purpose in question was not made known till the conversion of Cornelius; for to that the words διὰ τοῦ στόματός μου plainly allude. And the expression will appear to be not inapplicable to the period in question (thirteen or fourteen years before), if we consider that ἀρχαίων is often used simply of what has happened heretofore, whether many ages, or only a few years before; of which abundant examples have been adduced.

In the words ἐν ἡμῖν ἐξελέξατο many recognise a Hebraism; וְעַל in Hebrew taking after it אֵין. And thus it will be equivalent to ἡμῶς ἐξελ. That mode of solution, however, is precarious; and this occurrence of ἡμῖν and μου in the same clause would be harsh. As to ἐν ἡμῖν, it is, after all, best rendered in our common version (confirmed by the Syr. and De Dieu), 'amongst us.' Then ἡμῖν may be supplied (as in the Syr. Version), which is suppressed through delicacy, to avoid egotism, as in very many passages which I could adduce from Thucyd.

8. καρδιογνώστης.] See Note on i. 24. By this the Apostle intimates, that God can best determine who are worthy of being admitted as Christians, and who not; as also on the rites and ceremonies to be enjoined on them.

— ἡμαρτήρῃσεν αὐτοῖς.] The sense seems to be, 'hath borne testimony in their favour,' 'hath testified his approbation,' namely, by giving them the Holy Spirit; for μαρτυρίᾳ with a Dative always implies, favourable testimony.

9. οὐδὲν διέκρινε.] 'made no distinction between us,' as to the benefit and gratuitous favour to be bestowed on believers. A remarkable idiom, of which the Commentators adduce no analogous example. The following, however, which I have noted, will supply the deficiency. Thucyd. i. 48. 7, διέκριντο οὐδὲν ἑτι. Diod. Sinop. ap. Athen. p. 239, οὐχὶ διακρίνας τὴν πενιχρὰν ἢ πλουσίαν. By τὰς καρδίας are denoted, not their minds, but their hearts, souls, and consciences: these were sanctified by the Holy Spirit, and purified by the great truths of the Gospel.

— τῇ πίστει καθάρισας τὰς κ. α.] This clause answers to the foregoing epithet applied to God; as much as to say, that 'God, who knoweth all hearts, inwardly purified the Gentiles when he vouchsafed to adopt them, that they might be spiritually purified;' but he adds, moreover, that this purity is by faith. (Calvin.)

10. Here we have the second part of the speech; in which the Apostle shows how pernicious is the doctrine that the enemies of Paul would introduce; a doctrine such as would take away all hope from the pious. From the preceding clause, indeed, he infers and collects that God is tempted, if the Gentiles be compelled to observe the Law; but besides this he goes to the very reason of the thing. So far he has argued, that the Gentiles are wronged, by requiring of them more than God requires; and since he has bestowed on them the privilege of adoption, it were absurd to suppose they should still be rejected, and the goodness of God limited; in short, it is sufficient that they have faith, though ceremonies they have none. Now, however, he proceeds to show, that those who tie down men's salvation to the works of the Law, leave them nothing to hope; nay, indeed, the whole world is delivered up to destruction the most fearful, if it can attain salvation no otherwise than by observing the Law. (Calvin.)

— τί πειράζετε τὸν Θεόν.] Meaning, 'Why try ye the forbearance of God, by pertinaciously resisting his will?' So 1 Cor. x. 9, καθὼς καὶ τινες αὐτῶν ἐπειράσαντο. Heb. iii. 9, and often in the Old Test., as Exod. xvii. 2. 7. The argument being, that 'it is plainly the will of God that these persons should be received as Christians without such rites; that he has, in fact, already accepted them. Hence to attempt to impose rites he hath been pleased to abolish, would be 'resisting his will;' which were as criminal as vain; see Rom. ix. 19.

11. ἄλλα διὰ τῆς χάριτος—κακεῖνοι.] It has been disputed to whom these words respectively allude. Some refer the ἡμεῖς contained in πιστεύομεν to the Apostles Peter and James; others, to Peter only. Again, κακεῖνοι some refer to the οἱ πατέρες at ver. 10; and others, to Paul and Barnabas. But it is, I think, plain that the words we and those, which are antithetical, must denote no other than the same persons with the αἰσίοις (namely, the Gentiles) and ἡμεῖν, similarly antithetical, at ver. 8; also the ἡμῶν and αὐτῶν at ver. 9, namely, the Jewish and the Gentile convert. At κακεῖνοι the true grammatical ellipsis would be πιστεύουσι. Though indeed, among the other peculiarities of the Hellenistic style is that of anomalous ellipsis; as here of εὐθεῖσθαι. Finally, the ἄλλα is adversative (answering an objection), and signifies indeed, nay, yea, as in 2 Cor. vii. 11. Thus we may render: 'Yea, by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ alone do we trust we shall be saved; in which same way they too are alone to be saved'; comp. Gal. ii. 15, 16, and Rom. iii. 30. The inference is obvious, and therefore left to be supplied,—that a thing so unimportant to salvation, as the observation of the ceremonies of the Mosaic Law, ought not to be exacted from the Gentile converts.

12. πληθον.) Not multitude, but assembly (as Luke xxiii. 1, and elsewhere), consisting of persons convened for the special purpose of considering this question.

— [ἐξηγουμένῳ] 'while recounting.' Namely, for the purpose of establishing the facts on which the validity of the Apostle's reasoning rested. The argument being, that 'as God had approved their work, by causing miracles to be worked by them, so what they had done in this matter had his entire approbation.'

13. ἀπεκρίθη 'addressed the assembly.'

— ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί, &c.] The Apostle, after confirming what was just said by Peter, as to the calling of the Gentiles,—well aware that, in addressing Jews, it was always of great importance to ascertain whether any thing, which purported to be the will of God, was in accordance with the predictions of Holy Writ,—further shows, that however contrary to the prejudices of many

14. καθὼς] for ὥς, hōtōs. Πρῶτον. Render, not, 'at the first' (for that would mean, at the beginning of the Gospel), but first. In ἐπισκεψάτο λαβὴν, &c., we have a blending of two clauses into one, for ἐπισκεπ. τὰ ἰδύνη (ἔσται) λαβὴν ἔξ αὐτῆς λαὸν ἑ. τ. ὁ. α. In ἐπισκεπ., see Note on Luke i. 68. Ἐπὶ τῷ ὄν. α., 'in order to bear his name, and be called his peculiar people, by professing his religion.'

16, 17. This quotation varies from the Hebrew and the Sept. in the following unimportant particulars. For ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ there, we have here, to make the sense more plain, μετὰ ταῦτα. Ἀναστήσεις, too, though without having anything corresponding to it in the Hebrew, is here, for the same reason, supplied. The next clause is compressed, by blending the two parts of the parallelism into one. Again, the words καθὼς αἶμα ἡμερᾶ τοῦ αἰῶνος, found in the Sept. Version, are here omitted; and with reason; since they make no sense. There is doubtless (though the Translators failed to perceive it) an ellipsis of ב at כִּי, i. e. between ב and וי, though מָלַךְ may be considered as a sort of adverb. Finally, the words רֹדֵן כְּפֻרִים are not found in the LXX., at least in the Vatican text. But in the Alexandrian text the words are supplied, and have been adopted by Abp. Newcome, as representing the true reading of the Hebrew text. Again, answering to שָׁמַע אֱבֹתָא אֲנִי עֲלֵיהֶם אֲנִי אֲחִירָשׁוֹן—ἀνδρώπων—is הָיוּ חַיִּים יְהוּדָא מִן יוֹסֵף תַּקְוָה, ‘that they may possess the residue of Edom.’ Yet that makes such bad sense, that the words would seem to be corrupt. And this suspicion is countenanced by the remarkable variety of readings; none of which, however, give any aid. The corruption seems to be anterior to the Masoretic recension, and may best be emended by reading (with Lightfoot) for יוֹסֵף, דָּוִד, and for הָיוּ, הָיוּ, which will thus agree with the words of the Apostle; the sense being, that ‘after the return of the Jews, and their subsequent prosperity, they would extend the knowledge and benefits of their religion to other nations, even mankind at large; so that the Gentiles might be admitted to the privileges of the children of God.’ At any rate, the Apostle follows the Sept., where, doubtless, רֹדֵן כְּפֻרִים then existed.

That the Apostle has not (what some would have us suppose) merely accommodated the above passage to the present subject, but that he recognised such to be the intent of the prophecy, is plain from the very purpose for which he adduced it; it being his principal intent to show that, according to the Prophets, especially in this remarkable passage, it was contemplated that the Gentiles should be introduced to the privileges of the children of God. And that the Prophet did so mean it, we cannot for a moment doubt.

16. σκηνήν.] The word properly signifies a booth or hut, but sometimes denoted a permanent house, and figuratively a family; and, when applied to a royal family, its reign or kingdom. Κατεσκάπτω was often used of the utter destruction of houses or cities. So Ælian, V. H. xii. 54. τὴν πατρίδα κατέκτισε, κατεσκαμμένην ὑπὸ Φιλίππου.

17. ἐκζητ. τὸν Κύριον.] This phrase here and at Rom. iii. 11. Heb. xi. 6, signifies, by an imitation of the Heb. שָׁרָה or שָׁרָה שָׁרָה, 'to earnestly seek,' for the purpose of fervently praying to and serving him. Οἱ κατὰλοιποι τῶν ἀνθρώπων is explained by τὰ ἔθνη in the next clause.

— καὶ πάντα τὰ ἔθνη.] Kai has here the sense even. Πάντα, not found in many ancient MSS. and some Versions and Fathers (confirmed by the Hebrew text), has been cancelled by Griesbach and Scholz. In ἐπ' αὐτοῖς we have a Hebrew pleonasm.

18. γνωστὰ ἀπ' αἰῶνος, &c.] The purpose of these words is, as Calvin shows, to anticipate the objection (which to many seems fatal), that the thing was a mere novelty. The Apostle contends that it was not new to God, though it might seem sudden to man; that God, who sees every thing future, and knows what he will accomplish, had foretold, by his prophets, the foundation of a spiritual kingdom, into which both Jews and Gentiles should be received. It therefore formed part of his eternal plan; consequently immutable, and by man irresistible, Rom. ix. 19. A passage very similar in sentiment is here adduced by Wetstein from Seneca de Benef. iv. 32. 'Nota est illis operis sui series; omnium illis rerum per manus suas iturum scientia in aperto semper est, nobis ex abdito subit; et, quam repentina putamus, illis prævixa veniunt et familiaria.'

In the words preceding, ὁ ποιῶν ταῦτα πάντα, it is intimated, that the things in question will also be done by him.

19. ἐγὼ κρίνω.] Meaning, 'My judgment or decided opinion [on the matter] is.' So Thucyd. iv. 60, ὡς ἐγὼ κρίνω. Μὴ παρενοχλεῖν means, 'to give them no further molestation, than the observance only of the following necessary particulars.' This seems to be a popular form of expression. Commentators adduce as an example Arrian, Epict. i. 9, Μὴδὲ παρενοχλεῖτε τοῖς νόμοις, μηδὲ τοῖς γέρονσι. The word is not unfrequent in the later Classical writers and the Sept.

20. ἐπιστεῖλαι αὐτοῖς] 'to give them directions,' as Acts xxi. 25. At τὸν ἀπέχσθαι the Genitive is dependent on ἐν ἵνα understood, equivalent to ἵνα ἀπέχωνται. But to advert to the particulars of the prohibition, τῶν ἀλισγημάτων, &c.; the term ἀλισγημα is Hellenistic, and derived from ἀλίσσω, to pollute. Both it and the noun are used alike of physical and moral defilement, especially that of idolatry, as the greatest; see Dan. i. 8. Ecclus. xl. 29. Mal. i. 7. 12, where the subject is meat offered to idols. Here, however, in order to determine the sense, the words τῶν εἰδώλων are added. Now, though the word might denote any participation in idolatry, yet the passages of Daniel and Malachi (which were probably in the mind of the Apostle), as well as the ancient glosses of Hesych. and Suid. (formed from the early Scholiasts, and then from the Fathers), determine it to be the eating of meat offered to idols, not merely in the temples, but even the purchasing of it for use, when it was taken for sale into the public market. For we learn from the passages cited by the Commentators, that among the Gentiles, after a victim had been sacrificed in the temple, and a portion had been given to the Priests, and sometimes another eaten by the offerer and his friends on the spot, the residue was often taken home by the priests for domestic use, and sometimes was sent to the public shambles to be sold. The flesh, however, was, of course, held in abomination by the Jews (see 1 Cor. x. 20); and therefore the use of it was very properly forbidden, in order that no needless offence might be given to the Jewish Christians.

— καὶ τῇ πορνείᾳ.] It has been thought strange that this should be inserted among things of themselves lawful, but from which the Gentiles were to abstain, lest they should offend the Jewish Christians; fornication having never been accounted as a thing permitted; and so none would appear why, if greater offences are now

ἐκ γενεῶν ἀρχαίων κατὰ πόλιν τοὺς κηρύσσοντας αὐτὸν ἔχει, ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς κατὰ πᾶν σάββατον ἀναγινωσκόμενος.

tioned with smaller ones, this alone should be selected, which, it has been thought, would go far to put the things mentioned in this list on a level. To remove this difficulty many methods have been devised; some proceeding on critical conjecture (thus Bentley proposed to read χοιρῶν, pork); while others seek to remove the difficulty by supposing some unusual sense of the word; some understanding it of spiritual whoredom, viz. idolatry; others, marriage with idolaters; others, again, of marriage within the prohibited degrees. All which are alike open to insuperable objections, and especially to this, that no recondite or uncommon sense could be intended; since in public edicts words are supposed to be employed in their usual sense. And here there is no sufficient reason to abandon the common rendering, fornication; which has been well defended by Grotius, Wetstein, Valcknaer, Schoettgen, Pearce, Nitzsch, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, Scott, Wahl, and Bp. Marsh; who satisfactorily removes the objections to the word being taken in its ordinary sense, showing that there are other instances to be found of moral and positive precepts, duties of common and perpetual obligation, mingled with local and temporary ones, in the same list; as in the Decalogue. And since (continues he) it appears from the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of Paul, that the precepts of the Pentateuch were abrogated only by degrees, it seems by no means extraordinary that the Decree of the Council in Jerusalem should contain a mixture of moral and positive commands. I would add, that it is not unimportant, in this view, to remark, that in the words of the decision actually sent (ver. 29), we find the two kept separate, proprie being put apart from the rest, and placed last. As to the objection founded on fornication being never thought indifferent, it might not in theory, or philosophical speculation, but was so considered in practice. No one who is at all acquainted with the Classical writers can doubt, that simple fornication was, by the Heathens, considered as no crime at all. We find that even their religion permitted, nay, encouraged, licensed fornication. Hence the recommendation of chastity of this kind (for that contained in abstaining from adultery could not need enforcing) was highly necessary; the main purpose (as Grotius observes) of this list being to specify from what practices, besides known and flagrant sins, the Gentile Christians ought to abstain, in order to coalesce with the Jewish Christians without offence. And there was the more occasion to give the injunction, since, for many reasons (which are detailed in Recens. Synop.), fornication and idolatry were, in the minds of the Jews, inseparably connected; compare 1 Cor. x. 7, 8. v. 11. Eph. v. 5. Col. iii. 5. Rev. ii. 14, 20, and especially Exod. xxxiv. 24—26.

— τοῦ πνικτοῦ scil. κρέατος (supplied in Athen. l. ix.), meaning flesh of animals killed by strangling, which was very prevalent among the ancients, both Greeks and Romans, and also Orientals. They used to enclose the carcase of the animal (so killed that the blood should remain in it) in an oven, or a deep stewing vessel, and thus scethe it in its own vapour or steam. As to the blood,—the heathens, when butchering an animal, carefully preserved this, and mixing it up with flour and unguents, formed various sorts of dishes. Now as both the foregoing sorts of food were strictly forbidden by the Mosaic Law, especially the latter, (the Jews being enjoined to consider the blood as the seat and principle of life, and therefore not to eat of it, but offer it in sacrifice to God,) there was ample reason to forbid them to the Gentile Christians, in order to avoid the giving offence to their Jewish brethren. That an injunction so local in its nature, and of such temporary obligation, cannot be binding on Christians of these times, and must cease with the circumstances which gave occasion to it, has been convincingly shown by Schoettgen, Doddridge, and others.

21. Here (as at v. 18) there has seemed to many such an abruptness of transition, and want of connexion between this subject and the preceding, that they have supposed something to have been lost out of the text. But for this there is not the slightest foundation, either in external evidence or internal probability. Here, as often in sentences commencing with γάρ, there are some words to which that particle may be referred, left to be supplied from the context and subject-matter; which may, on the present occasion, be done as follows: 'And remember, the violation of these will occasion not only private, but public scandal; for the Mosaic religion has from remote antiquity had its professors in every city, and its Scriptures publicly read in the synagogues every sabbath day,—in which these things are strictly forbidden.' Thus the γάρ is intended to give a reason why the foregoing 'necessary things,' as they are called at v. 28, are required of them.

22. ἔδοξε τοῖς ἀποστόλοις—πέμψαι.] The syntax in ἐκλεξαμένους is generally thought not agreeable to the propriety of language; and γράψαντες deviates entirely from it. There ought, it is said, to have been written ἔδοξε τοῖς ἀπ. ἐκλεῖσθαι ἄνδρας καὶ πέμψαι. 'Εκλεῖσθαι', however, is as regular as ἐκλεξαμένοις, and is more frequent in the later writers (as Joseph.), the sense being, 'having chosen men from among themselves to send [them].' Yet it is not exactly put (as Kypke and Rosenmüller think) for ἵνα ἐκλεῖσθαι πέμψουσιν, but is a construction of a different kind, in which the Accus. is closely associated with the Infinitive, and τὸ is understood. Thus it serves to explain what was meant by the 'if' in 'it seemed good.' In γράψαντες for γράψουσιν, there is merely an anacoluthon, such as in long sentences, especially containing parenthetical clauses, is not unusual. Ἄνδρας ἡγουμένους denotes 'leading men'; a Hellenistic idiom, by which the Participle is used as an adjective or substantive. Here Classical usage would require the Article. Yet in Thucyd. i. 5, we have similarly ἡγουμένων ἀνδρῶν οὐ τῶν ἀδυνατωτάτων.

23. χαίρειν.] Supply λέγουσι, or such like. A form of frequent occurrence in the later writers, and used instead of the earlier one εὖ πράσσειν. These were the accustomed forms of salutation at the beginning of an epistle, as ἔρρωσθαι or ἔρρωσθαι at the end.

24. ἐτάραξαν ὑμᾶς λ.] The same expression occurs at Gal. i. 7. v. 10. Lucian, Scyth. § 3, has the plainer one ταρασσειν τὴν γνώμην. And so Cic. Tusc. iii. 2, 'perturbari animos.' The next words ἀνασκ. τὰς ψυχὰς ὑμ. are exegetical of ταρασσειν here.

— ἀνασκευάζοντες.] Ἀνασκευάζειν properly signifies 'to pack up any thing for removal,' as in Thucyd. i. 18, and elsewhere. 2. To remove; as Xenoph. An. vi. 2, 5. Thus the sense here seems to be, 'removing and perverting your minds (from the truth); or rather unsettling; the contrary to Σεμελιῶσαι, as in 1 Pet. v. 10.

— λέγοντες περὶ.] 'enjoining you to be circumcised.' Οἷς οὐ διεστ. Supply οὐδὲ, 'to whom we gave no direction or authority [so to act].' It is the more necessary to supply οὐδὲν, since οὐ διεστ. almost always signifies to forbid, not, as here, to enjoin.

25. γενομένοις ὁμοθυμαδόν.] Supply ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό, which is expressed at ii. 1. Ὑπὲρ τοῦ θυ, 'on behalf of the religion,' &c.

27. καὶ αὐτοὺς διὰ λόγου ἀπαγγ. τὰ αὐτά.] On the subject of the bearers of public letters or messages being usually allowed to explain any obscurity therein, see my Note on Thucyd. vii. 8. 10, ὅχοντο φέροντες τὰ γράμματα, καὶ δεῖα ἰδεῖν αὐτοὺς εἰπεῖν. Such despatches, indeed, were, in the earlier ages, always sent in the form of verbal messages, by trusty servants to deliver by word of mouth; and that custom had continued even up to the age of Thucyd. On the introduction, however, of written messages, or despatches, during the Peloponnesian war, still the custom was retained of permitting the messenger to explain any obscurity in the Epistle, or to give further particulars of matters only briefly adverted to in the letter (so Joseph. Ant. xvii. 2, 7, εἰς Ῥώμην ὡς Καίσαρα ἐκπέμπει γράμματα περὶ αὐτοῦ, καὶ τοὺς ἀπὸ γλώσσης διδάσκοντες, &c.), nay, occasionally to act as a sort of ambassador, in order to treat on the business at issue. Sometimes, however, the messengers were forbidden to say any thing (see Arrian, Exp. Alex. ii. 14, 6); and therefore the words καὶ αὐτοὺς διὰ λόγου, &c. here may be considered as informing the persons addressed, that the messengers were empowered to deliver the same message by word of mouth, and more fully and explicitly, if desired.

28. ἔδοξε γάρ.] I know not why all the English Translators should render the γάρ 'for.' It is plainly resumptive, and put for οὐν, as often in the Sept. Ἐδοξε, 'it hath seemed good,' the term used in decrees. Τῷ ἁγίῳ Πνεύματι καὶ ἡμῖν, by Ἡμεῖς, 'to us who are deciding under the influence of the Holy Spirit.' Agreeably to the promise of the Holy Spirit to them when labouring in the cause of the Gospel. See Matt. xvi. 18—20, and John xiv. 26. See Chrys., Grotius, and Kainoel.

— βάρος.] It was an early, and especially Oriental form of expression to apply the term βάρος, ζυγόν, &c., to all laws, orders, &c., enjoined on those who were subject to any sort of authority, whether they were heavy or light. See Matt. xxiii. 4, and Note. Ἐπάγγελλον is formed from the old adjective ἐπανάγκη, which is preserved only in the Nominative or Accusative neuter. It is found in the best writers from Herodotus downwards, but only as an adverb. Here it may stand for an adjective, by an ellipse of ὅπως.

29. πικτοῦ.] One of the seven precepts of Noah; which were, 'to abstain from blasphemy against God, homicide, incest, robbery, resistance to magistrates, and the eating of things strangled.'

— εὖ πράττει.] Not meaning, as many explain, 'you will do right'; but rather, 'it will be happy for you,' 'it will tend to your salvation.' Comp. Eccles. viii. 12. Is. iii. 10. Jerem. xlii. 6.

30. ἀπολυθέντες.] See Note v. 33.

— ἐπέδωκαν τὴν ἐπιστολὴν.] The word properly signifies 'to reach forth, or give out any thing' (to ἐπι) a person (as Matt. vii. 7, and Luke xi. 11, 12), but also, in a general way, to deliver so; especially as used of the delivery of letters.

31. ἐχάρησαν ἐπὶ τῇ παρακ.] I know not why so many eminent Commentators should have interpreted παρακλήσει exhortation, or instruction. Surely the common interpretation (confirmed by all the ancient Versions), consolation or comfort, is more suitable and natural. They rejoiced at the comfort which this Epistle gave them, by the assurance that they were delivered from whatever was burdensome in the Mosaic Law. See more in Calvin and Newcome.

32. προφῆται.] See xi. 27, and Note, Bp. Pearce in Recens. Synop., and especially Mr. Townsend's dissertation on the spiritual gifts, titles, and offices in the Church at Antioch. See also the Note on 1 Cor. xii. 8. Διὰ λόγον πολλοῦ, 'in a discourse of considerable length.' Παρασκεύ., 'exhorted, admonished, and instructed them'; stating, we may suppose, the grounds and reasons on which the determination of the Synod was founded, showing why the whole ritual was not enjoined, and why a part was retained; and withal defining the cause, nature, and extent of the duty of abstaining, in certain cases, from things naturally lawful.

33. ποιήσαντες χρόνον.] 'having spent some time.' An idiom confined to the later, and especially the Hellenistic writers. Μετ' εἰρήνης, 'with good wishes and prayers for their welfare,' or whatever was included in the Heb. וְשָׁלוֹם.

34. ἔδοξε αὐτοῦ.] This verse, not found in several MSS. and Versions, is rejected by Mill, Wetstein, Pearce, Newcome, Kuinoel, and Gricebach, bracketed by Vater, and cancelled by Matth. The reason which they assign for its having been inserted is, that it was done to account for what might have seemed strange and inconsistent in Silas being said to have gone with Jude to

Jerusalem; whereas, a few days after, he is said to have been chosen by Paul as his companion in his journey to visit the churches. Yet (say the Critics in question) 'he may have gone to Jerusalem, and been sent for from thence, and the circumstance of his sending for have been omitted to be mentioned.' I must own that there is nothing to negative this in the expression μετὰ τινὰς ἡμέρας (especially if it be taken of the first mention of a plan which might not be carried into execution for some short time), that being an indefinite term, which may, at least, mean after not a very few days. See xvi. 13. There is, however, something very hypothetical in this way of accounting for the insertion. Instances of insertions for such a purpose are very rare indeed, and not to be increased without urgent cause, as tending to lessen our confidence in the integrity of the Divine word. On the other hand, if we suppose the verse to be genuine, its omission may readily be accounted for; namely, to remove a seeming inconsistency, a person being here said to have stayed, who was just before said to have gone; in which case the readiest course,—and that on a level with the capacity of even the scribes,—would be to cancel the verse. And Critics and Commentators, having felt the same difficulty, might resort to the same mode of removing it. Whereas it may satisfactorily be obviated by less violent means,—namely, by taking ἀπαλύθ. not in the sense departed, but in the usual one dimissi sunt (as in the Vulg.), meaning their dismissal and departure from the place where the brethren were assembled, not from Antioch itself. It should seem that between the time when they left the meeting, and that fixed on for their actual departure, Silas, from a desire to further enjoy the society of Paul, resolved to stay longer at Antioch. One might, indeed, have expected that it should have been added, that Jude went on his journey. But this was not absolutely necessary, and such omissions are frequent. Words to that effect are, indeed, found in some MSS. and Versions; but it is so very difficult to account for their omission, and so easy for their insertion (from the margin), that they cannot be received. Thus internal evidence is quite in favour of the genuineness of the verse, and external evidence decidedly so. Accordingly I have thought proper, with Scholz, to retain it.

[ἔχουσι.] This may be, by a common Grecism, for ἱκανοὶ πῶς ἔχουσιν οἱ ἀδελφοί. Or at πῶς ἔχουσι we may supply σκεψόμενοι, from ἐπισκεψ. So Polyb. p. 1330, cited by Wetstein, πῶς ἐκπεῖν τοὺς ἐπισκεψόμενοι πῶς ἔχουσι τὰ κατὰ τοὺς προειρημένους βασιλεῖς. The expression must here denote inspection of their state as Christian professors. Hence was derived the use (which not long afterwards arose) of ἐπισκοπος in the sense Bishop.

36. ἐν αἷς.] The plural is used because the antecedent involves the idea of plurality, as 2 Pet. iii. 1. ταύτην δυνάμιν γράφω ἐπιστόλῃ, ἐν αἷς. 37. ἐβουλευσατο] 'purposed,' or 'was disposed;' as v. 33. and xxvii. 39, where the term represents the result of deliberation or self-counsel.

38. ἤϊον] 'wished or thought proper.' This must be closely united with μὴ συμπαραλαβεῖν.

39. παροξυσμός] an exacerbation of spirit one against the other.

XVI. 1. κατήντησε.] Literally, 'went down to.' A sense of the word often occurring in this book, and peculiar to the later Greek writers. Τινος, not found in several MSS., has been cancelled by Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz; but I apprehend, without sufficient reason.

— ἢν ἱκανῶς.] Whether this is to be understood of Derbe, or of Lystra, Commentators are not agreed. The present passage favours the opinion that he was of Lystra; while that at xx. 4 is thought by some to prove him to have been of Derbe. But the Δερβαιοὶ there must refer to Gaius, and Gaius only, otherwise St. Luke would have written καὶ Γάιος καὶ Τιμόθεος, Δερβαιοί. He does not add Λυστριοὶ to Τιμ., because it was unnecessary, he having, he thought, expressed that here. And certainly the ἱκανῶς cannot well be understood of any other than Lystra, since that was the last-mentioned place. From the position of the cities, there can be no doubt that the Apostles went to Derbe first, and then to Lystra.

2. ἐμαρτυρεῖτο] 'a good testimony was borne him,' 'he was praised' (see Note supra xv. 8); namely, on account of his great knowledge of religion, and his ardent zeal in its promotion.

3. περιέτιμειν α.] He had not been circumcised, because (as we learn from the Rabbins) his mother had no right to do that without the father's consent. The reason why Paul circumcised him (which he might do without any violation of Christian liberty, as being of Jewish birth, and because, though circumcision was not enjoined as necessary to the Gentile converts, it might yet be sometimes expedient) is just after expressed.

6. Ἀσίᾳ.] Meaning, that part of Asia Minor which was peculiarly so called, namely, Phrygia.

alar Asia, of which Ephesus was the capital. Now this hindrance was effected, whether by dream or otherwise, has been variously supposed. Certainly had it been through direct revelation by dream, that would have been expressed. Hence we may suppose it to have been by a sort of divine impression on the mind (which the Apostles knew how to distinguish from ordinary feeling), through which medium their decision, that it would not be expedient to go thither, was produced by the influence of the Holy Spirit. In his view there will be some pertinency in the following passage of Philo-Jud. vol. ii. 176 (cited by Wetstein), Αἱ τοιαῦται εἰκασίαι συγγενεῖς προφηταίαι εἰσὶ. Ὁ γὰρ νοῦς οὐκ ἀν' οὐτως ἐκείνῳ αὐθυβάλλειν, εἰ μὴ καὶ ζῶον ἦν πνεῦμα τὸ ποδηγετοῦν πρὸς τὴν ἀλήθειαν.

7. κατὰ τὴν M.] Render, not 'in' (for they did not enter Mysia), but (with Valckn.) 'unto, as far as' meaning, to the borders of. It should seem that when they finally determined not to go to Asia, they had so far advanced in their journey thither, as to be opposite to the chain of Mount Olympus. Then they went forward in a due westerly direction, until they came to the borders of Mysia, intending to make their way into Bithynia, by the plain of the river Rhyndacus, or at its western end of the chain of Olympus.

—κατὰ τὴν Βιθυνίαν.] Several MSS. and some Versions and Fathers have εἰς, which has not received by Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz; yet without sufficient reason; since the external evidence for the reading is weak (Versions and Fathers being, in a case like this, of little weight), and internal quite the other way; for the εἰς is evidently from the margin, being an alteration of some who wished to remove a tautology, and make the sense plainer, not aware that the κατὰ here means versus, in the direction of, as Montanus, Beza, and Piscator render. At the same time, had εἰς been the true reading, it is difficult to imagine how it should have been altered into εἰς in the great bulk of the MSS.

—Πνεῦμα.] Nine MSS. add Ἰησοῦ, and others, with several Versions and some Fathers, τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, which is adopted by Mill and Wetstein, and received into the text by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. Yet there seems no sufficient evidence of its genuineness to warrant its reception. The external evidence is weak, as far as regards MSS.; and Versions and others are, in a matter of this kind, not quite unquestionable testimony. But, to advert to internal evidence, it would at first sight seem that τὸ Πνεῦμα Ἰησοῦ is a very rare expression, occurring no where else but in Phil. i. 19 (and here in a different sense), we may far better account for the omission than for the insertion of Ἰησοῦ. And yet we do not elsewhere find that rare expressions are cancelled by the scribes. Besides, when any very rare forms of expression are connected with important doctrinal questions, we are to advert to the possibility, nay, probability, that they may have been tampered with by the ancient Theologians, either by adding something to the text, or by removing something from it. Now, it appears from the Note of Wetstein, that the Romanists, a little after the printing of the Greek Text, maintained that Ἰησοῦ had been expunged by the Nestorians; which is incredible. They might rather have been expected to add than to remove it. The addition, however, I suspect, came from the Arians, who would have more reason to add it, in order to destroy so striking an example of τὸ Πνεῦμα in the personal sense. Thus it is caught up by all the Socinian interpreters. And when once introduced by the Arians, it would be likely to be admitted by the Nestorians, who would rather have it than not. From the former of these it was, I suspect, foisted into the Vulgate, and by the latter into the Syriac Version, and from thence it would easily be transmitted to the Æthiopic, Coptic, and Armenian Versions. Finally, the word is strongly discountenanced by the context. For, to use the words of Bp. Middleton, 'in the preceding verse we are told that the Apostles were forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia; in the present, that, on their attempting to go into Bithynia, the Spirit suffered them not.' It is, therefore, highly unnatural that the τὸ Πνεῦμα of the latter verse should be meant of any other than the τὸ ἅγιον Πνεῦμα of the former.

8. παρελθόντες.] The meaning cannot well be, that they passed by or along Mysia, namely by coasting its borders. No reason can be imagined why they should have taken so circuitous a course in order to go to the Troad. Moreover, the term κατέβησαν has allusion to the mountainous region they traversed in their course to the Troas. Now the mountainous country of Mysia is confined to the interior; and the chain of Temnos, Pedasus, Gargara, and Ida ranges along the whole of the interior. Accordingly, the sense intended by St. Luke must be, 'passed through,' 'traversed,' as the Vulg., Erasmus, Calvin, and others render. And so the Cod. Cant. has, by gloss, διελθόντες.

10. ἐζητήσαμεν.] From the use of we after that of they thus far, it is plain that the Evangelist himself became the companion of Paul and Timothy in this journey, having joined them at Troas.

—συμβιβάζοντας] 'including.' See Note on ix. 22.

—προσέκικ.] 'had called and appointed us to the work.' See xiii. 2.

Ἦμεν δὲ ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ πόλει διατρίβοντες ἡμέρας τινάς· τῇ τε ἡμέρᾳ τῶν σαββάτων ἐξήλθομεν τῆς 13 πόλεως παρὰ ποταμὸν, οὗ ἑνομιζέτο προσευχὴ εἶναι, καὶ

11. ἀναχθέντες—εὐθυδρομήσαμεν.] Here we have two nautical terms; the former, as used of setting sail (literally, loosing ropes), the latter, of sailing in a straight course to any point without tacking; which implies a fair wind. So that the expression is equivalent to οὐριοδρομεῖν.

12. πρώτη τῆς μερίδος τῆς Μ. π.] No little perplexity here exists, from a difficulty to reconcile the present statement with the actual state of things then existing. According to the sense assigned by the Pesch. Syr. and some others, 'which is the metropolis of the country of Macedonia,' the words are contrary to facts, Thessalonica being undoubtedly the capital. And such will be equally the case if we take πρώτη for 'most considerable.' Indeed, by so interpreting we overlook the force of μερίδος, which, in such a connexion, can only be 'portion,' i. e. district. And that Macedonia had long been divided into four districts, we learn from the Historians. Indeed coins of the Provincia prima and secunda have been found. Hence it has been the opinion of many learned men that instead of πρώτη τῆς we should read πρώτης; by which the sense will be, 'which is a city of the Provincia prima of Macedonia.' Yet not a single MS. is found to support this conjecture; which, indeed, is little supported by probability, as introducing a sort of minute circumstance not very likely to have been adverted to by the sacred writer. It is better, therefore, to retain the common reading, and explain it as we best may. Now the main question is whether πρώτη may be supposed to mean 'the principal,' or 'a principal.' If we adopt the former sense, we encounter the objection, that Philippi was not even the capital of the district, but Amphipolis, as we learn from Livy and Diodorus. Hence Michaelis and Kuinoel adopt the latter sense; and they appeal to the unexceptionable evidence of Eckhel, Doctr. Vet. Numm. P. i. vol. iv. p. 282, in attestation of the fact, that πρώτη was sometimes so applied as to mean a principal, though not the principal city of a country. And certainly, this view being admitted, all objection on the score of geographical exactness will be removed. I am, however, inclined to think the word πρώτη was meant to have the sense 'the principal.' Nor is there any thing really formidable in the objection, that Amphipolis was the capital; for though Amphipolis had been originally the capital, yet it is very probable (as Wetstein and Pearce suppose) that, after the battle of Philippi, that city was raised to the dignity of capital of the district, in the place of Amphipolis, which was then on the decline; especially since we know it was the policy of the Romans to make their colonies the capitals of the countries where they were situated. As, however, we have no historical proof of this transfer, it may be better (with Bp. Pearce) to understand πρώτη in the sense most considerable and important, in commerce, wealth, and population. And such the Romans would be especially anxious their colonies should be; and many causes would contribute to make them such. Still one difficulty yet remains. Whichever of the above senses be adopted, the τῆς before μερίδος is worse than useless; and has, I suspect, caused all the perplexity in question. Bp. Middleton, indeed, places it in the least objectionable point of view, by reading, 'which is the chief city of its district, a city of Macedonia, a colony.' But this is doing a manifest violence to the construction, and injury to the sense. I would therefore suppose a slight corruption to have crept into the text, occasioned by a mistake in placing the article τῆς. Now the first τῆς is not found in three ancient MSS., the Syriac Version, and Chrysostom; nor does it appear to have been in the copies read by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulgate Translators; nor in the originals of those MSS. which have μερίς, plainly by a confounding of the abbreviation of the termination dor with ε; and it is probably not genuine. I suspect, therefore, that it crept in by a mistake of the scribes; since those MSS. which have not the τῆς here, have it before Μακ.; and though it is there not found in ten MSS. (some of them of the highest antiquity), all of them have the τῆς before μερίδος. May we not, then, suppose that the article, which ought properly to be inserted but once, was first inserted in the wrong place, and afterwards (error gathering force like a snow-ball) both in the right place and the wrong? I have ventured to double brackets the τῆς, which is cancelled by Lachmann. Reader, 'which is the most considerable city of a district of Macedonia.'

13. παρὰ ποταμὸν] 'by the river side,' not 'by a river,' as our English translators render. The Article is here omitted on account of a proposition being used. This ποταμός is a mere rivulet (formed by the fountains, from which Philippi derived its first name, Crynoides) running into the Strymon. A striking attestation to the truth of the narrative; for the river is so small as only to be found in the best modern maps.

—οὗ ἑνομιζέτο προσευχὴ εἶναι.] Some difference of opinion exists as to the sense of these words; which the earlier Commentators take to mean, 'where prayer was wont to be offered up, sævi;' while the later ones interpret, 'where, according to the [Jewish] custom, there was a proeseuche, or oratory.' That such places were frequent where, from the paucity of Jews, no synagogue was found, is proved by a reference to Tertullian and other ancient theologians; as also that such were situated, for the convenience of purification, by a river-side; since among the Jews (as also the Christians and even the Heathens) ablution always preceded prayer. Yet how the words οὗ ἑνομιζέτο εἶναι can have the above sense, still less be taken for εὐχὴ (as in been by some), it is difficult to see. Ἐνομιζέτο plainly refers to local, not to general custom. As to the objections which have been urged, that the common interpretation yields too indefinite a sense, and that it is incorrect in phraseology, the former has not a shadow of reason, and the latter is overturned by one of the passages adduced to establish the older interpretation, namely, Philo contra Flaccum, p. 523, τὰς προσευχὰς ἀφιήρητο, οὐ ἐνομιζέτο προσεῦχῃ εἶναι, where we have the very expression in question, and in the very sense in which it is here commonly interpreted. And from its being accompanied with the term προσεῦχῃ, proseucha, it is evident that Philo thought it necessary to add the words following, in order to determine the sense of προσεῦχῃς. Whereas St. Luke chose to use a circumlocution, in preference to a term which might require the addition of this very circumlocution to explain it. It might seem, indeed, that the above sense, proseucha, is required by the words at ver. 16, πορευομένην ἡμῶν εἰς προσεῦχὴν. But it is not necessary to so interpret the words; and the sense commonly assigned, 'going to prayer,' is confirmed by a passage of Josephus, Vit. § 57, ἡμῶν τὰ νόμιμα ποιοῦντων, καὶ εἰς προσεῦχὰς τρεπομένων. Moreover, the sense proseucha would require the article, which, although found in several ancient MSS., and received into the text by Griesbach and Scholz, yet is plainly an insertion of some Critics who thought the article necessary; which certainly would be the case, if προσεῦχῃ at ver. 13 meant proseucha, but not, if prayer be the sense intended. With reason, therefore, has the τὴν been rejected by Wetstein, Matthæi, Tittman, and Vater; since internal evidence is as much against it as external. For we can easily account for its insertion, but not for its omission. As, however, it would appear that the expression πορευομένην ἡμῶν εἰς προσεῦχὴν has some reference to place as well as custom, we may suppose the sense to be something between prayer and proseucha, or prayer-place, namely, prayer-meeting. Thus the article would not be requisite; and it might be said with sufficient propriety, 'as we were going to prayer-meeting.' The prayer-place in question may be supposed to have been not an edifice, but simply a grove, or booth made of the boughs of trees, as in the most ancient Pagan religions, nay, found in even that of Moses. So Josephus, contra Ap. l. ii. βυαί, αἰθρίου προσευχὰς ἀντήγαν.

With respect to the time when the circumstance mentioned at ver. 16 took place, it should seem to have been on the first day that Paul and Silas went to the prayer-meeting; for it seems from ver. 18 that they went daily.

— ἐλαλούμεν.] Not 'discoursed with,' as Wakefield renders, but 'discoursed to,' as a public teacher or preacher. Thus the preceding καθί-σαντες alludes to the posture adopted, which was the usual one of teaching; see Matt. v. 1, and Note. It is plain that the congregation consisted of women only, not, as is commonly supposed, a mixture of both sexes. To account for which, we may suppose, that since that separation of the sexes which always subsisted in regular buildings, such as synagogues, was impossible in places like the present, the same end was effected by the sexes attending at different times.

14. Λυδία.] Some take this as a name of country, and to be joined with γυνή. But the ὀνόματι associated with it shows it to be a proper name. The name was common both among the Greeks and Romans. Πορφυρόπωλις means a seller not of purple dye, as some suppose, but of purple vests, for the dyeing of which the Lydians were famous, who seem to have participated in, or rather succeeded to, the reputation of the Tyrians. She was probably a resident of Thyatira in Lydia, where her vests were manufactured, but then sojourning at Philippi, for the purposes of her business. By the expression just after, σεβομένη τὸν Θεόν, is meant, that she was a devout Gentile, worshipping the one true God, i. e. a proselyte of the gate.

 — διήνοιξε τὴν καρδίαν.] An expression probably derived from the Hebrew; for we find it in the Jewish prayers, as also in 2 Macc. i. 4, δ. τὴν καρδίαν ἡμῶν ἐν τῷ νόμῳ αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐν τοῖς προστάγμασι. Also in a passage of Themist. ii. p. 29 (cited by Wetstein), ξείνονι τι ἀτεχνῶς ὑπομένει καὶ ἀπιστον πάθος. Διανοίγεται γὰρ μοι τὸ στήθος καὶ ἡ καρδία, καὶ διανογιστέρα γίνεται ἡ ψυχὴ, καὶ τὰ ὁμματα ὀξύτερα τῆς διανοίας ὥρα γούνη, ἢ μακάριοι, ἢ πρότερον οὐχ ὅσοι τὴ νῦν. The mind is said to be opened against admonition, when either from prejudice, it cannot discern the truth, or from pride and perversity, will not admit it. Hence, to open the mind or heart denotes, 'to render it more intelligent,' to cause that any one shall better perceive the truth, and more readily yield assent to it. The opening in question was effected by the grace of God working by his Spirit concurrently with the good dispositions of Lydia.

15. πιστὴν τῷ Κυρίῳ] i. e. 'a true believer in the Lord' and his religion, so as to be fit to be admitted to baptism. These words, as Calvin observes, have the force of earnest appeal; q. d. 'By the faith which you have approved by the seal of baptism, I conjure you not to refuse to abide with me.'

— παρεβιάσατο ἡμᾶς.] This term, like ἀναγκάζω, is used of the moral compulsion of urgent entreaty, such as, in a manner, compels the person to grant the request. St. Luke here, and in his Gospel xxiv. 29, seems to have had in mind Gen. xix. 3, where Lot, it is said, κατεβιάζετο light than something preternatural. See Calvin.

22. παρακαλοῦντες.] Render, 'by exhorting them.' See Note supra v. 3. In καὶ ὅτι διὰ, &c., there is an idiom, by which another word of cognate signification is to be supplied from one which has preceded; here λέγοντες from παρακαλοῦντες, as in Joseph. Ant. v. 1. 18, and other passages cited by the Commentators. In διὰ πολλῶν—Θεοῦ there is a general declaration intended for every age, showing that the working out of our salvation is not to be accomplished without numerous trials and tribulations. Comp. 1 Thessa. iii. 4. Similarly we read in a Rabbinical writer, cited by Wetstein (Vajikra R.), 'Dixit David ad Deum S. B. Quamvis est porta ad vitam futuri seculi? ex monte R. Jodan Deus Davidi respondit: Si debes in vitam ingredi, debes etiam afflictiones tolerare S. D.'

23. χειροτονήσαντες a.] Some (as Erasmus, Calvin, and Beza, and, more latterly, Knatchbull, Raphel, Doddridge, and, indeed, all Presbyterian Commentators) take the sense to be, 'having ordained their elders by the votes of the people.' Others, however, consisting of the most eminent Interpreters, are agreed that χειροτονήσαντες here simply means, 'having selected, constituted, appointed.'

—κατ' ἐκκλησίαν.] Meaning, in the several churches they had founded; κατὰ here having the same sense as at Matt. xxiv. 7, κατὰ τόπους, and often in the present book.

—προσευξάμενοι μετὰ νηστ.] Meaning, 'after using prayer with fasting;' see Note supra xiii. 3.

—παρέθεντο αὐ. τῷ Κ.] 'committed them to the Divine protection;' as it is said infra xx. 32, παρατίθεμαι ὑμᾶς τῷ Θεῷ, καὶ τῷ λόγῳ τῆς χάριτος αὐτοῦ. Compare also 1 Pet. iv. 19.

26. ὅθεν ἦσαν παραδ.] Παραδ. is here synonymous with παρατίθεσθαι supra ver. 23. With the word ὅθεν Commentators have been not a little perplexed. Nay, even those mighty Grecians, Hemsterhusius and Valcknaer, thought the difficulty so great as to warrant critical conjecture. They would read ὅθεν ἦσαν, 'whence they had gone.' To this, however, the MSS. afford no countenance: the Greek is questionable;

and the form is not in use in the New Test. The common reading must, then, be retained. And the difficulty which it involves may be best obviated by supposing a significatio prænana, arising from a blending of two expressions; q. d. 'whence they had been recommended, and from whence they had gone commended to the favour and protection of God.' Ἐπλήρωσαν, 'had fulfilled, or performed.'

27. μετ' αὐτῶν.] It has been disputed whether the sense be, 'by their means' (i. e. their instrumentality), or, 'to them,' μετ' αὐτῶν standing for αὐτοῖς. The latter mode of interpretation has been adopted by many eminent Expositors, and is supported by several passages of the Old Test.; but the former is far more agreeable to the following context, and is also confirmed by two passages further on, xxi. 19, ἐξηγείτο κατ' ἐν ἑκάστῳ ἃν ἐποίησαν ὁ Θεὸς ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι διὰ τῆς διακονίας αὐτοῦ, and πτ. 12, ἐξηγουμένων ὅσα ἐποίησαν ὁ Θεὸς σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι δι' αὐτῶν.

—Θύραν πίστεως.] Θύρα here metaphorically signifies promulgation, access, or opportunity for the spread of the Gospel.

28. ἐκεῖ.] This, not found in twelve MSS., and the Vulg., Arm., and Ethiop. Versions, has been cancelled by Griesbach and Scholz; but without sufficient reason. In a few MSS. a word so little essential might easily be omitted; which is far more probable, than that it should have been introduced from the margin into all the rest.

XV. In this Chapter we have recorded the dispute arising in the infant Church concerning circumcision, and the other observances of the Mosaic law, and the Apostle's counsel and decree in the matter; also the subsequent disagreement and consequently separation of Paul and Barnabas.

1. τινες.] These are supposed to have been Antiochians and Jewish converts, who had formerly been Pharisees (see ver. 5), and still retained an attachment to the forms of the Mosaic law. At εἰδὼσκειν τοὺς ἀδελφούς must be understood λέγοντας; see Note supra xiv. 22.

—περιτέμνησθε.] Here, as in Joseph. Ant. x. 2. 5 (cited by Wetstein), circumcision stands for the whole of the ritual law of Moses.

as being the principal ceremony, binding the person who underwent it to the observance of the rest. τῷ ἰθι: M., 'conformably to the institution of Moses.'

2. στάσεις.] Notwithstanding what Bp. Pearce objects, there is no reason why στάσεις should not be rendered dissension, as at xxiii. 10, of which sense two or three examples have been adduced, yet only of the verb. Of the noun I have noticed one, in Æschyl. Pers. 744, Blomf. Δόγοι κραταὶ σαφηνῆς, τὰ δὲ γ' οὐκ ἔνι στάσις. — συζητήσεις 'mutual discussion,' or controversy. This seems meant to explain and qualify στάσεις. For συζ. Wetstein, Matthæi, Knapp, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz edit ζητήσ., from several MSS. and some Versions, and the Ed. Princ. But nothing is more common than for compounds to be changed by the scribes into simples. Besides ζητ. would here be a term not strong enough, and συζητ. seems required; which occurs at ver. 7, whence the Editors in question imagine the present reading to have been introduced. 'Ἐταξαν, scil. οἱ ἀδελφοί, the brethren at large, not the Præpositi ecclesiæ, as Hammond supposes.

3. οἱ μὲν οὖν.] The article is here put for the pronoun demonstrative ('accordingly they, being,' &c.); an idiom, indeed, almost peculiar to the old writers, especially the poets, but which was likely to continue in use, in the common dialect, long after the time when it became obsolete in the language of books. That such is the force of the article, appears by the context. Otherwise the sense would be, 'And the persons conducted on their way,' &c.; which would be little to the purpose. I have pointed accordingly.

— προπεμφθέντες 'honoriſicē deducti, set forward on their way,' a mark of respect usually rendered to eminent persons among the ancients; and always shown to Apostles, and of which we have mention further on in this book and in the Epistles. 'Ἐπιστροφὴν, 'conversion.' Formed on the use of ἐπιστρέφειν, as at xi. 21. xiv. 15. 'Ἐποίουν χαρὰν μεγάλην,' 'occasioned great joy.' So Aristid. cited by Wetstein, δὲ θεὸς ἐποίησεν μοι χαρὰν ὑπερμεγάλην.

4. ἀπεδέχθησαν 'were received with distinction,' as xviii. 27.

5. ἔξανίστησαν δὲ τινες—λέγοντες.] These words are so manifestly the words of St. Luke, that plain readers would be surprised to learn that any other opinion had ever been formed. And yet many eminent Commentators, stumbling at what they think the harshness of the answer being given before the question had been propounded, suppose the words to be those of the Jewish party at Antioch, reported by Paul and Barnabas. But although a transition from the oblique to the direct is occasionally found (as in i. 4. xvii. 7, and Luke v. 14), yet here it would be peculiarly harsh; and the ellipsis of ἔλεγον, which they propose, is inadmissible. Besides, ἔξανίστημι would not be a suitable term. In fact, the difficulty is imaginary; for as the words ἀνήγγειλαν—αὐτῶν plainly import that 'they gave an account of what had happened to them in the exercise of their mission,' so the difficulty which brought them there could not fail to be mentioned; see Kuin., who refers to a similar brevity at Acts xi. 3. Thus all difficulty vanishes, and ἔξανίστησαν has peculiar propriety; q. d. 'then there started up,' not 'rose up,' as in most versions. The word is often used in Thucyd., Xenoph., and the best writers, in the sense to start forth from ambush, or suddenly. The Judaizing party, on hearing the matter first propounded, suddenly and hastily started up, saying that it was proper to, &c. This opinion, it is plain, was given, not at a public assembly, called for the purpose of considering the matter in question, but probably at a private meeting to receive them on their return. The assembly denoted by συνήχθησαν was plainly another, called for the purpose of deciding on the question after due deliberation.

— πεπιστευκότες.] We have here a participle for substantive, to be taken after τινες, as serving to determine the sense. The words οἱ δὲ—Μωϋσῶς are by many supposed to be not in oratione directa, but indirecta.

6. συνήχθησαν δὲ οἱ ἀπ.] Thus was assembled what is called the First Council at Jerusalem, to counteract the baneful heresy which had sprung up from the bitter root of Pharisaism, and disturbed the harmony and concord of the infant Church. On the time of this council, see Towns. ii. 177—179; and on its nature, Vitring. de Syn. p. 598, sqq. On the circumstances which led to it, and the rise and progress of the heresy it was meant to counteract, consult Dr. Hales, iii. 513, sq. 6. ἰδὲν περὶ.] This, by an idiom found in Hebrew, Greek, and English, signifies, 'to consider about.'

— περὶ τοῦ λόγου] 'concerning the matter spoken of,' which involved two questions; 1. Whether the Gentiles should be circumcised; 2. Whether they should observe the customs of the Mosaic law. The former was answered decidedly in the negative; the latter partly in the affirmative. The συζητήσεως, just after, must be understood of disputation between the Apostles and presbyters, and those persons who had at the former private meeting given their opinion so positively.

7, seqq. St. Peter argues, that God, by pouring out his Spirit on the uncircumcised Gentiles, as he had done upon the circumcised Jews, had plainly demonstrated that he made no discrimination between them and the Jews, in the distribution of the Gospel privileges; and that legal purification, which seemed wanting to them on account of their non-circumcision, he had abundantly supplied in purifying their hearts by faith. After this proof, therefore, that God did not require from them the Mosaic observances, it was nothing less than tempting God, and setting aside his counsels, to impose the yoke upon them. (Whitby.)

7. ἀπὸ ἡμερῶν ἀρχ.] Some take this to mean, à principio, 'from the beginning of the Gospel.' Yet the purpose in question was not made known till the conversion of Cornelius; for to that the words διὰ τοῦ στόματος μου plainly allude. And the expression will appear to be not inapplicable to the period in question (thirteen or fourteen years before), if we consider that ἀρχαῖος is often used simply of what has happened heretofore, whether many ages, or only a few years before; of which abundant examples have been adduced.

In the words ἐν ἡμῖν ἐξελέξατο many recognise a Hebraism; τῷ in Hebrew taking after it 2 in. And thus it will be equivalent to ἡμᾶς ἐξελ. That mode of solution, however, is precarious; and this occurrence of ἡμῖν and μου in the same clause would be harsh. As to ἐν ἡμῖν, it is, after all, best rendered in our common version (confirmed by the Syr. and De Dieu), 'amongst us.' Then ἐμὴ may be supplied (as in the Syr. Version), which is suppressed through delicacy, to avoid egotism, as in very many passages which I could adduce from Thucyd.

8. καρδιογνώστης.] See Note on i. 24. By this the Apostle intimates, that God can best determine who are worthy of being admitted as Christians, and who not; as also on the rites and ceremonies to be enjoined on them.

— ἐμαρτύρησεν αὐτοῖς.] The sense seems to be, 'hath borne testimony in their favour,' 'hath testified his approbation,' namely, by giving them the Holy Spirit; for μαρτυρία with a Dative always implies, favourable testimony.

9. οὐδὲν διέκρινε] 'made no distinction between us,' as to the benefit and gratuitous favour to be bestowed on believers. A remarkable idiom, of which the Commentators adduce no apposite example. The following, however, which I have noted, will supply the deficiency. Thucyd. i. 49. 7, δισκρίπτο οὐδὲν ἔστι. Diod. Sinop. ap. Athen. p. 239, οὐχὶ διακρίνας τὴν πανυχρὰν ἢ πλοῦσιν. By τὰς καρδίας are denoted, not their minds, but their hearts, souls, and consciences: these were sanctified by the Holy Spirit, and purified by the great truths of the Gospel.

— τῇ πίστει καθάρισας τὰς κ. α.] This clause answers to the foregoing epithet applied to God; as much as to say, that 'God, who knoweth all hearts, inwardly purified the Gentiles when he vouchsafed to adopt them, that they might be spiritually purified; but he adds, moreover, that this purity is by faith.' (Calvin.)

10. Here we have the second part of the speech; in which the Apostle shows how pernicious is the doctrine that the enemies of Paul would introduce; a doctrine such as would take away all hope from the pious. From the preceding clause, indeed, he infers and collects that God is tempted, if the Gentiles be compelled to observe the Law; but besides this he goes to the very reason of the thing. So far he has argued, that the Gentiles are wronged, by requiring of them more than God requires; and since he has bestowed on them the privilege of adoption, it were absurd to suppose they should still be rejected, and the goodness of God limited; in short, it is sufficient that they have faith, though ceremonies they have none. Now, however, he proceeds to show, that those who tie down men's salvation to the works of the Law, leave them nothing to hope; nay, indeed, the whole world is delivered up to destruction the most fearful, if it can attain salvation no otherwise than by observing the Law. (Calvin.)

— τί πειράζετε τὸν Θεόν;] Meaning, 'Why try ye the forbearance of God, by peremptorily resisting his will?' So 1 Cor. x. 9, καθὼς καὶ τινες αὐτῶν ἐπείρασαν. Heb. iii. 9, and often in the Old Test., as Exod. xvii. 2. 7. The argument being, that 'it is plainly the will of God that these persons should be received as Christians' without such rites; that he has, in fact, already accepted them. Hence to attempt to impose them on hath been pleased to abolish, would be 'resisting his will'; which were as criminal as vain; see Rom. ix. 19.

11. Ἄλλα διὰ τῆς χάριτος—κἀκεῖνοι.] It has been disputed to whom these words respectively allude. Some refer the ἡμεῖς contained in πιστεύομεν to the Apostles Peter and James; others, to Peter only. Again, κἀκεῖνοι some refer to the οἱ πατέρες at ver. 10; and others, to Paul and Barnabas. But it is, I think, plain that the words we and those, which are antithetical, must denote no other than the same persons with the αὐτοῖς (namely, the Gentiles) and ἡμῖν, similarly antithetical, at ver. 8; also the ἡμῶν and αὐτῶν at ver. 9, namely, the Jewish and the Gentile converts. At κἀκεῖνοι the true grammatical ellipsis would be πιστεύουσιν. Though, indeed, among the other peculiarities of the Hellenistic style is that of anomalous ellipsis; as here ἡ σωθήσονται. Finally, the ἄλλα is adversative (answering an objection), and signifies imo, nay, yea, as in 2 Cor. vii. 11. Thus we may render: 'Yea, by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ alone do we trust we shall be saved; in which same way they too are alone to be saved;' comp. Gal. ii. 15, 16, and Rom. iii. 30. The superfluous is obvious, and therefore left to be supplied,—that a thing so unimportant to salvation, as the observation of the ceremonies of the Mosaic law, ought not to be exacted from the Gentile converts.

12. πλῆθος.] Not multitude, but assembly as Luke xxiii. 1, and elsewhere), consisting of persons convened for the special purpose of considering this question.

—ἐξηγουμένων] 'while recounting.' Namely, for the purpose of establishing the facts on which the validity of the Apostle's reasoning rested, the argument being, that 'as God had approved their work, by causing miracles to be worked by them, so what they had done in this matter had his entire approbation.'

13. ἀπεκρίθη] 'addressed the assembly.'

—ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί, &c.] The Apostle, after affirming what was just said by Peter, as to his calling of the Gentiles,—well aware that, in addressing Jews, it was always of great importance to ascertain whether any thing, which purported to be the will of God, was in accordance with the predictions of Holy Writ,—further shows, yet however contrary to the prejudices of many

among them, yet that it was agreeable to the predictions of the Prophets,—instancing a remarkable one of Amos ix. 11, 12.

14. καθὼς] for ὡς, how. Πρῶτον. Render, not, 'at the first' (for that would mean, at the beginning of the Gospel), but first. In ἐπισκέψατο λαβεῖν, &c., we have a blending of two clauses into one, for ἐπισκ. τὰ ἔθνη (ἔσται) λαβεῖν ἐξ αὐτῶν λαὸν i. e. δ. α. On ἐπισκ., see Note on Luke i. 68. Ἐπὶ τῷ ὀν. a., 'in order to bear his name, and be called his peculiar people, by professing his religion.'

16, 17. This quotation varies from the Hebrew and the Sept. in the following unimportant particulars. For ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ there, we have here, to make the sense more plain, μετὰ ταῦτα. Ἀναστρέψω, too, though without having any thing corresponding to it in the Hebrew, is here, for the same reason, supplied. The next clause is compressed, by blending the two parts of the parallelism into one. Again, the words καθὼς αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ αἰῶνος, found in the Sept. Version, are here omitted; and with reason; since they make no sense. There is doubtless (though the Translators failed to perceive it) an ellipsis of 3 at וַיְהִי, i. e. between 3 and וַי, though וַיְהִי וַיְהִי (occurring in Mich. vii. 14, and Is. lxiii. 9) may have been considered as a sort of adverb. Finally, the words τὸν Κύριον are not found in the LXX., at least in the Vatican text. But in the Alexandrian text the words are supplied, and have been adopted by Abp. Newcome, as representing the true reading of the Hebrew text. Again, answering to ὅπως ἂν ἐκζητήσωσιν—ἀνθρώπων is וְכִי תִשְׁאָל וְכִי תִשְׁאָל וְכִי תִשְׁאָל, 'that they may possess the residue of Edom.' Yet that makes such bad sense, that the words would seem to be corrupt. And this suspicion is countenanced by the remarkable variety of readings; none of which, however, give any aid. The corruption seems to be anterior to the Masoretic recension, and may best be emended by reading (with Lightfoot) for וְכִי, וְכִי, and for וְכִי, וְכִי, which will thus agree with the words of the Apostle; the sense being, that 'after the return of the Jews, and their subsequent prosperity, they would extend the knowledge and benefits of their religion to other nations, even mankind at large; so that the Gentiles might be admitted to the privileges of the children of God.' At any rate, the Apostle follows the Sept., where, doubtless, τὸν Κύριον then existed.

καὶ ἀνοικοδομήσω τὴν σκηνὴν Δαυὶδ τὴν πεπτωκυῖαν· καὶ τὰ κατεσκαμμένα αὐτῆς ἀνοικοδομήσω, καὶ ἀνορθώσω αὐτήν· ὅπως ἂν ἐκζητήσωσιν οἱ ἅπαντες τῶν ἀνθρώπων τὸν Κύριον, καὶ πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, ἐφ' οὓς ἐπικέκληται τὸ ὄνομά μου ἐπ' αὐτούς· λέγει Κύριος ὁ ποιῶν ταῦτα [πάντα].

That the Apostle has not (what some would have us suppose) merely accommodated the above passage to the present subject, but that he recognised such to be the intent of the prophecy, is plain from the very purpose for which he adduced it; it being his principal intent to show that, according to the Prophets, especially in this remarkable passage, it was contemplated that the Gentiles should be introduced to the privileges of the children of God. And that the Prophet did so mean it, we cannot for a moment doubt.

16. σκηνήν.] The word properly signifies a booth or hut, but sometimes denoted a permanent house, and figuratively a family; and, when applied to a royal family, its reign or kingdom. Κατασκάπτω was often used of the utter destruction of houses or cities. So Ælian, V. H. xii. 54, τὴν πατρίδα κατὰ κίσει, κατεσκαμμένην ὑπὸ Φιλίππου.

17. ἐκζητ. τὸν Κύριον.] This phrase here and at Rom. iii. 11. Heb. xi. 6. signifies, by an imitation of the Heb. פָּקַד or פָּקַדְתִּי פָּקַדְתִּי, 'to earnestly seek,' for the purpose of fervently praying to and serving him. Οἱ κατάλοιποι τῶν ἀνθρώπων is explained by τὰ ἔθνη in the next clause.

— καὶ πάντα τὰ ἔθνη.] Kai has here the sense etiam. Πάντα, not found in many ancient MSS. and some Versions and Fathers (confirmed by the Hebrew text), has been cancelled by Griesbach and Scholz. In ἐπ' αὐτούς we have a Hebrew pleonasm.

18. γνωστὰ ἀπ' αἰῶνος, &c.] The purpose of these words is, as Calvin shows, to anticipate the objection (which to many seems fatal), that the thing was a mere novelty. The Apostle contends that it was not new to God, though it might seem sudden to man; that God, who sees every thing future, and knows what he will accomplish, had foretold, by his prophets, the foundation of a spiritual kingdom, into which both Jews and Gentiles should be received. It therefore formed part of his eternal plan; consequently immutable, and by man irresistible, Rom. ix. 19. A passage very similar in sentiment is here adduced by Wetstein from Seneca de Benef. iv. 32. 'Nota est illis operis sui series; omnium illis rerum per manus suas iturarum scientia in aperto semper est, nobis ex abdito subit; et, quæ repentina putamus, illis prævia veniunt et familiaria.'

In the words preceding, ὁ ποιῶν ταῦτα πάντα, it is intimated, that the things in question will also be done by him.

19. ἐγὼ κρίνω.] Meaning, 'My judgment or decided opinion [on the matter] is.' So Thucyd. iv. 60, ὡς ἐγὼ κρίνω. Μὴ παρενοχλεῖν means, 'to give them no further molestation, than the observance only of the following necessary particulars.' This seems to be a popular form of expression. Commentators adduce as an example Arrian, Epict. l. 9, Μὴδὲ παρενοχλεῖν τοῖς νόμοις, μηδὲ τοῖς γέρονσι. The word is not infrequent in the later Classical writers and the Sept.

20. ἐπιστεῖλαι αὐτοῖς] 'to give them directions,' as Acts xxi. 25. Αὐτὸν ἀπέχεσθαι the Genitive is dependent on ἵνα understood, equivalent to ἵνα ἀπέχωνται. But to advert to the particulars of the prohibition, τῶν ἀλισθημάτων, &c.; the term ἀλισγημα is Hellenistic, and derived from ἀλίσγειν, to pollute. Both it and the noun are used alike of physical and moral defilement, especially that of idolatry, as the greatest; see Dan. i. 8. Eccles. xi. 29. Mal. i. 7. 12, where the subject is meat offered to idols. Here, however, in order to determine the sense, the words τῶν ἐδώλων are added. Now, though the word might denote any participation in idolatry, yet the passages of Daniel and Malachi (which were probably in the mind of the Apostle), as well as the ancient glosses of Hesych. and Suid. (formed from the early Scholiasts, and thence from the Fathers), determine it to be the eating of meat offered to idols, not merely in the temples, but even the purchasing of it for use, when it was taken for sale into the public market. For we learn from the passages cited by the Commentators, that among the Gentiles, after a victim had been sacrificed in the temple, and a portion had been given to the Priests, and sometimes another eaten by the offerer and his friends on the spot, the residue was often taken home by the priests for domestic use, and sometimes was sent to the public shambles to be sold. The flesh, however, was, of course, held in abomination by the Jews (see 1 Cor. x. 20); and therefore the use of it was very properly forbidden, in order that no needless offence might be given to the Jewish Christians.

— καὶ τῆς πορνείας.] It has been thought strange that this should be inserted among things of themselves lawful, but from which the Gentiles were to abstain, lest they should offend the Jewish Christians; fornication having never been accounted as a thing permitted; and no man would appear why, if greater offences are un-

tioned with smaller ones, this alone should be selected, which, it has been thought, would go far to put the things mentioned in this list on a level. To remove this difficulty many methods have been devised; some proceeding on critical conjecture (thus Bentley proposed to read χοιρίας, pork); while others seek to remove the difficulty by supposing some unusual sense of the word; some understanding it of spiritual ichoredom, viz. idolatry; others, marriage with idolaters; others, again, of marriage within the prohibited degrees. All which are alike open to insuperable objections, and especially to this, that no recondite or uncommon sense could be intended; since in public edicts words are supposed to be employed in their usual sense. And here there is no sufficient reason to abandon the common rendering, fornication; which has been well defended by Grotius, Wetstein, Valcknaer, Schoettgen, Pearce, Nitzsch, Rosenmuller, Kuinoel, Scott, Wahl, and Bp. Marsh; who satisfactorily removes the objections to the word being taken in its ordinary sense, showing that there are other instances to be found of moral and positive precepts, duties of common and perpetual obligation, mingled with local and temporary ones, in the same list; as in the Decalogue. 'And since (continues he) it appears from the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of Paul, that the precepts of the Pentateuch were abrogated only by degrees, it seems by no means extraordinary that the Decree of the Council in Jerusalem should contain a mixture of moral and positive commands.' I would add, that it is not unimportant, in this view, to remark, that in the words of the decision actually sent (ver. 29), we find the two kept separate, works being put apart from the rest, and placed last. As to the objection founded on fornication being never thought indifferent, it might not in theory, or philosophical speculation, but was so considered in practice. No one who is at all acquainted with the Classical writers can doubt, that simple fornication was, by the Heathens, considered as no crime at all. We find that even their religion permitted, nay, encouraged, licensed fornication. Hence the recommendation of chastity of this kind (for that contained in abstaining from adultery could not need enforcing) was highly necessary; the main purpose (as Grotius observes) of this list being to specify from what practices, beyond known and flagrant sins, the Gentile Christians ought to abstain, in order to coalesce with the Jewish Christians without offence. And there was the more occasion to give the injunction, since, for many reasons (which are detailed in Recens. Synop.), fornication and idolatry were, in the minds of the Jews, inseparably connected; compare 1 Cor. x. 7, 8. v. 11. Eph. v. 5. Col. iii. 5. Rev. ii. 14. 20, and especially Exod. xxxiv. 14—16.

— τοῦ πικτοῦ scil. κρέατος (supplied in Athen. 1. ix.), meaning flesh of animals killed by strangling, which was very prevalent among the ancients, both Greeks and Romans, and also Orientals. They used to enclose the carcase of the animal (so killed that the blood should remain in it) in an oven, or a deep stewing vessel, and thus scethe it in its own vapour or steam. As to the blood,—the heathens, when butchering an animal, carefully preserved this, and mixing it up with flour and unguents, formed various sorts of dishes. Now as both the foregoing sorts of food were strictly forbidden by the Mosaic Law, especially the latter, (the Jews being enjoined to consider the blood as the seat and principle of life, and therefore not to eat of it, but offer it in sacrifice to God,) there was ample reason to forbid them to the Gentile Christians, in order to avoid the giving offence to their Jewish brethren. That an injunction so local in its nature, and of such temporary obligation, cannot be binding on Christians of these times, and must cease with the circumstances which gave occasion to it, has been convincingly shown by Schoettgen, Doddridge, and others.

21. Here (as at v. 18) there has seemed to many such an abruptness of transition, and want of connexion between this subject and the preceding, that they have supposed something to have been lost out of the text. But for this there is not the slightest foundation, either in external evidence or internal probability. Here, as often in sentences commencing with γάρ, there are some words to which that particle may be referred, left to be supplied from the context and subject-matter; which may, on the present occasion, be done as follows: 'And remember, the violation of these will occasion not only private, but public scandal; for the Mosaic religion has from remote antiquity had its professors in every city, and its Scriptures publicly read in the synagogues every sabbath day,—in which these things are strictly forbidden.' Thus the γάρ is intended to give a reason why the foregoing 'necessary things,' as they are called at v. 28, are required of them.

22. ἔδοξε τοῖς ἀποστόλοις—πέμψαι.] The syntax in ἐκλεξαμένους is generally thought not agreeable to the propriety of language; and γράψαντες deviates entirely from it. There ought, it is said, to have been written ἔδοξε τοῖς ἀπ. ἐκλεῖσθαι ἄνδρας καὶ πέμψαι. 'Εκλεξαμένους, however, is as regular as ἐκλεξαμένοι, and is more frequent in the later writers (as Joseph.), the sense being, 'having chosen men from among themselves to send [them].' Yet it is not exactly put (as Kypke and Rosenmuller think) for ἵνα ἐκλεξαμένοι πέμψωσι, but is a construction of a different kind, in which the Accus. is closely associated with the Infinitive, and τὸ is understood. Thus it serves to explain what was meant by the 'it' in 'it seemed good.' In γράψαντες for γράψωσι, there is merely an anacoluthon, such as in long sentences, especially containing parenthetical clauses, is not unusual. Ἄνδρας ἡγουμένους denotes 'leading men'; a Hellenistic idiom, by which the Participle is used as an adjective or substantive. Here Classical usage would require the Article. Yet in Thucyd. i. 5, we have similarly ἡγουμένων ἀνδρῶν οὐ τῶν ἀδυνατωτάτων.

23. χαίρειν.] Supply λέγουσι, or such like. A form of frequent occurrence in the later writers, and used instead of the earlier one εὖ πράσσειν. These were the accustomed forms of salutation at the beginning of an epistle, as ἔρρωσθε or ἔρρωσθε at the end.

24. ἐτάραξαν ὑμᾶς λ.] The same expression occurs at Gal. i. 7. v. 10. Lucian, Scyth. § 3, has the plainer one παράσσειν τὴν γῶμην. And so Cic. Tusc. iii. 2, ‘perturbari animos.’ The next words ἀνασκ. τὰς ψυχὰς ὑ. are exegetical of παράσσειν here.

—ἀνασκευάζοντες.] Ἀνασκευάζειν properly signifies ‘to pack up any thing for removal,’ as in Thucyd. i. 18, and elsewhere. 2. To remove; as Xenoph. An. vi. 2, 5. Thus the sense here seems to be, ‘removing and perverting your minds (from the truth),’ or rather unsettling; the contrary to Σιμελιῶσαι, as in 1 Pet. v. 10.

—λέγοντες περὶ.] ‘enjoining you to be circumcised.’ Οἷς οὐ διεστ. Supply οὐδὲν, ‘to whom we gave no direction or authority (so to act).’ It is the more necessary to supply οὐδὲν, since οὐ διαστ. almost always signifies to forbid, not, as here, to enjoin.

25. γενομένοις ὁμοθυμαδόν.] Supply ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό, which is expressed at ii. 1. Ὑπὲρ τοῦ θυ., ‘on behalf of the religion,’ &c.

27. καὶ αὐτοὺς διὰ λόγου ἀπαγγ. τὰ αὐτά.] On the subject of the bearers of public letters or messages being usually allowed to explain any obscurity therein, see my Note on Thucyd. vii. 8. 10, ὅχουτο φέροντες τὰ γράμματα, καὶ ὅσα ἔδει αὐτοὺς εἰπεῖν. Such despatches, indeed, were, in the earlier ages, always sent in the form of verbal messages, by trusty servants to deliver by word of mouth; and that custom had continued even up to the age of Thucyd. On the introduction, however, of written messages, or despatches, during the Peloponnesian war, still the custom was retained of permitting the messenger to explain any obscurity in the Epistle, or to give further particulars of matters only briefly adverted to in the letter (so Joseph. Ant. xvii. 3. 7, εἰς Ῥώμην ὡς Καίσαρα ἐκπέμπει γράμματα περὶ αὐτοῦ, καὶ τοὺς ἀπὸ γλώσσης διδάσκοντες, &c.), nay, occasionally to act as a sort of ambassador, in order to treat on the business at issue. Sometimes, however, the messengers were forbidden to say any thing (see Arrian, Exp. Alex. ii. 14, 6); and therefore the words καὶ αὐτοὺς διὰ λόγου, &c. here may be considered as informing the persons addressed, that the messengers were empowered to deliver the same message by word of mouth, and more fully and explicitly, if desired.

28. ἔδοξε γάρ.] I know not why all the English Translators should render the γάρ ‘for.’ It is plainly resumptive, and put for etiam, as often in the Sept. Ἐδοξε, ‘it hath seemed good,’ the term used in decrees. Τῷ ἁγ. Πνεύμ. καὶ ἡμῖν, by Hendiadyas, ‘to us who are deciding under the influence of the Holy Spirit.’ Agreeably to the promise of the Holy Spirit to them when labouring in the cause of the Gospel. See Matt. xvi. 18—20, and John xiv. 26. See Chrys., Grotius, and Kuinoel.

—βάρος.] It was an early, and especially Oriental form of expression to apply the term βάρος, weight, &c., to all laws, orders, &c., enjoined on those who were subject to any one’s authority, whether they were heavy or light. See Matt. xxiii. 4, and Note. Ἐτάραξαν is formed from the old adjective ἐταράγναι, which is preserved only in the Nominative or Accusative gender. It is found in the best writers from Herodotus downwards, but only as an adverb. How it may stand for an adjective, by an ellipse of δύστω.

29. πνικτοῦ.] One of the seven precepts of Noah; which were, 'to abstain from blasphemy against God, homicide, incest, robbery, resistance to magistrates, and the eating of things strangled.'

— εὖ πράττει.] Not meaning, as many explain, 'you will do right;' but rather, 'it will be happy for you,' 'it will tend to your salvation.' Comp. Eccles. viii. 12. Is. iii. 10. Jerem. xlii. 6.

30. ἀπολυθέντες.] See Note v. 33.

— ἐπέδωκαν τὴν ἐπιστολὴν.] The word properly signifies 'to reach forth, or give out any thing' to (ἐπὶ) a person (as Matt. vii. 7, and Luke xi. 11, 12), but also, in a general way, to deliver to; especially as used of the delivery of letters.

31. ἐχάρησαν ἐπὶ τῇ παρακ.] I know not why so many eminent Commentators should have interpreted παρακλῆσαι exhortation, or instruction. Surely the common interpretation (confirmed by all the ancient Versions), consolation or comfort, is more suitable and natural. They rejoiced at the comfort which this Epistle gave them, by the assurance that they were delivered from whatever was burdensome in the Mosaic Law. See more in Calvin and Newcome.

32. προφῆται.] See xi. 27, and Note, Bp. Pearce in Recens. Synop. and especially Mr. Townsend's dissertation on the spiritual gifts, titles, and offices in the Church at Antioch. See also the Note on I Cor. xii. 8. Διὰ λόγον πολλοῦ, 'in a discourse of considerable length.' Παρακάλει, 'exhorted, admonished, and instructed them;' stating, we may suppose, the grounds and reasons on which the determination of the Synod was founded, showing why the whole ritual was not enjoined, and why a part was retained; and withal defining the cause, nature, and extent of the duty of abstaining, in certain cases, from things naturally lawful.

33. ποιήσαντες χρόνον] 'having spent some time.' An idiom confined to the later, and especially the Hellenistic writers. Μετ' εἰρήνης, 'with good wishes and prayers for their welfare,' or whatever was included in the Heb. וְשָׁלוֹם.

34. ἔδοξε αὐτοῦ.] This verse, not found in several MSS. and Versions, is rejected by Mill, Wetstein, Pearce, Newcome, Kuinoel, and Griesbach, bracketed by Vater, and cancelled by Matth. The reason which they assign for its having been inserted is, that it was done to account for what might have seemed strange and inconsistent in Silas being said to have gone with Jude to

Jerusalem; whereas, a few days after, he is said to have been chosen by Paul as his companion in his journey to visit the churches. Yet (say the Critics in question) 'he may have gone to Jerusalem, and been sent for from thence, and the circumstance of his sending for have been omitted to be mentioned.' I must own that there is nothing to negative this in the expression μετὰ τινὰς ἡμέρας (especially if it be taken of the first mention of a plan which might not be carried into execution for some short time), that being an indefinite term, which may, at least, mean after not a very few days. See xvi. 13. There is, however, something very hypothetical in this way of accounting for the insertion. Instances of insertions for such a purpose are very rare indeed, and not to be increased without urgent cause, as tending to lessen our confidence in the integrity of the Divine word. On the other hand, if we suppose the verse to be genuine, its omission may readily be accounted for; namely, to remove a seeming inconsistency, a person being here said to have stayed, who was just before said to have gone; in which case the readiest course,—and that on a level with the capacity of even the scribes,—would be to cancel the verse. And Critics and Commentators, having felt the same difficulty, might resort to the same mode of removing it. Whereas it may satisfactorily be obviated by less violent means,—namely, by taking ἀπελύθ. not in the sense departed, but in the usual one dimissi sunt (as in the Vulg.), meaning their dismissal and departure from the place where the brethren were assembled, not from Antioch itself. It should seem that between the time when they left the meeting, and that fixed on for their actual departure, Silas, from a desire to further enjoy the society of Paul, resolved to stay longer at Antioch. One might, indeed, have expected that it should have been added, that Jude went on his journey. But this was not absolutely necessary, and such omissions are frequent. Words to that effect are, indeed, found in some MSS. and Versions; but it is so very difficult to account for their omission, and so easy for their insertion (from the margin), that they cannot be received. Thus internal evidence is quite in favour of the genuineness of the verse, and external evidence decidedly so. Accordingly I have thought proper, with Scholz, to retain it.

[ἔχουσι.] This may be, by a common Grecism, for ἔχουσιν πῶς ἔχουσιν οἱ ἀδελφοί. Or at πῶς ἔχουσι we may supply σκεψόμενοι, from ἐπισκεψ. So Polyb. p. 1330, cited by Wetstein, πῶς ἐπισκεψόμενοι πῶς ἔχουσι τὰ κατὰ τοὺς προσηρημένους βασιλεῖς. The expression must here denote inspection of their state as Christian professors. Hence was derived the use (which not long afterwards arose) of ἐπίσκοπος in the sense Bishop.

36. ἐν αἷς.] The plural is used because the antecedent involves the idea of plurality, as 2 Pet. iii. 1, ταῦτον δυνάμεν γράφει ἐπιστόλῃ, ἐν αἷς. 37. ἐβουλευσάτο] 'purposed,' or 'was disposed;' as v. 33. and xxvii. 39, where the term represents the result of deliberation or self-counsel.

38. ἤξιον] 'wished or thought proper.' This must be closely united with μὴ συμπαραλαβεῖν.

39. παροξυσμός] an exacerbation of spirit one against the other.

XVI. 1. κατήντησε.] Literally, 'went down to.' A sense of the word often occurring in this book, and peculiar to the later Greek writers. Τις, not found in several MSS., has been cancelled by Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz; but, I apprehend, without sufficient reason.

— ἦν ἐκεῖ.] Whether this is to be understood of Derbe, or of Lystra, Commentators are not agreed. The present passage favours the opinion that he was of Lystra; while that at xx. 4, is thought by some to prove him to have been of Derbe. But the Δερβαιοί there must refer to Gaius, and Gaius only, otherwise St. Luke would have written καὶ Γάιος καὶ Τιμόθεος, Δερβαιοί. He does not add Λυστριοί to Τιμ., because it was unnecessary, he having, he thought, expressed that here. And certainly the ἐκεῖ cannot well be understood of any other than Lystra, since that was the last-mentioned place. From the position of the cities, there can be no doubt that the Apostles went to Derbe first, and then to Lystra.

2. ἐμαρτυρεῖτο] 'a good testimony was borne him,' 'he was praised' (see Note supra xv. 8); namely, on account of his great knowledge of religion, and his ardent zeal in its promotion.

3. περιέτεμεν αὐ.] He had not been circumcised, because (as we learn from the Rabbins) his mother had no right to do that without the father's consent. The reason why Paul circumcised him (which he might do without any violation of Christian liberty, as being of Jewish stock, and because, though circumcision was not essential as necessary to the Gentile converts, it might yet be sometimes expedient) is just after expressed.

6. Ἀσίᾳ.] Meaning, that part of Asia Minor which was peculiarly so called, namely, Phrygia.

ular Asia, of which Ephesus was the capital. How this hindrance was effected, whether by dream or otherwise, has been variously supposed. Certainly had it been through direct revelation by dream, that would have been expressed. Hence we may suppose it to have been by a sort of visions impression on the mind (which the Apostles knew how to distinguish from ordinary feeling), through which medium their decision, that it would not be expedient to go thither, was produced by the influence of the Holy Spirit. In his view there will be some pertinency in the following passage of Philo-Jud. vol. ii. 176 (cited by Wetstein), Αἱ τοιαῦται εἰκασίαι συγγενεῖς προφητείας εἰσι. Ὁ γὰρ νοῦς οὐκ ἀν οὐτως σαφῶς αὐθυβόληται, εἰ μὴ καὶ θεῖον ἦν πνεῦμα τὸ ποδηγητοῦν πρὸς τὴν ἀλήθειαν.

7. κατὰ τὴν M.] Render, not 'in' (for they did not enter Mysia), but (with Valckn.) 'unto, as far as;' meaning, to the borders of. It should seem that when they finally determined not to go to Asia, they had so far advanced in their journey thither, as to be opposite to the chain of Mount Olympus. Then they went forward in a due westerly direction, until they came to the borders of Mysia, intending to make their way into Bithynia, by the plain of the river Rhyndacus, or at the western end of the chain of Olympus.

— κατὰ τὴν Βιθυνίαν.] Several MSS. and some Versions and Fathers have εἰς, which has been received by Griesbach, Titman, and Scholz; not without sufficient reason; since the external evidence for the reading is weak (Versions and Fathers being, in a case like this, of little weight), and internal quite the other way; for the εἰς is evidently from the margin, being an alteration of those who wished to remove a tautology, and make the sense plainer, not aware that the κατὰ here means versus, in the direction of, as Montanus, Beza, and Piscator render. At the same time, had εἰς been the true reading, it is difficult to imagine how it should have been altered into πρὸς in the great bulk of the MSS.

— Πνεῦμα.] Nine MSS. add Ἰησοῦ, and others, with several Versions and some Fathers, τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, which is adopted by Mill and Wetstein, and received into the text by Griesbach, Knapp, Titman, Vater, and Scholz. Yet there seems no sufficient evidence of its genuineness to warrant its reception. The external evidence is weak, as far as regards MSS.; and Versions and Fathers are, in a matter of this kind, not quite exceptionable testimony. But, to advert to internal evidence, it would at first sight seem that τὸ Πνεῦμα Ἰησοῦ is a very rare expression, occurring nowhere else but in Phil. i. 19 (and even in a different sense), we may far better account for the omission than for the insertion of Ἰησοῦ. And yet we do not elsewhere find that

rare expressions are cancelled by the scribes. Besides, when any very rare forms of expression are connected with important doctrinal questions, we are to advert to the possibility, nay, probability, that they may have been tampered with by the ancient Theologians, either by adding something to the text, or by removing something from it. Now, it appears from the Note of Wetstein, that the Romanists, a little after the printing of the Greek Text, maintained that Ἰησοῦ had been expunged by the Nestorians; which is incredible. They might rather have been expected to add than to remove it. The addition, however, I suspect, came from the Arians, who would have more reason to add it, in order to destroy so striking an example of τὸ Πνεῦμα in the personal sense. Thus it is caught up by all the Socinian interpreters. And when once introduced by the Arians, it would be likely to be admitted by the Nestorians, who would rather have it than not. From the former of these it was, I suspect, foisted into the Vulgate, and by the latter into the Syriac Version, and from thence it would easily be transmitted to the Æthiopic, Coptic, and Armenian Versions. Finally, the word is strongly discountenanced by the context. For, to use the words of Bp. Middleton, 'in the preceding verse we are told that the Apostles were forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia; in the present, that, on their attempting to go into Bithynia, the Spirit suffered them not.' It is, therefore, highly unnatural that the τὸ Πνεῦμα of the latter verse should be meant of any other than the τὸ ἄγιον Πνεῦμα of the former.

8. παρελθόντες.] The meaning cannot well be, that they passed by or along Mysia, namely by coasting its borders. No reason can be imagined why they should have taken so circuitous a course in order to go to the Troad. Moreover, the term κατίβησαν has allusion to the mountainous region they traversed in their course to the Troas. Now the mountainous country of Mysia is confined to the interior; and the chain of Temnos, Pedasus, Gargara, and Ida ranges along the whole of the interior. Accordingly, the sense intended by St. Luke must be, 'passed through,' 'traversed,' as the Vulg., Erasmus, Calvin, and others render. And so the Cod. Cant. has, by gloss, διελθόντες.

10. ἐζητήσαμεν.] From the use of we after that of they thus far, it is plain that the Evangelist himself became the companion of Paul and Timothy in this journey, having joined them at Troas.

— συμβιβάζοντας] 'including.' See Note on ix. 22.

11. ἀναχθέντες—εὐθυδρομήσαμεν.] Here we have two nautical terms; the former, as used of setting sail (literally, loosing ropes), the latter, of sailing in a straight course to any point without tacking; which implies a fair wind. So that the expression is equivalent to οὐριοδρομεῖν.

12. πρώτη τῆς μερίδος τῆς Μ. π.] No little perplexity here exists, from a difficulty to reconcile the present statement with the actual state of things then existing. According to the sense assigned by the Pesch. Syr. and some others, 'which is the metropolis of the country of Macedonia,' the words are contrary to facts, Thessalonica being undoubtedly the capital. And such will be equally the case if we take πρώτη for 'most considerable.' Indeed, by so interpreting we overlook the force of μερίδος, which, in such a connexion, can only be 'portion,' i. e. district. And that Macedonia had long been divided into four districts, we learn from the Historians. Indeed coins of the Provincia prima and secunda have been found. Hence it has been the opinion of many learned men that instead of πρώτη τῆς we should read πρώτης; by which the sense will be, 'which is a city of the Provincia prima of Macedonia.' Yet not a single MS. is found to support this conjecture; which, indeed, is little supported by probability, as introducing a sort of minute circumstance not very likely to have been adverted to by the sacred writer. It is better, therefore, to retain the common reading, and explain it as we best may. Now the main question is whether πρώτη may be supposed to mean 'the principal,' or 'a principal.' If we adopt the former sense, we encounter the objection, that Philippi was not even the capital of the district, but Amphipolis, as we learn from Livy and Diodorus. Hence Michaelis and Kuinoel adopt the latter sense; and they appeal to the unexceptionable evidence of Eckhel, Doctr. Vet. Numm. P. i. vol. iv. p. 282, in attestation of the fact, that πρώτη was sometimes so applied as to mean a principal, though not the principal city of a country. And certainly, this view being admitted, all objection on the score of geographical exactness will be removed. I am, however, inclined to think the word πρώτη was meant to have the sense 'the principal.' Nor is there any thing really formidable in the objection, that Amphipolis was the capital; for though Amphipolis had been originally the capital, yet it is very probable (as Weistien and Pearce suppose) that, after the battle of Philippi, that city was raised to the dignity of capital of the district, in the place of Amphipolis, which was then on the decline; especially since we know it was the policy of the Romans to make their colonies the capitals of the countries where they were situated. As, however, we have no historical proof of this transfer, it may be better (with Bp. Pearce) to understand πρώτη in the sense most considerable and important, in commerce, wealth, and population. And such the Romans would be especially anxious their colonies should be; and many causes would contribute to make them such. Still one difficulty yet remains. Whichever of the above senses be adopted, the τῆς before μερίδος is worse than useless; and has, I suspect, caused all the perplexity in question. Bp. Middleton, indeed, places it in the least objectionable point of view, by reading, 'which is the chief city of its district, a city of Macedonia, a colony.' But this is doing a manifest violence to the construction, and injury to the sense. I would therefore suppose a slight corruption to have crept into the text, occasioned by a mistake in placing the article τῆς. Now the first τῆς is not found in three ancient MSS., the Syriac Version, and Chrysostom; nor does it appear to have been in the copies read by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulgate Translators; nor in the originals of those MSS. which have μυρις, plainly by a confounding of the abbreviation of the termination δος with ε; and it is probably not genuine. I suspect, therefore, that it crept in by a mistake of the scribes; since those MSS. which have not the τῆς here, have it before Μαντι; and though it is there not found in ten MSS. (some of them of the highest antiquity), all of them have the τῆς before μερίδος. May we not, then, suppose that the article, which ought properly to be inserted but once, was first inserted in the wrong place, and afterwards (error gathering force like a snow-ball) both in the right place and the wrong? I have ventured to double bracket the τῆς, which is cancelled by Lachmann. Bender, 'which is the most considerable city of a district of Macedonia.'

13. παρὰ ποταμὸν] 'by the river side;' not 'by a river,' as our English translators render. The Article is here omitted on account of a proposition being used. This ποταμός is a mere rivulet (formed by the fountains, from which Philippi derived its first name, Crenides) running into the Strymon. A striking attestation to the truth of the narrative; for the river is so small as only to be found in the best modern maps.

—οὗ ἐνομιζέτο προσευχὴ εἶναι.] Some difference of opinion exists as to the sense of these words; which the earlier Commentators take to mean, 'where prayer was wont to be offered up,' feri; while the later ones interpret, 'where, according to the [Jewish] custom, there was a proseechie, or oratory.' That such places were frequent where, from the paucity of Jews, no synagogue was found, is proved by a reference to Tertullian and other ancient theologians; as also that such were situated, for the convenience of purification, by a river-side; since among the Jews (as also the Christians and even the Heathens) ablution always preceded prayer. Yet how the words οὗ ἐνομιζέτο εἶναι can have the above sense, still less be taken for οὗ ἔτι (which the usual one of teaching; see Matt. v. 1, and Note.

 It is plain that the congregation consisted of women only, not, as is commonly supposed, a mixture of both sexes. To account for which, we may suppose, that since that separation of the sexes which always subsisted in regular buildings, such as synagogues, was impossible in places like the pre-attending at different times.

 14. Λυδία.] Some take this as a name of country, and to be joined with γυνή. But the ὀνόματι associated with it shows it to be a proper name. The name was common both among the Greeks and Romans. Πορφυρόπωλις means a seller not of purple dye, as some suppose, but of purple vests, for the dyeing of which the Lydians were famous, who seem to have participated in,
 or rather succeeded to, the reputation of the Tyrians. She was probably a resident of Thyatira in Lydia, where her vests were manufactured,
 but then sojourning at Philippi, for the purposes of her business. By the expression just after, σεβόμενη τὸν Θεόν, is meant, that she was a devout Gentile, worshipping the one true God,
 i. e. a proselyte of the gate.
 — ἤκουεν] 'was a hearer.'
 — διήνοιξε τὴν καρδίαν.] An expression probably derived from the Hebrew; for we find it in the Jewish prayers, as also in 2 Macc. i. 4, δ. τὴν
 καρδίαν ὑμῶν ἐν τῷ νόμῳ αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐν τοῖς προστάγμασι. Also in a passage of Themist. ii.
 p. 29 (cited by Wetstein), ξῖνον τι ἀτεχνῶς ὑπο-

 μοι τὸ στήθος καὶ ἡ καρδία, καὶ διανοίσι τὴν γίνεται ἡ ψυχὴ, καὶ τὰ ὁρμήματα ὀξύτερα τῆς διανοίας ὀρώ γούν, ὧ μακάριοι, ἃ πρότερον οὐχ ὅσοι τε ἦν. The mind is said to be closed against admonition, when either from prejudice, it cannot discern the truth, or from pride and per-versity, will not admit it. Hence, to open the mind or heart denotes, 'to render it more intelligent,' to cause that any one shall better perceive the truth, and more readily yield assent to it.
 The opening in question was effected by the grace of God working by his Spirit concurrently with the good dispositions of Lydia.
 15. πιστὴν τῷ Κυρίῳ] i. e. 'a true believer in the Lord' and his religion, so as to be fit to be admitted to baptism. These words, as Calvin observes, have the force of earnest appeal; q. d.
 'By the faith which you have approved by the seal of baptism, I conjure you not to refuse to abide with me.'
 — παρεβιάσατο ἡμᾶς.] This term, like ἀναγ-κάζω, is used of the moral compulsion of urgent entreaty, such as, in a manner, compels the person to grant the request. St. Luke here, and in his Gospel xxiv. 29, seems to have had in mind

16. Here we have further recorded the increase and prosperity of the Church; and though this is not expressly mentioned, it may, however, very well be collected from the context, that many were brought to the faith, or, at least, a certain number was added to the Church; and that not in vain did Paul frequent the congregation at the time of prayer. (Calvin.)

— παιδίσκην.] Meaning, a maid servant, i. e. a slave.

— ἔχουσαν πνεῦμα Πύθ.] Πύθων was, in Greek mythology, the name of a large serpent slain by Apollo (see Ælian, V. Hist. iii. 1), and transferred, as an appellation, to Apollo himself; from whom, as the god of divination, it came to be applied to soothsayers, conjurors, and those who pretended to evoke spirits. Now, as ventriloquism was a most useful art to persons of that profession, they generally acquired more or less of it; hence the word is sometimes explained ventriloquist in the Greek Lexicographers. And these πύθωνες were so called because the god was supposed to speak from their stomachs, and emit words through their throats, without their using any of their own organs of speech.

Whether this girl was a ventriloquist or not, has been much disputed. The negative has been generally maintained by the most eminent Commentators (see Deyl., Wolf, and Kuin.); and with reason; for there is nothing in the name, still less in the circumstances, to warrant the former supposition. This question is closely connected with another, and more important one,—whether she was a pretender to the gift of divination. This also has been by Deyling, Wolf (de Servis Fatidiciis), Walch, and Biscoe, decided in the negative. There is somewhat more to countenance the opinion of certain eminent recent Commentators, that she was a lunatic, who (like Johanna Southcote) fancied that she was inspired to foretell future events. This notion, however, involves insuperable difficulties, being inconsistent with the view taken by the Sacred writer; which requires us to suppose (as the ancient, and most modern Commentators have done) that the girl was possessed with an evil spirit, which enabled her to occasionally foretell future events. So Hesychius explains Πύθωνα by δαίμονιον μαγικόν. The expression, then, is a kindred one with that used by St. Luke in his Gospel iv. 34, ἄνθρωπος ἔχων πνεῦμα δαιμονίου ἀκαθάρτου.

— ἐργασίαν.] This word, from ἐργάζεσθαι, Angl. to make money, signifies gain. Of this sense, somewhat rare, an example occurs in Josephus, Bell. ii. 7. 2, καταχρησάμενος αὐτῷ τῇ ὁμοιότητι πρὸς ἐργασίαν· τοσαῦτα γὰρ αὐτῷ φέροι δῶρα, &c.

— τοῖς κυρίοις.] Fischer and Vater take this as plural for singular, as in Luke xix. 33. This passage, however, is of a different nature; and to call in enallage would be here entirely unnecessary; since Grotius and Wahl have fully proved, that the common possession of a slave, especially when exercising any gainful trade, was not unfrequent.

17. δούλοι τοῦ Θεοῦ—σμερ.] Though the expression δούλος Θεοῦ was in use among the Gentiles, to signify those devoted to any god as his priests, yet as ὁδὸς σωτηρίας was one quite unknown to them, we might imagine that both expressions were derived from persons who had heard Paul and Timothy preach; but that it is best to suppose the words pronounced by the demon through the organs of the girl, and thus bearing the same honourable testimony to the Apostles as had been borne by the demons to our Lord.

18. διαπονηθεὶς] 'wearied out.' See supra iv. 2.
 19. ἐξῆλθεν.] There seems to be (as Valcha remarks) a paronomasia with the preceding ἐξῆλθεν, since with the going out of the demon was gone their hope of gain. Ἐπιλαβόμενοι, 'having (caused to be) apprehended;' as xviii. 17. xii. 34, and Luke xxiii. 26. Ἐλκεῖν is, like εύρεω (as which see infra xvii. 6, and supra viii. 3), not to be understood of personal violence, but only of the constraint of law, by any one's being impeached. So the Latin reperere in jure, and reperere ad prætorium. Ἀρχοντας is a general term; in the place of which we have, in the next verse, the more special one στρατηγοί; for as, scilicet, the magistrates at Philippi were called. The term was applied to the officers denominated by the Romans Prætores Urbani. And to the city magistrates of the Colonies the same appellation was applied, partly by courtesy.

ἐκταράσσουσιν] 'are causing great disturbance.' The charge made was two-fold: 1. they were disturbers of the public peace; that they were teachers of unlawful religions and rites: both charges falling under violation of the magistracy. So Servius on En. viii. 187 (cited by Wetstein), 'Cautum pud Romanos, ne quis novas introduceret eas.' And though the Romans were not at, yet, in their permission to foreigners hip God according to their consciences, it derstood that there should be no public s at proselytism. And whenever the for-urge was connected with the latter (as it well be), the magistrates were bound to and that with the utmost severity. So Paulus, Sentent. v. 21. 2 (cited by Wetst.), novas religiones inducunt, ex quibus animi mō moveantur, honestiores deportantur, res capite puniuntur. In Ἰουδαῖοι ὑπάρ- it is suggested, that their offence is so the greater, by the persons being, as fo- and of a most despised nation, those who less to have ventured to commit it.

ἔθ.] Meaning, religious rites and customs. see vi. 14, and Note.

περιρρήξαντες.] By this use of the with which may be compared that of the violate, is always denoted a hasty, and, by another, a violent stripping off (περὶ, m around) of the clothes. So Xenoph., 7 Raphael, τὴν ἐσθῆτα περιρρήξαντες, ed. Sic. l. xvii. 35, οἱ τὰς ἐσθ. περιρ-ηται. Here we are to understand a strip- the waist only; as in Plut. Poplic. 6, π. bria. This scourging was, we may sup- sicted, not (as some have imagined) qua-argo, in order to extort a confession of it, as a temporary punishment, to satisfy ple; the final examination of the charge erved for another occasion, after time s taken to make further inquiry into the ἐν ἑσπέραν φυλ.] So Liv. Hist. xxxiv. minius in inferiorem demissus carcerem ills were not so strongly built at the outer the inner; to which there was access by gates, and where sometimes there were subterraneous dungeons. Chains, too, were added, to secure the prisoners committed there, and a machine employed, called ξύλον, of wood bound with iron, in which the arms and head were sometimes confined (as in our pillory), but more frequently the legs only, or rather the feet; for the machine was one in which the feet were constrained and bruised. Hence it was called ξύλο-πίδη, ποδοκάκη, and ποδοστράφη (Heb. π, Job xiii. 27. xxxiii. 11). So Plaut. Pœn. v. 6. 28, 'ne sis apud me in lignæ custodiâ.' Sometimes the machine was one in which all the mem- bers were held, by being thrust through five holes; whence it was called παντεσσύριγγος. So Aristoph. Eq. 1049, τουτονὶ Δῆσαι σ' ἰκέλιε παντεσσύριγγω ξύλω.

25. ὕμνου τὸν Θεόν.] 'were returning thanks to God,' i. e. for the honour done them of suffering in his cause (see v. 41, and Matt. v. 11, 12), and for the support he afforded them under affliction. The circumstance of the other prisoners 'hearing them' is recorded, to intimate that they prayed aloud; doubtless in order to testify their conscience to be void of offence, and their joy in the Holy Ghost.

26. καὶ πάντων τὰ δεσμὰ ἀνέθη.] By this expression most Commentators understand that the chains of the prisoners were relaxed, though not so much as to place them quite at liberty. This, however, is difficult to be conceived, and, from the use of the word in the Classical writers, ἀνέθη τὰ δεσμὰ can only signify 'were freed from their chains;' a circumstance, like the preceding ones, undoubtedly to be ascribed to Divine interposi- tion; the great intent of the whole transaction being, to evince, in the most decided manner, the presence of the Deity. And as the opening of the prison doors might have been ascribed to accident and a natural cause (namely, the earth- quake), therefore the prisoners were likewise all of them set free from their chains, yet held en- chained by a secret influence, that they should not endeavour to make their escape. All which plainly bespoke the miraculous. To ascribe this, as certain Rationalists have done, to the effect of the electric fluid of lightning dissolving the chains, is a notion so utterly against sound reason, as well as sober religion, that nothing but the credu-lous incredulity of scepticism could for a moment entertain it.

28. μηδὲν πράξεις σ. κ.] An euphemism, like that of Xenophon, cited by Wetstein, ἰδοῖσθαι γὰρ μὴ τι ἑαυτὸν ἐργάσασθαι δεινόν.

29. αἰτήσας φῶτα.] So Plutarch, vol. ii. p. 311 (cited by Wetstein), ὥς αἰτήσας. Phædr. x. 10. 24, 'dum querunt lumen.' Here, indeed, the plural is used; but that seems to have been by a common idiom (as in several other words) of plural for singular. So in Strabo, v. p. 187, ed. Sieb., we have τὰ φῶτα for lumen. Thus there is no reason to think that φῶτα here means torches or lamps, by what some call a Hellenistic idiom, but which is occasionally found in the Classical writers, yet only in the singular. Whereas in Latin the plural lumina is as frequent as the singular lumen, especially in phrases, such as luminibus accensis.

— ἔντρομος.] Various causes might produce this feeling, especially that of awe, as in the presence of Divine legates; attested to be such by the late supernatural occurrence.

30. Κύριοι, τί με δεῖ, &c.] Many eminent recent Commentators take these words to mean, 'What must I do to be safe?' namely, from the punishment of the magistrates, or the wrath of heaven for harshly treating persons thus singularly distinguished by the Divine favour. But surely, as respects the former, the jailor had done nothing to merit punishment; and as to the latter, the blame rested not on him, but on the magistrates. The true sense of the words is doubtless that commonly assigned to them,—'by what means can I attain unto eternal salvation?' exactly as in the similar inquiry of the people to

John the Baptist, Luke iii. 10, 'What shall we do?' τί ποιήσομεν; and that of others to our Lord, John vi. 28, τί ποιῶμεν, ἵνα ἔργασώμεθα τὰ ἔργα τοῦ Θεοῦ; meaning, as appears from the preceding verse, works such as shall endure εἰς τὴν αἰώνιον. Finally, such was the inquiry of the Apostle himself (supra ix. 6), when, 'trembling and astonished,' even as the trembling jailor here, he said, in answer to that reproving voice from above, 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?' Certainly the jailor could not be ignorant that his illustrious prisoners had professed to teach the means of attaining unto eternal salvation; and seeing their Divine commission so to do thus placed beyond all doubt, by the Divine interposition lately exerted in their behalf, well might he put the anxious question, 'Masters, what shall I do to be saved?'

31. πίστευσον ἐπὶ, &c.] It is here taken for granted that his family became believers, as well as himself.

33. ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ τῆς ν.] 'at that very hour of the night,' unseasonable as it was. 'Ἐλουσεν ἀπὸ τῶν πλ.' It is not necessary to suppose, with some, ἔλουσεν put for ἐλ. καθάρσας; or, with others, to take ἀπὸ in the sense propter, supplying σώματα. There is rather a blending of two kinds of expression,—namely, ἔλουσεν αὐτοὺς, and ἀπέλουσεν αἷμα τῶν πληγῶν. So Rom. ii. 2. 345, ἔφρα τάχιστα Πάτρονλον λούσας ἐν βρότῳ αἱματώεστα, where λούσας—αἷμα, is for ἀπολούων β. αἷμα.

37. ἔφη πρὸς αὐτοὺς. i. e. to the heads, by a message, it should seem, sent by the jailor.

'Ἀκατάκριτος signifies, 'found not guilty, at trial, of any wrong.' Ἐβεβόλωσε is not well

— οὐ γάρ.] An elliptical formula, like many similar ones in Latin and English, in which the brevity of expression (to be supplied by ποιεῖν ἰδεῖν, or the like,) is very well suited to a feeling of indignation. Render, non ita, 'no, indeed!'
 In ἄλλα ἐλθόντες, &c. may be traced a sort of symbolical action, expressive of conviction of their innocence. This, indeed, appears, from the citations of Commentators, to have been not unfrequently done by way of making the amende honorable. Thus Apuleius, l. iii. p. 134, tells a story of a person, who was falsely condemned by the magistrates, and afterwards induced them to make the amende honorable by going, in form, to his house: 'Ecce illico (says he) etiam magis-tratus ipsi, cum suis insignibus, domum nostram ingressi, talibus me monitis delinire gestiunt, Neque tuæ dignitati,' &c.

Certainly the Apostle was fully justified in acting with the spirit he did—not for the sake of a mere point of personal privilege or honour, but from a sense of duty, in order to assert the dignity of the law, and prevent its being similarly violated in the case of others; but, above all, to vindicate the character and reputation of himself and Silas, intimately connected as they were with the honour and furtherance of the Gospel. In short, as the injustice had been public and wilful,
 so it was fit that the reparation should be public and voluntary.

38. ἐφοβήθησαν ἀκούσαντες ὅτι 'P. s.] Well, indeed, they might; since the punishment for such a violation of the privilege of a Roman citizen was of the severest kind.

39. παρεκάλεσαν α.] 'besought them.'

40. εἰσῆλθον εἰς τὴν Α.] Some stumble at this idiom, and would read Λυδίας. But to this the MSS. afford no countenance; and it has been proved by Wolf, Alberti, Heumann, Kypke, and Valcknaer, that εἰσέρχεσθαι εἰς τὴν α is not unfrequently used in the sense 'to enter into any one's house.' So Plutarch, p. 237, εἰς Φειδε-λὸν εἰσέλθων, and Lysias, Orat. 2, εἰς ὕμης
 δ' εἰσέλθων ἐπὶ τῶν δικαίων ταύτῃσθαι.
 For εἰς several MSS. have πρὸς, which has been adopted by almost all recent Editors. But I suspect that it was an alteration of some who wished thereby to prevent the recurrence of εἰς after εἰσῆλθον.

— παρεκάλεσαν.] The term here seems to have the united sense of admonishing and exhorting, and perhaps comforting. See Note on 2 Cor. i. 4.

of the Jews,' and would render, 'the synagogue,' as signifying merely that the Jews of the surrounding district had their synagogue there. An explanation, however, so little satisfactory, that it is better to suppose the Article to have here crept in from the ἦν preceding. It is not found (as Scholz testifies) in MSS. A. B. D. (the three most ancient), also 13, 18, 19, 36, 40, and others; also Lut. 12, and Chrysostom, and several of the ancient Versions. That it should have crept in here is by no means improbable; since the Article is almost always used with συναγ., and the preceding ἦν in abbreviated character nearly resembles ἦ. Indeed, there seems no place for it, and not without reason has it been cancelled by Lachm.

2, 3. διελέγετο αὐτοῖς, &c.] Διαλέγεσθαι is a term of very general acceptance, denoting 'to discourse in any way,' especially to harangue. Thus it signifies to deliver orations, whether civil or military, and also disserte, 'to maintain disputations, or bring forward discourses,' as philosophers or teachers used to do to their scholars. So Ælian, V. H. iii. 19, ὁ δὲ Ξενοκράτης ἀκούσας, παραχρῆμα ἦκε πρὸς Πλάτωνα, καὶ κατέλαβε διαλεγόμενον τοῖς σὺν ἑαυτῷ. So that it might very well be applied to such discourses (or sermons) as St. Paul delivered.

Of the next words, διανοίγων, &c. the sense will chiefly depend on the construction, which has been disputed. The ancient and early modern Commentators place a comma after γραφῶν, of course joining ἀπὸ γραφῶν with διελέγετο; and at διανοίγων and παρατιθέμενος supplying γραφάς from γραφῶν; while others (consisting of the later Commentators, from Grot. to Kuin.) place a comma after αὐτοῖς. Yet the former construction is the more natural, and agreeable to the simplicity of Scripture style. The two terms διανοίγων and παρατ. have reference to the two principal parts of the ratiocination. 1. Opening out and bringing to light truth generally. 2. Laying down and propounding various particular truths; in order, from a collation of such particulars, to deduce some general conclusion, as here, ὅτι οὗτός ἐστι, &c. At ὅτι δὲ—ὑμῖν there is a transition from the oratio obliqua to the directa. See Acts i. 4.

4. προσεκληρώθησαν τῷ Π. II.] The verb has a reciprocal sense, 'joined themselves to,' 'took their lot with.'

—γυναικῶν τῶν πρώτων.] Answering to the

τῶν εὐσεβούνων infra v. 12, and xiii. 50, honourable matrons, wives, or widows. Thus Apuleius speaks of femina primates.

5. ζηλώσαντες δὲ οἱ ἀπ. [I.] Very many MSS. have προσλαβόμενοι δὲ οἱ Ἰουδ. αἰσίου, which reading has been received by Maubach, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz. And indeed there is reason to suspect that ζηλώσαντες came from the margin; whence it was probably introduced by those who had in mind a passage supra vii. 9, and perhaps one at Wisd. ii. 24, φθόνος τοῦ διεβόλου θανάτου εἰσῆλθαν εἰς τὸν κόσμον; or possibly the ancient Critics may have introduced it, in order to remove one of the participles at least from a sentence overloaded with them.

—τῶν ἀγοραίων.] Ἀγοραῖος denotes 'belonging to the forum, or market,' and carries various significations, according to the business done there, whether as applied to things or persons. As regarded the latter, it denoted market-people; some of whom were petty chaffers, others acting as porters, nay, even mere idlers; who, like the Lazzaroni at Naples, almost lived in the market. So Horace, Art. Poet. 245, 'in nati triviales ac pæne forenses.' The term came at length to mean persons of the basest sort,—the dregs of society.

—ἄνδρας πονηροὺς.] Not 'wicked,' as Bp. Pearce, Abp. Newc., and others render; but rather (as this expression is meant to qualify the τῶν ἀγοραίων), 'mean fellows.' Of this signification of πονηρός, which is somewhat rare, I can adduce the following examples: Thucyd. vii. 73, τινὰ μοχθηρὸν ἀνθρώπων (a beggarly fellow) ὡστρακισμένον—διὰ πονηρίας, 'because of his meanness.' Aristoph. Eq. 181, where is μέγας γίγνεσθαι is opposed πονηρὸς εἰς ἔργους εἶναι. And in Xenophon the πολῖται πονηροὶ are often opposed to the οἱ χρηστοί, the better sort. See also Lucian i. 483. Thucyd. vi. 51 — ἰθορύβουν] 'threw into disturbance'; as in Thucyd. iii. 78. vii. 61, and Dionys. Hal. ix. 68, ἰθορύβουσαν τὴν πόλιν.

—τὸν δῆμον.] Not 'the people,' as E. V.; much less 'the mob,' as Doddridge renders; but the popular assembly: a signification frequent in Thucydides, Xenophon, and the best writers.

6. ἔσυρον.] See Note supra viii. 3. Πολιτάρχας, 'the city magistrates'; a form of late Grecism, for πολιτάρχους.

— τὴν οἰκ. ἀναστατώσαντες.] This expression is to be taken in a popular sense, and not to too rigorously interpreted. Ἀναστ. is a word found elsewhere in the LXX. It is for ἐστατον ποιήσαντες in the Classical writers.
 are, however, it is used in the physical sense, destroying and expelling any people from their entry; while here, and infra xxi. 38, it is employed, like our turn upside down, to figuratively
 note perverting, exciting to tumult and insurrection. So ἀναστειν in Luke xxiii. 5.

1. ὑποδέδεκται.] Meaning, 'has received as guests and friends.' So in Luke xix. 6. James 25, and often in the Classical writers. The ὑ in ὑποδ. is not pleonastic, having the force δέχισθαι ὑπὸ τὸν οἶκον. See Matt. viii. 8, compared with Gen. xix. 8.

2. καὶ λαβ. τὸ ἱκανόν.] Τὸ ἱκανόν λαβεῖν is Greek translation of the Latin law phrase satisfactionem accipere, 'to take surety,' the opposite of ἔσθ is ἱκανόν δοῦναι. The purport of the payment (whether by bail or otherwise) probably was, that he would send away Paul and Silas thence, and would undertake to keep the peace.

11. εὐγενέστεροι.] Not, 'more noble' (for the men were probably but tradesmen), but rather a better sort of people, the more respectable; Chrysostom seems to have taken the expression by explaining it ἐπιεικέστεροι, which word is used in Xen. Hist. i. 1. 21, and Thucyd. viii.
 ; ἀνθρώπους ἐπιεικέας, where see my Note.
 Now, this may very well include the sense implied by others, candid and well-disposed;
 as it is observable that the better or more respectable class of persons are usually more disposed to a calm and rational investigation of truth, than those of the inferior and less reflecting multitude. In this sense, indeed, the word is used by Philo, de Nobil. p. 904, 'Ἐπιεικὲς τοῖνυν

ἡ εὐγένεια κεκαθαρμένη διανοίας καὶ καθαρσίαις τελείοις κληροῖς οἰκίαις, μόνους χρὴ λίγειν εὐγενεῖς τοὺς σώφρονες καὶ δικαίους.

— τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν.] The Article here would seem to have no force, and is in several MSS. not found. It must, however, be retained; since we may better account for its omission than for its insertion. To account for its being employed
 here, it is proper to bear in mind that καθ' ἡμέ-
 ραν is often used with the article for the adjective ἡμερινός. The substantive is generally expressed,
 but sometimes omitted, and left to be supplied
 from the context, or the subject-matter. Here
 ἴσθις may be supplied, and the common ellipsis of κατὰ supposed. Thus the sense will be, 'in their daily habits of life;' equivalent to the Thucydi-
 dean τὸν καθ' ἡμέραν βίον, or the Æschinean τὴν καθ' ἡμέραν διαίταν. And so the best writers say τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ, 'quantum ad me attinet.'

— ἀνακρίνοντας.] This is well explained by Chrysostom, ἀνερυνώντας. The ἀνα is intensifying, and this sense of κρίνειν springs from that primitive sense, 'to separate, to sift the corn
 from the chaff;' from which arises the derived and
 figurative one, to sift out any thing, by separating
 truth from falsehood.

13. σαλεύοντες] 'agitating;' from σάλλω, the surge of the sea. The Classical writers (as Soph.
 Ed. R. 25) have many passages where political turbulence is compared to the tossing of a tempestuous sea.

14. πορ. ὡς ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν.] Markland
 asks, to what sea? and would read Θεσσαλίαν.
 His query, however, may be readily answered.
 In the case of places situated, like Berea, between two seas, to go to the sea must denote to
 the nearest sea; and if embarkation for a voyage
 be implied, the nearest sea-port may be supposed.
 That, in the present case, was Pydna. Thus, in a kindred passage of Thucydides, i. 137, Adme-

Ἐν δὲ ταῖς Ἀθήναις ἐκδεχομένου αὐτοῦ τοῦ Παύλου, 16 παρωξύνετο τὸ πνεῦμα αὐτοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ θεωροῦντι κατείδωλον οὔσαν τὴν πόλιν. ¹ Διελέγετο μὲν οὖν ἐν τῇ συναγωγῇ 17 τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις καὶ τοῖς σεβομένοις, καὶ ἐν τῇ ἀγορᾷ κατὰ πᾶσαν ἡμέραν πρὸς τοὺς παρατυγχάνοντας. Τινὲς δὲ 18 τῶν Ἐπικουρείων καὶ τῶν Στωϊκῶν φιλοσόφων συνέβαλλον

tus, to remove Themistocles out of the reach of those who were seeking his life, sends him ἐπὶ τὴν ἰτρίαν θάλασσαν, which must mean the Ægean; and, as we afterwards learn, to Pydna. But had τὴν θάλασσαν been written, the Adriatic must have been understood.

The ὡς ἐπὶ our English Translators render 'as if,' or 'as it were;' which compels them to suppose that this going to the sea was only a stratagem to deceive his enemies, who might suppose he was taking ship, when he, in fact, meant to go to his destination by land. The ὡς, however, is but a slender foundation on which to erect such a notion. There can be no doubt that the two words ὡς ἐπὶ are to be taken together, and understood according to the sense of the expression in many passages of Classical writers cited by the Commentators, where the ὡς is pleonastic. Or, we may render, 'even unto.'

15. καθιστώντες.] I would not, with Kuinoel, consider this as put for προσέμποντες. The two words are far from being synonymous; προσέμπο signifying 'to set any one forward on his way to any place,' by accompanying him part of the distance thither; καθίστημι, 'to take charge of any one (as guide and defender) to any place, and there set him down.' So Hom. Od. v. 274, τοὺς μ' ἐκέλευσα Πύλονδ' ἀταστέλλειν καὶ ἰφίσσαι. The latter term occurs in Thucydides, iv. 78, κατέστησαν (scil. οἱ ἄγοντες) αὐτὸν ἐς Δίον; and several examples of it might be adduced from Xenophon, Plutarch, and Jamblichus. The construction properly requires an εἰς or ἐπὶ, or δέ. Wetstein, however, adduces an example of μέχρι from Arrian, which comes near to the ἕως of Luke.

— κατείδωλον.] 'full of idols.' An intensive force of κατά found in many words, as κατάδυστρος, κατάμπελος, κατάφυτος, &c. With respect to the fact, it is fully established and copiously illustrated by Wetstein; ex. gr. Pausanias says, that Athens had more images than all the rest of Greece; so also Thucydides, ii. 33, speaks of the Athenians as θυοῖαις διατηροῖσι νομίζοντες, where see my Note.

17. τῇ ἀγορᾷ.] There were many market-places; but the most considerable were the Ceramicus, or old, and the Forum Eretiacum, or new Forum; the former of which is supposed by Ikenius and Schleusner to be the one here meant, the latter by Kuinoel and most Commentators. And that this was by far the most frequented,

— τοὺς παρατ.] 'those whom he might happen to meet with.' The chief Forum was best adapted to his purpose, because it was the place where people met for conversation; and also where Socrates, and many other philosophers, had been accustomed to hold their discussions.

18. Ἐπικουρίων καὶ τῶν Στ.] The Επίκουροι were practically Atheists; since they held that the world was neither created by God, nor under the direction of his Providence. Πλεῖστον they accounted the summum bonum, and held that virtue was to be practised only for the sake of pleasure, not for its own sake. They maintained that the soul was material, like the body, and would perish with it, leaving nothing to be either hoped or feared after death. As to the Stoics, they did, indeed, believe in the existence of a God, but held such chimerical notions of his nature, attributes, and providence, as rendered that belief almost nugatory. They maintained that both God and man were bound by a necessitas fatalis; that the wise man yielded in no respect to God; of whom they believed that his nature was fire, and diffused throughout the world. On the condition of the soul after death, and on the existence of a state of rewards and punishments, they varied in opinion; but all denied the immortality of a future state. Nay, some thought that, sooner or later, the soul merged in the celestial fire of the Deity. Thus while the former denied the existence, or at least providence, of God, the latter, though professing to believe both, yet, by ascribing all human events to fate, destroyed the foundation of all religion as much as the former. It is obvious that both the above systems were as far as possible removed from the doctrines of Christianity; and therefore it is no wonder that the latter should have been both unaccountable and unacceptable to these philosophers. There were, besides, two other sects, the Platonists and the Peripatetics, the latter of whom probably came not near Paul, since their places of discussion were far removed. The opinions of the former made far nearer approaches than those of the other sects to the doctrines of Christianity; and these probably formed the far greater part of those who gave a qualified approbation of Paul's doctrines, by proposing to 'hear him again' on the subject of the immortality of the soul.

— συνέβαλλον.] Supply λόγους, which is expressed in Eurip. Iph. A. 630, and Xen. Mem. ii. 2. 21. The elliptical form occurs in Josephus, Jamblichus, and other later writers.

ὑψὶ· καὶ τινες ἔλεγον· Τί ἂν θέλοι ὁ σπερμολόγος οὗτος
 εἶναι; οἱ δὲ· Ξένων δαιμονίων δοκεῖ καταγγελεὺς εἶναι.
 ἵτις τὸν Ἰησοῦν καὶ τὴν ἀνάστασιν αὐτοῖς εὐηγγελίζετο.
 πηλαβόμενοι τε αὐτοῦ, ἐπὶ τὸν Ἄρειον πάγον ἤγαγον

σπερμολόγος.] This word, found only in Greek writers, was used properly of those birds (sparrows, &c.) which live by picking scattered seeds; but metaphorically, to those parasites who frequented the market, and lived by picking up any scattered or produce, and generally persons of object without any certain means of support. as the tribes of small birds which live by picking up seeds are especially garrulous, the word to denote one who picks up and retails tris-stories. Here, probably, both senses may be joined; q. d. 'an insignificant chatterer.'

Ξένων δαιμ. καταγγ.] We are not here to understand gods in the full sense of the term. It has been proved by the Commentators cited in Syn. (to whose matter I have there added what is important, from Max. Tyr., Jamblichus, Plutarch, Libani, Diog. Laert., Dion. Pindar, and others), that there was no distinction (though not always observed) between θεοὶ and δαιμόνες, by which the former applied to Jupiter and the other gods by the latter to those who had become so, originally men. These, according to some, had the ἥρωες, as Hercules; though others a third class of those. The above, then, all the classes which, properly speaking, reckoned as Divinities. But the Pagan logic comprehended another order of beings, δαιμόνια, holding the midway between gods and mere men, who were supposed to be mediators between God and man, by revealing the Divine will, and helping the imbecility of man's nature. One of these was said by Socrates to sit him; on which Xenoph. Mem. i. l. 2, was, was founded the charge against him of being καὶνὰ δαιμόνια, almost the same notion as that used of St. Paul, and with which we may compare Ælian, V. Hist. ii. 13, δαιμόνες. Some eminent Commentators that the Athenians meant by this to express the place claimed by Paul for Jesus was in a new class. But it is plain that what they meant the Apostle say of Jesus would give them notion of a Being who was at least a δαιμῶν, but one of the higher order. Nay, there is reason to believe that δαιμόνιον was sometimes used in the sense of δαιμῶν, as in the cited passage of Xenophon and those of Laert., Dio Cass., Ælian, and Josephus, &c. Weistien, where the expressions καὶνὰ θεῶν εὐαγγελιστῆς, or εὐαγγέλιον, and Ξένων θεῶν εὐαγγέλιον are used as equivalent.

Ἰησοῦν καὶ τὴν ἀνάστ.] Many emendations, ancient and modern (as Chrysostom, Selden, Hammond, Spencer, &c., Warburton, Valckenær, and Doddridge take ἀνάστ. (written ἀνάστασιν) as the new goddess. And certainly there is little to urge in favour of that view, on see Cudworth's Intellectual Syst. book i. l. who shows at large, that the heathens customed to deify not only virtues and vices, but the powers of nature. Yet the common interpretation, which was maintained by no less a scholar than BENTLEY, bears in its simplicity the stamp of truth, the sense being, 'preached Jesus, and the resurrection of the dead through him;' as being the first-fruits of those that slept. This, too, seems required by ver. 31, ἀναστήσας αὐτὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν, and 32, ἀκούσαντες ἀνάστασιν νεκρῶν. As to the use just before of the plural δαιμόνια, it may readily be accounted for from an idiom of frequent occurrence in all languages, and mostly used when a charge is made against any one. Thus it may be considered as said per hyperbole. It is not, however, improbable that they might so far mistake St. Paul, as to suppose that he preached two Gods, i. e. the Deity, and Jesus Christ. The God (namely, Jehovah) preached by him, and avowedly different from the Jupiter of the Athenians, might very well be esteemed by them a new and foreign God.

19. πηλαβόμενοι αὐτοῦ.] Commentators are not agreed whether this expression is to be regarded as importing violence, or not. Examples of both uses occur in the New Test. The former, however, is the more agreeable to the context. And it is countenanced by the fact, that the Areopagus was a tribunal for the trial of impiety, such as the introducing of the worship of foreign deities. Yet, after all, it may be doubted whether there was any thing of apprehension, properly so called, since there is no appearance of any regular trial before the court of Areopagus. There is, indeed, reason to think, that this court retained but a shadow of its ancient consequence, and had abated much of its ancient severity in matters of religion, otherwise foreign deities would not have been so worshipped as they then were at Athens. A stronger proof of which cannot be imagined than the following passage of Aristophanes, Horsæ, cited by Athen. l. ix. p. 372, where, after speaking of the abundance of every kind of produce supplied by the season, in such a manner that whatever was wanted could be had at any season, and one could scarcely tell what time of the year it was, this bounty of nature and the gods is ascribed by a speaker (I imagine, the Horsæ personified) to the piety of the Athenians: Τοῦτοις ὑπάρχει ταῦτ', ἵππειδ' τοὺς θεοὺς εἰσέουσιν. To this it is replied by one who stigmatizes the fondness of the Athenians for foreign superstitions, Ἀπὸ λανθαν ἄρα σεβούντες ὑμᾶς, ὥς σὺ φης· τίητι (quamobrem) Αἰγυπτῶν αὐτῶν τὴν πόλιν πεποιθήκαο', ἀντ' Ἀθηνῶν; meaning, that they had filled Athens as full of gods as Egypt, of which it was said, 'there one might sooner find a god than a man.'

These words, then, taken in conjunction with the preceding verse, suggest rather the idea of a tumultuary proceeding, on the part of the two classes of persons just before mentioned, than a regular trial. They, it should seem, thought proper to call Paul to a public account; and considered no place so proper as the hill of judgment called Areopagus: thus the words just after, δυσάμεθα γινώσκειν, as also βουλόμεθα γινώσκειν. It is observable, too, that the Apostle does

λέγοντες· Δυνάμεθα γινῶναι, τίς ἡ καινὴ αὕτη ἡ ὑπὸ σου λαλουμένη διδασχὴ; ξενίζοντα γάρ τινα εἰσφέρεις εἰς τὰς 20 ἀκοὰς ἡμῶν· βουλόμεθα οὖν γινῶναι, τί ἂν θέλοι ταῦτα εἶναι. Ἀθηναῖοι δὲ πάντες, καὶ οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες ξένοι, εἰς οὐδὲν 21 ἔτερον εὐκαίρουν, ἢ λέγειν τὶ καὶ ἀκουεῖν καινότερον. Σταθεὶς δὲ ὁ Παῦλος ἐν μέσῳ τοῦ Ἀρείου πάγου, ἔφη 22 Ἄνδρες Ἀθηναῖοι, κατὰ πάντα ὡς διαισιδαιμονεστέρους ὑμᾶς

not address them as judges,—nor seek any justification of his conduct,—but as philosophers. If, then, any of them were, as was Dionysius, Areopagites, they were there not sitting ex officio, but as private individuals. This may perhaps account for the little seriousness or ceremony which the Apostle met with.

19. δυνάμεθα γινῶναι.] This is Hellenistic Greek; both in the use of δύνασθαι for 'to be permitted,' and in the not prefixing some particle of interrogation to the verb.

20. ξενίζοντα.] Literally, 'matters which strike us with surprise.'

— εἰσφέρεις εἰς τὰς ἀκοὰς.] This plural use of the word has been thought rare in any other but the New Testament writers. Yet examples of it might be adduced from Euripides, Ælian, Herodian, Polybius, and Themiſtius. With εἰσφ. εἰς τὰς ἀκοὰς here I would compare εἰς ὅσα φέρειν in Eurip. Dan. 55.

21. οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες ξένοι.] The distinction between the ἀστοὶ and ξένοι was no where more strongly marked than at Athens. The ἀστοὶ considered themselves as alone possessing any rank, while all the rest were included indiscriminately under the name ξένοι. They called themselves the αὐτοχθόνες, or first inhabitants; the rest they styled ἐπὶ ἡλῦδας, or new comers. There was, however, a class between one and the other, called μέτοικοι, sojourners, who had a sort of ius civitatis. Now, it has been debated whether by οἱ ἐπὶ δ. ξένοι are to be understood all the ξένοι, or only the μέτοικοι, or both of them. Kypke and Kuinoel adopt the second view; and rightly; for though ξένοι might include both (so Thucyd. ii. 36, τὸν ὕμειλον καὶ ἀσπίων καὶ ξένων), yet since ἐπὶ δὴμ. is here added, and as the difference between the μέτοικοι and the ξένοι was, that the former were regular residents of the city, and accordingly obliged to take the oath of allegiance, and participate in military service, the latter were merely sojourners, drawn thither by business or pleasure.

— εἰς οὐδὲν ἔτερον εὐκαίρουν]. 'nulli rei magis vacabant.' Εὐκαίρ. is here used for συχολάζειν, by a use confined to the later writers. The next words are graphic, and point at the chief traits of the Athenian character,—garrulity, and rage for novelty. Inasmuch that at Athens there were places called λέσχαι, appropriated to the reception of newsmongers.

Καινότερον Commentators regard as an example of the Comparative for the Positive. Yet in such cases the Comparative is seldom without its force, though it may not be very possible to express it in translating. Here the examples adduced by Commentators are not quite to the purpose; because in those the sentence is interrogative. They might more appositely have cited Josephus, Bell. i. 18. 1, τοῖς ὀργάνοις ἀντιμη-

χανώμενοι δαί τι κώλυμα καινότερον. In the present case the full sense probably is, 'to tell or hear the latest news.' So Eurip. Orest. 1327, τί δὲ νεώτερον λέγεις; the sense seems to be, 'What is the latest news you have to tell?'

22. In this brief but forcible address (which would doubtless have been longer, had it not been broken off by the scoffs of some, and the listlessness and abrupt departure of others) the Apostle wisely accommodates himself to the circumstances of his hearers. After a complimentary exordium (such as was usual in publicly addressing the Athenians), accompanied with a præoccupatio benevolentis, frequent in the ancient orators, he notices the occasion which led to his addressing them, and shows that it is his desire to enable them to satisfy their wish of worshipping even unknown gods, by pointing out that great Being (to them hitherto unknown) who is THE ONLY AND THE TRUE GOD, some of whose chief attributes, together with his various benefits, both of creation and providence, the Apostle then proceeds to enumerate. And here we may notice the admirable address, by which a seemingly plain statement of the first principles of natural religion is made acceptable to persons of the most opposite description, and highly instructive, by being aimed at the errors of each. Thus, by adverting to the works of God in creation, the Apostle means to censure the dogmas of the Epicureans; and by what he says of the providential care of God over all things, he glances at the opinions of the Stoics and Epicureans; finally, in speaking of sacrifices, temples, and the creation of man, he reproves the superstitions of the ignorant multitude. He shows where each party was right, and where both parties were wrong; directing his words as well against the irreligious scepticism of the higher ranks, as the grovelling superstition of the inferior classes.

Having thus established the existence of one God and Father of all mankind, he infers the duty, incumbent on God's creatures, of seeking, i. e. worshipping him; at the same time noticing certain erroneous modes of worship, which had originated in utter ignorance of the true nature of the Deity. This introduces an exhortation to abandon these errors, strengthened by an announcement of a future day of judgment and punishment for all wilful disobedience to the Divine will. Now this implied a present state of accountability, and the duty of guiding themselves by the light of that Gospel, which God had been pleased to reveal by Jesus Christ.

— δαισιδαιμονεστέρους.] The sense most commonly assigned, 'too superstitious,' can by no means be defended. That would imply (what surely could not be supposed) that there may be a degree of superstition that is good. Equally objectionable is the sense assigned by Calvin,

ἡρώ. Διερχόμενος γὰρ καὶ ἀναθεωρῶν τὰ σεβίσματα
ῶν, εὗρον καὶ βωμὸν ἐν ᾧ ἐπετέγραπτο· ἈΓΝΩΣΤΩΙ
ΘΕΩ. Ὁν οὖν ἀγνοοῦντες εὐσεβείῃ, τοῦτον ἐγὼ καταγ-

Campbell, and Newcome, 'somewhat too
n.' The most eminent Expositors for the story have been of opinion, that δεῖσις is employed in the good acception,—to denote
religious, i. e. attentive to religion, [as far understood it.] So the Pesch. Syr. Versions, 'I see that in all things ye excel in relish of the δαίμονες, or gods.' That the don will bear this sense, has been established by a multitude of proofs. And that the
was very attentive to religious observance, has been proved on the testimonies of the writers of every kind—dramatists, historians and philosophers; especially Pausan. Attic.
2. Ἀθηναίοις περισσώτερον τι ἢ τοῖς ἑτέροις ἐν ταῖς ἱερῇ σπουδῇ. See also 2 v. 19. That such is the sense intended in the present passage, is plain from the air of the ἀντίστασις, and will appear by a consideration of the circumstances in which the Apostle was then

To a people like the Athenians, so scrupulously observant of all the rules of courtesy on occasions of public address, it were surely improbable that the Apostle (with that distinction which ever actuated his zeal) should have chosen to commence with the language
of allusion, rather than abrupt rebuke; which,
in such a case, would have been the more out of place,
seeing that it was customary for foreigners
to address the people, to begin with payment of compliment to the place. Nevertheless,
all, perhaps, not err, if we suppose that St.
Paul purposely selected the ambiguous term δαί-μονες, because he could not conscientiously use the word θεοί; since the gods whom they worshipped were, in his estimation, demons. So 1 Cor. x. 20, Ὅτι τὰ ἱερῇ δαίμονος εἰδὲς, καὶ οὐ θεῶν.
For, as δαίμονες properly meant gods of evil kind, the hint would not be pointed.
The Apostle, then, commends their worshipping,
shows that they 'worship they know not'
(John iv. 22), meaning, that 'they are very ignorant in their way.' Again, that the comparative means very, and not too, is plain from the following. Of ὅς here the sense is that some take it to be, quasi; and so far from abating (as Campbell supposes) the importance of the comparative, it is intensive; as it always is when the comparative is put for the superlative, or when, as here, it denotes a high degree of the positive.

Δε σεβίσματα δ.] Not 'your devotions,' Erasmus, Koppe, Schleusner, and Kuinoel
the ἱερά, or objects of your worship,'
as in temples, altars, images, sacrifices, in 2 Thess. ii. 4. Wisd. xiv. 20, and some of the Classical writers.

Ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ.] These words have occasioned little perplexity to biblical interpreters.
Scanty hinges on this—that, although we read Pausan. i. 1. v. 14, and Philostr. Vit.
3, that there were at Athens altars inscribed to unknown gods, yet no passage is known, which makes mention of any altar 'to unknown god.' Now Jerome, Erasmus, and most remove this difficulty by supposing the inscription in question was Ἀγνώστοις

Θεοῖς, or rather Θεοῖς Ἀσίας καὶ Εὐρώπης καὶ Λιβύης, Θεοῖς ἀγνώστοις καὶ ξίνοις. But, as
Bp. Middleton observes, 'that is a most improbable supposition; and, indeed, the manner in which
the inscription is introduced makes it incredible
that St. Paul could intend merely a remote or vague allusion.' Indeed thus (as Kuinoel observes)
the whole force of the Apostle's argument would
be taken away, nay, his assertion would not be true. Therefore, 'that the altar (as Bp. Middleton remarks) was inscribed simply Ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ,
must either be conceded, or all inquiry will be in vain.' And, as Baronius and Wonna have observed, 'though there might be several altars
at Athens and elsewhere inscribed to unknown
gods generally, or to the unknown gods of any particular part of the world, yet that there might occasionally be one inscribed to one of them, is extremely probable.' Bishop Middleton, indeed,
thinks that the words of the author of the Philo-
patrias (apud Lucian) τῇ τὸν Ἀγνώστον τὸν ἐν Ἀθήναις, are decisive, that Ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ, in the singular, was a well-known inscription. Now this would, indeed, be the case if the Philopatrias stood in the same circumstances as almost every other work of the Classical writers preserved to
us. But, in fact, that tract (which was written,
as Gesner has proved, not by Lucian, but by an
imitator of his style and manner, who lived 200
years after him, in the time of the Emperor Julian, and who bore the same name) contains,
as I can attest, after having carefully examined the whole for the purpose of ascertaining, little short
of twenty passages, written with manifest allusion
to various parts of the Scriptures, chiefly of the New Test. There can be no doubt, then, that the writer had the present passage in view; (the article having the use κατ' ἐξοχήν to denote the well-known), and consequently his testimony will only serve to prove (what, however, is of some consequence) that the singular number was used by St. Paul. But though no other writer seems to have recorded the existence of any altar so
inscribed, yet the thing has probability to support
it; and no argument from the silence of authors
can be drawn to the discredit of any writer of unimpeached integrity.

The question, however, as Bp. Middleton observes, is, 'was this inscription meant to be applied
to one of a possible multitude, as if we should im-pute any kindness or any injury to an unknown
benefactor or enemy,—or was it meant to be significant of the one true God?' He maintains that the latter opinion (though the general one)
is ungrounded. It involves, he thinks, a great improbability, that an inscription so offensive to
a polytheistical people could have been tolerated.
Nay, he affirms that it is inconsistent with the propriety of the Article, and maintains that the
omission of the Article, the position of the words,
as also the rules of ordinary language and the custom of inscriptions, alike require that the words should be rendered, 'to an unknown god,'
or 'to a god unknown.' He asserts that the discourse of the Apostle is, even according to that
way of taking ἀγνώστῳ, very pertinent, and that the mention of any unknown deity gave him a

ἐν αὐτῷ, οὗτος οὐρανοῦ καὶ γῆς Κύριος ὑπάρχων, οὐκ ἐν

sufficient handle for the purpose in question. But, on the supposition that the sense is 'to an unknown god,' we are encountered with the difficulty, how it could happen that an altar should have been so inscribed. The best solution of which is, that it had been erected by the Athenian people, in acknowledgment of some signal benefit received by the city at large, which seemed attributable to some god, though to whom was uncertain. If this were the case, there would be little difficulty in supposing (with Chrysostom, Theophylact, and Isidore, of the ancients, and several learned moderns), that the benefit in question was the removal of the pestilence, which almost depopulated the city, so finely described by Thucydides. And this is thought to be proved by Diogenes Laert. i. 10. Yet (waving the fabulousness of the story) we may observe, that he says nothing about an unknown god, but only represents the altars as erected θεῷ προσήκοντι. And so far from being inscribed θεῷ ἀγνώστῳ, he says they were ἀνώνυμοι, without any inscription. Indeed, these βωμοὶ ἀνώνυμοι, or four-sided stone altars without inscription of any deity, were common in Greece. To suppose that the one at Athens here meant had such an inscription, is far too hypothetical to be admitted. Not to say that, from the words of Diogenes, it seems very unlikely that there should have been one at Athens. That there were altars at Athens inscribed θεοῖς ἀγνώστοις καὶ ξένοις, is nothing to the present purpose; since the union of ξένοις with ἀγνώστοις alters the allusion in ἀγν., and the passage merely attests that the Athenians were much attached to foreign superstitions. So Strabo, l. x. p. 472, Falc., observes: 'Ἀθηναῖοι δ' ὥσπερ περὶ τὰ ἄλλα φιλοξενούμεντοι διατιλοῦσιν, οὕτως περὶ τοὺς θεοὺς· παλλὰ γὰρ τῶν ξενικῶν ἱερῶν παροδίζαντο. And from Hesychius we learn that there was at Athens a festival called θεοξένια, on which worship was paid to the gods in general, both of their country and foreign ones, called θεοὶ ξενικοί. If it be asked, to whom, then, was the altar in question inscribed? I answer, doubtless, to the one true God, the Creator and Lord of all things; which, indeed, seems to be required by the course of argument in the passage, as thus stated by Wonna, in a Dissertation on the present subject, vol. ii. p. 464 of the Thesaurus Theolog. Philol.: 'Quemcunque Deum Apostolus Atheniensibus annuntiavit, est verus Deus. Sed quem Deum Athenienses ignorantes coluerunt, eique aram inscripserunt, est is Deus, quem Apostolus Atheniensibus annuntiavit. E. Is Deus, quem Athenienses ignorantes coluerunt, eique aram inscripserunt, est verus Deus. Major et Minor ex textu liquido constat.' This, he shows, was also the opinion of Clemens Alex. and Augustine, of the ancient Commentators; and, of the modern ones, of Baronius, Menochius, and Heinsius. To which names may be added Cudworth, Intell. Syst. i. 4. 18, and Bp. Warburton. From what the former says,—and especially from what is adduced by Bp. Warburton, in Sect. 4. l. ii. of his Divine Legation,—it is plain that the ancient philosophers of Egypt, Greece, and Rome, were well acquainted with the doctrine of the Unity of the Godhead,

to inculcate which was the grand end of the Mysteries, where (as he has shown) the errors of Polytheism were detected, and the doctrine of the Unity taught and explained.

With respect to the term here applied to the Deity, ἀγνώστος, it appears, from what is said by Cudworth and Warburton, to have been by no means unusual. So Damascius (ap. Cudworth, Intell. Syst. i. 4. 18) says, 'the Egyptian philosophers of his time had found in the writings of the ancients, that they held one principle of all things, and worshipped it under the name of the Unknown Darkness.' Thus we find in the celebrated Saitic inscription, I am all that was, is, and shall be; and MY VEIL HATH NO MAN UNCOVERED. In like manner the ancient Mexicans, as we learn from Latrobe's Travels in Mexico, called the great Supreme Teatl, i. e. 'the unknown God.' Indeed, the Deity might well be so called, because he is not only invisible (hence the Egyptian appellation of the Deity, HAMMIL, invisible), but, in respect of his nature and essence, incomprehensible, being, as Josephus, contr. Ap. (cited by Cudworth) says, δυνάμει μόνον ἡμῖν γινώμετος, ὅποιος δὲ κατὰ οὐσίαν ἀγνώστος. As to the objection urged by Bp. Middleton, that thus θεῷ ἀγνώστῳ would here have been written, it has very little force, and being a mere question of position, as respects one writing in a foreign language, involves too minute a criticism to stand in the way of a sense excellent in itself, and demanded by the context. Not to say that the inscription might have θεῷ ἀγνώστῳ, and St. Paul might thus alter it, whether inadvertently, or to give greater prominence to the word on which his argument was meant to rest; or even St. Luke might alter its position. Moreover, in the Pesch. Syr. Version we have ܠܐܝܠܐܝܢ, hidden, from the Chaldee ܠܐܝܠܐܝܢ, to hide. And, besides this, the Translator subjoins the [emphatic (corresponding to the Greek article)] to both words; which proves at least that he must have understood the expression of the one true God. As to the argument that the 'inscription would have been too offensive to Polytheists to be allowed to stand,' it is of no force; for it is well known how tolerant the people of Athens then were; and we may suppose that the inscription was worded by the same person or persons who erected the altar, (doubtless, philosophers, who had been initiated in the greater Mysteries,) and that with such discreet ambiguity, by the omission of the article, as to leave it uncertain whether it was meant to express one out of many, or the one alone true God.

— ὃν ἀγνοοῦντες εὐσεβ.] Render, 'whom ye worship without knowing him.' This syntax (also occurring at 1 Tim. v. 4) of the Accusative without αι or προς is very rare; nor do the Commentators adduce a single example. I have, however, noticed it in Joseph. Bell. ii. 8. 7, εὐσεβ. τὸ θεῖον.

24. The Apostle now proceeds to show the true nature and proper worship of the Deity; here evidently impugning what the Grecian philosophers promulgated as to the attributes and providence of God.

[^q ὁ Θεός] The Apostle now suggests the grand design creation; namely, ζητεῖν τὸν Κύριον, and obey his Maker.

 of the foregoing; and the sense is, '[to

 τὰς γνωρίζομεν*.

[^o ὁ Θεός] Hales supposes the Apostle to have in a passage of Plato, Phæd. § 47, where he censures those who feel after God
 by resting in second causes, without carrying up their inquiries to that first cause;

 consequently worshipping the creature rather than the Creator. Perhaps, however, the similarity of the two passages is merely accidental,
 the Apostle merely adverting, by a popular figure,
 to the less distinct evidences of natural religion,
 as opposed to the clear ones of Revelation; see
 ver. 30.

[^o οὐ μακρὰν ἀπό.] A litotes; the Deity

 ating and preserving power.

[^p ἐν αὐτῷ, &c.] Many here recognise a climax. But it rather seems to be a strong mode of expression for 'to Him we owe life and every faculty connected with it; by Him we are what we are.' So Eurip. Alc. 290, ἐν σοὶ δ' ἰσμεν καὶ ζῆν καὶ μῆ.

[^o τῶν καθ' ὑμᾶς π.] for τῶν ὑμετέρων π.;
 of which Weta. cites an example from Longinus.

[^o τοῦ γὰρ καὶ γένος ἰσμεν.] These words occur both in Aratus, Phæn. 5, and in a hymn of Cleanthes on Jupiter, v. 5. Similar sentiments, too, are found in other ancient writers; as Pind.
Nem. Od. 6, ἐν ἀνδράων, ἐν θεῶν γένος, and in a passage of Apollonius, Epist. 44, imitated from the present passage; καὶ πάντας ἀνθρώπους ἀδελφούς καὶ φίλους, ὡς ἀν γένος μιν ὄντας Θεοῦ, μᾶτ' δι' φύσιν.

[^o γένος οὖν ὑπάρχοντες, &c.] Meaning,
 'If, then, man be God's handy-work, or creation, as your own poet says; sure it must be absurd to imagine that God can be man's handy-work, or creation.' (Markland.) Here the Apostle adduces the conclusion, that mankind are bound to worship God THEIR FATHER; and that not with idolatrous, but spiritual worship, as being a spiritual Being (see John iv. 23, 24), and not like images made by human art.

To see the full force of the allusions in *χρυσῷ
 ἢ ἀργύρῳ—ἐνθυμήσεως ἀνθρώπου* we must, as Mr. Gifford observes, in his Travels in Greece, recollect that 'below, around, and above the spot where the Apostle stood (the Mars' Hill) there stood innumerable idols, and above all the celebrated Minerva of Phidias, on which the highest arts and devices of men, and the most costly materials, had been lavishly expended.'

30, 31. The Apostle now points out the subject of his preaching—JESUS AND THE RESURREC-

TION; to attend to which he excites them by every motive. To call forth their love of God, and hope in him, he tells them that their past ignorance of his true nature and worship, and their consequent corruption of morals, God was pleased to overlook; but had now sent his Son (that DIVINE Teacher so ardently wished and longed for by the wisest philosophers) to teach men how to worship God aright, and to save them, upon condition of repentance for what was past, and reformation as to the future. To work on their fear of the Divine Majesty, he apprises them that, if they did not listen to the Lord Jesus and his Gospel, they would incur condign punishment at the general resurrection and subsequent judgment held by him.

30. ὑπεριδῶν] 'overlooking transgression,' forbearing to punish it. So Josephus, Ant. ii. 6. 8, τὰ περὶ μικρῶν ζημιωμάτων ἀφίειναι τοὺς πλημμελήσαντας ἵπαινον ἤνεγκε τοῖς ὑπεριδοῦσι.

— μετανοεῖν] i. e. 'to cease to do evil and learn to do well': true repentance implying reformation; see Note on Matt. iii. 2.

31. ὅτι ἐστῆσεν, &c.] q. d. '[And there is need that you should repent, and reform your lives.] for you must give an account,' &c. 'Ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ; i. e. in such strictness of justice as must exclude all mercy to the impenitent and unreformed. Ἀνδρὶ is (as Ecumenius observes) spoken οἰκονομικῶς, denoting, the God-man Jesus, &c.

— πίστιν παρασχεῖν here signifies (as often) 'to produce faith in any thing, or confidence in any one's pretensions,' by adducing sufficient proofs of the existence of the former, and the validity of the latter.

32. οἱ μὲν ἐχλεύαζον.] This feeling of contempt for, and ridicule of, the doctrine in question will not appear so strange, when we consider how wholly unaccustomed were men's minds to the notion of a resurrection of the body, and consequently the identity of man in a future state; see the Introduction to 1 Cor. xv. Of this their mythological accounts of Elysium had said nothing. And the thing, at first consideration, involved so much to stagger their faith, that the feeling was perhaps natural, but ought to have been suppressed by the consideration of the omnipotence of the great God who had pleased that life and immortality should be brought to light by the Gospel of Christ.

— ἀκουσάμενά σου π. π. τ.] Not, it should seem, that they really desired to hear more: for if so, why should they not hear it then, for the Apostle had not wearied his gay fastidious hearers with obscure prolixity? The feeling seems to have been that of indifference and disdain; or rather, we may consider this as a civil way of saying, 'We will hear no more of this at present: some other time will do;' see Doddridge and Scott. Thus the Apostle's reception was so very discouraging, that he, in disgust, terminated his discourse; which, therefore, may be said to have been as much interrupted and cut short as Stephen's was, nay, even some of our Lord's discourses to the Jews, in St. John's Gospel. Had that not been the case, St. Paul would doubtless have enlarged on the nature and requisites of that religion whose divine origin had been thus attested by God himself, by signs and wonders and mighty deeds.

34. κολληθέντες] 'having become his converts;' see Note on ver. 13. Γυνή, 'a matron,' doubtless, of some rank, as being here mentioned by name. Some suppose her to have been the wife of Dionysius. Yet thus αὐτοῦ would have been required after γυνή.

XVIII. The Apostle, after having departed from Athens, repairs to Corinth, and there meets with Aquila, who, on being expelled from Rome, with the other Jews there, had, with his wife Priscilla, retired to that city. To this person, who was a tent-maker, the Apostle, being of the same trade, joins himself, works in his shop, and lodges in his house (vv. 1—3). Silas and Timothy come to him from Macedonia (ver. 5). After having stayed a year and a half at Corinth (ver. 11), and, notwithstanding the pertinacious opposition of the Jews, preached to the Gentiles with success the doctrine of Christ, the Apostle takes a journey through Syria; repairs to Caesarea and Jerusalem (vv. 21, 22); afterwards traverses Galatia and Phrygia (ver. 23); and at length returns to Ephesus, where he had left Aquila and Priscilla (ver. 23), who accompany him into Syria (ver. 18). Meanwhile, at Ephesus, Apollos, having been fully instructed in the Christian doctrine by Aquila and Priscilla, had there preached the Gospel with singular zeal and success (ver. 24, seqq.).

2. Ἰουδαίων.] Whether Aquila was then a Christian has been by recent Commentators thought doubtful. Certainly, it by no means follows from the silence of St. Luke as to the

that he was not, it being not unusual for writers to omit minute circumstances to be supplied, of which this is probably specially since the expression προσῆλθεν implies a sort of conversion, which was that of identity of religion. Now there is from the earliest period of the Gospel, of Christians at Rome, which is to have originated with some who had sat at the feast of Pentecost, when the host was imparted; and was doubtless by those Jewish Christians, who had to repair to that city on commercial or sines.

προσφάτως for πρόσφατος, which promises recently slain, but is used, both in secal and Hellenistic writers, in the sense So Pindar, Pyth. iv. ult., πρόσφατον ζηνόθετε: see Blomfield on Æschyl. 791.

γεταχέναι had issued a διάταγμα, or Of which we have mention made in κ. Claud. c. 23, 'Judeos, impulsores assidue tumultuantes, Romæ expulsi.' status there spoken of is by most recent sators supposed to have been a Hellenis; while the ancient and earlier modern of opinion that it is but a false reading for Christus. And that Christus be changed into Chrestus might easily and did happen on other occasions.

assulsi there adverted to were doubtless as between the Jews and Christians (Jewish or Gentile), and other political sees which so mighty a moral revolutionroduction of the Gospel could not but; and so verifying the words of Christ, 'came not to send peace, but a sword.' since, Christ might, by means of his remind to be the impulsor.

ποιοί.] Few terms so plain as this on rise to more discussion as to the sense signed to it. The general opinion of gators, both ancient and modern, is, that tent-makers. Some, however (as in the ἱεκτων, Matt. xiii. 55), perhaps thinking occupation too humble for the Apostle of filos, have fancied other senses,—namely, of tapestry, makers of mathematical, saddlers, &c. Yet for these signifi- the word very slender authority exists; by be supposed that St. Luke, writing, as in a plain style, would use such a term its ordinary sense; not to say that the mentioned trades would require far more exact skill and devoted attention, than could be expected in one like St. Paul, the greater part probably of whose time was spent so very differently. There can be little doubt that the Apostle's trade was (according to ancient opinion) that of a maker of tents, formed of leather or thick cloth, both for military and domestic purposes, the latter sort being, from the scarcity of inns, much used throughout the East in travelling; and, in that warm climate, inhabited, during the summer season, as houses.

4. ἐπειθὲ.] This is strangely rendered by Kuinoel and others docebat; for παίθειν must surely, from the subject, mean 'awayed their minds, persuaded them (to embrace Christianity);' the action being here, as often, put for the endeavour. So 2 Cor. v. 11, αἰδότες τὸν φόβον τοῦ Κυρίου, ἀνθρώπους παίδομεν.

5. τῷ πνεύματι.] Some MSS., several Versions, and a few Fathers, have τῷ λόγῳ, which was preferred by Bengel, Pearce, and Kuinoel, and received by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz; but without sufficient reason. The external authority for that reading is slender, and the internal by no means strong. The above Editors, indeed, urge that λόγῳ is to be preferred, as being the more difficult reading. But it must be remembered, that that canon has its exceptions; one of which is when the reading in question would do violence to the proprietas linguæ, or yield an absurd or unsuitable sense; which is the case here; for the sense 'was occupied in preaching,' is most jejune; inasmuch that Morus and Heinrichs render συνελάττο cogebatur, yet without assigning any tolerable sense to τῷ λόγῳ. But whence, then, it may be asked, arose τῷ λόγῳ? I answer, from a marginal or interlineary scholium, of some one who had in his copy, not συνελάττο, but ἐνέκαίτο; and thus suggested that λόγῳ should be supplied, or substituted for πνεύματι. That such must have been the reading in Jerome's copy is plain from his version instabat verbo. The common reading must also claim a preference on the score of being the more difficult reading; though not so difficult as Markland represents, who professed that he was unable to comprehend it. It surely admits of a very good sense; namely, as Beza, Luther, Calvin, and others explain, 'intus et apud se æstuebat præ zeli ardore,' 'he was under the impulse of ardent zeal.' So xx. 22, διεδίμνετο τῷ πνεύματι.

6. ἀντιτασσομένων 'contradicting and opposing by words;' a military metaphor, of which Elser and Markland adduce two examples; but one more apposite occurs in Thucyd. iii. 83, τὸ

δὲ ἀντιτετάχθαι ἀλλήλοις τῇ γνώμῃ ἀπίστωσιν ἐπὶ πολὺ διήνεγκεν.

6. ἐκτιναζάμενος τὰ ἱμάτια.] A symbolical action (with which we may compare Nehem. v. 13), like shaking the dust off one's shoes at any one, thereby signifying that we renounce all intercourse with him; see xiii. 51.

— τὸ αἶμα ὑμῶν ἐπὶ, &c.] Supply τρέψεται (which word is expressed in Aristoph. Nub. 39, εἰς τὴν κεφαλὴν ἅπαντα τὴν σὴν τρέψεται) or τρέποντο, as Aristoph. Ach. 833, εἰς κεφαλὴν τρίποντο ἱμοί. By αἶμα is here meant destruction, i. e. figuratively, perdition in the next world. This manner of speaking was common to the Hebrews (see 2 Sam. i. 16. Ezek. xxxiii. 4), the Greeks, and the Romans. Several examples are adduced in Elsner and Wetstein, who rightly derive it from the very ancient custom of putting hands on the heads of victims for sacrifice, and imprecating on them the evils which impended over the sacrifice, or the nation. Εἰς τὰ ἔθνη πορεύσομαι must not be understood as implying abandonment of the Jews, but only a more especial attention to the Gentiles.

7. μεταβάς ἐκείθεν.] Not from the house of Aquila (thus shifting his lodgings), as most Commentators suppose; but, as appears from the context, from the synagogue,—that being, no doubt, the place where the foregoing exhortations had been pronounced. Besides, if συναγ. be not taken as the substantive of place referred to, there is no other. Ἥλθεν εἰς οἰκίαν must be understood to mean, 'entered into, entered upon, a house,' for the purpose of teaching and preaching, perhaps in an upper apartment appropriated to that purpose; see a kindred passage at xix. 9.

— συνωμοροῦσα] 'conterminous, contiguous.' The word occurs, I believe, no where else;

though συνόμορος, from which it is derived, is found in the ancient glossaries. The Classical term is συνορίω, used by Polybius.

9. λάλει καὶ μὴ σιωπήσῃς.] This intermixture of the Imperative with the Subjunctive is thought to be a Hebraism. Be that as it may, there is no pleonasm; for the Subjunctive form is more significant than the Imperative, there being an ellipsis of ὅρα, q. d. 'Mind that ye be not silent!'

10. λαὸς ἐστὶ.] The best Commentators remark, that the persons in question are called Christ's people by anticipation; just as the Gentiles, who should afterwards embrace the Christian religion, are in John x. 16 already called the stock of Christ.

11. ἐκάθισας] 'took up his abode.' A Hellenistic use of the word, as in Luke xxiv. 49.

12. Γαλλ. ἀνθυπ. τῆς Ἀχ.] The best Commentators are agreed that the sense is, 'on Gallio becoming Proconsul.' Καταφίστημι is a very rare word, but may be compared with καταχειρίζω and others.

13. παρὰ τὸν νόμον—Θεόν.] As much as to say: 'The Roman people permit us Jews in Greece to worship God after the rites of the Mosaic Law (see Josephus, Ant. xiv. 40; xvi. 2); but this follow teaches things contrary to our Law, and excites disturbances among us.'

14. ἀδικ. τι ἢ ραδιούργημα &c.] The best Commentators regard ἀδικ. as equivalent to παραπτώμα, any serious offence, and ραδ. they interpret flagitium. It should rather seem to either correspond to that minor class of offences with us styled larceny, or rather those petty breaches of the peace which with us are called misemeanours. The ραδ. παραπτώμα perhaps had reference to those mischievous tricks often played off in Heathen countries in ridicule of the Jewish

Moreover, it was the prudent policy of the Roman governors to pass unnoticed any conduct which did not involve the honour or interest of Rome, that its yoke might be the lighter to the provincials.

18. κειράμενος τὴν κεφαλὴν.] It has been
disputed whether this should be referred to Aquila, or to Paul. The former view (adopted
by the most eminent Commentators, and supported by the ancient Versions) is, for several reasons, preferable,—and, besides having far more
of probability, avoids many difficulties involved in the latter. Ἐν Κερχραιαῖς, 'at Cenchrea;' that being the port where he embarked on his voyage.

The best Commentators are agreed that the
vow was not a Nazarite vow, but a votum civile,
such as was, among the Jews, taken during or after recovery from sickness, or deliverance from
any peril, or on obtaining any unexpected good,
importing, 'to consecrate and offer up the hair,'
the shaving of which signified the fulfilment of the vow. A custom this not unusual among the heathens, as appears from Artemid. On. i. 28.

is obscurely expressed, but there is no necessity
to adopt the expedient proposed by Doddridge, of transposing this clause, and placing it after Ἐλκοιτο, ver. 21. The fact is, that St. Paul had brought them with him, on his voyage to Cæsarea,
as far as Ephesus, and there put them on shore;
and, the ship stopping there a short time, including a sabbath-day, Paul took the opportunity of preaching to the Jews, to whom his discourse was
so acceptable, that they pressed him to remain longer with them; which request, however, he
was obliged to refuse, because if he permitted the
ship to go without him, he should probably not be able to meet with another to convey him in time
for the feast at Jerusalem.

21. δεῖ με π. τὴν ἑορτὴν, &c.] Meaning (by a popular mode of expression centered in δεῖ) 'I must spend the feast time,' &c. The Apostle's purpose may be supposed to have been to promote the cause of the Gospel, and open the communication between the Christians of Jerusalem and those of other parts of the world; also to endeavour to remove the prejudices of his countrymen.

22. ἀναβάς.] Namely, to Jerusalem; for to this the word may very well be referred, from eis Ἱεροσόλυμα having occurred only a little before. To take it, as many have done, of Cæsarea, involves far greater harshness; since it would forbid all mention of the going to Jerusalem, the great object of the Apostle's voyage into those parts.

24. Ἀπολλῶς.] A name contracted from Ἀπολλώνιος, as Erapphras from Erapphroditus, and Artemas from Artemonius.

— ἀνὴρ λόγιος.] An expression denoting, in the earlier writers, a man of letters, especially an historian; but in the later ones (especially Philo and Josephus) an eloquent man; which is most probably the sense here. Δυνατὸς ἐν ταῖς γραφαῖς, 'well versed in the interpretation of the Scriptures of the Old Test.'

25. κατηχημένος τὴν ὁδὸν τοῦ Κυρίου.] By the expression ἡ ὁδὸς τοῦ Κυρίου must (as appears from the words following) be meant that part of God's plan for the salvation of man by a Redeemer, which regarded the doctrine and methods of John the Baptist, and enjoined repentance and reformation, and the being baptized unto the faith of the future Messiah. Or, taking Κύριος here to denote Christ, we may understand, 'instructed in the doctrine of a Messiah,' not, in the doctrine of Jesus Christ; for Apollos knew only the doctrine of John, who baptized eis τὸν ἐρχόμενον, preaching repentance, and announcing the coming of the Messiah (see Matt. iii. 2, compared with Acts xix. 4); while, by the more accurate instruction which Apollos received from Aquila and Priscilla, must be understood that of the Messiahship of Jesus, and what he had enjoined as to faith and practice, in order to the attainment of everlasting salvation. By τὸ βάπτισμα is meant, per synecdochen, the doctrine of John the Baptist, of which baptism was a principal feature. Now, this must imply that Apollos had received that baptism; as also, ἐπιστάμενος μόνον, that he had not received Christian baptism. It is generally believed that he had been baptized by John himself, and had, since that time, obtained some knowledge of the Gospel; though he had not been baptized unto the faith of Christ. This, however, involves much improbability. It should rather seem that he had been baptized not long before by one of John's disciples; and, in short, was become one of the sect of the Johannites, which existed about this period, and on which see Tittman's Intro. to the Gospel of St. John. Ἀκριβῶς has reference, not to the doctrine, but to the manner of teaching it, namely, 'as exactly as he knew how.'

26. παρρησιάζεσθαι.] This may have reference not only to his descanting on the necessity of repentance and reformation, but to his freely pointing out many errors in the usual mode of understanding the Scriptures, especially the Prophecies.

— προσελάβοντο.] The word signifies properly, 'to take any one to oneself,' and figuratively, 'to one's society and confidence.' Ἐξέθεντο, 'exposuerunt, explained, set forth.'

27. προτρέψαντες αὐτόν.] 'exhorting him' [to carry into effect his resolve].

— συνεβόλετο πολὺ τοῖς, &c.] i. e. contributed to the spiritual good of. Of the next words, διὰ τῆς χάριτος, the sense depends upon the construction of the sentence; on which a difference of opinion exists. Some, as Picander and Hammond, construing it with τοῖς πεπιστευκόσι; others, and indeed almost all the last Expositors, with συνεβόλετο. The latter method is far preferable; for to construe it with τοῖς πεπιστευκόσι not a little embarrasses the sentence; and no such phrase as παραγενόμενος διὰ τῆς χάριτος elsewhere occurs in Scripture. Indeed, the sense thus arising would be here little suitable.

ἥς χάριτος. εὐτόνως γὰρ τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις διακατηλέγχετο ἡμοσία, ἐπιδεικνύς διὰ τῶν γραφῶν, εἶναι τὸν Χριστὸν ἠσοῦν.

transposition is by no means harsh; and, we suppose, was here adopted because the words do not well have been introduced between ἐλάτο and its dative, especially as πολὺ had interposed.

proceed to the sense of the words. I can mean agree with those who take τῆς for to mean grace of diction and manner, Luke iv. 22, τοῖς λόγοις τῆς χάριτος; a which would here be not sufficiently by, and, indeed, would require the addition of λόγου. There can be little doubt that χάριτος stands for τῆς χάριτος τοῦ Θεοῦ, expression of such frequent occurrence that the the τοῦ Θεοῦ is dispensed with. So Rom. vi. 17, διὰ τῆς χάριτος τῆς δοθείσης, and xii. 6, and especially v. 17, οἱ τὴν περισσεύαν χάριτος λαμβάνοντες. Thus the expression may be supposed to have reference to that grace of God by the extraordinary influence of the Holy Spirit, so likely to be communicated to one thus devoted to the great work of civilization. A sense at once natural, and due to the context, and agreeable to the language of Scripture elsewhere; see 1 Cor. iii. 18.

X. 1. τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη.] The upper as regarded Ephesus, the inland regions, viz. Phrygia and Galatia. See my Note on yd. i. 7.

μαθητάς.] Some suppose these to have merely believers in a Messiah, and followers of the Baptist. Yet thus they could not have been called 'disciples,' meaning disciples of Christ. It should rather seem that the had been, some time before, baptized by of John's disciples, but had been not long at Ephesus—when, partly by means of Apollos, and partly of Aquila, they became convinced of the Christian religion, and were disciples of Aquila,—though they were not yet fully acquainted with its doctrines, nor had been formally baptized.

ἵνα πρὸς αὐτούς· El, &c.] Here there is seen in reporting speeches) a blending of the direct with the indirect.

— ἀλλ' οὐδὲ—ἡκούσαμεν.] This, according to the sense assigned by our common Version, would imply such ignorance as, even on the supposition that the men were only Johannites, would be incredible. However, it is quite unnecessary to so interpret; for Grotius, Bp. Pearce, and others have proved, that διδόμενον, or λαμβανόμενον, must be supplied as ἐστι; meaning, that they had not heard whether the Holy Spirit was imparted; or, as Pr. Robinson, in his Lex., explains, they did not know that the Holy Spirit had yet been given; namely, that the time foretold by Joel had arrived. So, at John vii. 39, it is said, οὐπω γὰρ ἦν Πνεῦμα ἅγιον, where our common Version very properly expresses the διδόμενον. In both passages the extraordinary influences of the Holy Spirit are to be understood.

3. εἰς τί.] Supply βάπτισμα, or ὄνομα. Εἰς is here used, not to denote purpose, but, with the Accusative, stands for ἐν, by, with a Dative, as in forms of swearing; ex. gr. Matt. v. 35, εἰς τὸ ἱεροσόλυμα, which is just after followed by δμνῶν ἐν τῇ γῇ.

4. βάπτισμα μετανοίας.] Meaning, a baptism which bound those who received it to repentance, reformation, and purity of life. See Matt. iii. 2, and Note.

— τουτέστιν εἰς τὸν Χ. 'I.] These are to be understood as the words of the Apostle, briefly importing, 'namely, that Messiah whom John bound you to worship is Jesus.' Doubtless the Apostle proceeded to enlarge on the conclusive nature of the evidence existing for the Messiahship of Jesus, and the benefits whereof we are made partakers by his religion.

5. ἐβαπτίσθησαν, &c.] That the circumstance of these persons being rebaptized in the name of Jesus, affords no countenance to the notions of Anabaptists, has been shown at large in Recens. Synop.

preaching.' It is plain that γλώσσαις here is for ἐτέραις γλώσσαις, as in the similar passage supra
 ii. 4, ἤρξαντο λαλεῖν ἐτέραις γλώσσαις, καθὼς
 τὸ Πνεῦμα ἰδοὺ αὐτοῖς ἀποφθέγγεσθαι,
 where St. Luke gives the complete phrase, though afterwards he uses the elliptical form; as does St.
 Paul universally. We may here recognise a clima- tiar; the προφητεία being, as we learn from I Cor.
 xiv. 5, a higher gift than the λαλεῖν γλώσσαις.
 Thus it is meant that 'they had not only the gift
 of tongues, but, what was greater, that of pro-
 phesy'; as it is said in the above passage, μεῖζων
ὁ προφητεύων, ἢ ὁ λαλῶν γλώσσαις.

9. ἐκκληρ. καὶ ἠπείθουν.] A sort of Hendiadyes; 'obstinately refused to yield credence.' So Eccles. xxx. 12, μήποτε σκληρυνθεὶς ἀπειθήσῃ
σοι. See also Ps. xciv. 8, and Heb. iii. 8. Ἀπο- στάς must be understood of separation from the synagogue and church communion.

— ἐν τῇ σχολῇ Τυράννου τ.] What sort of a school this was, Commentators are not quite agreed. Some suppose it to have been a kind of Beth-Midrash, or Divinity Hall, designed for reading theological lectures. Others think it was a philosophical lecture-room, and that Tyrannus
 was a rhetorician, or sophist. If the former conjecture be correct, he was probably a converted
 Jew; if the latter, a converted Gentile.

10. πάντας.] This may be taken, with many Commentators, in a qualified sense. But surely,
 considering the constant influx of persons to this
 emporium and metropolis of Asia Minor, there could not be many individuals but had heard, at least by the report of others, of the doctrines of Christianity.

11. οὐ τὰς τυχοῦσας.] Literally, 'such as were not of every day occurrence,' meaning extraordinary and illustrious.

12. ἐπιφέρεισθαι.] For this many ancient
 MSS. and the Vulgate have ἀποφέρ., which has been edited by Lachmann; but wrongly; since

the common reading presents a more appropriate
 term; for the ἐπι in ἐπιφέρ. ought not (as it has been by many) to be considered as pleonastic,
 but as having the sense ad. Indeed, the word
 seems to have been a medical term, signifying adferre, to apply. There is, I would observe, the more reason to contend for strict propriety in this term, since the other two verbs in this sentence
 are quite appropriate, — ἀπαλλάσσεσθαι and ἐξέρχεσθαι. And though, instead of the latter,
 very many MSS. have ἐκπορεύεσθαι (which has been received by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz), yet I have thought proper, with Matthew and Vater, to retain it, as being by far the more
 probable reading, the term being often elsewhere
 used in Scripture; ex. gr. supra viii. 7; whereas ἐκπορεύεσθαι is nowhere found in Scripture, or elsewhere.

— σουδάρια.] See Luke xix. 20. Σιμικίνθια
 is from the Latin semicinctum, a half-girdle, or garment, equivalent to our apron.

— ἀπ' αὐτῶν.] These words, not found in those MSS. which have, for ἐξέρχεσθαι, ἐκπο-
ρεύεσθαι, have been cancelled by Griesbach,
 Tittman, and Scholz.

13. τινὲς ἀπὸ τῶν περιερχ. [I. i.] Render,
 'some of the Jews who go about as exorcists.'
 These (called by the Greeks ἀγύρται, and by the Romans circulatores) were a class of persons
 who, like our travelling quacks, or mountebanks,
 or conjurors, pretended to cure violent disorders
 beyond the skill of the physician, and even to cast out devils; and all this, with the use of certain incantations or charms, made effective, partly
 by administering certain powerful medicines, and
 partly by strongly operating on the imagination.
 See Joseph. Ant. viii. 2, 5.

14. τινὲς.] This must be construed with ἐπτά.
 'some seven persons, sons of Sceva.' See infra
 xxiii. 23, and Thucyd. iii. 11. vii. 87.

— ἀρχιερέων.] Not 'High Priest,' but 'a chief

24. ἀργυροκόπος.] The word signifies a silver-smith, or worker in silver in any way, whether in forming utensils thereof, or in stamping metals. Here, however, only one branch of the trade is meant, namely, that of making the silver shrines.

— ναοὺς ἀργυροῦς.] So Artemid. iv. 34, ἀργυρίου ναοὺ ἐργεπιστάτης. These naoi argyroi 'Art. are, with most probability, supposed to have been small silver models of the Temple of Diana at Ephesus (one of the wonders of the world), or at least of the sanctum, or chapel, which contained the famous statue of the goddess. These were much bought up, both for curiosity (as memorials of a building so matchless), and for purposes of devotion (as are the models of the Santa Croce at Loretto, in modern times), and were carried about by travellers or others, like the movable altars in use among the Roman Catholics; the model being always provided with a small image of the goddess. Probably the ἀργυροκόποι also executed large medals representing the temple, with the image of Diana, of which some have been preserved.

— παρείχeto τοῖς τεχνίταις ἐργασίαν οὐκ ὀλ., &c.] 'produced much gain to,' as supra xvi. 16, ἥτις ἐργασίαν πολλὴν παρέχετο τοῖς, &c. By the τεχνίταις are here denoted the chief workmen; and by the ἐργάται, the inferior artizans, employed on the rougher work of these portable chapels. Τὰ τοιαῦτα, i. e. statuary, painting, and such sort of occupations connected with the Pagan religion.

25. ἡ εὐπορία ἡμῶν.] We have here a term of middle signification, to be interpreted according to the circumstances of the case. In the present instance it cannot mean wealth, but must simply have the sense faculties, property, living; as supra xi. 29, καθὼς ἡπόρευτο τις.

26. πείσας μετέστησεν] 'has by his persuasions drawn away.' Μετέστηναι signifies properly to change the position of any thing or person; to remove any one from any present station; and, figuratively, to alienate any one's attachment to another.

— λέγων ὅτι οὐκ εἰσὶ θεοὶ οἱ διὰ χ. γιν.] The heathens (at least the ignorant multitude) regarded the images of the gods as the gods themselves. Hence the makers of these were called θεοποιοί; and on the removal of the images, they supposed the gods themselves to be taken away. The better instructed, indeed, did not harbour so gross a fancy; yet they maintained that the gods in illis LATUISS, and that hence

they were θεοὶ, and filled with the presence of the Deity. They readily allowed that the gods did not need images; which, they said, were only invented in condescension to the weakness of men, and only meant as helps, to raise the soul to heaven, and as symbols and handmaids to religion. They regarded the images as representatives of the gods, and, as such, entitled to every honour. Finally, they maintained that they did not adore the images, but only the gods, who, as it were, resided in them. In short, they resorted to such arguments and excuses as those by which the idolatries of the Romish Church have ever been defended; but which were indignantly rejected by the great Christian Apologists, in their Answers to Celsus, Porphyry, and Julian; who would, doubtless, were they alive now, be as strenuous opposers of Romish, as they were once of Pagan idolatry.

27. ἡμῖν τὸ μέρος.] The general sense here is clear; yet to exactly fix it, and show how it arises, is by no means easy. Some learned Expositors take the expression to mean, 'this part,' namely, as regards the present business. Others explain, 'this matter of concern;' and Valcknaer and Wolf, 'quod ad nos spectat, questus poster.' But of these interpretations the one last mentioned is much too far-fetched, and the others are destitute of valid proof. It should seem that the expression in question is one deviating from Classical usage, and taken from the language of common life; the sense being simply, 'this very occupation of ours, [by which we subsist].' Μέρος may be supposed to have this signification, from that by which it denotes (as sometimes in Xenophon) office or duty, like the Latin pars, and our part. Thus Johnson (in his English Dictionary) gives, among other senses of the word part, that of duty, business. Hence it came to mean an occupation, or employment; literally, 'that which it is our allotted duty to perform.'

— ἀπελεγμὸν διάγρῃ;] from ἀπελεγεσθαι, 'to be utterly refuted or rejected.' The word occurs in Symmachus, and ἐλεγμὸς in the Sept. The construction of this passage is somewhat anomalous, and it has therefore been treated as corrupt, and has been tampered with by both ancient and modern Critics. But no change is necessary, since the style is what is called popular, and the construction is: κινδυνεύει τὸ μέρος—λογισθῆναι, τὴν τι μεγαλειότητα αὐτῆς μίλλαν καὶ καθαιρεῖσθαι. Much to the present purpose is a passage of Aristoph. Pac. 1212, where Trygæus, ρτέμιδος ἱερὸν εἰς οὐδὲν λογισθῆναι, μέλλειν δὲ καὶ καθαι-ῖσθαι τὴν μεγαλειότητα αὐτῆς, ἣν ὅλη ἡ Ἀσία καὶ ἡ οἰκου-

Ἀσιάρχων.] These Asiarchs were of the
 of those annual magistrates, who, in the part of the Roman empire, were (like the Ædiles) superintendents of things per-to religious worship, the celebration of ible games, &c. They were called, accord-
 the provinces over which they presided, Lyciarchs, Bithyniarchs, Syriarchs, &c.
 office was only for a year, and was elective;
 main number of persons (in Proconsular sen) being elected by the cities, and sent in a common council at some principal city.
 one the Proconsul appointed one to act as the sh; the rest being his colleagues, though styled Asiarchs: for those who had borne office were afterwards called Asiarchs by say.

μὴ δοῦναι ἑαυτὸν εἰς τὸ θέατρον.] I can-agree with Valcknaer and Kypke in regard-as a forensic mode of expression, like εἶν εἰς τὸν δῆμον just before. For though adduce examples of this use from Josephus, here εἰς κίνδυνον is added. It should rather to be a popular form of expression, denoting to trust himself in the theatre.' So Cicero, pr. iii. 19, 'Populo se ac coronæ daturum,' so Diod. Sic. v. 59, δίδοτε ἑαυτὸν εἰς τὰς scen. See also Joseph. Ant. xv. 7. 7.

οἱ πλείους, &c.] A lively picture appli-
 to a mob in every age.

This verse involves no little obscurity,
 from certain words being used in a some-unusual acceptation; but chiefly from the action being left incomplete, and the circumstances of the transaction in question rather

left to be gathered from what is said, than distinctly narrated. Hence considerable difference of opinion exists, both as to the construction and the sense. The construction commonly adopted is προεβίβασαν Ἀλέξανδρον ἐκ τοῦ ὄχλου
 which, though involving a somewhat harsh transposition, might be admitted, if the context would permit it. But it does not; for thus no tolerable account could be given of the transaction in question. It must therefore be taken before προεβί- βασαν, and a nominative supplied,—either τινες,
 as referred to ἐκ τοῦ ὄχλου, or the common ellipse ἄνθρωποι must be supposed at προεβί- βασαν the sense of which term will depend upon the view taken of the affair then going forward; which has been not a little misunderstood by some Expositors, as Hamm. and Bp. Pease. It should seem that certain well-disposed persons of the people present, with a view to quiet the tumult, were desirous to set up some one to address the multitude, and endeavour to appease their wrath,
 by showing that there were no just grounds for it.
 Now the Jews present were sure to join them,
 because they saw that the anger of the multitude was directed against both the Christians and themselves; and they were anxious that the speaker should at least take the blame off their shoulders, and lay it—where it ought, they thought, to be,—on the Christians. They therefore put forward, as a proper person to speak, one Alexander, who, it seems, had a talent for haranguing; the same, probably, with Alexander the coppersmith, mentioned in 2 Tim. iv. 14. Hence it appears that προεβ. cannot mean 'drew out,' or
 'thrust forth;' for the word has never that sense, and here the context would not permit it: whereas προεβίβας and ἀναβίβας are very often used of setting any one up to speak, especially as an advocate for others; sometimes, however, only to express their sentiments. Examples in abundance are supplied by the Commentators and Steph. Thesaur. The above interpretation is supported by the authority of the Pesh. Syr. Version.

Προβαλόντων, just after, may be taken (as often) in a metaphorical sense for proposing him, recommending him (as a fit person). These words προβαλόντων αὐτὸν τῶν Ἰουδαίων are added, to point out the prominent part taken by the λέγοντες· Δυνάμεθα γνῶναι, τίς ἡ καινὴ αὕτη ἡ ὑπὸ σοῦ λαλουμένη διδασχῇ; ξενίζοντα γάρ τινα εἰσφέρεις εἰς τὰς 20 ἀκοὰς ἡμῶν· βουλόμεθα οὖν γνῶναι, τί ἂν θέλοι ταῦτα εἶναι. Ἀθηναῖοι δὲ πάντες, καὶ οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες ξένοι, εἰς οὐδὲν 21 ἕτερον εὐκαίρουν, ἢ λέγειν τὶ καὶ ἀκούειν καινότερον.

Σταθεὶς δὲ ὁ Παῦλος ἐν μέσῳ τοῦ Ἀρείου πάγου, ἔφη· 22 Ἄνδρες Ἀθηναῖοι, κατὰ πάντα ὡς δεισιδαίμονεστίρους ὑμᾶς

not address them as judges,—nor seek any justification of his conduct,—but as philosophers. If, then, any of them were, as was Dionysius, Areopagites, they were there not sitting ex officio, but as private individuals. This may perhaps account for the little seriousness or ceremony which the Apostle met with.

19. δυνάμεθα γνῶναι.] This is Hellenistic Greek; both in the use of δύνασθαι for 'to be permitted,' and in the not prefixing some particle of interrogation to the verb.

20. ξενίζοντα.] Literally, 'matters which strike us with surprise.'

— εἰσφέρεις εἰς τὰς ἀκοὰς.] This plural use of the word has been thought rare in any other but the New Testament writers. Yet examples of it might be adduced from Euripides, Ælian, Herodian, Polybius, and Themistius. With εἰσφ. εἰς τὰς ἀκοὰς here I would compare εἰς ὅσα φέρειν in Eurip. Dan. 55.

21. οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες ξένοι.] The distinction between the ἀστοὶ and ξένοι was no where more strongly marked than at Athens. The ἀστοὶ considered themselves as alone possessing any rank, while all the rest were included indiscriminately under the name ξένοι. They called themselves the αὐτοχθόνες, or first inhabitants; the rest they styled ἐπὶ ἡλῦδες, or new comers. There was, however, a class between one and the other, called μέτοικοι, sojourners, who had a sort of jus civitatis. Now, it has been debated whether by οἱ ἐπὶ δὲ ξένοι are to be understood all the ξένοι, or only the μέτοικοι, or both of them. Kypke and Kuinoel adopt the second view; and rightly; for though ξένοι might include both (so Thucyd. ii. 36, τὸν ὕμιλον καὶ ἀπ᾽ αὐτῶν καὶ ξένων), yet since ἐπὶ δὲ is here added, and as the difference between the μέτοικοι and the ξένοι was, that the former were regular residents of the city, and accordingly obliged to take the oath of allegiance, and participate in military service, the latter were merely sojourners, drawn thither by business or pleasure.

— εἰς οὐδὲν ἕτερον εὐκαίρουν 'nulli rei magis cavendum.' Εὐκαίρ. is here used for συχολάζειν, by a use confined to the later writers. The next words are graphic, and point at the chief traits of the Athenian character,—garrulity, and rage for novelty. Inasmuch that at Athens there were places called λίσσαι, appropriated to the reception of newsmongers.

Καινότερον Commentators regard as an example of the Comparative for the Positive. Yet in such cases the Comparative is seldom without its force, though it may not be very possible to express it in translating. Here the examples adduced by Commentators are not quite to the purpose; because in those the sentence is interrogative. They might more appositely have cited Josephus, Bell. i. 18, 1, τοῖς ὀργάνοις ἀντιμη-

χανόμενοι δὲ τι κώλυμα καινότερον. In the present case the full sense probably is, 'to tell or hear the latest news.' So Eurip. Orest. 1327, τί δὲ νεώτερον λέγεις; the sense seems to be, 'What is the latest news you have to tell?'

22. In this brief but forcible address (which would doubtless have been longer, had it not been broken off by the scoffs of some, and the listlessness and abrupt departure of others) the Apostle wisely accommodates himself to the circumstances of his hearers. After a complimentary exordium (such as was usual in publicly addressing the Athenians), accompanied with a præoccupatio benevolentia, frequent in the ancient orators, he notices the occasion which led to his addressing them, and shows that it is his desire to enable them to satisfy their wish of worshipping vera unknown gods, by pointing out that great Being (to them hitherto unknown) who is THE ONLY AND THE TRUE GOD, some of whose chief attributes, together with his various benefits, both of creation and providence, the Apostle then proceeds to enumerate. And here we may notice the admirable address, by which a seemingly plain statement of the first principles of natural religion is made acceptable to persons of the most opposite description, and highly instructive, by being aimed at the errors of each. Thus, by adverting to the works of God in creation, the Apostle means to censure the dogmas of the Epicureans; and by what he says of the providential care of God over all things, he glances at the opinions of the Stoics and Epicureans: finally, in speaking of sacrifices, temples, and the creation of man, he reproves the superstitions of the ignorant multitude. He shows where each party was right, and where both parties were wrong; directing his words as well against the irreligious scepticism of the higher ranks, as the grovelling superstition of the inferior classes.

Having thus established the existence of one God and Father of all mankind, he infers the duty, incumbent on God's creatures, of seeking, i. e. worshipping him; at the same time noticing certain erroneous modes of worship, which had originated in utter ignorance of the true nature of the Deity. This introduces an exhortation to abandon these errors, strengthened by an announcement of a future day of judgment and punishment for all wilful disobedience to the Divine will. Now this implied a present state of accountability, and the duty of guiding themselves by the light of that Gospel, which God had been pleased to reveal by Jesus Christ.

— δεισιδαίμονεστίρους.] The sense must commonly assigned, 'too superstitious,' can by no means be defended. That would imply (what surely could not be supposed) that there was a degree of superstition that is good. Equally objectionable is the sense assigned by Calvin,

ἑωρῶ. Διερχόμενος γὰρ καὶ ἀναθεωρῶν τὰ σεβίσματα
μῶν, εὗρον καὶ βωμὸν ἐν ᾧ ἐπεγέγραπτο· ἈΓΝΩΣΤΩΙ
ΘΕΩΙ. Ὁν οὖν ἀγνοοῦντες εὐσεβεῖτε, τοῦτον ἐγὼ καταγ-

, Campbell, and Newcome, 'somewhat too
ous.' The most eminent Expositors for the entury have been of opinion, that δεισιδ. is employed in the good acception,—to denote
religious, i. e. attentive to religion, [as far as understood it.] So the Pesch. Syr. Ver-renders, 'I see that in all things ye excel in worship of the δαίμονες, or gods.' That the sion will bear this sense, has been estabed by a multitude of proofs. And that the ians were very attentive to religious obser-es, has been proved on the testimonies of the
at writers of every kind—dramatists, histoy, and philosophers; especially Pausan. Attic.
sq. Ἀθηναίοις περισσώτερόν τι ἢ τοῖς ας ἐς τὰ θεῶν ἵστί σπουδῇ. See also at v. 19. That such is the sense intended he present passage, is plain from the air of sent, and will appear by a consideration of circumstances in which the Apostle was then
ed. To a people like the Athenians, so scru-nously observant of all the rules of courtesy ach occasions of public address, it were surely ore probable that the Apostle (with that dis-on which ever attempted his zeal) should
have chosen to commence with the language
eciliation, rather than abrupt rebuke; which,
ed, would have been the more out of place,
ldering that it was customary for foreigners
had to address the people, to begin with pay-some compliment to the place. Nevertheless, hall, perhaps, not err, if we suppose that St.
l purposely selected the ambiguous term δει-
y, because he could not conscientiously use
y; since the gods whom they worshipped
y, in his estimation, demons. So 1 Cor. x. 20,
ὁ δὲ θεὸς τὰ ἰδὼν δαιμονίου θεοί, καὶ οὐ θεοί.
y yet, as δαίμονες properly meant gods of tain kind, the hint would not be pointed.
Apostle, then, commends their worshipping,
shows that they 'worship they know not
' (John iv. 22), meaning, that 'they are very gous in their way.' Again, that the comparahere means very, and not too, is plain from words following. Of ὥς here the sense is what some take it to be, quasi; and so far its abating (as Campbell supposes) the im-of the comparative, it is intensive; as it always ither when the comparative is put for the relative, or when, as here, it denotes a high ee of the positive.

ἢ τὰ σεβίσματα ὅ.) Not 'your devotions,' (as Erasmus, Koppe, Schleusner, and Kuinoel for) the 'numina, or objects of your worship,' shown in temples, altars, images, sacrifices,
; as in 2 Thess. ii. 4. Wisd. xiv. 20, and some-
as in the Classical writers.

—ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ.] These words have occa-
ed no little perplexity to biblical interpreters.
e difficulty hinges on this—that, although we l from Pausan. i. l. v. 14, and Philostr. Vit.
vi. 3, that there were at Athens altars ined 'to unknown gods,' yet no passage is need, which makes mention of any altar 'to unknown god.' Now Jerome, Erasmus, and ers would remove this difficulty by supposing t the inscription in question was Ἀγνώστοις

θεοῖς, or rather θεοῖς Ἀσίας καὶ Εὐρώπης καὶ Λιβύης, θεοῖς ἀγνώστοις καὶ ξίνοις. But, as
Bp. Middleton observes, 'that is a most improbable supposition; and, indeed, the manner in which
the inscription is introduced makes it incredible
that St. Paul could intend merely a remote or vague allusion.' Indeed thus (as Kuinoel observes)
the whole force of the Apostle's argument would
be taken away, nay, his assertion would not be true. Therefore, 'that the altar (as Bp. Middleton remarks) was inscribed simply Ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ,
must either be conceded, or all inquiry will be
in vain.' And, as Baronius and Wonna have observed, 'though there might be several altars
at Athens and elsewhere inscribed to unknown
gods generally, or to the unknown gods of any particular part of the world, yet that there might occasionally be one inscribed to one of them, is extremely probable.' Bishop Middleton, indeed,
thinks that the words of the author of the Philo-
patris (apud Lucian) νῆ τὸν Ἀγνώστον τὸν ἐν Ἀθήναις, are decisive, that Ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ, in the singular, was a well-known inscription. Now this would, indeed, be the case if the Philopatris
stood in the same circumstances as almost every other work of the Classical writers preserved to
us. But, in fact, that tract (which was written,
as Gesner has proved, not by Lucian, but by an
imitator of his style and manner, who lived 200
years after him, in the time of the Emperor
Julian, and who bore the same name) contains,
as I can attest, after having carefully examined the
whole for the purpose of ascertaining, little short
of twenty passages, written with manifest allusion
to various parts of the Scriptures, chiefly of the New Test. There can be no doubt, then, that
the writer had the present passage in view; (the article having the use κατ' ἐξοχὴν to denote the well-known), and consequently his testimony will only serve to prove (what, however, is of some consequence) that the singular number was used by St. Paul. But though no other writer seems to have recorded the existence of any altar so
inscribed, yet the thing has probability to support
it; and no argument from the silence of authors
can be drawn to the discredit of any writer of unimpeached integrity.

The question, however, as Bp. Middleton observes, is, 'was this inscription meant to be applied
to one of a possible multitude, as if we should im-
pute any kindness or any injury to an unknown
benefactor or enemy,—or was it meant to be significant of the one true God?' He maintains that the latter opinion (though the general one)
is ungrounded. It involves, he thinks, a great improbability, that an inscription so offensive to
a polytheistical people could have been tolerated.
Nay, he affirms that it is inconsistent with the
propriety of the Article, and maintains that the
omission of the Article, the position of the words,
as also the rules of ordinary language and the
custom of inscriptions, alike require that the
words should be rendered, 'to an unknown god,'
or 'to a god unknown.' He asserts that the discourse of the Apostle is, even according to that
way of taking ἀγνώστῳ, very pertinent, and that
the mention of any unknown deity gave him a

(See my Note on yd. ii. 51. No. 5.) At προσδεόμενος there seem to be an ellipsis of ὡς. But, in fact, position includes that sense.

re, then, it is shown that, as to sacrifices, aga, or gifts, he wants them not, nor is he ated by receiving them; for all things that enjoy are derived from him, as their Author Preserver. Similar sentiments are adduced stein and Kypke from the philosophers.

Ἐξ ἐνός αἵματος] 'of one kindred;' as a. xxi. 1., and Joseph. ii. 6. 3., ἰσμὴν ἀδελ- φαὶ κοινὸν αἷμα. See Note on John i. 13. ἀ compares from Anth. Gr. iii. 31. 6. "Ἀστὰ αἵματος, and Virgil, 'sanguine ab uno,' thus tracing back the origin of mankind Adam, the Apostle perhaps meant to check anity of the Athenians, who maintained they were αὐτοχθόνες and γῆγεναις. See yd. i. 2. ii. 36.

ὁρίσας προστεταγμένους, &c.] Render, ag appointed certain determinate periods their inhabiting], and the boundaries of the as they should inhabit.' There seems a nce to the records of the early colonization settling of the earth, in the books of Moses. fulg. prot. many MSS. and early Editions προστ., which is adopted by almost every r from Bengel and Weststein to Vater.

The Apostle now suggests the grand design his creation; namely, ζητεῖν τὸν Κύριον, ship and obey his Maker.

εἰ ἄρα γε ψηλαί, &c.] These words are tical of the foregoing; and the sense is, 'to indeed they could, by the glimmering light mon, feel out and find him.' A Hendiadys ψηλαφῆσαντες εὔροιεν, if by investigating would find out his attributes, will, &c. So sch. p. 589 (cited by Elsner), Τὰς μὲν ἁλὸν νοήσεις οἶον ὑπὸ σκότῃ, διὰ φωνῆς φῶντες γνωρίζομεν.

Dr. Hales supposes the Apostle to have mind a passage of Plato, Phaed. § 47, where philosopher censures those who feel after God dark, by resting in second causes, without carrying up their inquiries to that first cause; consequently worshipping the creature rather than the Creator. Perhaps, however, the similarity of the two passages is merely accidental, the Apostle merely adverting, by a popular figure, to the less distinct evidences of natural religion, as opposed to the clear ones of Revelation; see ver. 30.

— οὐ μακρὰν ἀπὸ.] A litotes; the Deity being near, by these plain indications of his creating and preserving power.

28. ἐν αὐτῷ, &c.] Many here recognise a climax. But it rather seems to be a strong mode of expression for 'to Him we owe life and every faculty connected with it; by Him we are what we are.' So Eurip. Alc. 290, ἐν σοὶ δ' ἰσμεν καὶ ζῆν καὶ μὴ.

— τῶν καθ' ὑμᾶς π.] for τῶν ὑμετέρων π.; of which Wets. cites an example from Longinus.

— τοῦ γὰρ καὶ γένος ἰσμεν.] These words occur both in Aratus, Phæn. 5. and in a hymn of Cleanthes on Jupiter, v. 5. Similar sentiments, too, are found in other ancient writers; as Pind. Nem. Od. 6. ἐν ἀνδράν, ἐν θεῶν γένος, and in a passage of Apollonius, Epist. 44, imitated from the present passage; καὶ πάντας ἀνθρώπους ἀδελφοὺς καὶ φίλους, ὡς ἂν γένος μὴ ὄντας Θεοῦ, μιᾷ δὲ φύσει.

29. γένος οὖν ὑπάρχοντες, &c.] Meaning, 'If, then, man be God's handy-work, or creation, as your own poet says; sure it must be absurd to imagine that God can be man's handy-work, or creation.' (Markland.) Here the Apostle adduces the conclusion, that mankind are bound to worship God THEIR FATHER; and that not with idolatrous, but spiritual worship, as being a spiritual Being (see John iv. 23, 24), and not like images made by human art.

To see the full force of the allusions in χρυσῷ ἢ ἀργύρῳ—ἐνθυμήσεως ἀνθρώπου we must, as Mr. Gifford observes, in his Travels in Greece, recollect that 'below, around, and above the spot where the Apostle stood (the Mars' Hill) there stood innumerable idols, and above all the celebrated Minerva of Phidias, on which the highest arts and devices of men, and the most costly materials, had been lavishly expended.'

30, 31. The Apostle now points out the subject of his preaching—JESUS AND THE RESURREC-

TION; to attend to which he excites them by every motive. To call forth their love of God, and hope in him, he tells them that their past ignorance of his true nature and worship, and their consequent corruption of morals, God was pleased to overlook; but had now sent his Son (that DIVINE Teacher so ardently wished and longed for by the wisest philosophers) to teach men how to worship God aright, and to save them, upon condition of repentance for what was past, and reformation as to the future. To work on their fear of the Divine Majesty, he apprises them that, if they did not listen to the Lord Jesus and his Gospel, they would incur condign punishment at the general resurrection and subsequent judgment held by him.

30. ὑπεριδὼν] 'overlooking transgression,' forbearing to punish it. So Josephus, Ant. ii. 6. 8, τὰ περὶ μικρῶν ζημιωμάτων ἀφείναι τοὺς πλημμελήσαντας ἔπαινον ἤνεγκε τοῖς ὑπεριδοῦσι.

— μετανοεῖν] i. e. 'to cease to do evil and learn to do well;' true repentance implying reformation; see Note on Matt. iii. 2.

31. ὅτι ἐστῆσεν, &c.] q. d. '[And there is need that you should repent, and reform your lives.] for you must give an account,' &c. 'Ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ; i. e. in such strictness of justice as must exclude all mercy to the impenitent and unreformed. Ἀνδρὶ is (as Ecumenius observes) spoken οἰκονομικῶς, denoting, the God-man Jesus, &c.

— πίστιν παρασχεῖν here signifies (as often) 'to produce faith in any thing, or confidence in any one's pretensions,' by adducing sufficient proofs of the existence of the former, and the validity of the latter.

32. οἱ μὲν ἐχλεύαζον.] This feeling of contempt for, and ridicule of, the doctrine in question will not appear so strange, when we consider how wholly unaccustomed were men's minds to the notion of a resurrection of the body, and consequently the identity of man in a future state; see the Introduction to 1 Cor. xv. Of this their mythological accounts of Elysium had said nothing. And the thing, at first consideration, involved so much to stagger their faith, that the feeling was perhaps natural, but ought to have been suppressed by the consideration of the omnipotence of the great God who had pleased that life and immortality should be brought to light by the Gospel of Christ.

— ἀκουσόμεθά σου π. π. τ.] Not, it should

seem, that they really desired to hear more; for if so, why should they not hear it then, for the Apostle had not wearied his gay fastidious hearers with obscure prolixity? The feeling seems to have been that of indifference and disdaint; or rather, we may consider this as a civil way of saying, 'We will hear no more of this at present: some other time will do;' see Doddridge and Scott. Thus the Apostle's reception was so very discouraging, that he, in disgust, terminated his discourse; which, therefore, may be said to have been as much interrupted and cut short as Stephen's was, nay, even some of our Lord's discourses to the Jews, in St. John's Gospel. Had that not been the case, St. Paul would doubtless have enlarged on the nature and requisitions of that religion whose divine origin had been thus attested by God himself, by signs and wonders and mighty deeds.

34. κολληθέντες] 'having become his converts;' see Note on ver. 13. Γυνή, 'a matron;' doubtless, of some rank, as being here mentioned by name. Some suppose her to have been the wife of Dionysius. Yet thus αὐτοῦ would have been required after γυνή.

XVIII. The Apostle, after having departed from Athens, repairs to Corinth, and there meets with Aquila, who, on being expelled from Rome, with the other Jews there, had, with his wife Priscilla, retired to that city. To this person, who was a tent-maker, the Apostle, being of the same trade, joins himself, works in his shop, and lodges in his house (vv. 1—3). Silas and Timotheus come to him from Macedonia (ver. 5). After having stayed a year and a half at Corinth (ver. 11), and, notwithstanding the pertinacious opposition of the Jews, preached to the Gentiles with success the doctrine of Christ, the Apostle takes a journey through Syria; repairs to Caesarea and Jerusalem (vv. 21, 22); afterwards traverses Galatia and Phrygia (ver. 23); and at length returns to Ephesus, where he had left Aquila and Priscilla (ver. 23), who accompany him into Syria (ver. 18). Meanwhile, at Ephesus, Apollos, having been fully instructed in the Christian doctrine by Aquila and Priscilla, had there preached the Gospel with singular zeal and success (ver. 26, seq.).

2. Ἰουδαῖον.] Whether Aquila was then a Christian has been by recent Commentators thought doubtful. Certainly, it by no means follows from the silence of St. Luke as to that

r, that he was not, it being not unusual for it writers to omit minute circumstances to be supplied, of which this is probably especially since the expression προσῆλθεν implies a sort of conversion, which was bly that of identity of religion. Now there een, from the earliest period of the Gospel, gregation of Christians at Rome, which is sed to have originated with some who had present at the feast of Pentecost, when the Ghost was imparted; and was doubtless sed by those Jewish Christians, who had on to repair to that city on commercial or business.

προσφάτως for πρόσφατος, which pro-signifies recently slain, but is used, both in lassical and Hellenistic writers, in the sense . So Pindar, Pyth. iv. ult., πρόσφατον Ξυνωθεῖς: see Blomfield on Æschyl. sh. 791.

ἱατεταχέναι 'had issued a διάταγμα, or u' Of which we have mention made in rius, Claud. c. 23, 'Judeos, impulsive to, assidue tumultuantes, Romæ expulit.' Χρῆστος there spoken of is by most recent sentators supposed to have been a Hellenis-w; while the ancient and earliest modern re of opinion that it is but a false reading alling for Χρῆστος. And that Χρῆστος l be changed into Χρῆστος might easily a, and did happen on other occasions.

τὸν there adverted to were doubtless ions between the Jews and Christians her Jewish or Gentile), and other political hances which so mighty a moral revolution introduction of the Gospel could not but e; and so verifying the words of Christ, e 'came not to send peace, but a sword.' e sense, Christ might, by means of his reli-e said to be the impulsor.

πνεύματι.) Few terms so plain as this ven rise to more discussion as to the sense assigned to it. The general opinion of sentators, both ancient and modern, is, that lies tent-makers. Some, however (as in the t τέκτων, Matt. xiii. 55), perhaps thinking a occupation too humble for the Apostle of mtiles, have fancied other senses,—namely, re of tapestry, makers of mathematical nents, saddlers, &c. Yet for these signifi- of the word very slender authority exists; may be supposed that St. Luke, writing, as e, in a plain style, would use such a term in its ordinary sense; not to say that the ut mentioned trades would require far more exact skill and devoted attention, than could be expected in one like St. Paul, the greater part probably of whose time was spent so very differ-ently. There can be little doubt that the Apostle's trade was (according to ancient opinion) that of a maker of tents, formed of leather or thick cloth, both for military and domestic purposes, the latter sort being, from the scarcity of inns, much used throughout the East in travelling; and, in that warm climate, inhabited, during the summer sea-son, as houses.

4. ἵπαιθε.] This is strangely rendered by Kuinoel and others docetab; for παῖθαι must surely, from the subject, mean 'swayed their minds, persuaded them [to embrace Christianity];' the action being here, as often, put for the endeavour. So 2 Cor. v. 11, εἰδότες τὸν φόβον τοῦ Κυρίου, ἀνθρώπους παῖθμεν.

5. τῷ πνεύματι.] Some MSS., several Versions, and a few Fathers, have τῷ λόγῳ, which was preferred by Bengel, Pearce, and Kuinoel, and received by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz; but without sufficient reason. The external authority for that reading is slender, and the internal by no means strong. The above Editors, indeed, urge that λόγῳ is to be preferred, as being the more difficult reading. But it must be remembered, that that canon has its exceptions; one of which is when the reading in question would do violence to the proprietas linguae, or yield an absurd or unsuitable sense; which is the case here; for the sense 'was occupied in preach-ing,' is most jejune; inasmuch that Morus and Heinrichs render συνείχετο cogebatur, yet with-out assigning any tolerable sense to τῷ λόγῳ. But whence, then, it may be asked, arose τῷ λόγῳ? I answer, from a marginal or interlineary scholium, of some one who had in his copy, not συνείχετο, but ἐνέκειτο; and thus suggested that λόγῳ should be supplied, or substituted for πνεύματι. That such must have been the read-ing in Jerome's copy is plain from his version instabat verbo. The common reading must also claim a preference on the score of being the more difficult reading; though not so difficult as Mark-land represents, who professed that he was unable to comprehend it. It surely admits of a very good sense; namely, as Beza, Luther, Calvin, and others explain, 'intus et apud se assuebat prae zeli ardore,' 'he was under the impulse of ardent zeal.' So xx. 22, δεδεμένος τῷ πνεύματι.

6. ἀντιτασσομένῳ] 'contradicting and op-posing by words,' a military metaphor, of which Elsner and Markland adduce two examples; but one more apposite occurs in Thucyd. iii. 83, τὸ

6. ἐκτιναζάμενος τὰ ἱμάτια.] A symbolical action (with which we may compare Nehem. v. 13), like shaking the dust off one's shoes at any one, thereby signifying that we renounce all intercourse with him; see xiii. 51.

— τὸ αἶμα ὑμῶν ἐπὶ, &c.] Supply τρέψεται (which word is expressed in Aristoph. Nub. 39, εἰς τὴν κεφαλὴν ἅπαντα τὴν σὴν τρέψεται) or τρέποιτο, as Aristoph. Ach. 833, εἰς κεφαλὴν τρέποιτ' ἰμοί. By αἶμα is here meant destruction, i. e. figuratively, perdition in the next world. This manner of speaking was common to the Hebrews (see 2 Sam. i. 16, Ezek. xxxiii. 4), the Greeks, and the Romans. Several examples are adduced in Elsner and Wetstein, who rightly derive it from the very ancient custom of putting hands on the heads of victims for sacrifice, and imprecating on them the evils which impended over the sacrifice, or the nation. Εἰς τὰ ἔθνη πορεύσομαι must not be understood as implying abandonment of the Jews, but only a more especial attention to the Gentiles.

7. μεταβάς ἐκείθεν.] Not from the house of Aquila (thus shifting his lodgings), as most Commentators suppose; but, as appears from the context, from the synagogue,—that being, no doubt, the place where the foregoing exhortations had been pronounced. Besides, if συναγ. be not taken as the substantive of place referred to, there is no other. Ἦλθεν εἰς οἰκίαν must be understood to mean, 'entered into, entered upon, a house,' for the purpose of teaching and preaching, perhaps in an upper apartment appropriated to that purpose; see a kindred passage at xix. 9.

— συνημροῦσα] 'conterminous, contiguous.' The word occurs, I believe, no where else;

though συνόμορος, from which it is derived, is found in the ancient glossaries. The Classical term is συνορίω, used by Polybius.

9. Λάλει καὶ μὴ σιωπήσῃς.] This intermixture of the Imperative with the Subjunctive is thought to be a Hebraism. Be that as it may, there is no pleonasm; for the Subjunctive form is more significant than the Imperative, there being an ellipsis of ὅρα, q. d. 'Mind that ye be not silent!'

10. λαὸς ἐστί.] The best Commentators remark, that the persons in question are called Christ's people by anticipation; just as the Gentiles, who should afterwards embrace the Christian religion, are in John x. 16 already called the stock of Christ.

11. ἐκάθισεν.] 'took up his abode.' A Hellenistic use of the word, as in Luke xxiv. 49.

12. Γαλλ. ἀνθυπ. τῆς Ἀχ.] The best Commentators are agreed that the sense is, 'on Gallia becoming Proconsul.' Κατεφίστημι is a very rare word, but may be compared with κατεστήχισεν and others.

13. παρὰ τὸν νόμον—Θεόν.] As much as to say: 'The Roman people permit us Jews in Greece to worship God after the rites of the Mosaic Law (see Josephus, Ant. xiv. 40; xvi. 2); but this fellow teaches things contrary to our Law, and excites disturbances among us.'

14. ἀδικ. τι ἢ ῥαδιούργημα π.] The best Commentators regard ἀδικ. as equivalent to πρασιμύημα, any serious offence, and ῥαδ. they interpret flagitium. It should rather seem to either correspond to that minor class of offences with us styled larceny, or rather those petty breaches of the peace which with us are called misemeanors. The ῥαδ. προσηγορία perhaps had reference to those mischievous tricks often played off in Heathen countries in ridicule of the Jewish

18. κειράμενος τὴν κεφαλὴν.] It has been
 disputed whether this should be referred to Aquila, or to Paul. The former view (adopted
 by the most eminent Commentators, and supported by the ancient Versions) is, for several reasons, preferable,—and, besides having far more
 of probability, avoids many difficulties involved in the latter. Ἐν Κερχραῖς, 'at Cenchrea;' that

The best Commentators are agreed that the
 vow was not a Nazarite vow, but a votum civile,
 such as was, among the Jews, taken during or
 after recovery from sickness, or deliverance from
 any peril, or on obtaining any unexpected good,
 importing, 'to consecrate and offer up the hair,'
 the shaving of which signified the fulfilment of the vow. A custom this not unusual among the heathens, as appears from Artemid. On. i. 28.

 is obscurely expressed, but there is no necessity
 to adopt the expedient proposed by Doddridge,
 of transposing this clause, and placing it after εἰσελθόντος, ver. 21. The fact is, that St. Paul had brought them with him, on his voyage to Caesarea,
 as far as Ephesus, and there put them on shore;
 and, the ship stopping there a short time, including a sabbath-day, Paul took the opportunity of
 preaching to the Jews, to whom his discourse was
 so acceptable, that they pressed him to remain
 longer with them; which request, however, he
 was obliged to refuse, because if he permitted the
 ship to go without him, he should probably not be able to meet with another to convey him in time
 for the feast at Jerusalem.

purpose may be supposed to have been to promote the cause of the Gospel, and open the communication between the Christians of Jerusalem and those of other parts of the world; also to endeavour to remove the prejudices of his countrymen.

22. ἀναβάς.] Namely, to Jerusalem; for to this the word may very well be referred, from εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα having occurred only a little before. To take it, as many have done, of Cæsarea, involves far greater harshness; since it would forbid all mention of the going to Jerusalem, the great object of the Apostle's voyage into those parts.

24. Ἀπολλῶς.] A name contracted from Ἀπολλώνιος, as Erastus from Erastoditus, and Artemas from Artemonius.

— ἀνὴρ λόγιος.] An expression denoting, in the earlier writers, a man of letters, especially an historian; but in the later ones (especially Philo and Josephus) an eloquent man; which is most probably the sense here. Δυνατὸς ἐν ταῖς γραφαῖς, 'well versed in the interpretation of the Scriptures of the Old Test.'

25. κατηχημένος τὴν ὁδὸν τοῦ Κυρίου.] By the expression ἡ ὁδὸς τοῦ Κυρίου must (as appears from the words following) be meant that part of God's plan for the salvation of man by a Redeemer, which regarded the doctrine and methods of John the Baptist, and enjoined repentance and reformation, and the being baptized unto the faith of the future Messiah. Or, taking Κύριος here to denote Christ, we may understand, 'instructed in the doctrine of a Messiah,' not, in the doctrine of Jesus Christ; for Apollos knew only the doctrine of John, who baptized εἰς τὸν ἐρχόμενον, preaching repentance, and announcing the coming of the Messiah (see Matt. iii. 2, compared with Acts xix. 4); while, by the more accurate instruction which Apollos received from Aquila and Priscilla, must be understood that of the Messiahship of Jesus, and what he had enjoined as to faith and practice, in order to the attainment of everlasting salvation. By τὸ βάπτισμα is meant, per

synecdochen, the doctrine of John the Baptist, of which baptism was a principal feature. Now, this must imply that Apollos had received that baptism; as also, ἐπιστάμενος μόνον, that he had not received Christian baptism. It is generally believed that he had been baptized by John himself, and had, since that time, obtained some knowledge of the Gospel; though he had not been baptized unto the faith of Christ. This, however, involves much improbability. It should rather seem that he had been baptized not long before by one of John's disciples; and, in short, was become one of the sect of the Johnanites, which existed about this period, and on which see Tittman's Introduct. to the Gospel of St. John. Ἀκριβῶς has reference, not to the doctrine, but to the manner of teaching it, namely, 'as exactly as he knew how.'

26. παρρησιάζεσθαι.] This may have reference not only to his descanting on the necessity of repentance and reformation, but to his freely pointing out many errors in the usual mode of understanding the Scriptures, especially the Prophecies.

— προσελάβυντο.] The word signifies properly, 'to take any one to oneself,' and figuratively, 'to one's society and confidence.' Ἐξέθεντο, 'exposuerunt,' explained, set forth.

27. προτρέψαντες.] 'exhorting him' [to carry into effect his resolve].

— συνεβάλετο πολὺ τοῖς, &c.] i. e. contributed to the spiritual good of. Of the next words, διὰ τῆς χάριτος, the sense depends upon the construction of the sentence; on which a difference of opinion exists. Some, as Fickes and Hammond, construing it with τοῖς πεπιστευκόσι; others, and indeed almost all the best Expositors, with συνεβάλετο. The latter method is far preferable; for to construe it with τοῖς πεπιστευκόσι not a little embarrasses the sentence; and no such phrase as πιστεύουσιν διὰ τῆς χάριτος elsewhere occurs in Scripture. Indeed, the sense thus arising would be here little suitable.

ἥς χάριτος. εὐτόνως γὰρ τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις διακατηλέγχετο ἡμοσίᾳ, ἐπιδεικνύς διὰ τῶν γραφῶν, εἶναι τὸν Χριστὸν ἡσοῦν.

position is by no means harsh; and, we suppose, was here adopted because the words not well have been introduced between ἄλτο and its dative, especially as πολλοὶ so interposed.

proceed to the sense of the words. I can mean agree with those who take τῆς as to mean grace of diction and manner, Luke iv. 22, τοῖς λόγοις τῆς χάριτος; a which would here be not sufficiently γ, and, indeed, would require the addition τὸν λόγον. There can be little doubt that ἄριστος stands for τῆς χάριτος τοῦ Θεοῦ, precision of such frequent occurrence that the the τοῦ Θεοῦ is dispensed with. So Rom. diὰ τῆς χάριτος τῆς δοθείσης, and xii. 6. i, and especially v. 17, οἱ τὴν περισσείαν ἄριστος λαμβάνοντες. Thus the expression may be supposed to have reference to that al grace of God by the extraordinary influence of the Holy Spirit, so likely to be commended to one thus devoted to the great work of elization. A sense at once natural, and lo to the context, and agreeable to the language of Scripture elsewhere; see 1 Cor. iii. 18.

X. 1. τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη.] The upper is regarded Ephesus, the inland regions, y, Phrygia and Galatia. See my Note on rd. i. 7.

μαθητάς.] Some suppose these to have merely believers in a Messiah, and followers in the Baptist. Yet thus they could not have been called 'disciples,' meaning disciples of Christ. It should rather seem that the had been, some time before, baptized by John's disciples, but had been not long at when, partly by means of Apollos, and Aquila, they became convinced of the Christian religion, and were dis-Aquila,—though they were not yet ly acquainted with its doctrines, nor had formally baptized.

ἡ πρὸς αὐτούς Εἰ, &c.] Here there is in reporting speeches) a blending of the recta with the indirecta.

— Ἄλλ' οὐδὲ—ἡκούσαμεν.] This, according to the sense assigned by our common Version, would imply such ignorance as, even on the supposition that the men were only Johannites, would be incredible. However, it is quite unnecessary to so interpret; for Grotius, Bp. Pearce, and others have proved, that διδόμενον, or λαμβανόμενον, must be supplied at ἔστι; meaning, that they had not heard whether the Holy Spirit was imparted; or, as Pr. Robinson, in his Lex., explains, they did not know that the Holy Spirit had yet been given; namely, that the time foretold by Joel had arrived. So, at John vii. 39, it is said, οὐκ ἔστιν ἡν Πνεῦμα ἅγιον, where our common Version very properly expresses the διδόμενον. In both passages the extraordinary influences of the Holy Spirit are to be understood.

3. εἰς τί.] Supply βάπτισμα, or ὄνομα. Εἰς is here used, not to denote purpose, but, with the Accusative, stands for in, by, with a Dative, as in forms of swearing; ex. gr. Matt. v. 35, εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα, which is just after followed by ὁμνέειν ἐν τῇ γῇ.

4. βάπτισμα μετανόιας.] Meaning, a baptism which bound those who received it to repentance, reformation, and purity of life. See Matt. iii. 2, and Note.

— τουτίστιν εἰς τὸν Χ. Ἰ.] These are to be understood as the words of the Apostle, briefly importing, 'namely, that Messiah whom John bound you to worship is Jesus.' Doubtless the Apostle proceeded to enlarge on the conclusive nature of the evidence existing for the Messiahship of Jesus, and the benefits whereof we are made partakers by his religion.

5. ἐβαπτίσθησαν, &c.] That the circumstance of these persons being rebaptized in the name of Jesus, affords no countenance to the notions of Anabaptists, has been shown at large in Recent Synop.

6. ἐλάλουν τε γλώσσαις καὶ προφη.] Notwithstanding the opinion of several recent Commentators as to the import of these expressions, the sense must surely be, 'they spake with [foreign] tongues, and used their gift in the exercise of the προφητεία, or inspired teaching and of the Jews,' and would render, 'the synagogue,' as signifying merely that the Jews of the surrounding district had their synagogue there. An explanation, however, so little satisfactory, that it is better to suppose the Article to have here crept in from the ἦν preceding. It is not found (as Scholz testifies) in MSS. A. B. D. (the three most ancient), also 13, 18, 19, 36, 40, and others; also Lut. 12, and Chrysostom, and several of the ancient Versions. That it should have crept in here is by no means improbable; since the Article is almost always used with συναγ., and the preceding ἦν in abbreviated character nearly resembles ἦ. Indeed, there seems no place for it, and not without reason has it been cancelled by Lachm.

2, 3. διελέγετο αὐτοῖς, &c.] Διαλέγεσθαι is a term of very general acceptance, denoting 'to discourse in any way,' especially to haraugue. Thus it signifies to deliver orations, whether civil or military, and also disserere, 'to maintain disputations, or bring forward discourses,' as philosophers or teachers used to do to their scholars. So Ælian, V. H. iii. 19, ὁ δὲ Σεινοκράτης ἀκούσας, παραχρῆμα ἦκε πρὸς Πλάτωνα, καὶ κατέλαβε διαλεγόμενον τοῖς σύνιαντι. So that it might very well be applied to such discourses (or sermons) as St. Paul delivered.

Of the next words, διανοίγων, &c. the sense will chiefly depend on the construction, which has been disputed. The ancient and early modern Commentators place a comma after γραφῶν, of course joining ἀπὸ γραφῶν with διελέγετο; and at διανοίγων and παρατιθέμενος supplying γραφάς from γραφῶν; while others (consisting of the later Commentators, from Grot. to Kuin.) place a comma after αὐτοῖς. Yet the former construction is the more natural, and agreeable to the simplicity of Scripture style. The two terms διανοίγων and παρατ. have reference to the two principal parts of the ratiocination. 1. Opening out and bringing to light truth generally. 2. Laying down and propounding various particular truths; in order, from a collation of such particulars, to deduce some general conclusion, as here, ὅτι οὗτός ἐστι, &c. At ὅτι οὗτός ἐστι—ὑμῖν there is a transition from the oratio obliqua to the directa. See Acts i. 4.

4. προσεκληρώθησαν τῷ Π.] The verb has a reciprocal sense, 'joined themselves to,' 'took their lot with.'

—γυναικῶν τῶν πρώτων.] Answering to the

τῶν εὐσεβούνων infra v. 12, and xiii. 50, honourable matrons, wives, or widows. Thus Apuleius speaks of feminae primates.

5. ζηλώσαντες δὲ οἱ ἀπ. [I.] Very many MSS. have προσλαβόμενοι δὲ οἱ Ἰουδ. ἀπειθεῖς, which reading has been received by Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz. And indeed there is reason to suspect that ζηλώσαντες came from the margin; whence it was probably introduced by those who had in mind a passage supra vii. 9, and perhaps one at Wisd. ii. 24, φθόνῳ τοῦ διαβόλου θάνατος εἰσῆλθεν εἰς τὸν κόσμον; or possibly the ancient Critics may have introduced it, in order to remove one of the participles at least from a sentence overloaded with them.

—τῶν ἀγοραίων.] Ἀγοραῖος denotes 'belonging to the forum, or market,' and carries various significations, according to the business done there, whether as applied to things or persons. As regarded the latter, it denoted market people; some of whom were petty chapmen, others acting as porters, nay, even mere idlers; who, like the Lazzaroni at Naples, almost lived in the market. So Horace, Art. Poet. 245, 'is-nati triviales ac pæne forenses.' The term came at length to mean persons of the basest sort,—the dregs of society.

—ἄνδρας πονηροὺς.] Not 'wicked,' as Dr. Pearce, Abp. Newc., and others render; but rather (as this expression is meant to qualify the τῶν ἀγοραίων), 'mean fellows.' Of this signification of πονηρός, which is somewhat rare, I can adduce the following examples: Thucyd. vii. 73, τινὰ μοχθηρὸν ἀνθρώπων (a beggarly fellow) ὠστρακισμῶν—διὰ πονηρίαν, 'because of his meanness.' Aristoph. Eq. 181, where ὁ μέγας γίγνεται is opposed πονηρὸς καὶ ἄγρως εἶναι. And in Xenophon the πλητὶς πονηροί are often opposed to the οἱ χρηστοί, 'the better sort.' See also Lucian i. 483. Thucyd. vi. 33. —ἐθορύβουν] 'threw into disturbance;' as in Thucyd. iii. 78. vii. 61, and Dionys. Hal. ix. 68, ἐθορύβησαν τὴν πόλιν.

—τὸν δῆμον.] Not 'the people,' as E. V.; much less 'the mob,' as Doddridge renders; but the popular assembly: a signification frequent in Thucydides, Xenophon, and the best writers.

6. ἔσυρον.] See Note supra viii. 3. Παισίδρχας, 'the city magistrates'; a form of late Grecism, for πολιτάρχους.

 tally interpreted. Ἀναστ. is a word elsewhere in the LXX. It is for ποιήσαντες in the Classical writers.

 ἐκ τῆς οἰκῆς. See Matt. viii. 8, with Gen. xix. 8.

αβ. τὸ ἱκανόν.] Τὸ ἱκανόν λαβεῖν is ἱκανόν δοῦναι. The purport of the

— τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν.] The Article here would seem to have no force, and is in several MSS. not found. It must, however, be retained; since we may better account for its omission than for its insertion. To account for its being employed
 here, it is proper to bear in mind that καθ' ἡμέ-
 ραν is often used with the article for the adjective
 ἡμερῖνός. The substantive is generally expressed,
 but sometimes omitted, and left to be supplied
 from the context, or the subject-matter. Here
 ἴθις may be supplied, and the common ellipsis of κατὰ supposed. Thus the sense will be, 'in their daily habits of life;' equivalent to the Thucydi-
 dean τὸν καθ' ἡμέραν βίον, or the Æschinean τὴν καθ' ἡμέραν δαίταν. And so the best writers say τὸ κατ' ἡμέρην, 'quantum ad me attinet.'

— ἀνακρίνοντες.] This is well explained by Chrysostom, ἀναρυννύντες. The ἀνα is intensifying, and this sense of κρίνω springs from that primitive sense, 'to separate, to sift the corn
 from the chaff;' from which arises the derived and
 figurative one, to sift out any thing, by separating
 truth from falsehood.

13. σαλεύοντες.] 'agitating;' from σάλος, the surge of the sea. The Classical writers (as Soph.
 Œd. R. 25) have many passages where political turbulence is compared to the tossing of a tempestuous sea.

ἰστέροι.] Not, 'more noble' (for the probably but tradesmen), but rather sort of people, the more respectable;

 sion ἰστέροι, which word is

 His query, however, may be readily answered.
 In the case of places situated, like Beroea, between two seas, to go to the sea must denote to
 the nearest sea; and if embarkation for a voyage
 be implied, the nearest sea-port may be supposed.
 That, in the present case, was Pydna. Thus, in
 a kindred passage of Thucydides, i. 137, Adme-

tus, to remove Themistocles out of the reach of those who were seeking his life, sends him ἐπὶ τὴν ἰτρίαν θάλασσαν, which must mean the Ægean; and, as we afterwards learn, to Pydna. But had τὴν θάλασσαν been written, the Adriatic must have been understood.

The ὡς ἐπὶ our English Translators render 'as if,' or 'as it were;' which compels them to suppose that this going to the sea was only a stratagem to deceive his enemies, who might suppose he was taking ship, when he, in fact, meant to go to his destination by land. The ὡς, however, is but a slender foundation on which to erect such a notion. There can be no doubt that the two words ὡς ἐπὶ are to be taken together, and understood according to the sense of the expression in many passages of Classical writers cited by the Commentators, where the ὡς is pleonastic. Or, we may render, 'even unto.'

15. καθιστώντες.] I would not, with Kuinoel, consider this as put for προσέμποντες. The two words are far from being synonymous; προσέμπω signifying 'to set any one forward on his way to any place,' by accompanying him part of the distance thither; καθίστημι, 'to take charge of any one (as guide and defender) to any place, and there set him down.' So Hom. Od. v. 274, τοὺς μ' ἐκίλευσα Πύλονδι καταστήσαι καὶ ἰφίσσαι. The latter term occurs in Thucydides, iv. 78, κατίστησαν (scil. οἱ ἄγοντες) αὐτὸν ἐς Δίον; and several examples of it might be adduced from Xenophon, Plutarch, and Jamblichus. The construction properly requires an eis or ἐπὶ, or δέ. Wetstein, however, adduces an example of μείχρι from Arrian, which comes near to the ἕως of Luke.

— κατείδωλον] 'full of idols.' An intensive force of κατὰ found in many words, as κατάδυσσος, κατάμπελος, κατάφυτος, &c. With respect to the fact, it is fully established and copiously illustrated by Wetstein; ex. gr. Pausanias says, that Athens had more images than all the rest of Greece; so also Thucydides, ii. 38, speaks of the Athenians as θυσιαις διατηροῖσι νομίζοντες, where see my Note.

17. τῇ ἀγορᾷ.] There were many market-places; but the most considerable were the Ceramicus, or old, and the Forum Æretriacum, or new Forum; the former of which is supposed by Ikenius and Schleusner to be the one here meant, the latter by Kuinoel and most Commentators. And that this was by far the most frequented,

— τοὺς παρατ.] 'those whom he might happen to meet with.' The chief Forum was best adapted to his purpose, because it was the place where people met for conversation; and also where Socrates, and many other philosophers, had been accustomed to hold their discussions.

18. Ἐπικουρείων καὶ τῶν Στ.] The Epicureans were practically Atheists; since they held that the world was neither created by God, nor under the direction of his Providence. Πλάτων they accounted the summum bonum, and held that virtue was to be practised only for the sake of pleasure, not for its own sake. They maintained that the soul was material, like the body, and would perish with it, leaving nothing to be either hoped or feared after death. As to the Stoics, they did, indeed, believe in the existence of a God, but held such chimerical notions of his nature, attributes, and providence, as rendered that belief almost nugatory. They maintained that both God and man were bound by a necessitas fatalis; that the wise man yielded in no respect to God; of whom they believed that his nature was fire, and diffused throughout the world. On the condition of the soul after death, and on the existence of a state of rewards and punishments, they varied in opinion; but all denied the immortality of a future state. Nay, some thought that, sooner or later, the soul merged in the celestial fire of the Deity. Thus while the former denied the existence, or at least providence, of God, the latter, though professing to believe both, yet, by ascribing all human events to fate, destroyed the foundation of all religion as much as the former. It is obvious that both the above systems were as far as possible removed from the doctrines of Christianity; and therefore it is no wonder that the latter should have been both unaccountable and unacceptable to these philosophers. There were, besides, two other sects, the Platonists and the Peripatetics, the latter of whom probably came not near Paul, since their places of discussion were far removed. The opinions of the former made far nearer approaches than those of the other sects to the doctrines of Christianity; and these probably formed the far greater part of those who gave a qualified approbation of Paul's doctrines, by proposing to 'hear him again' on the subject of the immortality of the soul.

— συνέβαλλον.] Supply λόγους, which is expressed in Eurip. Iph. A. 630, and Xen. Mem. ii. 2. 21. The elliptical form occurs in Josephus, Jamblichus, and other later writers.

ἰπῶ· καὶ τινες ἔλεγον· Τί ἂν θέλοι ὁ σπερμολόγος οὗτος
 ἔγειν; οἱ δὲ· Ἕνων δαιμονίων δοκεῖ καταγγελεὺς εἶναι.
 καὶ τὸν Ἰησοῦν καὶ τὴν ἀνάστασιν αὐτοῖς εὐηγγελίζετο.
 ἐπιλαβόμενοι τε αὐτοῦ, ἐπὶ τὸν Ἄρειον πάγον ἤγαγον

σπερμολόγος.] This word, found only in Greek writers, was used properly of those birds (sparrows, &c.) which live by picking scattered seeds; but metaphorically, to those parasites who frequented the market, and lived by picking up any scattered or produce, and generally persons of object without any certain means of support. as the tribes of small birds which live by picking up seeds are especially garrulous, the word to denote one who picks up and retails tris-stories. Here, probably, both senses may be added; q. d. 'an insignificant chatterer.'
Ἕνων δαίμ. καταγγ.] We are not here to understand gods in the full sense of the term. It has been proved by the Commentators cited in Syn. (to whose matter I have there added that is important, from Max. Tyr., Jamblichus, Plutarch, Libani, Diog. Laert., Dion. Pindar, and others), that there was pro-
a distinction (though not always observed) between θεοὶ and δαίμονες, by which the former applied to Jupiter and the other gods by the latter to those who had become so, originally men. These, according to some, led the heroes, as Hercules; though others a third class of those. The above, then, all the classes which, properly speaking, reckoned as Divinities. But the Pagan logic comprehended another order of beings, δαίμόνια, holding the midway between gods and mere men, who were supposed to mediate between God and man, by revealing a Divine will, and helping the imbecility of a nature. One of these was said by Socrates to him; on which Xenoph. Mem. i. l. 2, he was founded the charge against him of being καὶνὰ δαίμόνια, almost the same notion as that used of St. Paul, and with which we may compare Ælian, V. Hist. ii. 13, δαίμονες. Some eminent Commentators that the Athenians meant by this to express the place claimed by Paul for Jesus was in that class. But it is plain that what they the Apostle say of Jesus would give them notion of a Being who was at least a δαίμων, not one of the higher order. Nay, there is reason to believe that δαίμόνιον was sometimes used in the sense of δαίμων, as in the cited passage of Xenophon and those of Laert., Dio Cass., Ælian, and Josephus, by Weistain, where the expressions καὶνὰ θεῶν ἐισηγησάμεθα, or ἐισφύρειν, and ἐξίνουςαι ἐισάγειν are used as equivalent.
τὸν Ἰησοῦν καὶ τὴν ἀνάστ.] Many em-terpreters, ancient and modern (as Chrysa, Eusebius, Selden, Hammond, Spencer, North, Warburton, Valcknaer, and Doddridge), take ἀνάστ. (written ἀνάστασιν) as the of a new goddess. And certainly there is little to urge in favour of that view, on see Cudworth's Intellectual Syst. book i. c. 33, who shows at large, that the heathens accustomed to deify not only virtues and vices, but the powers of nature. Yet the common interpretation, which was maintained by no less a scholar than BENTLEY, bears in its simplicity the stamp of truth, the sense being, 'preached Jesus, and the resurrection of the dead through him;' as being the first-fruits of those that slept. This, too, seems required by ver. 31, ἀναστήσας αὐτὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν, and 32, ἀκούσαντες ἀνάστασιν νεκρῶν. As to the use just before of the plural δαίμόνια, it may readily be accounted for from an idiom of frequent occurrence in all languages, and mostly used when a charge is made against any one. Thus it may be considered as said per hyperbole. It is not, however, improbable that they might so far mistake St. Paul, as to suppose that he preached two Gods, i. e. the Deity, and Jesus Christ. The God (namely, Jehovah) preached by him, and avowedly different from the Jupiter of the Athenians, might very well be esteemed by them a new and foreign God.

19. ἐπιλαβόμενοι αὐτοῦ.] Commentators are not agreed whether this expression is to be regarded as importing violence, or not. Examples of both uses occur in the New Test. The former, however, is the more agreeable to the context. And it is countenanced by the fact, that the Areopagus was a tribunal for the trial of impiety, such as the introducing of the worship of foreign deities. Yet, after all, it may be doubted whether there was any thing of apprehension, properly so called, since there is no appearance of any regular trial before the court of Areopagus. There is, indeed, reason to think, that this court retained but a shadow of its ancient consequence, and had abated much of its ancient severity in matters of religion, otherwise foreign deities would not have been so worshipped as they then were at Athens. A stronger proof of which cannot be imagined than the following passage of Aristophanes, Horse, cited by Athen. l. ix. p. 372, where, after speaking of the abundance of every kind of produce supplied by the season, in such a manner that whatever was wanted could be had at any season, and one could scarcely tell what time of the year it was, this bounty of nature and the gods is ascribed by a speaker (I imagine, the Horse personified) to the piety of the Athenians: Τούτοις ὑπάρχει ταῦτ', ἰπικὴ τοῖς θεοῖς εἰσβούσιν. To this it is replied by one who stigmatizes the fondness of the Athenians for foreign superstitions, Ἀπὸ λαοῦν ἄρα σιβούντες ὑμᾶς, ὡς σὺ φῆς· τίτην (quamobrem) Αἰγυπτίον αὐτῶν τὴν πόλιν παροίκαας, ἀντ' Ἀθηνῶν; meaning, that they had filled Athens as full of gods as Egypt, of which it was said, 'there one might sooner find a god than a man.'
 These words, then, taken in conjunction with the preceding verse, suggest rather the idea of a tumultuary proceeding, on the part of the two classes of persons just before mentioned, than a regular trial. They, it should seem, thought proper to call Paul to a public account; and considered no place so proper as the hill of judgment called Areopagus: thus the words just after, δυνάμεθα γινῶναι, as also βουλόμεθα γινῶναι. It is observable, too, that the Apostle does

λέγοντες· Δυνάμεθα γνῶναι, τίς ἡ καινὴ αὕτη ἡ ὑπὸ σου λαλουμένη διδασχῇ; ξενίζοντα γάρ τινα εἰσφέρεις εἰς τὰς 20 ἀκοάς ἡμῶν· βουλομεθα οὖν γνῶναι, τί ἂν θέλοι ταῦτα εἶναι. Ἀθηναῖοι δὲ πάντες, καὶ οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες ξένοι, εἰς οὐδὲν 21 ἔτερον εὐκαίρουν, ἢ λέγειν τί καὶ ἀκούειν καινότερον. Σταθεὶς δὲ ὁ Παῦλος ἐν μέσῳ τοῦ Ἀρείου πάγου, ἔφη 22 Ἄνδρες Ἀθηναῖοι, κατὰ πάντα ὡς δεισιδαιμονεστέρους ὑμᾶς

not address them as judges,—nor seek any justification of his conduct,—but as philosophers. If, then, any of them were, as was Dionysius, Areopagites, they were there not sitting ex officio, but as private individuals. This may perhaps account for the little seriousness or ceremony which the Apostle met with.

19. δυνάμεθα γνῶναι.] This is Hellenistic Greek; both in the use of δύνασθαι for 'to be permitted,' and in the not prefixing some particle of interrogation to the verb.

20. ξενίζοντα.] Literally, 'matters which strike us with surprise.'

— εἰσφέρεις εἰς τὰς ἀκοάς.] This plural use of the word has been thought rare in any other but the New Testament writers. Yet examples of it might be adduced from Euripides, Ælian, Herodian, Polybius, and Themistius. With εἰσφ. εἰς τὰς ἀκοάς here I would compare εἰς ὅσα φέρειν in Eurip. Dan. 55.

21. οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες ξένοι.] The distinction between the ἀστοὶ and ξένοι was no where more strongly marked than at Athens. The ἀστοὶ considered themselves as alone possessing any rank, while all the rest were included indiscriminately under the name ξένοι. They called themselves the αὐτοχθόνες, or first inhabitants; the rest they styled ἐπὶ ἡλῦδες, or new comers. There was, however, a class between one and the other, called μέτοικοι, sojourners, who had a sort of jus civitatis. Now, it has been debated whether by οἱ ἐπὶ δ. ξένοι are to be understood all the ξένοι, or only the μέτοικοι, or both of them. Kypke and Kuinoel adopt the second view; and rightly; for though ξένοι might include both (so Thucyd. ii. 36, τὸν ὅμιλον καὶ ἀπ᾽ ἑνῶν καὶ ξένων), yet since ἐπὶ δ. is here added, and as the difference between the μέτοικοι and the ξένοι was, that the former were regular residents of the city, and accordingly obliged to take the oath of allegiance, and participate in military service, the latter were merely sojourners, drawn thither by business or pleasure.

— εἰς οὐδὲν ἔτερον εὐκαίρουν.] nulli rei magis vacabant. Εὐκαίρ. is here used for συχολάζειν, by a use confined to the later writers. The next words are graphic, and point at the chief traits of the Athenian character,—garrulity, and rage for novelty. Inasmuch that at Athens there were places called λέσχαι, appropriated to the reception of newsmongers.

Καινότερον Commentators regard as an example of the Comparative for the Positive. Yet in such cases the Comparative is seldom without its force, though it may not be very possible to express it in translating. Here the examples adduced by Commentators are not quite to the purpose; because in those the sentence is interrogative. They might more appositely have cited Josephus, Bell. i. 18, 1, τοῖς ὁργάνοις ἀντιμη-

χανόμενοι δὲ τι κώλυμα καινότερον. In the present case the full sense probably is, 'to tell or hear the latest news.' So Eurip. Orrest. 1327, τί δὲ νεώτερον λέγεις; the sense seems to be, 'What is the latest news you have to tell?'

22. In this brief but forcible address (which would doubtless have been longer, had it not been broken off by the scoffs of some, and the listlessness and abrupt departure of others) the Apostle wisely accommodates himself to the circumstances of his hearers. After a complimentary exordium (such as was usual in publicly addressing the Athenians), accompanied with a præoccupatio benevolentia, frequent in the ancient orators, he notices the occasion which led to his addressing them, and shows that it is his desire to enable them to satisfy their wish of worshipping even unknown gods, by pointing out that great Being (to them hitherto unknown) who is THE ONLY AND THE TRUE GOD, some of whose chief attributes, together with his various benefits, both of creation and providence, the Apostle then proceeds to enumerate. And here we may notice the admirable address, by which a seemingly plain statement of the first principles of natural religion is made acceptable to persons of the most opposite description, and highly instructive, by being aimed at the errors of each. Thus, by adverting to the works of God in creation, the Apostle means to censure the dogmas of the Epicureans; and by what he says of the providential care of God over all things, he glances at the opinions of the Stoics and Epicureans; finally, in speaking of sacrifices, temples, and the creation of men, he reproves the superstitions of the ignorant multitude. He shows where each party was right, and where both parties were wrong; directing his words as well against the irreligious scepticism of the higher ranks, as the grovelling superstition of the inferior classes.

Having thus established the existence of one God and Father of all mankind, he infers the duty, incumbent on God's creatures, of seeking, i. e. worshipping him; at the same time noting certain erroneous modes of worship, which had originated in utter ignorance of the true nature of the Deity. This introduces an exhortation to abandon these errors, strengthened by an announcement of a future day of judgment and punishment for all wilful disobedience to the Divine will. Now this implied a present state of accountableness, and the duty of guiding themselves by the light of that Gospel, which God had been pleased to reveal by Jesus Christ.

— δεισιδαιμονεστέρουν.] The sense most commonly assigned, 'too superstitious,' can by no means be defended. That would imply (what surely could not be supposed) that there may be a degree of superstition that is good. Equally objectionable is the sense assigned by Calvin,

ωρῶ. Διερχόμενος γὰρ καὶ ἀναθεωρῶν τὰ σεβίσματα
 ἰὼν, εὗρον καὶ βωμὸν ἐν ᾧ ἐπεγεγραπτο· ἈΓΝΩΣΤΩΙ
 ΕΩΙ. Ὅν οὖν ἀγνοοῦντες εὐσεβεῖτε, τοῦτον ἐγὼ καταγ-

Campbell, and Newcome, 'somewhat too us.' The most eminent Expositors for the ntury have been of opinion, that δεῖσθαι is employed in the good acceptation,—to denote religious, i. e. attentive to religion, [as far as understood it.] So the Pesch. Syr. Ver-menders, 'I see that in all things ye excel in worship of the δαίμονες, or gods.' That the mon will bear this sense, has been estab-lished by a multitude of proofs. And that the ians were very attentive to religious obser-ts, has been proved on the testimonies of the it writers of every kind—dramatists, histo-and philosophers; especially Pausan. Attic. η. Ἀθηναῖοις περισσώτερόν τι ἢ τοῖς is ἐν τῷ δαίμονι σπουδῇ. See also at v. 19. That such is the sense intended in the present passage, is plain from the air of ment, and will appear by a consideration of resemblances in which the Apostle was then l. To a people like the Athenians, so scru-sh observant of all the rules of courtesy sh occasions of public address, it were surely ore probable that the Apostle (with that dis-a which ever attempted his zeal) should have chosen to commence with the language scillation, rather than abrupt rebuke; which, d, would have been the more out of place, dering that it was customary for foreigners had to address the people, to begin with pay-some compliment to the place. Nevertheless, all, perhaps, not err, if we suppose that St. purposely selected the ambiguous term δεῖ- because he could not conscientiously use θεῶν; since the gods whom they worshipped in his estimation, dæmons. So 1 Cor. x. 20, ἡ δὲ εἰς τὴν δαίμονιαν εἰς, καὶ οὐ θεῶν, yet, as δαίμονες properly meant gods of rain kind, the hint would not be pointed. Apostle, then, commends their worshipping, shows that they 'worship they know not' (John iv. 22), meaning, that 'they are very ous in their way.' Again, that the compara-here means very, and not too, is plain from words following. Of us here the sense is what some take it to be, quasi; and so far its abating (as Campbell supposes) the im-of the comparative, it is intensive; as it always lther when the comparative is put for the lative, or when, as here, it denotes a high so of the positive. τὰ σεβίσματα ὧν.] Not 'your devotions,' as Erasmus, Koppe, Schleusner, and Kuinoel er) the 'summa, or objects of your worship,' down in temples, altars, images, sacrifices, as in 2 Thess. ii. 4. Wisd. xiv. 20, and some in the Classical writers. ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ.] These words have occa-ed no little perplexity to biblical interpreters. difficulty hinges on this—that, although we from Pausan. i. l. v. 14, and Philostr. Vit. l. 3, that there were at Athens altars in-ed 'to unknown gods,' yet no passage is ed, which makes mention of any altar 'to known god.' Now Jerome, Erasmus, and t would remove this difficulty by supposing the inscription in question was Ἀγνώστῳ

θεοῖς, or rather θεοῖς Ἀσίας καὶ Εὐρώπης καὶ Λιβύης, θεοῖς ἀγνώστοις καὶ ξένοις. But, as Bp. Middleton observes, 'that is a most improba-ble supposition; and, indeed, the manner in which the inscription is introduced makes it incredible that St. Paul could intend merely a remote or vague allusion.' Indeed thus (as Kuinoel observes) the whole force of the Apostle's argument would be taken away, nay, his assertion would not be true. Therefore, 'that the altar (as Bp. Middleton remarks) was inscribed simply Ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ, must either be conceded, or all inquiry will be in vain.' And, as Baronius and Wonna have observed, 'though there might be several altars at Athens and elsewhere inscribed to unknown gods generally, or to the unknown gods of any particular part of the world, yet that there might occasionally be one inscribed to one of them, is extremely probable.' Bishop Middleton, indeed, thinks that the words of the author of the Philo-patris (apud Lucian) τῇ τὸν Ἀγνώστον τὸν ἐν Ἀθήναις, are decisive, that Ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ, in the singular, was a well-known inscription. Now this would, indeed, be the case if the Philopatris stood in the same circumstances as almost every other work of the Classical writers preserved to us. But, in fact, that tract (which was written, as Gesner has proved, not by Lucian, but by an imitator of his style and manner, who lived 200 years after him, in the time of the Emperor Julian, and who bore the same name) contains, as I can attest, after having carefully examined the whole for the purpose of ascertaining, little short of twenty passages, written with manifest allusion to various parts of the Scriptures, chiefly of the New Test. There can be no doubt, then, that the writer had the present passage in view; (the article having the use κατ' ἑξοχὴν to denote the well-known), and consequently his testimony will only serve to prove (what, however, is of some consequence) that the singular number was used by St. Paul. But though no other writer seems to have recorded the existence of any altar so inscribed, yet the thing has probability to support it; and no argument from the silence of authors can be drawn to the discredit of any writer of unimpeached integrity.

The question, however, as Bp. Middleton ob-serves, is, 'was this inscription meant to be applied to one of a possible multitude, as if we should im-pute any kindness or any injury to an unknown benefactor or enemy,—or was it meant to be sig-nificant of the one true God?' He maintains that the latter opinion (though the general one) is ungrounded. It involves, he thinks, a great improbability, that an inscription so offensive to a polytheistical people could have been tolerated. Nay, he affirms that it is inconsistent with the propriety of the Article, and maintains that the omission of the Article, the position of the words, as also the rules of ordinary language and the custom of inscriptions, alike require that the words should be rendered, 'to an unknown god,' or 'to a god unknown.' He asserts that the discourse of the Apostle is, even according to that way of taking Ἀγνώστῳ, very pertinent, and that the mention of any unknown deity gave him a sufficient handle for the purpose in question. But, on the supposition that the sense is 'to an unknown god, we are encountered with the difficulty, how it could happen that an altar should have been so inscribed. The best solution of which is, that it had been erected by the Athenian people, in acknowledgment of some signal benefit received by the city at large, which seemed attributable to some god, though to whom was uncertain. If this were the case, there would be little difficulty in supposing (with Chrysostom, Theophylact, and Isidore, of the ancients, and several learned moderns), that the benefit in question was the removal of the pestilence, which almost depopulated the city, so finely described by Thucydides. And this is thought to be proved by Diogenes Laert. i. 10. Yet (waving the fabulousness of the story) we may observe, that he says nothing about an unknown god, but only represents the altars as erected Θεῷ προσήκοντι. And so far from being inscribed Θεῷ ἀγνώστῳ, he says they were ἀνώνυμοι, without any inscription. Indeed, these βαμφοὶ ἀνώνυμοι, or four-sided stone altars without inscription of any deity, were common in Greece. To suppose that the one at Athens here meant had such an inscription, is far too hypothetical to be admitted. Not to say that, from the words of Diogenes, it seems very unlikely that there should have been one at Athens. That there were altars at Athens inscribed Θεοῖς ἀγνώστοις καὶ ξίνοις, is nothing to the present purpose; since the union of ξίνοις with ἀγνώστοις alters the allusion in ἀγν., and the passage merely attests that the Athenians were much attached to foreign superstitions. So Strabo, l. x. p. 472, Falc., observes: 'Ἀθηναῖοι δ' ὥσπερ περὶ τὰ ἄλλα φιλοξενούντες διατελοῦσιν, οὕτως περὶ τοὺς θεοὺς πολλά γὰρ τῶν ξενικῶν ἱερῶν περιδέξαντο. And from Hesychius we learn that there was at Athens a festival called θεοξένια, on which worship was paid to the gods in general, both of their country and foreign ones, called θεοὶ ξενικοί. If it be asked, to whom, then, was the altar in question inscribed? I answer, doubtless, to the one true God, the Creator and Lord of all things; which, indeed, seems to be required by the course of argument in the passage, as thus stated by Womra, in a Dissertation on the present subject, vol. ii. p. 464 of the Thesaurus Theolog. Philol.: 'Quemcunque Deum Apostolus Atheniensibus annunciat, is est verus Deus. Sed quem Deum Athenienses ignorantes coluerunt, eique aram inscripserunt, est Deus, quem Apostolus Atheniensibus annunciat. E. Is Deus, quem Athenienses ignorantes coluerunt, eique aram inscripserunt, est verus Deus. Major et Minor ex textu liquido constant.' This, he shows, was also the opinion of Clemens Alex. and Augustine, of the ancient Commentators; and, of the modern ones, of Baronius, Menochius, and Heinsius. To which names may be added Cudworth, Intell. Syst. i. 4. 18, and Bp. Warburton. From what the former says,—and especially from what is adduced by Bp. Warburton, in Sect. 4. l. ii. of his Divine Legation,—it is plain that the ancient philosophers of Egypt, Greece, and Rome, were well acquainted with the doctrine of the Unity of the Godhead,

to inculcate which was the grand end of the Mysterics, where (as he has shown) the errors of Polytheism were detected, and the doctrine of the Unity taught and explained.

With respect to the terms here applied to the Deity, ἀγνώστος, it appears, from what is said by Cudworth and Warburton, to have been by no means unusual. So Damascius (ap. Cudworth, Intell. Syst. i. 4. 18) says, 'the Egyptian philosophers of his time had found in the writings of the ancients, that they held one principle of all things, and worshipped it under the name of the Unknown Darkness.' Thus we find in the celebrated Saïtic inscription, I am all that was, is, and shall be; and MY VEIL HATH NO MAN UNCOVERED. In like manner the ancient Mexicans, as we learn from Latrobe's Travels in Mexico, called the great Supreme Teatl, i. e. 'the unknown God.' Indeed, the Deity might well be so called, because he is not only invisible (hence the Egyptian appellation of the Deity, HAMMIM, invisible), but, in respect of his nature and essence, incomprehensible, being, as Josephus, contr. Ap. (cited by Cudworth) says, δυνάμει μόνον ἡμῖν γινώσκτος, ὁποῖος δὲ κατὰ οὐσίαν ἀγνώστος. As to the objection urged by Bp. Middleton, that this Θεῷ ἀγνώστῳ would here have been written, it has very little force, and being a mere question of position, as respects one writing in a foreign language, involves too minute a criticism to stand in the way of a sense excellent in itself, and demanded by the context. Not to say that the inscription might have Θεῷ ἀγνώστῳ, and St. Paul might thus alter it, whether inadvertently, or to give greater prominence to the word on which his argument was meant to rest; or even St. Luke might alter its position. Moreover, in the Pesch. Syr. Version we have ܠܗܐ ܥܝܢܐ ܠܗܐ, hidden.

from the Chaldee ܠܗܐ, to hide. And, besides this, the Translator subjoins the { emphatic (corresponding to the Greek article) to both words; which proves at least that he must have understood the expression of the one true God. As to the argument that the 'inscription would have been too offensive to Polytheists to be allowed to stand,' it is of no force; for it is well known how tolerant the people of Athens then were; and we may suppose that the inscription was worded by the same person or persons who erected the altar, (doubtless, philosophers, who had been initiated in the greater Mysterics), and that with such discreet ambiguity, by the omission of the article, as to leave it uncertain whether it was meant to express one out of many, or the one alone true God.

— ὃν ἀγνοοῦντες εὐσεβ.] Render, 'whom ye worship without knowing him.' This syntax (also occurring at 1 Tim. v. 4) of the Accusative without εἰς or πρὸς is very rare; nor do the Commentators adduce a single example. I have, however, noticed it in Joseph. Bell. ii. 8.7, ἀνέβη τὸ θεῖον.

24. The Apostle now proceeds to show the true nature and proper worship of the Deity; here evidently impugning what the Grecian philosophers promulgated as to the attributes and providence of God.

There seems a ace to the records of the early colonization tling of the earth, in the books of Moses. Vulg. prot. many MSS. and early Editions προστ., which is adopted by almost every e from Bengel and Wetstein to Vater.

The Apostle now suggests the grand design ne's creation; namely, ζητεῖν τὸν Κύριον, ship and obey his Maker.

εἰ ἄρα γε ψηλα., &c.] These words are tal of the foregoing; and the sense is, '[to f indeed they could, by the glimmering light mon, feel out and find him.' A Hendiadys ψηλαφήσαντες εὔροιεν, if by investigating ould find out his attributes, will, &c. So sch, p. 589 (cited by Elsner), Τὰς μὲν λων νοήσεις οἶον ὑπὸ σκότει, διὰ φωνῆς φωνάτες γνωρίζομεν.

So Dr. Hales supposes the Apostle to have mind a passage of Plato, Phæd. § 47, where philosopher censures those who feel after God work, by resting in second causes, without carrying up their inquiries to that first cause; consequently worshipping the creature rather than the Creator. Perhaps, however, the simi- larity of the two passages is merely accidental, the Apostle merely adverting, by a popular figure, to the less distinct evidences of natural religion, as opposed to the clear ones of Revelation; see ver. 30.

— οὐ μακρὰν ἀπό.] A litotes; the Deity being near, by these plain indications of his cre- ating and preserving power.

28. ἐν αὐτῷ, &c.] Many here recognise a climax. But it rather seems to be a strong mode of expression for 'to Him we owe life and every faculty connected with it; by Him we are what we are.' So Eurip. Alc. 290, ἐν σοὶ δ' ἰσμὶν καὶ ζῆν καὶ μί.

— τῶν καθ' ὑμᾶς π.] for τῶν ὑμετέρων π.; of which Wets. cites an example from Longinus.

— τοῦ γὰρ καὶ γένος ἰσμίν.] These words occur both in Aratus, Phæn. 5, and in a hymn of Cleanthes on Jupiter, v. 5. Similar sentiments, too, are found in other ancient writers; as Pind. Nem. Od. 6, ἐν ἀνδρῶν, ἐν θεῶν γένος, and in a passage of Apollonius, Epist. 44, imitated from the present passage; καὶ πάντας ἀνθρώπους ἀδελφοὺς καὶ φίλους, ὡς ἀν γένος μιν ὄντας Θεοῦ, μὴ δὲ φύσει.

29. γένος οὖν ὑπάρχοντες, &c.] Meaning, 'If, then, man be God's handy-work, or creation, as your own poet says; sure it must be absurd to imagine that God can be man's handy-work, or creation.' (Markland.) Here the Apostle ad- duces the conclusion, that mankind are bound to worship God THEIR FATHER; and that not with idolatrous, but spiritual worship, as being a spir- itual Being (see John iv. 23, 24), and not like images made by human art.

To see the full force of the allusions in χρυσῷ ἢ ἀργύρῳ—ἐνθυμήσεως ἀνθρώπου we must, as Mr. Gifford observes, in his Travels in Greece, recollect that 'below, around, and above the spot where the Apostle stood (the Mars' Hill) there stood innumerable idola, and above all the cele- brated Minerva of Phidias, on which the highest arts and devices of men, and the most costly materials, had been lavishly expended.'

30, 31. The Apostle now points out the subject of his preaching—JESUS AND THE RESURREC-

TION; to attend to which he excites them by every motive. To call forth their love of God, and hope in him, he tells them that their past ignorance of his true nature and worship, and their consequent corruption of morals, God was pleased to overlook; but had now sent his Son (that DIVINE Teacher so ardently wished and longed for by the wisest philosophers) to teach men how to worship God aright, and to save them, upon condition of repentance for what was past, and reformation as to the future. To work on their fear of the Divine Majesty, he apprises them that, if they did not listen to the Lord Jesus and his Gospel, they would incur condign punishment at the general resurrection and subsequent judgment held by him.

30. ὑπεριδὼν] 'overlooking transgression,' forbearing to punish it. So Josephus, Ant. ii. 6. 8, τὰ περὶ μικρῶν ζημιωμάτων ἀφίειναι τοὺς πλημμελήσαντας ἐκαινον ἡγεῖκε τοῖς ὑπεριδοῦσι.

— μετανοεῖν] i. e. 'to cease to do evil and learn to do well;' true repentance implying reformation; see Note on Matt. iii. 2.

31. ὅτι ἐστῆσεν, &c.] q. d. '[And there is need that you should repent, and reform your lives,] for you must give an account,' &c. 'Ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ; i. e. in such strictness of justice as must exclude all mercy to the impenitent and unreformed. 'Ἀνδρὶ is (as Œcumenius observes) spoken οἰκονομικῶς, denoting, the God-man Jesus, &c.

— πίστιν παρασχῆν here signifies (as often) 'to produce faith in any thing, or confidence in any one's pretensions,' by adducing sufficient proofs of the existence of the former, and the validity of the latter.

32. οἱ μὲν ἐχλεύαζον.] This feeling of contempt for, and ridicule of, the doctrine in question will not appear so strange, when we consider how wholly unaccustomed were men's minds to the notion of a resurrection of the body, and consequently the identity of man in a future state; see the Introduction to 1 Cor. xv. Of this their mythological accounts of Elysium had said nothing. And the thing, at first consideration, involved so much to stagger their faith, that the feeling was perhaps natural, but ought to have been suppressed by the consideration of the omnipotence of the great God who had pleased that life and immortality should be brought to light by the Gospel of Christ.

— ἀκουσόμεθά σου π. τ. τ.] Not, it should

seem, that they really desired to hear more; for if so, why should they not hear it then, for the Apostle had not wearied his gay fastidious hearers with obscure prolixity? The feeling seems to have been that of indifference and distrust; or rather, we may consider this as a civil way of saying, 'We will hear no more of this at present: some other time will do;' see Doddridge and Scott. Thus the Apostle's reception was so very discouraging, that he, in disgust, terminated his discourse; which, therefore, may be said to have been as much interrupted and cut short as Stephen's was, nay, even some of our Lord's discourses to the Jews, in St. John's Gospel. Had that not been the case, St. Paul would doubtless have enlarged on the nature and requisites of that religion whose divine origin had been thus attested by God himself, by signs and wonders and mighty deeds.

34. κολληθέντες] 'having become his converts;' see Note on ver. 13. Γυνή, 'a matron,' doubtless, of some rank, as being here mentioned by name. Some suppose her to have been the wife of Dionysius. Yet thus αὐτοῦ would have been required after γυνή.

XVIII. The Apostle, after having departed from Athens, repairs to Corinth, and there meets with Aquila, who, on being expelled from Rome, with the other Jews there, had, with his wife Priscilla, retired to that city. To this person, who was a tent-maker, the Apostle, being of the same trade, joins himself, works in his shop, and lodges in his house (vv. 1—3). Silas and Timotheus come to him from Macedonia (ver. 5). After having stayed a year and a half at Corinth (ver. 11), and, notwithstanding the pertinacious opposition of the Jews, preached to the Gentiles with success the doctrine of Christ, the Apostle takes a journey through Syria; repairs to Caesarea and Jerusalem (vv. 21, 22); afterwards traverses Galatia and Phrygia (ver. 23); and at length returns to Ephesus, where he had left Aquila and Priscilla (ver. 23), who accompany him into Syria (ver. 18). Meanwhile, at Ephesus, Apollas, having been fully instructed in the Christian doctrine by Aquila and Priscilla, had there preached the Gospel with singular zeal and success (ver. 24, seqq.).

2. Ἰουδαῖον.] Whether Aquila was then a Christian has been by recent Commentaries thought doubtful. Certainly, it by no means follows from the silence of St. Luke as to that

, that he was not, it being not unusual for writers to omit minute circumstances to be supplied, of which this is probably specially since the expression προσῆλθεν implies a sort of conversion, which was ly that of identity of religion. Now there on, from the earliest period of the Gospel, negation of Christians at Rome, which is ad to have originated with some who had resent at the feast of Pentecost, when the Ghost was imparted; and was doubtless sed by those Jewish Christians, who had a to repair to that city on commercial or business.

προσφάτως] for πρόσφατος, which pro- signifies recently slain, but is used, both in aical and Hellenistic writers, in the sense So Pindar, Pyth. iv. ult., πρόσφατος ξενωθείς: see Blomfield on Æschyl. h. 791.

πεταχέναι] 'had issued a διάταγμα, or 'Of which we have mention made in ius, Claud. c. 23, 'Judeos, impulsores, assidue tumultuantes, Romæ expulsi.' Christus there spoken of is by most recent authors supposed to have been a Hellenis-; while the ancient and earlier modern re of opinion that it is but a false reading illing for Christus. And that Christus be changed into Christus might easily and did happen on other occasions.

ταπείνωσις there adverted to were doubtless ions between the Jews and Christians (or Jewish or Gentile), and other political nances which so mighty a moral revolution introduction of the Gospel could not but be; and so verifying the words of Christ, 'came not to send peace, but a sword.' sense, Christ might, by means of his reli- said to be the impulsor.

ἰσοποιοί.] Few terms so plain as this even rise to more discussion as to the sense assigned to it. The general opinion of authors, both ancient and modern, is, that ten tent-makers. Some, however (as in the τέκτων, Matt. xiii. 55), perhaps thinking an occupation too humble for the Apostle of titles, have fancied other senses,—namely, of tapestry, makers of mathematical instruments, saddlers, &c. Yet for these signifi- of the word very slender authority exists; may be supposed that St. Luke, writing, as he, in a plain style, would use such a term in its ordinary sense; not to say that the not mentioned trades would require far more exact skill and devoted attention, than could be expected in one like St. Paul, the greater part probably of whose time was spent so very differently. There can be little doubt that the Apostle's trade was (according to ancient opinion) that of a maker of tents, formed of leather or thick cloth, both for military and domestic purposes, the latter sort being, from the scarcity of inns, much used throughout the East in travelling; and, in that warm climate, inhabited, during the summer season, as houses.

4. ἐπειθ'.] This is strangely rendered by Kuinoel and others docebat; for παίθεσθαι must surely, from the subject, mean 'swayed their minds, persuaded them [to embrace Christianity]'; the action being here, as often, put for the endeavour. So 2 Cor. v. 11, αἰδέσθε τὸν φόβον τοῦ Κυρίου, ἀνθρώπους παίθεμεν.

5. τῷ πνεύματι.] Some MSS., several Versions, and a few Fathers, have τῷ λόγῳ, which was preferred by Bengel, Pearce, and Kuinoel, and received by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz; but without sufficient reason. The external authority for that reading is slender, and the internal by no means strong. The above Editors, indeed, urge that λόγῳ is to be preferred, as being the more difficult reading. But it must be remembered, that that canon has its exceptions; one of which is when the reading in question would do violence to the proprietas linguæ, or yield an absurd or unsuitable sense; which is the case here; for the sense 'was occupied in preaching,' is most jejune; inasmuch that Morus and Heinrichs render συνείχετο coquebatur, yet without assigning any tolerable sense to τῷ λόγῳ. But whence, then, it may be asked, arose τῷ λόγῳ? I answer, from a marginal or interlineary scholium, of some one who had in his copy, not συνείχετο, but ἐνέκαιτο; and thus suggested that λόγῳ should be supplied, or substituted for πνεύματι. That such must have been the reading in Jerome's copy is plain from his version instabat verbo. The common reading must also claim a preference on the score of being the more difficult reading; though not so difficult as Markland represents, who professed that he was unable to comprehend it. It surely admits of a very good sense; namely, as Beza, Luther, Calvin, and others explain, 'intus et apud se aestuabat præ zeli ardore,' 'he was under the impulse of ardent zeal.' So xx. 22, διδέμενος τῷ πνεύματι.

6. ἀντιτασσομένων] 'contradicting and opposing by words,' a military metaphor, of which Elmsler and Markland adduce two examples; but one more apposite occurs in Thucyd. iii. 83, τὸ

καὶ βλασφημούντων, ἐκτιναζάμενος τὰ ἱμάτια, εἶπε πρὸς αὐτούς· Τὸ αἶμα ὑμῶν ἐπὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν ὑμῶν! καθαρὸς ἐγὼ ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν εἰς τὰ ἔθνη πορεύσομαι. Καὶ μεταβάς ἐκεῖθεν ἦλθεν εἰς οἰκίαν τινός, ὀνόματι Ἰούστου, σεβομένου τὸν Θεόν, οὗ ἡ οἰκία ἦν συνηγοροῦσα τῇ συναγωγῇ. * Κρίσπος δὲ ὁ ἀρχισυναγωγὸς ἐπίστευσε τῷ Κυρίῳ σὺν ὅλῳ τῷ οἴκῳ αὐτοῦ· καὶ πολλοὶ τῶν Κορινθίων ἀκούοντες ἐπίστευον, καὶ ἐβαπτίζοντο. Ἐῖπε δὲ ὁ Κύριος δι' ὁράματος ἐν νυκτὶ τῷ Παύλῳ· Μὴ φοβοῦ, ἀλλὰ λάλει καὶ μὴ σιωπήσῃς· ⁸ διότι ἐγὼ εἰμι μετὰ σοῦ, καὶ οὐδεὶς ἐπιθήσεται σοι τοῦ κακῶσαι σε· διότι λαὸς ἐστί μοι πολὺς ἐν τῇ πόλει ταύτῃ. δὲ ἀντιτετάχθαι ἀλλήλοις τῇ γνώμῃ ἀπὸ-στως ἐπὶ πολὺ δῆνεγκεν.

6. ἐκτιναζάμενος τὰ ἱμάτια.] A symbolical action (with which we may compare Nehem. v. 13), like shaking the dust off one's shoes at any one, thereby signifying that we renounce all intercourse with him; see xiii. 51.

— τὸ αἶμα ὑμῶν ἐπὶ, &c.] Supply τρέψεται (which word is expressed in Aristoph. Nub. 39, ἐς τὴν κεφαλὴν ἅπαντα τὴν σὴν τρέψεται) or τρέποιτο, as Aristoph. Ach. 833, ἐς κεφαλὴν τρέποιτο ἱμοί. By αἶμα is here meant destruction, i. e. figuratively, perdition in the next world. This manner of speaking was common to the Hebrews (see 2 Sam. i. 16. Ezek. xxxiii. 4), the Greeks, and the Romans. Several examples are adduced in Elsnar and Wetstein, who rightly derive it from the very ancient custom of putting hands on the heads of victims for sacrifice, and imprecating on them the evils which impended over the sacrifice, or the nation. Εἰς τὰ ἔθνη πορεύσομαι must not be understood as implying abandonment of the Jews, but only a more especial attention to the Gentiles.

7. μεταβάς ἐκεῖθεν.] Not from the house of Aquila (thus shifting his lodgings), as most Commentators suppose; but, as appears from the context, from the synagoge,—that being, no doubt, the place where the foregoing exhortations had been pronounced. Besides, if συναγ. be not taken as the substantive of place referred to, there is no other. Ἦλθεν εἰς οἰκίαν must be understood to mean, 'entered into, entered upon, a house' for the purpose of teaching and preaching, perhaps in an upper apartment appropriated to that purpose; see a kindred passage at xix. 9.

— συνηγοροῦσα] 'contemninous, contiguous.' The word occurs, I believe, no where else;

though συνόμορος, from which it is derived, is found in the ancient glossaries. The Classical term is συνορίω, used by Polybius.

9. λάλει καὶ μὴ σιωπήσῃς.] This intermixture of the Imperative with the Subjunctive is thought to be a Hebraism. Be that as it may, there is no pleonasm; for the Subjunctive form is more significant than the Imperative, there being an ellipsis of ὅρα, q. d. 'Mind that ye be not silent!'

10. λαὸς ἐστί.] The best Commentators remark, that the persons in question are called Christ's people by anticipation; just as the Gentiles, who should afterwards embrace the Christian religion, are in John x. 16 already called the stock of Christ.

11. ἐκάθισεν] 'took up his abode.' A Hellenistic use of the word, as in Luke xxiv. 49.

12. Γαλλ. ἀνθυπ. τῆς Ἀχ.] The best Commentators are agreed that the sense is, 'on Gallio becoming Proconsul.' Καταφίστημι is a very rare word, but may be compared with καταχειρίω and others.

13. παρὰ τὸν νόμον—Θεόν.] As much as to say: 'The Roman people permit us Jews in Greece to worship God after the rites of the Mosaic Law (see Josephus, Ant. xiv. 40; xvi. 2); but this fellow teaches things contrary to our Law, and excites disturbances among us.'

14. ἀδίκ. τι ἢ ῥάδιον ἔργημα π.] The best Commentators regard ἀδίκ. as equivalent to πρωτόμνημα, any serious offence, and ῥάδι. they interpret flagitium. It should rather seem to either correspond to that minor class of offences with us styled larceny, or rather those petty breaches of the peace which with us are called misemeanors. The ῥάδι. πρωτόμνημα perhaps had reference to those mischievous tricks often played off in Heathen countries in ridicule of the Jewish

18. κειράμενος τὴν κεφαλὴν.] It has been
 disputed whether this should be referred to Aquila, or to Paul. The former view (adopted
 by the most eminent Commentators, and supported by the ancient Versions) is, for several reasons, preferable,—and, besides having far more
 of probability, avoids many difficulties involved in the latter. Ἐν Κεγχρεαῖς, 'at Cenchrea'; that being the port where he embarked on his voyage.

The best Commentators are agreed that the
 vow was not a Nazarite vow, but a votum civile,
 such as was, among the Jews, taken during or
 after recovery from sickness, or deliverance from
 any peril, or on obtaining any unexpected good,
 importing, 'to consecrate and offer up the hair,'
 the shaving of which signified the fulfilment of
 the vow. A custom this not unusual among the heathens, as appears from Artemid. On. i. 28.

 is obscurely expressed, but there is no necessity
 to adopt the expedient proposed by Doddridge,
 of transposing this clause, and placing it after εἰλόντος, ver. 21. The fact is, that St. Paul had brought them with him, on his voyage to Cæsarea,
 as far as Ephesus, and there put them on shore;
 and, the ship stopping there a short time, including a sabbath-day, Paul took the opportunity of
 preaching to the Jews, to whom his discourse was
 so acceptable, that they pressed him to remain
 longer with them; which request, however, he
 was obliged to refuse, because if he permitted the
 ship to go without him, he should probably not be able to meet with another to convey him in time
 for the feast at Jerusalem.

ὃς παραγενόμενος συνεβάλετο πολὺ τοῖς πεπιστευκόσι διὰ

purpose may be supposed to have been to promote the cause of the Gospel, and open the communication between the Christians of Jerusalem and those of other parts of the world; also to endeavour to remove the prejudices of his countrymen.

22. ἀναβάς.] Namely, to Jerusalem; for to this the word may very well be referred, from εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα having occurred only a little before. To take it, as many have done, of Cæsarea, involves far greater harshness; since it would forbid all mention of the going to Jerusalem, the great object of the Apostle's voyage into those parts.

24. Ἀπολλῶς.] A name contracted from Ἀπολλώνιος, as Εραφῆρος from Εραφροδίτης, and Αρτεμης from Αρτεμόνιος.

— ἀνὴρ λόγιος.] An expression denoting, in the earlier writers, a man of letters, especially an historian; but in the later ones (especially Philo and Josephus) an eloquent man; which is most probably the sense here. Δυνατὸς ἐν ταῖς γραφαῖς, 'well versed in the interpretation of the Scriptures of the Old Test.'

25. κατηχημένος τὴν ὁδὸν τοῦ Κυρίου.] By the expression ἡ ὁδὸς τοῦ Κυρίου must (as appears from the words following) be meant that part of God's plan for the salvation of man by a Redeemer, which regarded the doctrine and methods of John the Baptist, and enjoined repentance and reformation, and the being baptized unto the faith of the future Messiah. Or, taking Κύριος here to denote Christ, we may understand, 'instructed in the doctrine of a Messiah,' not, in the doctrine of Jesus Christ; for Apollos knew only the doctrine of John, who baptized eis τὸν ἐρχόμενον, preaching repentance, and announcing the coming of the Messiah (see Matt. iii. 2, compared with Acts xix. 4); while, by the more accurate instruction which Apollos received from Aquila and Priscilla, must be understood that of the Messiahship of Jesus, and what he had enjoined as to faith and practice, in order to the attainment of everlasting salvation. By τὸ βάπτισμα is meant, per

synecdochen, the doctrine of John the Baptist, of which baptism was a principal feature. Now, this must imply that Apollos had received that baptism; as also, ἐπιστάμενος μόνον, that he had not received Christian baptism. It is generally believed that he had been baptized by John himself, and had, since that time, obtained some knowledge of the Gospel; though he had not been baptized unto the faith of Christ. This, however, involves much improbability. It should rather seem that he had been baptized not long before by one of John's disciples; and, in short, was become one of the sect of the Johnnites, which existed about this period, and on which see Tittman's Introd. to the Gospel of St. John. Ἀκριβῶς has reference, not to the doctrine, but to the manner of teaching it, namely, 'as exactly as he knew how.'

26. παρρησιάζεσθαι.] This may have reference not only to his decanting on the necessity of repentance and reformation, but to his freely pointing out many errors in the usual mode of understanding the Scriptures, especially the Prophecies.

— προσελάβοντο.] The word signifies properly, 'to take any one to oneself,' and figuratively, 'to one's society and confidence.' Ἐξέδωκε, 'exposuerunt, explained, set forth.'

27. προτρέψαμενοι] 'exhorting him' [to carry into effect his resolve].

— συνεβάλετο πολὺ τοῖς, &c.] i. e. contributed to the spiritual good of. Of the next words, διὰ τῆς χάριτος, the sense depends upon the construction of the sentence; on which a difference of opinion exists. Some, as Faciet and Hammond, construing it with τοῖς πεπιστευκόσι; others, and indeed almost all the best Expositors, with συνεβάλετο. The latter method is far preferable; for to construe it with τοῖς πεπιστευκόσι not a little embarrasses the sentence; and no such phrase as πιστεύειν διὰ τῆς χάριτος elsewhere occurs in Scripture. Indeed, the sense thus arising would be here little suitable.

transposition is by no means harsh; and, we suppose, was here adopted because the words not well have been introduced between ἔλαστο and its dative, especially as πολὺ so interposed.

proceed to the sense of the words. I can means agree with those who take τῆς to mean grace of diction and manner, Luke iv. 22, τοῖς λόγοις τῆς χάριτος; a which would here be not sufficiently, and, indeed, would require the addition of λόγου. There can be little doubt that χάριτος stands for τῆς χάριτος τοῦ Θεοῦ, expression of such frequent occurrence that times the τοῦ Θεοῦ is dispensed with. So Rom. διὰ τῆς χάριτος τῆς δοθείσης, and xii. 6. & especially v. 17, οἱ τὴν περισσεύσαν χάριτος λαμβάνουσι. Thus the expression may be supposed to have reference to that grace of God by the extraordinary influence of the Holy Spirit, so likely to be communicated to one thus devoted to the great work of civilization. A sense at once natural, and agreeable to the context, and agreeable to the language of Scripture elsewhere; see 1 Cor. iii. 18.

X. 1. τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη.] The upper as regarded Ephesus, the inland regions, Phrygia and Galatia. See my Note on i. 7.

θητάς.] Some suppose these to have been believers in a Messiah, and followers of the Baptist. Yet thus they could not have been called 'disciples,' meaning disciples of Christ. It should rather seem that they had been, some time before, baptized by John's disciples, but had been not long at —when, partly by means of Apollos, and partly by Aquila, they became convinced of the Christian religion, and were disciples of Aquila,—though they were not yet fully acquainted with its doctrines, nor had they formally been baptized.

πρὸς αὐτούς· Εἰ, &c.] Here there is a blending of the direct with the indirect.

— ἄλλ' οὐδὲ—ἡκούσαμεν.] This, according to the sense assigned by our common Version, would imply such ignorance as, even on the supposition that the men were only Johnannites, would be incredible. However, it is quite unnecessary to so interpret; for Grotius, Bp. Pearce, and others have proved, that διδόμενον, or λαμβανόμενον, must be supplied at ἐστὶ; meaning, that they had not heard whether the Holy Spirit was imparted; or, as Pr. Robinson, in his Lex., explains, they did not know that the Holy Spirit had yet been given; namely, that the time foretold by Joel had arrived. So, at John vii. 39, it is said, οὕτως γὰρ ἦν Πνεῦμα ἅγιον, where our common Version very properly expresses the διδόμενον. In both passages the extraordinary influences of the Holy Spirit are to be understood.

3. εἰς τί.] Supply βάπτισμα, or ὄνομα. Εἰς is here used, not to denote purpose, but, with the Accusative, stands for in, by, with a Dative, as in forms of swearing; ex. gr. Matt. v. 35, εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν, which is just after followed by οὐρανὸν ἐν τῇ γῇ.

4. βάπτισμα μετανοίας.] Meaning, a baptism which bound those who received it to repentance, reformation, and purity of life. See Matt. iii. 2, and Note.

— τουτέστιν εἰς τὸν Χ. Ἰ.] These are to be understood as the words of the Apostle, briefly importing, 'namely, that Messiah whom John bound you to worship is Jesus.' Doubtless the Apostle proceeded to enlarge on the conclusive nature of the evidence existing for the Messiahship of Jesus, and the benefits whereof we are made partakers by his religion.

5. ἐβαπτίσθησαν, &c.] That the circumstance of these persons being rebaptized in the name of Jesus, affords no countenance to the notions of Anabaptists, has been shown at large in Recens. Synop.

6. ἐλάλουν τε γλώσσαις καὶ προφητεῖαι.] Notwithstanding the opinion of several recent Commentators as to the import of these expressions, the sense must surely be, 'they spake with [foreign] tongues, and used their gift in the exercise of the prophecy, or inspired teaching and

 ἑτέροις γλώσσαις, as in the similar passage supra
 ii. 4, ἤρξαντο λαλεῖν ἑτέροις γλώσσαις, καθὼς
 τὸ Πνεῦμα ἐδίδου αὐτοῖς ἀποφθίγγεσθαι,
 where St. Luke gives the complete phrase, though
 afterwards he uses the elliptical form; as does St.
 Paul universally. We may here recognise a cli- max; the προφητεία being, as we learn from 1 Cor.
 xiv. 5, a higher gift than the λαλεῖν γλώσσαις.
 Thus it is meant that 'they had not only the gift
 of tongues, but, what was greater, that of pro-
 phesy'; as it is said in the above passage, μεῖζον
ὁ προφητεύων, ἢ ὁ λαλῶν γλώσσαις.

9. ἐσκληρ. καὶ ἠπείθουν.] A sort of Hendiadys; 'obstinately refused to yield credence.' So Eccles. xxx. 12, μήποτε σκληρυνθεὶς ἀπειθήσῃ
σοι. See also Ps. xciv. 8, and Heb. iii. 8. Ἀπο-στάς must be understood of separation from the synagogue and church communion.

— ἐν τῇ σχολῇ Τυράννου τ.] What sort of a school this was, Commentators are not quite agreed. Some suppose it to have been a kind of Beth-Midrash, or Divinity Hall, designed for reading theological lectures. Others think it was a philosophical lecture-room, and that Tyrannus
 was a rhetorician, or sophist. If the former conjecture be correct, he was probably a converted
 Jew; if the latter, a converted Gentile.

10. πάντας.] This may be taken, with many Commentators, in a qualified sense. But surely,
 considering the constant influx of persons to this
 emporium and metropolis of Asia Minor, there
 could not be many individuals but had heard, at least by the report of others, of the doctrines of Christianity.

11. οὐ τὰς τυχούσας.] Literally, 'such as
 were not of every day occurrence,' meaning extraordinary and illustrious.

12. ἐπιφέρεισθαι.] For this many ancient
 MSS. and the Vulgate have ἀποφέρ., which has been edited by Lachmann; but wrongly; since

the common reading presents a more appropriate
 term; for the ἐπι in ἐπιφέρ. ought not (as it has been by many) to be considered as pleonastic,
 but as having the sense ad. Indeed, the word
 seems to have been a medical term, signifying adferre, to apply. There is, I would observe, the more reason to contend for strict propriety in this
 term, since the other two verbs in this sentence
 are quite appropriate, — ἀπαλλάσσεσθαι and ἐξίρχεσθαι. And though, instead of the latter,
 very many MSS. have ἐκπορεύεσθαι (which has been received by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz), yet I have thought proper, with Matthei
 and Vater, to retain it, as being by far the more
 probable reading, the term being often elsewhere
 used in Scripture; ex. gr. supra viii. 7; whereas ἐκπορεύεσθαι is no where found in Scripture, or elsewhere.

— σουδάρια.] See Luke xix. 20. Σιμικίνθια
 is from the Latin semicinctum, a half-girdle, or garment, equivalent to our apron.

— ἀπ' αὐτῶν.] These words, not found in those MSS. which have, for ἐξίρχεσθαι, ἐκπο-
ρεύεσθαι, have been cancelled by Griesbach,
 Tittman, and Scholz.

13. τινες ἀπὸ τῶν περιερχ. 'I. i.] Render,
 'some of the Jews who go about as exorcists'.
 These (called by the Greeks ἀγύρται, and by
 the Romans circulatores) were a class of persons
 who, like our travelling quacks, or mountebanks,
 or conjurors, pretended to cure violent disorders
 beyond the skill of the physician, and even to
 cast out devils; and all this, with the use of certain incantations or charms, made effective, partly
 by administering certain powerful medicines, and
 partly by strongly operating on the imagination.
 See Joseph. Ant. viii. 2, 5.

14. τινες.] This must be construed with ἐπτά,
 'some seven persons, sons of Sceva.' See infra
 xxiii. 23, and Thucyd. iii. 11. vii. 87.

— ἀρχιερέως.] Not 'High Priest,' but 'a chief ἰσομολ. καὶ ἀναγγ.] The two expressions are synonymous, denoting open and unre-ἡκανοί.] Lit., 'a good many.'

 τὰ περιέργα.] Περιέργος, as applied to is, signifies nimis sedulus, male curiosus;
 hence, as applied to things, supercarvus,
 . Thus it was used, like curiosus in Latin,
 note the arts of magic; a sense occurring in the Scriptural and Classical writers. The here mentioned were, no doubt, treatises on and necromancy; such as those of Artemi-and Astrampychus on the interpretation of dreams. Ephesus was the chief resort of the professors of the black art, who drew up what are called in the Classical writers the ἑφίσια γράμματα; which were scrolls of parchment inscribed with certain formulæ, and bound to the body, being used as amulets. Of pernicious books being publicly burnt, several examples are adduced by Wetstein. I have adopted the above pointing at πάντων, since, in the words following, the subject is not the same as in the preceding; for, I apprehend, it was not the persons that burnt the books, who were the computers of the value. We have only to suppose an ellipsis of ἀνθρώποι. In which case the phrase may be expressed by our impersonal form, thus: 'the cost of them being estimated, was found to be,' &c. So, indeed, the words were understood by the Vulgate and Arabic Translators, as they have also been by some modern ones, as Wakefield and Newcome.

—ἀργυρίου.] What kind of silver coin is here meant,—whether the silver shekel, or the drachm,—it is impossible to determine. The lat- ter is the more probable opinion.

20. κατὰ κράτος] for ἰσχυρῶς, 'exceedingly';
 a Hellenistic idiom; the Classical writers only employing the expression in the place of ἰσχυρῶς,
 to signify vehementer.

21. ἐθετο ἐν τῷ πν.] 'statuit apud se,' 'resolved
 in his mind.' So the Hebrew שָׁלַח בְּעַצְמוֹ. Comp.
 Dan. i. 8. Hagg. ii. 19. 1 Cor. vii. 37. Such the best Commentators have been long agreed in assigning as the sense, rather than to refer τῷ πνεύματι (as others have done) to the Holy Spirit.

22. ἐπέσχε χρόνον.] Ἐπέσχειν signifies, 1. to hold to any thing (ἐπὶ); and, 2. to keep to, stay by;
 and has a reflected force by the ellipse of ἑαυτὸν.
 In the sense of stay, it occurs either without, or (as here) with the addition of an Accusative (depending on κατὰ), denoting duration of time.

24. ἀργυροκόπος.] The word signifies a silver-smith, or worker in silver in any way, whether in forming utensils thereof, or in stamping metals. Here, however, only one branch of the trade is meant, namely, that of making the silver shrines.

— ναοὺς ἀργυροῦς.] So Artemid. iv. 34, ἀργυρίου ναοὺ ἐργεπιστάτης. These naoi argyroi 'Art. are, with most probability, supposed to have been small silver models of the Temple of Diana at Ephesus (one of the wonders of the world), or at least of the sanctum, or chapel, which contained the famous statue of the goddess. These were much bought up, both for curiosity (as memorials of a building so matchless), and for purposes of devotion (as are the models of the Santa Croce at Loretto, in modern times), and were carried about by travellers or others, like the movable altars in use among the Roman Catholics; the model being always provided with a small image of the goddess. Probably the ἀργυροκόποι also executed large medals representing the temple, with the image of Diana, of which some have been preserved.

— παρείχετο τοῖς τεχνίταις ἐργασίαν οὐκ ὀλ., &c.] 'produced much gain to,' as supra xvi. 16, ἥτις ἐργασίαν πολλὴν παρείχε τοῖς, &c. By the τεχνίταις are here denoted the chief workmen; and by the ἐργάταις, the inferior artizans, employed on the rougher work of these portable chapels. Τὰ τοιαῦτα, i. e. statuary, painting, and such sort of occupations connected with the Pagan religion.

25. ἡ εὐπορία ἡμῶν.] We have here a term of middle signification, to be interpreted according to the circumstances of the case. In the present instance it cannot mean wealth, but must simply have the sense faculties, property, living; as supra xi. 29, καθὼς ἡπόρευε τὸ τίς.

26. πείσας μετέστησεν] 'has by his persuasions drawn away.' Μετέσταναι signifies properly to change the position of any thing or person; to remove any one from any present station; and, figuratively, to alienate any one's attachment to another.

— λέγων ὅτι οὐκ εἰσὶ θεοὶ οἱ διὰ χ. γιν.] The heathens (at least the ignorant multitude) regarded the images of the gods as the gods themselves. Hence the makers of these were called θεοποιοί; and on the removal of the images, they supposed the gods themselves to be taken away. The better instructed, indeed, did not harbour so gross a fancy; yet they maintained that the gods in illis LATUERE, and that hence

they were θεοὶ, and filled with the presence of the Deity. They readily allowed that the gods did not need images; which, they said, were only invented in condescension to the weakness of men, and only meant as helps, to raise the soul to heaven, and as symbols and handmaids to religion. They regarded the images as representatives of the gods, and, as such, entitled to every honour. Finally, they maintained that they did not adore the images, but only the gods, who, as it were, resided in them. In short, they resorted to such arguments and excuses as those by which the idolatries of the Romish Church have ever been defended; but which were indignantly rejected by the great Christian Apologists, in their Answers to Celsus, Porphyry, and Julian; who would, doubtless, were they alive now, be as strenuous opposers of Romish, as they were once of Pagan idolatry.

27. ἡμῖν τὸ μέρος.] The general sense here is clear; yet to exactly fix it, and show how it arises, is by no means easy. Some learned Expositors take the expression to mean, 'this part,' namely, as regards the present business. Others explain, 'this matter of concern;' and Valcknaer and Wolf, 'quod ad nos spectat, questus noster.' But of these interpretations the one last mentioned is much too far-fetched, and the others are destitute of valid proof. It should seem that the expression in question is one deviating from Classical usage, and taken from the language of common life; the sense being simply, 'this very occupation of ours, [by which we subsist].' Μέρος may be supposed to have this signification, from that by which it denotes (as sometimes in Xenophon) office or duty, like the Latin pars, and our part. Thus Johnson (in his English Dictionary) gives, among other senses of the word part, that of duty, business. Hence it came to mean an occupation, or employment; literally, 'that which it is our allotted duty to perform.'

— ἀπελεγμὸν διαγράψαι; from ἀπελεγεσθαι, 'to be utterly refuted or rejected.' The word occurs in Symmachus, and ἐλεγμὸς in the Sept. The construction of this passage is somewhat anomalous, and it has therefore been treated as corrupt, and has been tampered with by both ancient and modern Critics. But no change is necessary, since the style is what is called populæ, and the construction is: κινδυνεύει τὸ ἱερὸν—λογισθῆναι, τὴν τι μεγαλειότητα αὐτῆς μίλλαι καὶ καθαιρεῖσθαι. Much to the present purpose is a passage of Aristoph. Pac. 1212, where Trygæus,

Jews in the transaction; who, indeed, had some cause to feel alarmed for their safety, since their hostility to all idol-worship was well known; and the bitter animosity felt towards them by the multitude is plain, from their refusing to hear the speaker because he was a Jew. Of ἀπολογεῖσθαι the sense is simply that of addressing the people in the way of justification, to show them that no insult had been offered to the worship of Diana; or, at least, that the Jews were not the persons who had done the wrong.

34. ἰκινύοντες.] This (for the common reading ἰκινύοντων), found in many of the best MSS., almost all the early Editions, and several Fathers, has been adopted by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Vater; and rightly; for besides the strong external evidence, internal is quite in its favour, it being the more difficult reading. It is, however, not so much a Nominative absolute, as it involves an anacoluthon.

35. Καταστέλλω signifies properly to put down, as Ps. lxxv. 7, καταστ. τὸ κύτος τῆς Σαλάσσης. But it is more frequently used in a metaphorical sense, of quieting a tumult.

— γραμματεὺς.] It is easier to ascertain the rank and duties of this office, than to represent the term by any corresponding one of modern languages. From the passages of ancient writers adduced by Wets., it appears that the Γρ. was President of the Senate, and that his duties embraced most of those of our Chancellor and Secretary of State. It may be conjectured that this functionary (of different dignity in different cities) was so called, from being the keeper of the archives, containing all the γράμματα of the State; as public treaties, decrees, and documents of every kind.

— τίς γάρ ἐστιν, &c.] Pearce and Markland observe that the γάρ has reference to some clause omitted, and to be filled up thus: '[There is no need of this clamorous repetition of "Great is Diana," for what man is there, &c. Of this elliptical use of γάρ at the beginning of a speech, they adduce an example from Herodot. vi. 11, 'Ἐπὶ Euroῦ γὰρ ἀκμῆς ἔχεται ἡμῖν τὰ πράγματα; q. d. '[I am now induced to address you;] for our affairs are in the utmost danger.'

— νεωκόρον.] The word at first denoted merely a keeper of the temple. Afterwards, however, (when the humility of religious devotees made the office sought after even by persons of rank,) the term was employed to denote a curator, one whose office it was to see that the temple was kept clean and in good repair, and furnished with every thing proper for the celebration of public worship. (See Jos. Ant. i. 7. 6. Xen. An. v. 3. 6.) Sometimes, too, it meant, not curator, but simply cultor, worshipper; as in Joseph. Bell. v. 9. 6, οὗ (Israelites) ὁ θεὸς ἑαυτῷ νεωκόρου ἦγεν. At length, what was properly applicable only to a person, came to be transferred, by Prosopopœia, to cities; especially as it was usual to personify them. And thus, by an accommodation of the sense, the term came to signify dedicated, consecrated to; in which acceptation it was used not only of Ephesus, but also (as we find from inscriptions on coins) of other cities of Greece and Asia Minor. Nay, sometimes one and the same city was called νεωκόρος, with respect to three or even four different deities. So great was this devotion of the Ephesians to Diana, that we find from Ælian, Var. Hist. iii. 26, the city was styled her ἀνάθημα. And that it should have been thus attached to her service, we may easily imagine; since by devoting itself to the goddess, the city was said to have been formerly saved from destruction, when about to be stormed by Cressus. (See Herodot. i. 26.) The dedication in question, we learn, was accomplished by a very significant action,—namely, that of fastening cords to the walls and gates, and tying the other end to the pillars of the temple: the very manner in which the Island of Rheneia was dedicated to Apollo by Polycrates. See Thucyd. iii. 94.—Θεᾶς before Ἀρτέμιδος (which is not found in several MSS. and Versions) has been cancelled by Griesbach, Knapp, and Tittman.

— τοῦ Διοπετοῦς.] Supply ἀγάλματος, which is expressed in the Syr. Version. It is not surprising that images of an antiquity so remote as to ascend beyond all historical record, should have been feigned by the priests to have come 'from heaven.' And from heaven, in a certain sense, they might be said to have come, as far as regards the material; since aërolites (i. e. meteoric stones, or rather, metallic substances of stone-like appearance) of immense size, and most grotesque shapes, are known to have fallen from the skies. One or two of these might, in the infancy of society and the origin of idolatry, (bearing, by a low nature, a rude resemblance to the human bust) have been regarded as images of gods, and, as coming from the skies, sent from heaven to be worshipped. Afterwards similar aërolites, not naturally shaped like a bust, would be so formed by art. Of the latter kind were, I suspect, the famous Palladia of Troy and of Athens, both said to be διοπετῆ. Sometimes, however, in a rude condition of society, the aërolite was left in its natural state, without any attempt to form it into a bust. Of this we have at least two instances: one in the famous black stone in the Kaaba at Mecca,—which, there is reason to think, has been an object of worship from the earliest ages;—the other, in an idol mentioned in Herodian, v. 3, and which he speaks of as existing in the Temple of the Sun at Baalbec, namely, a sort of image not χειροποίητον, but ἀερίγενες, of black stone, and of a conical figure, bearing in form a resemblance to the sun, and said to be διοπετῆ.

κατεσταλμένους] 'quiet and orderly,' προπ. πράττειν, 'to do nothing precipitately probably a proverbial form of dissuade one from doing a thing rashly, and such would afterwards have to repent of.

γάρ γε γὰρ.] Here again the γὰρ refers to the omitted, q. d. '[And that you have rash and rash is certain,] for you have to hither,' &c.

εὐν.] This, for the common reading Σεδν, is in many MSS., nearly all the early Editions, the Fathers, has been preferred by Mill, adopted by Weistain, Matthæi, Griesbach, and, Vater, and Scholz. It is also confirmed by the testimony; since the scribes were far likely to change Σεδν into Σεδν, than the εὐν, as appears from this,—that some who εὐν in their originals changed τὴν into τόν, Griesbach, by a grievous blunder, has ad into the text.

λόγον.] Some take this to mean a case at like πράγμα at 1 Cor. vi. 1; but others, agreeably to the simple style of St. Luke, in it a complaint, by an ellipsis of μομφῆς, as Hebr. על at Exod. xviii. 16, for ἀντιλογία. At xxiv. 19, and Matt. v. 23, we have ἔχουσιν τι.

γόραιοι ἄγονται.] At ἀγ. supply ἡμέραι, εἰς, 'there are court-days held for hearing &c.' So Strabo, cited by Weistain, τὰς ἀγοὰς ποιοῦνται καὶ τὰς δικαιοδοσίας.

ἀνθύπατοι.] The only satisfactory way of setting for the plural here is to regard it not as an hyperbole, as a popular idiom, by the plural is put for the singular, in a loose sense, q. d. 'It is for laws and proconsuls side such matters.' So Demosth. de Coron. νόμοι εἰσιν, and Seneca, Controv. iii. 8, coetu (tumultu) opus est? Sunt scriptæ ad nam injuriarum omnium leges.

ἐγκαλείτωσαν ἀλλήλους] for ἐγκαλῶν or ἑματὰ εἰσαγίνωσκον, 'let them go to law each other.'

ἐτέρων.] Meaning, other matters of public concern, whether political or religious. Such, at least, is the sense (though not a very apposite one) if ἐτέρων be the true reading. Many MSS., however, (some very ancient) have παραίτερος, which seems to have been read by the Pesch. Syr. and Arabic Translators. It is also found in the very ancient Itala, and was probably read by the Vulgate Translator (for the ulterior of that Version seems to be nothing more than an error of the scribes for ulterior); and such has been edited by Lachmann. That παραίτερος should be altered by the scribes to περὶ ἐτέρων, was by no means unlikely; especially as τι preceded, and ε and αι are, by Tacitism, continually interchanged. Certainly the reading in question could not have originated in an error of the scribes. Though it might possibly be an emendation of the Alexandrian Critics.

— τῇ ἐννόμῳ ἐκκλ.] Not 'a lawful assembly,' but 'the regular assembly.' By τῇ κυρία it is intimated that the present assembly was not such.

40. κινδυνεύομεν.] The first person is delicately used for the second, per κοινωνίαν. Στάσις, in the law sense, denoted not only sedition, but tumult, and is further explained by συστροφῆς following, which signifies a tumultuous assemblage, ἐξστasis, as a Classical writer would have said. Though Herodotus, vii. 9, init. has κοίην πλῆθις συστροφῆν. But the use of the word is almost confined to the phrase κατὰ συστροφῆν, or συστροφῆς εἶναι, or συνίειναι.

XX. 1. ἀσπασάμενος] 'having given them the parting embrace of farewell.'

3. ποιήσας.] A Nominative absolute. Or rather, we may suppose, an anantapodoton. At αὐτῷ ἐπιβ. ὑπὸ, &c. ἐπιβουλή, as a verbal, takes the construction of the verb from which it is derived. On the plot in question Commentators variously speculate. It was probably one to contrive means to make away with Paul while on the voyage. To this the Apostle alludes, 2 Cor. xi. 26, κινδυνεύω ἐκ γίνουσι.

3. ἐγένετο γνώμη.] Repeat αὐτῷ, 'it was his purpose.'

— διὰ Μακεδονίας] 'by the way of Macedonia,' i. e. as he had come into Greece.

5. οὗτοι.] It is not clear whether by οὗτοι are to be understood all the foregoing persons, or only the two last.

6. μετὰ τὰς ἡμ. τ. ἀζ.] 'after Passover time;' for the Jews spoke of their festivals in the same way as we do, when we say Christmas-time, or Michaelmas-time. Ἀχρις ἡμερῶν π., 'within five days.' This use of the word is Hellenistic, and found at Rom. viii. 22. xi. 25.

7. μιᾷ τῶν σαββ.] See Note on Matt. xviii. 1.

— τῶν μαθ.] About 17 MSS. and several Versions have ἡμῶν, which is preferred by Grot., Mill, and Bengel, and edited by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. But without sufficient reason. Τοῦ before κλάσαι, not found in many MSS. and almost all the early Editors, has been cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz. It probably came from the margin, especially as it is not found supra xv. 6. On the thing itself see ii. 42.

8. See Note on John vi. 10.

9. τῆς θυρίδος] 'the window;' which, it seems, was a kind of lattice, or casement, to let in light, admitting of being thrown back, so as to admit air into the apartment, heated by so much company and so many lamps; see Arundel in the 2d vol. of his 'Discoveries in Asia Minor.' Καταφερόμενος ὕπνῳ, for εἰς or πρὸς ὕπνον, of which latter construction examples are adduced by the Commentators. The former is Hellenistic, but occurs in Parthen. Erot. 10, εἰς βαθὺν ὕπνον καταφύσθαι. The Commentators closely connect καταφ. with ἔπεσαν, taking it to mean only ἔπεσαν κάτω. But the latter may denote the completion of the action described as in progress at καταφερ.

— ἀπὸ τοῦ ὕπνου] 'from the effects of sleep.' — τριστέγου] 'the third story;' for στίγις signifies not only a roof, but the flooring of an upper apartment, as being a roof to the apartment below. So the Latin tristegula tecta, for the third floor. Artem. iv. 46, has ἡ τριστέγη.

— ἦρθη νεκρός.] Many recent Commentators, from Bp. Pearce downwards, suppose the word to mean 'was taken up for dead.' They urge that persons falling from a high place are often found in a swoon, and that there is nothing in the context that would lead us to think the lad was dead. Nay, that Paul himself says, 'he is not dead.' The first argument, however, has no force as opposed to the plain words of St. Luke. And the second and third have next to none. There is no trait in the Apostles and Evangelists more remarkable, than their avoiding every thing like setting off any circumstance to the utmost. Further, it by no means follows from St. Paul's stretching himself upon the young man, that he thought him alive, or meant to see whether he was so or not. The Apostle, by doing the very thing which Elijah in similar circumstances did, evidently regarded him as dead; and, no doubt, followed the example of the Prophet, in offering up fervent prayers that he might be brought to life. And as to the expression of St. Paul, ἡ γὰρ ψυχὴ αὐτοῦ ἐστίν, we are no more to infer from that, that the young man was not dead, than in the narration at Matt. ix. 24, from the words οὐ γὰρ ἀπέθανε, that the damsel was not dead; see the Note there.

10. συμπεριλαβὼν] 'having embraced.' A sense very rare in the Classical writers, though one example, from Plutarch, is adduced by Wetstein.

11. κλάσας ἄρτον καὶ γευσάμενος.] Some difference of opinion here exists as to whether this is to be understood of the Eucharist, or of a common meal. The older Expositors adopt the gests the idea of a common meal, since wherever in Scripture it is used of ordinary com-

προελθόντες ἐπὶ τὸ πλοῖον.] No ship
 been recently spoken of; but at ver. 6 men
 was made of one sailing from Philippi.
 before Bp. Middleton, with reason, supposes to be the ship there meant; in which, it Luke and his party performed their coast-age from Philippi, touching at Troas and places by the way, till they reached Patara.
 may made by him at Troas may be accounted for by supposing that the ship occasionally stopped

 on account of commercial business. It should seem that Paul and his companions depended for their passage on such coasting vessels employed
 in the carrying trade as they should meet with,
 and which would be likely to most forward them
 on their way to Jerusalem; embracing, at the same time, every opportunity (afforded by the
 occasional stoppage of those vessels for the purposes of trade) to salute and instruct their Christian brethren by the way. Hence we may account for (what has been thought strange) the Apostle's not calling at Antioch in his way;
 namely, because the vessel, in which he had
 taken his passage, did not touch there.

— ἦν διατεταγμένος.] We have here an example of Pret. Pass. for Pret. Midd. (as supra xiii. 2); on which see Matthiæ, Gr. Gr. § 493.

— μέλλων αὐ. πεζεύειν.] On the reason
 for this, Commentators variously speculate; see Recens. Synop. It was, I apprehend, simply to avoid the tedious and, considering the want of
 skill in the ancient navigators, dangerous circum-
 navigation of the promontory of Lectrum, which extends a long way into the sea; inasmuch that the distance from Troas to Assos is about one-third shorter by land than by sea. And the Apostle's perils by sea had been so great, that he might well prefer going by land; especially when the distance was so much shorter. I say, going
by land; for there cannot be a doubt (notwithstanding that Commentators and Translators in general prefer the sense 'going on foot') that such
 is the meaning of πεζεύειν here, as very frequently
 in good writers. This, indeed, is required by the antithesis implied in αὐτόν. The same error is observable at Matt. xiv. 13, and Mark vi. 33, in the case of πεζῶν, which must surely mean, 'by land.'

15. ἀντικρὺ.] Answering to καταντικρὺ in

17. τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους.] As these persons
 are at ver. 28 called ἐπισκόπους, and especially
 from a comparison of other passages (as 1 Tim.
 iii. 1), the best Commentators, ancient and
 modern, have with reason inferred that the terms

as yet denoted the same thing. Ἐπίσκοπος might denote either an overlooker or a care-taker; and these senses would be very suitable to express the pastoral duties. But the word might also (correspondently to the Heb. מֶלֶךְ) denote a ruler, or governor, an idea naturally arising out of the former. The term πρεσβύτεροι was borrowed from the Jewish Hierarchy, and corresponded to the מְזִבְּרִי, or Archisynagogi of the Jews. Now all πρεσβύτεροι were officially ἐπίσκοποι. Yet we are not therefore to infer that there was no superintending supreme authority in the primitive Church; for reason will show that no society can exist without some laws, and consequently persons to administer those laws. We may suppose that one of the presbyters (as there were many at Ephesus) was, in such a case, invested with authority over the others, and consequently was a Bishop in the modern sense of the term. And since, after Episcopacy, in that sense, was established, it became proper to have a name by which to designate the ruling Presbyter, none seemed so proper as ἐπίσκοπος, because it was far better fitted to denote the Episcopal than the Pastoral duties; while πρεσβ. had, no doubt, been always more in use to denote the Pastoral.

From ver. 25 it is justly inferred by Markland, that the Apostle convoked not only the Presbyters of Ephesus, but of the district (namely, Asia proper, the ancient Ionia); no part of it being far from Ephesus, the Christians of all which constituted the Church of Ephesus.

18. πῶς μ. ὑ. ἐγενόμην.] 'How I have conducted myself among you.'

19. δουλεύων—ταπεινοφ.] 'discharging the ministry of the Lord with all humility and modesty.' The μετὰ must be repeated at δακρύων, and rendered, with a small accommodation of sense, amidst, or amongst. So the Hebr. 2, by. Συμβ. 4ν, 2, 'which happened through or by.' See my Note on Thucyd. ii. 70. N. 3.

20. οὐδὲν ὑπεστ.] Ὑποστῆλαισθαι signifies, in the Middle form, 'to withdraw oneself through fear'; and, in a deponent sense, 'to withdraw, keep back any thing.' So Josephus, Bell. i. 20. 1, μηδὲν τῆς ἀληθείας ὑποστειλάμενος. Julian,

Orat. i. p. 17, εἰ δαὶ μηδὲν ὑποστειλάμενος εἰπείν.

— ἀναγγεῖλαι ὑμῖν καὶ διδάξαι.] In these expressions there seems to be a reference to the Gospel preached being at once a message and a body of instruction.

— κατ' οἴκους.] From the foregoing term δημοσίᾳ, which has reference to meetings of the whole congregation at once, it is plain that κατ' οἴκους must mean, not 'from house to house,' but 'in private houses' (the κατὰ only denoting rotation), namely, those where separate parts of the whole number of Christians met. So κατ' οἶκον supra ii. 46, where see Note.

22. δεδεμένος τῷ πνεύμ.] Many Commentators take πνεῦμα to mean the Holy Spirit. But thus δεδεμένος admits of no satisfactory sense, and the next clause discountenances this interpretation. It is better, with others, to take πνεῦμα of the mind of St. Paul; a very frequent sense of the word. Δεδεμένος τῷ πνεύμ. is well explained by Rosenmuller, Kuinoel, and Middleton, 'under a strong impulse of my mind;' by a metaphor very similar to that in συνέχεσθαι τῷ πνεύματι at xviii. 5, where see Note.

23. πλὴν ὅτι.] Sub. ἐν and τοῦτο, 'But this one thing [alone I know] that.' So Soph. El. 426, πλείω δὲ τούτων οὐ κάτοιδα· πλὴν ὅτι πέμπει με, &c. The ἐν is expressed in Aristoph. Pac. 227. Τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον is rightly taken by the best Commentators to denote persons endued by the Holy Spirit; the sense being 'that the Holy Spirit in every city testified by the mouth of inspired prophets;' see xxi. 4. 11. Μένουν, 'await me.' This seems to be a Latinism.

24. οὐδὲνός λόγον ποιούμαι.] 'I make no account of, care not for, any thing.' A mode of expression occurring in the best writers. So Dionys. Hal. ix. 50, λόγον οὐδὲνός ἐστίν ποιούμενος.

— οὐδὲ ἔχω τὴν ψυχὴν μ. τιμ.] A popular mode of expression, in which ἔχω is employed according to the Latin use of habeo. There is here an ellipsis of οὗτο, which word is expressed in a similar passage of Liban. p. 407, cited by Wetstein. So also Josephus, Ant. xvi. 4. 2, οὐχ οὕτως ὁ βίος ἡμῶν τίμιος, &c., &c.

οἱ. Ταλειῶσαι is employed in two senses, to the two different clauses to which it is applied. Διαμαρτύρασθαι—Θεοῦ is explanatory of σιλείαν.

[καὶ νῦν ἰδοὺ, &c.] Here it is not necessary in order to reconcile this with the fact, certain, that the Apostle did again visit secular Asia, after his release from imprisonment at Rome, to suppose, with some, either that

Presbyters now present were dead when he visited Asia, or (with others) that the word means to say, he shall not see them all.

We have only to understand the Apostle speaking ἐν πνεύματι, according to his spirit or mind, and therefore (as he said fore) μὴ εἰδώς, not certainly knowing that it should be so, but presaging such from the intimations he had received. Indeed, τὸν οἶδ' ὅτι, or even εὖ οἶδ' ὅτι, is very used in the best writers to denote somewhat short of certain knowledge, and only of persuasion. Comp. supra iii. d. infra xvi. 27, and see my Note on d. vi. 34.

μαρτύρομαι.] 'I solemnly affirm to you,' &c., by calling God to witness.

καθαρός ἐγὼ ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵμ. π.] So it is Hist. Sus. i. 5, καθαρός ἐγὼ ἀπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος. Gen. xxiv. 8, καθαρός ἔσθ' ὁ θεὸς τοῦ κυρίου. The construction is Celtic; the Greek writers using the Genitive as a preposition.

ἐπεστελάμην.] See Note supra v. 20.

In this passage (much disputed by Critics and commentators) the MSS. present no less than six readings; namely, τοῦ Θεοῦ: τοῦ Κυρίου: τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Κυρίου: τοῦ Κυρίου Θεοῦ: and τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ. The relative merits of these are discussed by Zahn, Griesbach, Kuinoel, and Dr. Pye; Scrip. Test. vol. iii. p. 66, sq., who decide in favour of Κυρίου. On the contrary, others are of not less eminence, as Mill, Bengel, Venema, Michaelis, Ernesti, Valcknaer, Moberg, Matthæi, Wakefield, Tittman, Vater, Middleton, Gratz, and Rinck, reject Κυρίου, and most all read Θεοῦ; though some, as Matthew Middleton prefer τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ.

The question is, indeed, one of no easy decision, in which the Critical arguments usually draw two ways. In the first edition of this work I decided in favour of the common reading τοῦ Θεοῦ. But upon reconsidering the question (in consequence of the remarks and objections offered in an able critique on the present work, in the Eclectic Review for Dec. 1832) I have come to a somewhat different conclusion, the reasons for which will appear further on.

First, with respect to the state of the evidence. Perplexing as it appears, yet it may be much cleared by the consideration that three out of the above six Varr. Lectt. (namely, τοῦ Χριστοῦ, —τοῦ Κυρίου Θεοῦ,—and τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Κυρίου) are scarcely entitled to the appellation of varr. lectt., being partly formed on the others, and partly proceeding from an evident alteration to avoid a difficulty; and having scarcely any authority of MSS., they merit no attention, except as furnishing data to assist us in judging of the remaining three PRIMARY READINGS, namely, τοῦ Θεοῦ; —τοῦ Κυρίου;—and τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ. Let us now examine these readings, as to the evidence both external and internal. As to the former, Κυρίου is supported by 13 MSS. (five of them very ancient, and the rest neither ancient nor very valuable), by the Coptic, Sahidic, and Armenian Versions, and some Fathers, chiefly Latin. 2. Τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ is supported by one very ancient MS. and 63 others, none of much antiquity or consequence, but of different families; also by the Slavonic Version, the Edit. Princ., and Plantin. 3. Τοῦ Θεοῦ is supported by the most ancient of the MSS. (the Cod. Vat.) and 17 others; some of the 10th, 11th, or 12th centuries, but most of them more modern: also by the Peasch. Syr. in some MSS.; by the Latin Vulgate; and, according to some, the Æthiopic. Finally, it is quoted, or referred to, by Ignatius, Tertullian, Basil, Chrysostom, Epiphanius, Ambrose, Theophylact, Ecumenius, and 12 other Fathers of the Greek and Latin Church. Now it is manifest that τοῦ Κυρίου is greatly inferior in MS. authority to τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ, and not superior to τοῦ Θεοῦ: and of the 4 valuable Venice MSS. lately collated by Rinck, two have τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ, one τοῦ Κυρίου Θεοῦ, and one Θεοῦ. And as τοῦ Κυρίου was evidently formed on τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ, that is decisive. Consequently the reading τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ has an undoubted superiority as to external evidence. As to internal, the reading Θεοῦ has been contended for by eminent Critics (though with very different views) strenuously, but, I am now of opinion, not successfully; for while the phrase ἐκκλησία τοῦ Θεοῦ occurs 12 times in St. Paul's Epistles, ἐκκλησία τοῦ Κυρίου is found nowhere in the New Test., consequently, it was far more probable that Κυρίου should be altered to Θεοῦ than Θεοῦ to Κυρίου. Besides, the former might be done without any evil intention, while the latter could only arise from sinister design; which ought surely never to be imputed without very strong reasons. Now if τοῦ Θεοῦ be the true reading, the sense will be that assigned by the above-mentioned learned Reviewer, 'Feed the Church of Him who is God, which he hath purchased with his own blood;' implying an assertion at once of the Deity and the Humanity of our Lord, without confounding the two natures. Yet this is somewhat harsh, and cannot fairly be elicited from the words; and therefore there is the less reason to impute the reading to any pious fraud on the part of the Trinitarians. And as little reason is there to impute the reading Kυρίου to an alteration of the Arians; for, not to say that they never had the power to foist in a reading, so as to introduce it into above two-thirds of the Copies, they were not driven to do so from necessity, having, as we see in the case of Mr. Wakefield, contrived such a sort of interpretation, as to keep out any sense that might compromise their opinions. It may, indeed, be argued that τοῦ Θεοῦ, as being unquestionably the most difficult reading, ought to be preferred. And it is true that the readings may perhaps all of them be accounted for as so many various attempts to soften that harshness. Yet that is evidently too hypothetical.

Let us now proceed to examine the comparative evidence, external and internal, for the readings τοῦ Κυρίου and τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ. Now external evidence is decidedly in favour of the latter; but internal evidence is somewhat in favour of the former; for though Bp. Middleton (after Matthæi) thinks it quite as probable that the readings τοῦ Θεοῦ and τοῦ Κυρίου may have arisen by dividing the reading τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ, as that the reading τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ was compounded of those readings; nevertheless, since the former circumstance so very rarely occurs, and the latter so frequently in all writers, I really cannot agree with the learned Prelate. I am quite disposed to assent to the observation of Dr. Pye Smith, that 'τοῦ Κυρίου being admitted to be the original reading, all the others may be accounted for by suppositions easy and probable in themselves, and known to have been realized in numerous instances.' But, to advert to the evidence as regards the secondary readings. The reading Χριστοῦ supports that of Κυρίου; and the reading τοῦ Κυρίου Θεοῦ supports τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ; while τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Κυρίου, I think, supports τοῦ Θεοῦ; for it seems to have arisen from the alteration of some who, stumbling at the harshness of Θεοῦ, subjoined καὶ Κυρίου, in order to supply some word to which τοῦ ἰδίου αἵματος could be applied. Under all the circumstances, I have thought proper (with Matthæi and Vater) to admit the words Κυρίου καὶ; but, from the state of the comparative internal evidence, I have not chosen, with Vater, to bracket καὶ Θεοῦ; since, as all the other readings may be accounted for (though with less probability), on the supposition that τοῦ Θεοῦ is the true reading, it may, after all, be such; and it must be owned that the testimony of Versions and Fathers is strongly in its favour, and also that it is found in the most ancient of MSS. And certainly it is more likely to be the original reading than τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ.

It is scarcely necessary to observe, that if the reading τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ be authentic, it affords a strong proof of the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ; since (as Bp. Middleton has shown at large) the sense must be, 'of Him being (i. e. who is) both Lord and God.' And even if τοῦ Κυρίου be the true reading, yet the passage will still bear attestation to the same doctrine; for (as the learned Reviewer above-mentioned observes) the phrase 'Church of the Lord' equally denotes the Divinity of the Proprietor and Redeemer of the Church, the Object of its worship, who has given himself for it, that he might sanctify it, and present it to himself a glorious Church, Eph. v. 27.

28. ἢν περιποιήσατο.] Περιποιῆσαι signifies 'to make one's own by purchase.' The term was often used of acquiring a right to any one's services, by preserving or sparing his life in war; see Herodot. i. 110. Wetstein compares Dionys. Hal. iv. 11, ἢν (scil. γῆν) ὑμεῖς δι' αἵματος ἐκτήσασθε.

— διὰ τοῦ ἰδίου αἵματος.] 'The Lamb is God, the Son of God, very God of very God, and so the blood of this Lamb is the blood of God. And it is this dignity of his nature that especially setteth so huge a value upon his blood, that it is of an infinite price, of infinite merit, able to satisfy an infinite justice, and to appease an infinite wrath.' (Bp. Sanderson, Sermon.)

29. St. Paul here adverts to the reason for this solemn admonition, namely, the danger which would shortly overtake the Church from false teachers, whose rapacity would be as great as their hypocrisy. We have here the same metaphor as at Matt. vii. 15, 16 (where see Note); though in the present instance there is a tacit allusion to the case of the shepherd, or his watchdogs appointed to guard the flock, gratifying their voracity by even preying on the flock itself. So Dio Cass. p. 389, ἐπὶ γὰρ τὰς ἀγέλας ὅπου φύλακες, οὐ κύνες οὐδὲ νομῆαι, ἀλλὰ λύκοι πέμπεται. Themist. Orat. viii. οὐκοῦν οὐδὲ τὸ ποιμαίνειν παρὰ σου ταχέϊστα, αἱ λύκοι ἀπὲρ ποιμῆντος ὀφθαλμοί, κεφάλαιον τὴν προέκουσαν δίκην ἔχον. Comp. 2 Cor. xi. 20. In addition to rapacity and hypocrisy, the Apostle in the next verse subjoins the sorcery of heretics and schisms, such as those of Phygellus and Hermogenes, and others, who afterwards promulgated the Nicolaitan errors.

30. διστραμμένα] 'erroneous.' So Arrian opposes δόγματα ὁρθὰ τοῖς διστραμμένοις καὶ στριβλά. The metaphor is the same as that in our adjective wrong.

35. πάντα ὑπέδειξα ὑμῖν.] Sub. κατὰ, and take ὑπέδειξα for ὑποδείγματα ἰδῶκα, as in a kindred passage of John xiii. 15.

— ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι] 'to assist;' lit. 'to bear up;' see Note on Luke i. 54. By τῶν ἀσθενούντων we are to understand, not (as some explain) the weak in faith, nor (as others) the poor; but the sick and infirm, who could not, by their own labour, provide themselves with the necessities of life.

— μακάριόν ἐστι, &c.] Render, 'More blessed of God is it to give than,' &c., μαγία ἵναται, &c. This is one of the sayings of our Lord unrecorded in the Gospels, (see John xxi. fin.) of which, no doubt, there were then many circulated among the Christians, and some of which are recorded by the early Fathers; on which see Fabric. Cod. Apoc. New Test. i. 131, and especially the very scarce tract of Koerner de Sermonibus Christi ἀγράφτοις, Lips. 1776, 8vo.

37. ἐπιπεσόντες ἐπὶ τὸν τράχη.] According to an Oriental custom, still retained in the East.

XXI. 1. ἀποσπασθέντας ἀπ' α.] The sense assigned by many, 'separated ourselves, or withdrawn ourselves,' does not well represent the idea intended in this expressive term, which is not simply that of going away, but of unwilling separation, suitably to the deep sorrow just before mentioned. Thus the proper rendering is, 'after having parted from them;' intimating how loath they were to separate from each other. So it is well remarked by Kuinoel: 'Αποσπᾶσθαι dicuntur imprimis amici, qui sibi invicem valedicentes, vix avelli possunt et discedere. Eurip. Alc. 287, οὐκ ἠθέλησα ζῆν ἀποσπασθεῖσά σου.' So also Virg. Æn. ii. 434, 'dilectum inde.' Of the ancient Versions, the Vulgate and Arabic, and all the early modern Latin ones, I find, express this sense.

3. ἀναφανέντες διὰ τὴν K.] Such is the reading of the textus receptus, as well as the Ed. Princ. and almost all the MSS. The Stephanic reading ἀναφάνεντες was only taken from the Erasmus Editions, in which it was probably a mere typographical error. For ἀναφαν. Stephens and Beza conjecture ἀναφάνεντες; which would, indeed, make good grammar and be good Greek, as answering to the phrase ἀποκρύπτειν τὴν γῆν, which is used, like the Latin aperire terram, of, as we say, making a land. See my Note on Thucyd. v. 65. 7. Yet the idiom in ἀναφανέντες τὴν Κύπρ., though different from the other, is quite as correct. So Theophan., p. 392, ἀναφανέντων δὲ αὐτῶν τὴν γῆν, εἶδον αὐτοὺς οἱ στρατηγοί. Commentators regard it as a nautical phrase, for ἀναφανίσαι τῆς Κύπρου. There is, in truth, an hyperallage; the sense being, 'brought into view of Cyprus'; or rather, as in the Active, ἀναφαίνω governs an Accusative of thing, and Dative of person, so in the Passive the Dative becomes the subject, and the Accusative is retained.

—καταλιπόντες αὐτὴν εὐών.] 'leaving it on the left hand.' Another nautical phrase, of which examples are adduced by Wetstein.

—ἦν ἀποφορτίζομενον] for ἀπεφορτίζετο, lit., 'was unloading'; though, in reality, (by an interchange of the past with the present, to denote what is shortly to happen,) it signifies, 'was soon to unload.'

4. τοὺς μαθητάς.] A good many MSS., some Fathers, and the Ed. Princ. have not the Article, which Bp. Middleton thinks should be cancelled, since there is no place for it here. So, too, it seems, thought the Alexandrian Critics, who expunged it. Yet surely there is a place for it; the sense being simply, 'the persons, or such persons there as were disciples, i. e. believers, Christian brethren'; as supra vi. 2. xi. 26. To cancel the Article would be a violation of one of the most certain of Critical Canons; since we may easily account for the omission, but not for the insertion of the word, which has been rightly retained by Griesbach and Scholz.

—ἔλεγον—μὴ ἀναβαίνειν.] There may seem something strange in these persons, under the impulse of the Spirit, bidding Paul not to go to Jerusalem, when it was doubtless the will of God that he should go. To remove this difficulty, some Commentators take διὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος to mean 'ex proprio spiritu.' Such a phraseology, however, would be unprecedented. The expression must retain its force, and be rendered 'under the influence of the Holy Spirit.' The difficulty, however, which that sense involves will be effectually removed by supposing in ἔλεγον—μὴ ἀναβαίνειν an idiom common in all the best writers (ex gr. Thucyd. vi. 29, ἔλεγον—πλαῖν); by which the words, being used populariter, may be understood as limited by some clause omitted; and thus the sense will be, 'they counselled him [if he valued his safety] not to go to Jerusalem.' The Spirit did not order them to bid him not go, but only enabled them to predict that there would be danger in his going. It is plain that Chrysost. so took the words; for he explains them by προφητεύοντες τὰς ἑλπίεις. And that Paul so understood what they said is certain; for if he had really regarded himself as forbidden by the Holy Spirit to go, he would not have gone.

5. ἐξαρτίσαι] 'had completed.' This use of ἐξαρτίζω ἡμ. is Hellenistic. 'Εστὶ ἔξω τῇ πόλ.' is probably an idiom of the common dialect; at least I have noted nothing like it in the Classical writers.

—δόντες τὰ γόνατα, &c.] We have here a most graphic trait, illustrating the fervent devotion of the primitive Christians.

6. ἀσπασάμενοι ἀλλήλ.] 'having bade adieu.' —εἰς τὰ ἴδια.] See John xvi. 32, and Note. Τὸ πλοῖον, i. e. the ship by which they had sailed from Patara to Tyre.

7. τὸν πλοῦν διαν.] The only mode of removing the difficulty involved in this expression is (with Markland and Kuinoel) to take the Aorist as put for the Present, and render, 'thus accomplishing our voyage,' i. e. the sailing part of our journey.

8. ἐξελθόντες—εἰς K.] It is not quite certain whether they went by sea or by land; and Commentators are divided in opinion. The latter, however, is far the more probable; the ship, it seems, stopping at Ptolemais longer than they could conveniently stay. Besides, the route by land to Caesarea was more convenient than that οἱ ἐντόπιοι] 'the inhabitants [of the place,] i. e. with the limitation suggested by the stances of the case, the Christians of Ca-sarea.' Ἐντόπιος is properly synonymous with ἐκ, 'a native of any place;' but it was, by early writers, used for ἐγχώριος, 'an inhabitant of a place.' Yet the former signification is in Soph. Œd. Col. 841. Elmel.

τί ποιεῖτε:] This Markland regards as a form of expression (as at Mark xi. 5) for ῥησιν; comparing Theophr. Char. 9. τί ποιεῖτε λογοποιεῖτε; And Kuinoel observes, that verbs denoting action often indicate,

not the effect of the action, but only the intent
and will. The same idiom, indeed, exists in our own language. Thus, then, the full sense is,
'What mean ye to do by thus weeping and breaking;' &c., i. e. weeping and [thus] quite subduing
my courage. For in συνθρύπτοντες the συν has an intensive force, as in συντρίβειν, συγκλῆναι,
συντρίκειν, &c., and denotes the utter destruction
of a thing, by its being crushed together, and thus
broken up. Hence the γὰρ in the following sentence will be seen to have much propriety; q. d.
'for courage I have, being ready,' &c.

— ἐτοιμῶς ἔχω.] We have here an example
of that use of ἔχω, by which it is so joined with an adverb, as to form a phrase equivalent to εἶμι
and the adjective corresponding to that adverb.

16. ἀποσκευασάμενοι.] There has been no little debate as to the reading. The MSS.
fluctuate between ἀποσκ., ἱπισκ., παρσκ., and ἀποταξάμενοι, of which the last two are, it is plain, merely glosses on the preceding. Ἐπι-σκευασ., found in several good MSS. and early Editions, as also in Chrysostom, Theophylact, and Ecumen., has been preferred by most Critics,
and is edited by Bengel, Matthæi, Tittman, and Vater; but without sufficient reason. They object, indeed, to ἀποσκ., that the word can only
signify to unpack luggage; whereas the context
requires the sense to collect one's baggage for a journey; which ἱπισκευάζεσθαι does express,
being of frequent occurrence in the best writers.
This is very true. But how, then, are we to account for the alteration of the ordinary term
ἱπισκ. into what has been thought the anomalous term ἀποσκευασάμενοι? This, I conceive, will go far to prove that the new reading is a mere gloss, and the old reading the true one, which has been retained by Griesbach and Scholz. As to alleging that ἀποσκ. is not susceptible of the
required sense, it were surely hypercritical to set

preaching.' It is plain that γλώσσαις here is for ἐτίραις γλώσσαις, as in the similar passage supra ii. 4, ἤρξαντο λαλεῖν ἐτίραις γλώσσαις, καθὼς τὸ Πνεῦμα ἰδίδου αὐτοῖς ἀποφθίγγισθαι, where St. Luke gives the complete phrase, though afterwards he uses the elliptical form; as does St. Paul universally. We may here recognise a cimmar; the προφητεία being, as we learn from I Cor. xiv. 5, a higher gift than the λαλεῖν γλώσσαις. Thus it is meant that 'they had not only the gift of tongues, but, what was greater, that of prophecy'; as it is said in the above passage, μεῖζον ὁ προφητεύων, ἢ ὁ λαλῶν γλώσσαις.

9. ἐσκληρ. καὶ ἠπειθουν.] A sort of Hendiadys; 'obstinately refused to yield credence.' So Eccles. xxx. 12, μήποτε σκληρυνθεὶς ἀπειθήσῃ σοι. See also Ps. xciv. 8, and Heb. iii. 8. Ἀποστάς must be understood of separation from the synagogue and church communion.

— ἐν τῇ σχολῇ Τυράννου τ. i.] What sort of a school this was, Commentators are not quite agreed. Some suppose it to have been a kind of Beth-Midrash, or Divinity Hall, designed for reading theological lectures. Others think it was a philosophical lecture-room, and that Tyrannus was a rhetorician, or sophist. If the former conjecture be correct, he was probably a converted Jew; if the latter, a converted Gentile.

10. πάντας.] This may be taken, with many Commentators, in a qualified sense. But surely, considering the constant influx of persons to this emporium and metropolis of Asia Minor, there could not be many individuals but had heard, at least by the report of others, of the doctrines of Christianity.

11. οὐ τὰς τυχούσας.] Literally, 'such as were not of every day occurrence,' meaning extraordinary and illustrious.

12. ἐπιφέρεισθαι.] For this many ancient MSS. and the Vulgate have ἀποφέρ. which has been edited by Lachmann; but wrongly; since the common reading presents a more appropriate term; for the ἐπι in ἐπιφέρ. ought not (as it has been by many) to be considered as pleonastic, but as having the sense ad. Indeed, the word seems to have been a medical term, signifying adferre, to apply. There is, I would observe, the more reason to contend for strict propriety in this term, since the other two verbs in this sentence are quite appropriate, — ἀπαλλάσσεσθαι and ἐξέρχεσθαι. And though, instead of the latter, very many MSS. have ἐκπορεύεσθαι (which has been received by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz), yet I have thought proper, with Matthæi and Vater, to retain it, as being by far the more probable reading, the term being often elsewhere used in Scripture; ex. gr. supra viii. 7; whereas ἐκπορεύεσθαι is no where found in Scripture, or elsewhere.

— σουδάρια.] See Luke xix. 20. Σιμικίνθιον is from the Latin semicinctum, a half-girdle, or garment, equivalent to our apron.

— ἀπ' αὐτῶν.] These words, not found in those MSS. which have, for ἐξέρχεσθαι, ἐκπορεύεσθαι, have been cancelled by Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz.

13. τινες ἀπὸ τῶν περιερχ. τ. i.] Reader, 'some of the Jews who go about as exorcists.' These (called by the Greeks ἀγύρται, and by the Romans circumdoctores) were a class of persons who, like our travelling quacks, or mountebanks, or conjurors, pretended to cure violent disorders beyond the skill of the physician, and even to cast out devils; and all this, with the use of certain incantations or charms, made effective, partly by administering certain powerful medicines, and partly by strongly operating on the imagination. See Joseph. Ant. viii. 2, 5.

14. τινες.] This must be construed with ἐπτά. 'some seven persons, sons of Sceva.' See infra xxiii. 23, and Thucyd. iii. 11. vii. 87.

— ἀρχιερέων.] Not 'High Priest,' but 'a chief ἐφαλλόμενος.] This use of the word is by a metaphor taken from wild animals, and not exemplified by the Commentators. I have, however, in Recens. Synop. adduced examples from Homer.

κατακυρ. αὐτῶν, ἴσχ. κατ' α.] Almost commentators for the last century are agreed in using ἴσχυσε κατ' αὐτῶν to denote 'exerted over them, by maltreating them.' But expression may be rather taken simply to 'after overpowering them, held the master them.' And we may compare a similar of expression at v. 20, ἡῤανε καὶ ἴσχυεν. It is of course to be taken in a qualified professors of the black art, who drew up what are called in the Classical writers the Ἐφίσια γράμματα; which were scrolls of parchment inscribed with certain formulæ, and bound to the body, being used as amulets. Of pernicious books being publicly burnt, several examples are adduced by Wetstein. I have adopted the above pointing at πάντων, since, in the words following, the subject is not the same as in the preceding; for, I apprehend, it was not the persons that burnt the books, who were the computers of the value. We have only to suppose an ellipsis of ἄνθρωποι. In which case the phrase may be expressed by our impersonal form, thus: 'the cost of them being estimated, was found to be,' &c. So, indeed, the words were understood by the Vulgate and Arabic Translators, as they have also been by some modern ones, as Wakefield and Newcome.

—ἀργυρίου.] What kind of silver coin is here meant,—whether the silver shekel, or the drachm,—it is impossible to determine. The latter is the more probable opinion.

20. κατὰ κράτος] for ἰσχυρῶς, 'exceedingly,' a Hellenistic idiom; the Classical writers only employing the expression in the place of ἰσχυρῶς, to signify vehementer.

21. ἔθετο ἐν τῷ πν.] 'statuit apud se,' 'resolved in his mind.' So the Hebrew וַיִּחַזַּק. Comp. Dan. i. 8. Hagg. ii. 19. 1 Cor. vii. 37. Such the best Commentators have been long agreed in assigning as the sense, rather than to refer τῷ πνεύματι (as others have done) to the Holy Spirit.

22. ἐπίσχε χρόνον.] Ἐπίσχε signifies, 1. to hold to any thing (ἐπι); and, 2. to keep to, stay by; and has a reflected force by the ellipse of ἑαυτὸν. In the sense of stay, it occurs either without, or (as here) with the addition of an Accusative (depending on κατὰ), denoting duration of time.

ἱερομ. καὶ ἀναγγ.] The two expressions are synonymous, denoting open and unreserved confession. By πράξεις are especially magical arts, though also evil practices of kind.

ἱκανοί.] Lit., 'a good many.'

ἱερίεργα.] ἱερίεργος, as applied to a person, signifies nimis sedulus, male curiosus; hence, as applied to things, supervacuus. Thus it was used, like curiosus in Latin, to the arts of magic; a sense occurring in the Scriptural and Classical writers. The are mentioned were, no doubt, treatises on and necromancy; such as those of Artemidus Astrampychus on the interpretation of dreams. Ephesus was the chief resort of the Jews in the transaction; who, indeed, had some cause to feel alarmed for their safety, since their hostility to all idol-worship was well known; and the bitter animosity felt towards them by the multitude is plain, from their refusing to hear the speaker because he was a Jew. Of ἀπολογεῖσθαι the sense is simply that of addressing the people in the way of justification, to show them that no insult had been offered to the worship of Diana; or, at least, that the Jews were not the persons who had done the wrong.

34. ἐπιγινόντας.] This (for the common reading ἐπιγινόντων), found in many of the best MSS., almost all the early Editions, and several Fathers, has been adopted by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Vater; and rightly; for besides the strong external evidence, internal is quite in its favour, it being the more difficult reading. It is, however, not so much a Nominative absolute, as it involves an anacoluthon.

35. Καταστείλω signifies properly to put down, as Ps. lxx. 7, καταστ. τὸ κύτος τῆς Σαλάσσης. But it is more frequently used in a metaphorical sense, of quieting a tumult.

— γραμματεὺς.] It is easier to ascertain the rank and duties of this office, than to represent the term by any corresponding one of modern languages. From the passages of ancient writers adduced by Wets., it appears that the Γρ. was President of the Senate, and that his duties embraced most of those of our Chancellor and Secretary of State. It may be conjectured that this functionary (of different dignity in different cities) was so called, from being the keeper of the archives, containing all the γράμματα of the State; as public treaties, decrees, and documents of every kind.

— τίς γάρ ἐστιν, &c.] Pearce and Markland observe that the γάρ has reference to some clause omitted, and to be filled up thus: 'There is no need of this clamorous repetition of "Great is Diana," for what man is there; &c. Of this elliptical use of γάρ at the beginning of a speech, they adduce an example from Herodot. vi. 11, Ἐπὶ ξυροῦ γὰρ ἀκμῆς ἔχειται ἡμῖν τὰ πράγματα; q. d. '[I am now induced to address you;] for our affairs are in the utmost danger.'

— νεωκόρον.] The word at first denoted merely a keeper of the temple. Afterwards, however, (when the humility of religious devotees made the office sought after even by persons of rank,) the term was employed to denote a curator, one whose office it was to see that the temple was kept clean and in good repair, and furnished with every thing proper for the celebration of public worship. (See Jos. Ant. i. 7. 6. Xen. An. v. 3. 6.) Sometimes, too, it meant, not curator, but simply cultor, worshipper; as in Joseph. Bell. v. 9. 5, οὗς (Israelites) ὁ Θεὸς ἑαυτῷ νεωκόρους ἤγειν. At length, what was properly applicable only to a person, came to be transferred, by Prosopopæia to cities; especially as it was usual to personify them. And thus, by an accommodation of the sense, the term came to signify devoted, consecrated to; in which acceptance it was used not only of Ephesus, but also (as we find from inscriptions on coins) of other cities of Greece as Asia Minor. Nay, sometimes one and the same city was called νεωκόρος, with respect to three or even four different deities. So great was the devotion of the Ephesians to Diana, that we find from Ælian, Var. Hist. iii. 26, the city was styled her ἀνάθημα. And that it should have been thus attached to her service, we may easily imagine since by devoting itself to the goddess, the city was said to have been formerly saved from destruction, when about to be stormed by Cressus (See Herodot. i. 26.) The dedication in question, we learn, was accomplished by a very significant action,—namely, that of fastening cords to the walls and gates, and tying the other ends to the pillars of the temple: the very manner in which the Island of Rheneia was dedicated to Apollo by Polycrates. See Thucyd. iii. 94.—Θεᾶς before Ἀρτέμιδος (which is not found in several MSS. and Versions) has been cancelled by Griesbach, Knapp, and Tittman.

— τοῦ Διοπετοῦς.] Supply ἀγάλματος, which is expressed in the Syr. Version. It is not surprising that images of an antiquity so remote as ascend beyond all historical record, should have been feigned by the priests to have come 'from heaven.' And from heaven, in a certain way they might be said to have come, as far as regards the material; since aërolites (i. e. meteoric stones or rather, metallic substances of stone-like appearance) of immense size, and most grotesque shapes, are known to have fallen from the sky. One or two of these might, in the infancy of the world, and the origin of idolatry, (bearing, by a nature, a rude resemblance to the human form,) have been regarded as images of gods, coming from the skies, sent from heaven worshipped. Afterwards similar aërolites, naturally shaped like a bust, would be so far from being regarded as images of gods, but as objects of worship from the earliest times. Of the latter kind were, I suspect, the famous Palladia of Troy and of Athens, said to be διοπετῆ. Sometimes, however, in a condition of society, the aërolite was in a natural state, without any attempt to fashion it into a bust. Of this we have at least two examples: one in the famous black stone in the Mecca,—which, there is reason to think, an object of worship from the earliest times; other, in an idol mentioned in Herodotus which he speaks of as existing in the temple of the Sun at Basileus, namely, a sort of χειροποίητος, but ἀνεργαστος, of a conical figure, bearing in its resemblance to the sun, and said to be divine κατεσταλμένους] 'quiet and orderly.'

προσπράττειν, 'to do nothing precipi-

would afterwards have to repent of.

Ἠγάγετε γὰρ.] Here again the γὰρ refers sentence omitted, q. d. '[And that you have hasty and rash is certain,] for you have hitherto, &c.

ἑσόν.] This, for the common reading ἑσόν, is in many MSS., nearly all the early Editions,
some Fathers, has been preferred by Mill,
adopted by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, van, Vater, and Scholz. It is also confirmed internal testimony; since the scribes were far likely to change ἑσόν into ἑσόν, than the ary, as appears from this,—that some who ἑσόν in their originals changed τὴν into τόν, Griesbach, by a grievous blunder, has red into the text.

λόγον.] Some take this to mean a case at like πράγμα at 1 Cor. vi. 1; but others, agreeably to the simple style of St. Luke, inter it a complaint, by an ellipsis of μομφή, as ἀνθύπατοι.] The only satisfactory way of satisfying for the plural here is to regard it not such as an hyperbole, as a popular idiom, by the plural is put for the singular, in a sense, q. d. 'It is for laws and proconsuls side such matters.' So Demosth. de Coron.

ἐγκαλεῖσθαι ἀλλήλους] for ἐγκλησιν or ἄματα ἐισαγγεῖσθαι, 'let them go to law each other.'

ἐτέρων.] Meaning, other matters of public concern, whether political or religious. Such,

at least, is the sense (though not a very apposite
one) if ἐτέρων be the true reading. Many MSS., however, (some very ancient) have παραίτέρω,
which seems to have been read by the Pesh.
Syr. and Arabic Translators. It is also found in the very ancient Itala, and was probably read by the Vulgate Translator (for the ullerius of that Version seems to be nothing more than an error of the scribes for ullerius); and such has been edited by Lachmann. That παραίτέρω should be altered by the scribes to περὶ ἐτέρων, was by no means unlikely; especially as τι preceded,
and α and αι are, by Itacism, continually interchanged. Certainly the reading in question could not have originated in an error of the scribes. Though it might possibly be an emendation of the Alexandrian Critics.

—τῇ ἐννόμῳ ἐκκλ.] Not 'a lawful assembly,' but 'the regular assembly.' By τῇ κυρίᾳ it is intimated that the present assembly was not such.

40. κινδυνεύομεν.] The first person is delicately used for the second, per κοινωνίαν. Στάσις, in the law sense, denoted not only sedition,
but tumult, and is further explained by συστρο-
φῆς following, which signifies a tumultuous assemblage, ξύστασις, as a Classical writer would have said. Though Herodotus, vii. 9, init. has κοίην πλῆθους συστροφῆν. But the use of the word is almost confined to the phrase κατὰ συστροφῆν, or συστροφᾶς εἶναι, or συνίναί.

XX. 1. ἀσπασάμενος] 'having given them
the parting embrace of farewell.'

3. ποιήσας.] A Nominative absolute. Or rather, we may suppose, an anastrophe. At αὐτῷ ἐπιβ. ὑπὸ, &c. ἐπιβουλή, as a verbal,
takes the construction of the verb from which it is derived. On the plot in question Commentators variously speculate. It was probably one to contrive means to make away with Paul while on the voyage. To this the Apostle alludes, 2 Cor.
xi. 26, κινδυνεύει ἐκ γίνουσι.

3. ἐγένετο γνώμη.] Repeat αὐτῷ, 'it was his purpose.'

— διὰ Μακεδονίας] 'by the way of Macedonia,' i. e. as he had come into Greece.

5. οὗτοι.] It is not clear whether by οὗτοι are to be understood all the foregoing persons, or only the two last.

6. μετὰ τὰς ἡμ. τ. ἀζ.] 'after Passover time;' for the Jews spoke of their festivals in the same way as we do, when we say Christmas-time, or Michaelmas-time. Ἀχρις ἡμερῶν π., 'within five days.' This use of the word is Hellenistic, and found at Rom. viii. 22. xi. 25.

7. μιᾷ τῶν σαββ.] See Note on Matt. xviii. 1.

— τῶν μαθ.] About 17 MSS. and several Versions have ἡμῶν, which is preferred by Grot., Mill, and Bengel, and edited by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. But without sufficient reason. Τοῦ before κλάσαι, not found in many MSS. and almost all the early Editors, has been cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz. It probably came from the margin, especially as it is not found supra xv. 6. On the thing itself see ii. 42.

8. See Note on John vi. 10.

9. τῆς θυρίδος] 'the window;' which, it seems, was a kind of lattice, or casement, to let in light, admitting of being thrown back, so as to admit air into the apartment, heated by so much company and so many lamps; see Arundel in the 2d vol. of his 'Discoveries in Asia Minor.' Καταφερόμενος ὕπνῳ, for εἰς or πρὸς ὕπνον, of which latter construction examples are adduced by the Commentators. The former is Hellenistic, but occurs in Parthen. Erot. 10, εἰς βαθὺν ὕπνον καταφίρεσθαι. The Commentators loosely connect καταφ. with ἔπεισαν, taking it to mean only ἔπεισαν κάτω. But the latter may denote the completion of the action described as in progress at καταφερ.

— ἀπὸ τοῦ ὕπνου] 'from the effects of sleep.' — τριστέγου] 'the third story;' for στίβος signifies not only a roof, but the flooring of an upper apartment, as being a roof to the apartment below. So the Latin tridexa lecta, for the third floor. Artem. iv. 46, has ἡ τριστέγη.

— ἦρθη νεκρός.] Many recent Commentators, from Bp. Pearce downwards, suppose the word to mean 'was taken up for dead.' They urge that persons falling from a high place are often found in a swoon, and that there is nothing in the context that would lead us to think the lad was dead. Nay, that Paul himself says, 'he is not dead.' The first argument, however, has no force as opposed to the plain words of St. Luke. And the second and third have next to none. There is no trait in the Apostles and Evangelists more remarkable, than their avoiding every thing like setting off any circumstance to the utmost. Further, it by no means follows from St. Paul's stretching himself upon the young man, that he thought him alive, or meant to see whether he was so or not. The Apostle, by doing the very thing which Elijah in similar circumstances did, evidently regarded him as dead; and, no doubt, followed the example of the Prophet, in offering up fervent prayers that he might be brought to life. And as to the expression of St. Paul, ἡ γὰρ ψυχὴ αὐτοῦ—ἐστιν, we are no more to infer from that, that the young man was not dead, than in the narration at Matt. ix. 24, from the words οὐ γὰρ ἀπέθανε, that the damsel was not dead; see the Note there.

10. συμπεριλαβὼν] 'having embraced.' A sense very rare in the Classical writers, though one example, from Plutarch, is adduced by Wetstein.

11. κλάσας ἄρτον καὶ γευσάμενος.] Some difference of opinion here exists as to whether this is to be understood of the Eucharist, or of a common meal. The older Expositors adopt the

 2. The following term ὁμιλήσας sugthe idea of a common meal, since wherever in Scripture it is used of ordinary con- sation, not of preaching, as in the Ecclesiastiwriters; for which διαλέγεσθαι is used, as before. Not to mention, that as the Apostle already so much exceeded the usual time in discourse, he would not, at that unseasonable of the night, resume it, and continue it 'a while, till day-break:' nor would he then the Eucharist, which had, probably,

προελθόντες ἐπὶ τὸ πλοῖον.] No ship
 sen recently spoken of; but at ver. 6 men-
 was made of one sailing from Philippi.
 fore Bp. Middleton, with reason, supposes
 o be the ship there meant; in which, it
 , Luke and his party performed their coast-yage from Philippi, touching at Troas and places by the way, till they reached Patara.
 ay made by him at Troas may be accounted

for by supposing that the ship occasionally stopped
 on account of commercial business. It should seem that Paul and his companions depended for
 their passage on such coasting vessels employed
 in the carrying trade as they should meet with,
 and which would be likely to meet forward them
 on their way to Jerusalem; embracing, at the
 same time, every opportunity (afforded by the
 occasional stoppage of those vessels for the purposes of trade) to salute and instruct their Christian brethren by the way. Hence we may account for (what has been thought strange) the Apostle's not calling at Antioch in his way;
 namely, because the vessel, in which he had
 taken his passage, did not touch there.

— ἦν διατεταγμένος.] We have here an example of Pret. Pass. for Pret. Midd. (as supra xiii. 2); on which see Matthiæ, Gr. Gr. § 493.

— μέλλων αὐ. πεζεύειν.] On the reason
 for this, Commentators variously speculate; see Recens. Synop. It was, I apprehend, simply to avoid the tedious and, considering the want of
 skill in the ancient navigators, dangerous circum-
 navigation of the promontory of Lectrum, which extends a long way into the sea; insomuch that
 the distance from Troas to Assos is about one-third shorter by land than by sea. And the Apostle's perils by sea had been so great, that he might well prefer going by land; especially when
 the distance was so much shorter. I say, going
by land; for there cannot be a doubt (notwithstanding that Commentators and Translators in
 general prefer the sense 'going on foot') that such
 is the meaning of πεζεύειν here, as very frequently
 in good writers. This, indeed, is required by the antithesis implied in αὐτός. The same error is observable at Matt. xiv. 13, and Mark vi. 33, in the case of πεζῇ, which must surely mean, 'by land.'

15. ἀντικρὺ.] Answering to καταντικρὺν in Thucyd. vii. 26.

17. τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους.] As these persons
 are at ver. 28 called ἐπισκόπους, and especially
 from a comparison of other passages (as 1 Tim.
 iii. 1), the best Commentators, ancient and
 modern, have with reason inferred that the terms

as yet denoted the same thing. Ἐπίσκοπος might denote either an overlooker or a care-taker; and these senses would be very suitable to express the pastoral duties. But the word might also (correspondently to the Heb. תִּרְבָּ) denote a ruler, or governor, an idea naturally arising out of the former. The term πρεσβύτεροι was borrowed from the Jewish Hierarchy, and corresponded to the זְבִינִי, or Archisynagogi of the Jews. Now all πρεσβύτεροι were officially ἐπίσκοποι. Yet we are not therefore to infer that there was no superintending supreme authority in the primitive Church; for reason will show that no society can exist without some laws, and consequently persons to administer those laws. We may suppose that one of the presbyters (as there were many at Ephesus) was, in such a case, invested with authority over the others, and consequently was a Bishop in the modern sense of the term. And since, after Episcopacy, in that sense, was established, it became proper to have a name by which to designate the ruling Presbyter, none seemed so proper as ἐπίσκοπος, because it was far better fitted to denote the Episcopal than the Pastoral duties; while πρεσβ. had, no doubt, been always more in use to denote the Pastoral.

From ver. 25 it is justly inferred by Markland, that the Apostle convoked not only the Presbyters of Ephesus, but of the district (namely, Asia proper, the ancient Ionia); no part of it being far from Ephesus, the Christians of all which constituted the Church of Ephesus.

18. πῶς μ. ὁ. ἐγενόμην.] 'How I have conducted myself among you.'

19. δουλεύων—ταπεινός.] 'discharging the ministry of the Lord with all humility and modesty.' The μετὰ must be repeated at δακρύων, and rendered, with a small accommodation of sense, amidst, or amongst. So the Hebr. 2, by. Συμβ. in, 2, 'which happened through or by.' See my Note on Thucyd. ii. 70. N. 3.

20. οὐδὲν ὑπεστ.] Ὑποστῆλαισθαι signifies, in the Middle form, 'to withdraw oneself through fear'; and, in a deponent sense, 'to withdraw, keep back any thing.' So Josephus, Bell. i. 20. 1, μηδὲν τῆς ἀληθείας ὑποστειλάμενος. Julian,

Orat. i. p. 17, εἰ δαὶ μηδὲν ὑποστειλάμενος εἴποιν.

— ἀναγγεῖλαι ὑμῖν καὶ διδάξαι.] In these expressions there seems to be a reference to the Gospel preached being at once a message and a body of instruction.

— κατ' οἴκους.] From the foregoing term δημοσίᾳ, which has reference to meetings of the whole congregation at once, it is plain that κατ' οἴκους must mean, not 'from house to house,' but 'in private houses' (the κατὰ only denoting rotation), namely, those where separate parts of the whole number of Christians met. So κατ' οἶκον supra ii. 46, where see Note.

22. δεδεμένος τῷ πνεύματι.] Many Commentators take πνεῦμα to mean the Holy Spirit. But thus δεδεμένος admits of no satisfactory sense, and the next clause discountenances this interpretation. It is better, with others, to take πνεῦμα of the mind of St. Paul; a very frequent sense of the word. Δεδεμένος τῷ πνεύματι is well explained by Rosenmuller, Kuinoel, and Middleton, 'under a strong impulse of my mind'; by a metaphor very similar to that in συνέχεσθαι τῷ πνεύματι at xviii. 5, where see Note.

23. πλὴν ὅτι.] Sub. ἐν and τοῦτο, 'But this one thing [alone I know] that.' So Soph. El. 426, πλὴν οὐδὲ τούτων οὐ κάτοιδα: πλὴν ὅτι πέμπει με, &c. The ἐν is expressed in Aristoph. Pac. 227. Τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον is rightly taken by the best Commentators to denote persons endued by the Holy Spirit; the sense being 'that the Holy Spirit in every city testified by the mouth of inspired prophets'; see xxi. 4. 11. Μένουσι, 'await me.' This seems to be a Latinism.

24. οὐδεὶς λόγον ποιούμαι.] 'I make no account of, care not for, any thing.' A mode of expression occurring in the best writers. So Dionys. Hal. ix. 50, λόγον οὐδεὶς αὐτῶν ποιησάμενος.

— οὐδὲ ἔχω τὴν ψυχὴν μ. τιμίαν.] A popular mode of expression, in which ἔχω is employed according to the Latin use of habere. There is here an ellipsis of οὗτω, which word is expressed in a similar passage of Liban. p. 407, cited by Wetstein. So also Josephus, Ant. xvi. 4. 4 οὐχ οὕτως ὁ ὅσιος ἡμῶν τίμιος, &c.

— τελειῶσαι τὸν δρόμον.] An epitaph

καὶ νῦν ἰδοὺ, &c.) Here it is not necessary in order to reconcile this with the fact, &c. certain, that the Apostle did again visit secular Asia, after his release from imprisonment at Rome, to suppose, with some, either that the Presbyters now present were dead when Paul visited Asia, or (with others) that the Apostle means to say, he shall not see them all. We have only to understand the Apostle as speaking ἐν πνεύματι, according to his spirit or mind, and therefore (as he said before) μὴ εἰδὼς, not certainly knowing that it would be so, but presaging such from the warning intimations he had received. Indeed, ὅτι οἶδ' ὅτι, or even εἰ οἶδ' ὅτι, is peculiarly used in the best writers to denote somewhat short of certain knowledge, and only of persuasion. Comp. supra iii. and infra xxvi. 27, and see my Note on 1st. vi. 34.

μαρτύρομαι.] See Note supra v. 20. In this passage (much disputed by Critics and commentators) the MSS. present no less than four readings; namely, τοῦ Θεοῦ : τοῦ Χριστοῦ : τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Κυρίου : τοῦ Κυρίου Θεοῦ : and τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ. The relative merits of these are discussed by Griesbach, Kuinoel, and Dr. Pye Scrip. Test. vol. iii. p. 68, sq., who decide in favour of τοῦ Κυρίου. On the contrary, other of not less eminence, as Mill, Bengel, Venema, Michaelis, Ernesti, Valcknaer, Iberg, Matthæi, Wakefield, Tittman, Vater, Middleton, Gratz, and Rinck, reject τοῦ Κυρίου, and read Θεοῦ; though some, as Matd Middleton prefer τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ. The question is, indeed, one of no easy decision, in which the Critical arguments usually used draw two ways. In the first edition of the New Testament, I decided in favour of the common reading, τοῦ Θεοῦ. But upon reconsidering the question (in consequence of the remarks and suggestions offered in an able critique on the present work, in the Eclectic Review for Dec. 1832) I have come to a somewhat different conclusion, the reasons for which will appear further on.

First, with respect to the state of the evidence. Perplexing as it appears, yet it may be much cleared by the consideration that three out of the above six Varr. Lectt. (namely, τοῦ Χριστοῦ, —τοῦ Κυρίου Θεοῦ,—and τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Κυρίου) are scarcely entitled to the appellation of varr. lectt., being partly formed on the others, and partly proceeding from an evident alteration to avoid a difficulty; and having scarcely any authority of MSS., they merit no attention, except as furnishing data to assist us in judging of the remaining three PRIMARY READINGS, namely, τοῦ Θεοῦ; —τοῦ Κυρίου;—and τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ. Let us now examine these readings, as to the evidence both external and internal. As to the former, τοῦ Κυρίου is supported by 13 MSS. (five of them very ancient, and the rest neither ancient nor very valuable), by the Coptic, Sahidic, and Armenian Versions, and some Fathers, chiefly Latin. 2. τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ is supported by one very ancient MS. and 63 others, none of much antiquity or consequence, but of different families; by also the Slavonic Version, the Edit. Princ., and Plantin. 3. τοῦ Θεοῦ is supported by the most ancient of the MSS. (the Cod. Vat.) and 17 others; some of the 10th, 11th, or 12th centuries, but most of them more modern: also by the Pesh. Syr. in some MSS.; by the Latin Vulgate; and, according to some, the Æthiopic. Finally, it is quoted, or referred to, by Ignatius, Tertullian, Basil, Chrysostom, Epiphanius, Ambrose, Theophylact, Æcumenus, and 12 other Fathers of the Greek and Latin Church. Now it is manifest that τοῦ Κυρίου is greatly inferior in MS. authority to τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ, and not superior to τοῦ Θεοῦ: and of the 4 valuable Venice MSS. lately collated by Rinck, two have τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ, one τοῦ Κυρίου Θεοῦ, and one Θεοῦ. And as τοῦ Κυρίου was evidently formed on τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ, that is decisive. Consequently the reading τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ has an undoubted superiority as to external evidence. As to internal, the reading Θεοῦ has been contended for by eminent Critics (though with very different views) strenuously, but, I am now of opinion, not successfully; for while the phrase ἐκκλησία τοῦ Θεοῦ occurs 12 times in St. Paul's Epistles, ἐκκλησία τοῦ Κυρίου is found no where in the New Test., consequently, it was far more probable that τοῦ Κυρίου should be altered to Θεοῦ than Θεοῦ to τοῦ Κυρίου. Besides, the former might be done without any evil intention, while the latter could only arise from sinister design; which ought surely never to be imputed without very strong reasons. Now if τοῦ Θεοῦ be the true reading, the sense will be that assigned by the above-mentioned learned Reviewer, 'Feed the Church of Him who is God, which he hath purchased with his own blood;' implying an assertion at once of the Deity and the Humanity of our Lord, without confounding the two natures. Yet this is somewhat harsh, and cannot fairly be elicited from the words; and therefore there is the less reason to impute the reading to any pious fraud on the part of the Trinitarians. And as little reason is there to impute the reading Kυρίου to an alteration of the Arians; for, not to say that they never had the power to foist in a reading, so as to introduce it into above two-thirds of the Copies, they were not driven to do so from necessity, having, as we see in the case of Mr. Wakefield, contrived such a sort of interpretation, as to keep out any sense that might compromise their opinions. It may, indeed, be argued that τοῦ Θεοῦ, as being unquestionably the most difficult reading, ought to be preferred. And it is true that the readings may perhaps all of them be accounted for as so many various attempts to soften that harshness. Yet that is evidently too hypothetical.

Let us now proceed to examine the comparative evidence, external and internal, for the readings τοῦ Κυρίου and τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ. Now external evidence is decidedly in favour of the latter; but internal evidence is somewhat in favour of the former; for though Bp. Middleton (after Matthæi) thinks it quite as probable that the readings τοῦ Θεοῦ and τοῦ Κυρίου may have arisen by dividing the reading τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ, as that the reading τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ was compounded of those readings; nevertheless, since the former circumstance so very rarely occurs, and the latter so frequently in all writers, I really cannot agree with the learned Prelate. I am quite disposed to assent to the observation of Dr. Pye Smith, that 'τοῦ Κυρίου being admitted to be the original reading, all the others may be accounted for by suppositions easy and probable in themselves, and known to have been realized in numerous instances.' But, to advert to the evidence as regards the secondary readings. The reading Χριστοῦ supports that of Κυρίου; and the reading τοῦ Κυρίου Θεοῦ supports τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ; while τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Κυρίου, I think, supports τοῦ Θεοῦ; for it seems to have arisen from the alteration of some who, stumbling at the harshness of Θεοῦ, subjoined καὶ Κυρίου, in order to supply some word to which τοῦ ἰδίου αἵματος could be applied. Under all the circumstances, I have thought proper (with Matthæi and Vater) to admit the words Κυρίου καὶ; but, from the state of the comparative internal evidence, I have not chosen, with Vater, to bracket καὶ Θεοῦ; since, as all the other readings may be accounted for (though with less probability), on the supposition that τοῦ Θεοῦ is the true reading, it may, after all, be such; and it must be owned that the testimony of Versions and Fathers is strongly in its favour, and also that it is found in the most ancient of MSS. And certainly it is more likely to be the original reading than τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ.

It is scarcely necessary to observe, that if the reading τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ be authentic, it affords a strong proof of the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ; since (as Bp. Middleton has shown at large) the sense must be, 'of Him being (i. e. who is) both Lord and God.' And even if τοῦ Κυρίου be the true reading, yet the passage will still bear attestation to the same doctrine; for (as the learned Reviewer above-mentioned observes) the phrase 'Church of the Lord' equally denotes the Divinity of the Proprietor and Redeemer of the Church, the Object of its worship, who has given himself for it, that he might sanctify it, and present it to himself a glorious Church, Eph. v. 27.

28. ἢν περιποιήσατο.] Περιποιῆσαι signifies 'to make one's own by purchase.' The term was often used of acquiring a right to any one's services, by preserving or sparing his life in war; see Herodot. i. 110. Wetstein compares Dionys. Hal. iv. 11, ἢν (scil. γῆν) ὑμεῖς δι' αἵματος ἐκτήσασθε.

— διὰ τοῦ ἰδίου αἵματος.] 'The Lamb is God, the Son of God, very God of very God, and so the blood of this Lamb is the blood of God. And it is this dignity of his nature that especially setteth so huge a value upon his blood, that it is of an infinite price, of infinite merit, able to satisfy an infinite justice, and to appease an infinite wrath.' (Bp. Sanderson, Berm.)

29. St. Paul here adverts to the reason for this solemn admonition, namely, the danger which would shortly overtake the Church from false teachers, whose rapacity would be as great as their hypocrisy. We have here the same metaphor as at Matt. vii. 15, 16 (where see Note); though in the present instance there is a tacit allusion to the case of the shepherd, or his watchdogs appointed to guard the flock, gratifying their voracity by even preying on the flock itself. So Dio Cass. p. 369, ἵπλ γὰρ τὰς ἀγέλας ὄρνις φύλακες, οὐ κύνας οὐδὲ νομίας, ἀλλὰ λύκους πέμπεται. Themist. Orat. viii. οὐκ οὐδὲ τὸν ποιμαίνειν παρὰ σου ταχθέντα, εἰ λύκος ἀντὶ ποιμνίου ἐφθλήη, καρδαίνειν τὴν προσηκούσαν δίκην ἱσθ. Comp. 2 Cor. xi. 20. In addition to rapacity and hypocrisy, the Apostle in the next verse subjoins the sowing of heresies and schisms, such as those of Phygellus and Hermogenes, and others, who afterwards promulgated the Nicolaitan errors.

30. διστραμμένα] 'erroneous.' So Arrian opposes δόγματα ὁρθὰ τοῖς διστραμμένοις καὶ στρεβλοῖς. The metaphor is the same as that in our adjective wrong.

 tioned. Thus the proper rendering is, 'after having parted from them; intimating how loath they were to separate from each other. So it is well remarked by Kuinoel: 'Αποσπᾶσθαι dicuntur

 all the early modern Latin ones, I find, express this sense.

3. ἀναφανέντες δὲ τὴν Κ.] Such is the reading of the testus receptus, as well as the Ed. Princ. and almost all the MSS. The Stephanic reading ἀναφάναντες was only taken from the Erasmus Editions, in which it was probably a mere typographical error. For ἀναφαν. Stephens and Beza conjecture ἀναφάναντες; which would, indeed, make good grammar and be good Greek, as answering to the phrase ἀποκρύπτειν τὴν γῆν, which is used, like the Latin aperire terram, of, as we say, making a land. See my Note on Thucyd. v. 65. 7. Yet the idiom in ἀναφανέντες τὴν Κύπρ., though different from the other, is quite as correct. So Theophan., p. 392, ἀναφανέντων δὲ αὐτῶν τὴν γῆν, εἶδον αὐτοὺς οἱ στρατηγοί. Commentators regard it as a nautical phrase, for ἀναφανίσαι τῆς Κύπρου. There is, in truth, an hyperallage, the sense being, 'brought into view of Cyprus;' or rather, as in the Active, ἀναφαίνω governs an Accusative of thing, and Dative of person, so in the Passive the Dative becomes the subject, and the Accusative is retained.

— καταλιπόντες αὐτὴν εὐών.] 'leaving it on the left hand.' Another nautical phrase, of which examples are adduced by Wetstein.

— ἡν ἀποφορτίζομενον for ἀπεφορτίζετο, lit., 'was unloading;' though, in reality, (by an interchange of the past with the present, to denote what is shortly to happen,) it signifies, 'was soon to unload.'

4. τοὺς μαθητάς.] A good many MSS., some Fathers, and the Ed. Princ. have not the Article, which Bp. Middleton thinks should be cancelled, since there is no place for it here. So, too, it seems, thought the Alexandrian Critics, who expunged it. Yet surely there is a place for it; the sense being simply, 'the persons, or such persons there as were disciples, i. e. believers, Christian brethren;' as supra vi. 2. xi. 26. To cancel the Article would be a violation of one of the most certain of Critical Canons; since we may easily account for the omission, but not for the insertion of the word, which has been rightly retained by Griesbach and Scholz.

— ἔλεγον—μὴ ἀναβαίνειν.] There may seem something strange in these persons, under the impulse of the Spirit, bidding Paul not to go to Jerusalem, when it was doubtless the will of God that he should go. To remove this difficulty, some Commentators take διὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος to mean 'ex proprio spiritu.' Such a phraseology, however, would be unprecedented. The expression must retain its force, and be rendered 'under the influence of the Holy Spirit.' The difficulty, however, which that sense involves will be effectually removed by supposing in ἔλεγον—μὴ ἀναβαίνειν an idiom common in all the best writers (ex gr. Thucyd. vi. 29, ἔλεγον—πλεῖν); by which the words, being used populariter, may be understood as limited by some clause omitted; and thus the sense will be, 'they counselled him [if he valued his safety] not to go to Jerusalem.' The Spirit did not order them to bid him not go, but only enabled them to predict that there would be danger in his going. It is plain that Chrysost. so took the words; for he explains them by προφητεύουσι τὰς ἑλπίσεις. And that Paul so understood what they said is certain; for if he had really regarded himself as forbidden by the Holy Spirit to go, he would not have gone.

5. ἔξαρτίσαι.] 'had completed.' This use of ἔξαρτίσειν ἡμ. is Hellenistic. 'Ἐστὶ ἔξω τῆς πόλ.' is probably an idiom of the common dialect; at least I have noted nothing like it in the Classical writers.

— δίντες τὰ γόνατα, &c.] We have here a most graphic trait, illustrating the fervent devotion of the primitive Christians.

6. ἀσπασάμενοι ἀλλήλ.] 'having bade adieu.' — εἰς τὰ ἴδια.] See John xvi. 32, and Note. Τὸ πλοῖον, i. e. the ship by which they had sailed from Patara to Tyro.

7. τὸν πλοῦν διαπ.] The only mode of removing the difficulty involved in this expression is (with Markland and Kuinoel) to take the Aorist as put for the Present, and render, 'then accomplishing our voyage,' i. e. the sailing part of our journey.

8. ἐξελθόντες—εἰς Κ.] It is not quite certain whether they went by sea or by land; and Commentators are divided in opinion. The latter, however, is far the more probable; the ship, it seems, stopping at Ptolemais longer than they could conveniently stay. Besides, the route by land to Caesarea was more convenient than that seqq. (Grotius and Wetstein.) It was not, confined to the Prophets; for the act of symbolical actions was a custom prevalent in the early ages, both among

 and the Gentiles.

ἐντόπιοι] 'the inhabitants [of the place, with the limitation suggested by the case of the case, the Christians of Cæsarea] is properly synonymous with
 'a native of any place'; but it was, by writers, used for ἐξωτός, 'an inhabitant of any place.' Yet the former signification is supported. (Ed. Col. 841. Elmal.

ῥοιῶντες;] This Markland regards as a new expression (as at Mark xi. 5) for ῥοιῶντες; comparing Theophr. Char. 9. τί λογοποιούντες; And Kuinoel ob-

serves, that verbs denoting action often indicate,
 not the effect of the action, but only the intent
 and will. The same idiom, indeed, exists in our own language. Thus, then, the full sense is,
 'What mean ye to do by thus weeping and breaking,' &c., i. e. weeping and [thus] quite subduing
 my courage. For in συνθρύπτοντες the συν has an intensive force, as in συντρίβειν, συγκλᾶν,
 συντρίκειν, &c., and denotes the utter destruction
 of a thing, by its being crushed together, and thus
 broken up. Hence the γὰρ in the following sentence will be less to have much propriety; q. d.
 'for courage I have, being ready,' &c.

— ἐτοιμῶς ἔχω.] We have here an example
 of that use of ἔχω, by which it is so joined with an adverb, as to form a phrase equivalent to simul
 and the adjective corresponding to that adverb.

15. ἀποσκευασάμενοι.] There has here been
 no little debate as to the reading. The MSS.
 fluctuate between ἀποσκ., ἐπισκ., παρασκ., and ἀποταξάμενοι, of which the last two are, it is
 plain, merely glosses on the preceding. Ἐπισκινασ., found in several good MSS. and early Editions, as also in Chrysostom, Theophylact, and Œcumen., has been preferred by most Critics,
 and is edited by Bengel, Matthæi, Tittman, and Vater; but without sufficient reason. They object, indeed, to ἀποσκ., that the word can only
 signify to unpack luggage; whereas the context
 requires the sense to collect one's baggage for a journey; which ἐπισκινάζεσθαι does express,
 being of frequent occurrence in the best writers.
 This is very true. But how, then, are we to account for the alteration of the ordinary term
 ἐπισκ. into what has been thought the anomalous
 term ἀποσκευασάμενοι? This, I conceive, will go far to prove that the new reading is a mere
 gloss, and the old reading the true one, which has been retained by Griesbach and Scholz. As to alleging that ἀποσκ. is not susceptible of the
 required sense, it were surely hypercritical to set limits to the signification of certain Greek words. And as ἀποσκευῇ, both in the Sept. and the Classical writers, often denotes baggage, surely ἀποσκευάζεσθαι may very well mean to pack up one's baggage. Indeed, that it has that sense, is proved by an example adduced from Dionys. Hal. ix. 23, οὐδὲ ἀποσκευάσασθαι δύναμιν ἔσχον οἱ φεύγοντες· ἀλλ' ἀγαπητῶς αὐτὰ τὰ σάματα δέεσσαν, οὐδὲ τὰ ὅπλα πολλοὶ φυλάττουτες. To which I add Polyb. iv. 81. 11, τὰ ἀπὸ τῆς χώρας ἀπεσκευάζοντο, where, though the sense is removed, yet that includes the idea of packing up, previous to removal.

16. ἄγοντες — Κυπρίῳ.] The sense of the passage is plain, but the construction not so clear. Most Commentators, from Grotius to Kuinoel, recognise here a Hebraism, the datives Μνάσωνι τινι Κυπρίῳ being, they say, put, like the Heb. ה, for accusatives with πρὸς. Yet the two Apostles were not going to, as we say, call on Mnason, but to lodge at his house. Hence it is better to suppose here a frequent idiom (usually called Attic, but in reality extending to the common dialect), by which a noun is attracted to the case of the relative, as in Matt. vii. 2. Luke i. 4. Acts xxii. 24. Rom. vi. 17, ὑπηκούσατε ἐκ καρδίας εἰς ὃν παρεδόθητε τύπον διδασκῆς, for τῷ τύπῳ διδασκῆς, εἰς ὃν παρ. Thus in the present passage it is as if there had been written ἄγοντας (ἡμᾶς, to be supplied from ἡμῶν preceding) παρὰ Μνάσωνι τινι, Κυπρίῳ, ἀρχαίῳ μαθ. παρ' ᾧ ξενισθῶμεν. Examples of the phrase ἄγειν παρὰ are adduced by Bornemann.

18. Ἰάκωβον.] Peter and John were, it seems, both absent; and James (son of Alphaeus, — see xv. 13,) is supposed to have presided, both in his Apostolical character, and as Bishop of Jerusalem, at the meeting now held to consider of the business which regarded Paul.

20. τὸν Κύριον.] For Κύριον, many ancient MSS. have Θεόν, which is received by Vator; but on insufficient grounds; for it is evidently from the margin.

— ἡλ. τοῦ νόμου.] So 2 Macc. iv. 2, ἡλ. τῶν νόμων.

21. κατηγήθησαν π. σ. ε.] 'they have been informed concerning thee.' So Plutarch, de Flav. 10, κατηχηθεὶς περὶ τῶν συμβεβηκότων.

— ἀποστασίαν.] Later Greek for ἀνόμιαν.

22. τί οὖν ἐστὶ;] This (like that in 1 Cor. xiv. 15. 26) seems to be a popular formula, similar to our 'what then?' and the Latin, 'quid ergo est?' and quid igitur est? sub. πρακτικῶς. So that it may be a Latinism; for I am not aware that it ever occurs in the Greek Classical writers.

— πάντως δεῖ πλήθος συνελθεῖν.] Piac, Bez, and Grotius understand this of a regular convocation of the people, as contradistinguished from the Presbyters. But all the best recent Commentators seem right in determining the sense to be, 'It is unavoidable but that a multitude should flock together.' Δεῖ, like ἀνάγκη, often (ex. gr. 1 Cor. xi. 19) denotes only what must and will happen.

23. τοῦτο οὖν ποίησον.] This is of course to be regarded as the language of advice, not of command. For a justification of the conduct of the Apostle in thus conciliating the Jews to the compromise, as some have thought, of the leading doctrines of the Gospel, see Witsius de Vri. Pauli x., Dr. Hales, iii. 536, sq., and Townsend. Suffice it to say, that though the Apostle taught that Jewish as well as Gentile Christians are freed from the observance of the Mosaic Law, yet he never forbade the Jewish converts to observe it, or any part of it, on the score of expediency; since he himself occasionally did so, that he might 'gain the more' to Christ. See 1 Cor. ix. 20. Acts xvi. 3. Whether εὐχὴν is to be understood of a votum civile, undertaken on account of recovery from sickness, or deliverance from calamity, or a vow of Nazaritishness, is not agreed. The last is the more probable opinion, since the term ἀγγιζεσθαι, which follows, is appropriate thereto.

ἀγνισθῇ, &c.] i. e. 'undertake the same once and purity enjoined by the vow,' and their expenses for them; namely, those of sacrifice, on going to the Temple, for the purpose of being released from the vow by shaving
 and. From what has been adduced by sin, Witaius, and Lardner, it appears that participation in the agnosta did not necessarily make the person himself a Nazarite; and that to so participate with and pay the
 of Nazarites, was not unusual among the id was regarded as a mark of singular piety.
 ἀγνισθῶν ἐπ' αὐτοῖς.] Literally, 'be at ense of their sacrifices.'

ξυρήσονται.] Meaning, that they may ir vow by shaving their heads; which they not do till the termination of their vow:
 t could only be by offering sacrifice: but et being able to provide the offering, could ve their heads. Thus the phrases to cause
isarite to be shorn, and to pay his expenses,
 o be convertible. So Maimonides says, neumbit ut radatur Nazareus per me.

γνῶσι.] Many MSS. have γνώσονται, is supported by some Versions, and edited sabach, Tittman, and Scholz. This readings, though more agreeable to propriety usage, may strongly be suspected to have an emendation. Στοιχεῖς φυλάσσω τὸν σιγνifies, 'that thou livest in the habitual ence of the law;' στοιχεῖν, like περιπα-
 and the Heb. ἵπ, being used of habitual action.
 περὶ δὲ τῶν πεπ., &c.] The δὲ is adver-
 and the sense is, 'But as to the Gentiles are, (the case is different, and) we have
 d [thus]; determining that,' &c.

ἐπιστάλαμεν.] Ἐπιστάλλω properly signifies send word to any one, whether verbally better; 2. to send directions or orders to.

26. ἀγνισθεῖς.] See Note supra v. 24.

— διαγγέλλων τὴν ἐκπλήρ., &c.] 'giving notice [to the Priests] of the [period of the] completion of the days of purification;' which the persons themselves had not done, because they could not provide the offering. The period, as it appears from what follows, was that day week.
 Every one, it seems, was allowed to fix the period of his votive purification, either when he com- menced it, or at any time during its course; so that the Priests had proper notice, in order to make the necessary arrangements as to the victims, &c. Ἐως οὗ, 'at which;' as ἕως ἔσται, Luke xv. 8. xxii. 16, 18. John ix. 18. Προσφορά is the θύσια προσφερομένη. See Eph.
 v. 2.

27. αἱ ἐπτὰ ἡμέραι.] As the number of days had not been before mentioned, this must be put for αἱ ἡμέραι, ἐπτὰ οὖσαι. Συνέχεον is for συνεκίνησαν. So Demosth. cited by Schleus. Lex., συνχεῖ ὅλην τὴν πολιτείαν.

28. βοηθεῖτε.] The sense is, 'Come to our aid [in apprehending this person].' A sense of the word very frequently occurring in Thucyd.
 and the best writers. Ἕλληνας is considered by Kuinoel as an exaggeration for Ἕλληνα. But it is better to suppose an idiom, found in all languages, by which the plural is used instead of the singular, taken generically; a single action being spoken of as if it were habitual.

— κεκοίωκε.] The penalty of any Gentile passing the partition-wall between the inner and outer wall was, as we learn from Philo, θάνατος
ἀπαράτῃτος.

29. προειωρακοτές.] The προ, not found in very many MSS., several Versions and Fathers, and all the early Editions except the Erasmanian,
 has been cancelled by Bengel and Matthæi.

30. ἐκινήθη] 'was in commotion,' as in Plu-tarch, vol. ii. 435, Xyland. and Thucyd., l. iii. 82, πᾶν τὸ Ἑλληνικὸν ἐκινήθη.

30. συνδρομή.] A word often used of riotous assemblage.

— εἶλκον αὐτὸν ἔξω τοῦ ἱερ. i. e. in order (as Chrysostom suggests) to avoid polluting the Temple with murder; and also, it should seem, to be more unrestrained, than the Priests and Levites could decently permit them to be; who appear to have themselves closed the doors, in order to preserve the Temple from pollution, and be thought to have no hand in whatever might ensue.

31. φάσις for φήμη is confined to the later writers.

32. ἐξαυτῆς] scil. ὅρας. A later Greek form for ἐξαυθις. Render, forthwith.

33. δαθ. δλ. δυοί.] See Note supra xii. 6. Perhaps in the present case the feet also were bound with a chain. At least so we may suppose from supra v. 11.

34. τὸ ἀσφαλὲς] 'what was assuredly the truth.' So xxii. 30. Παρεμβολή properly signifies a place where tents περιβάλλονται. But it here denotes the barracks in the castle of Antonia. And this is confirmed by the ἀναβαθμοὺς just after; for the castle of Antonia was situated on an eminence.

35. τοὺς ἀναβ.] This term is supposed to denote the flight of stairs leading from the portico of the Temple to the castle of Antonia, which nearly joined the Temple, being built (as we find from Joseph. Bell. v. 5. 3) at an angle of it. In illustration of the present passage, I would adduce an apposite one of Joseph. Bell. v. 5. 8, ἰνδοτέρω δὲ τούτου (scil. ἡν) τὸ πᾶν διάστημα (I read from Cod. Bigot., ἀνάστημα, edificium, structura), τὸ δὲ ἰνδον βασιλείων εἶχε χώραν καὶ διὰ τῶν μμῆριστον γὰρ εἰς πᾶσαν οἰκὴν ἴδιαν τε καὶ χρῆσιν, περισσὴν τε καὶ βαλανεία καὶ στρατοπέδων αὐλας πλατείας, ὡς τῷ μιν πάντα ἔχουν τὰ χροιάθη, πόλεις εἶναι δοκίμ, τῇ πολυτελείᾳ δὲ βασιλείων, where by the πύρστοα are meant courts surrounded by columns, and by the στρατοπέδων αὐλαὶ πλατείας, the soldiers' barracks, laid out, it should seem, in quadrangles. As to the words πόλεις εἶναι δοκίμ, they are, perhaps, corrupt. If correct, they can only refer to barracks; and then βασιλείων must be wrong, and βασιλεία would be required. But such a description would not be suitable to the barracks, and is, no doubt, meant of the πόλις of the citadel, which formed a sort of military city. Now this sense (which is undoubtedly the true one) may be obtained by simply reading πόλεις instead of πόλεις, and for δοκίμ, δοκίμ, or, from the Cod. Bigot., δοκοίη, which evidently requires πόλεις.

— βαστάζεσθαι] 'carried on their shoulders,' for security against the violence of the people. Pricus and Wetstein, however, think the κτῆ does not mean that he was literally carried, but was borne off his legs by the press; and they produce a passage of Dio Chrys., where a person is described (p. 141) as βαδίζοντα μετὰ πολλῶν πλῆθους, καὶ μηδὲ ἐκβαίνοντα πρὸς γῆ, ἀλλ' ὑψηλὸν φερόμενον ὑπὸ τοῦ ὄχλου. Here, however, nothing is said about a great press.

36. αἶρε αὐτόν] 'away with him,' viz. from the earth. So xxii. 22, αἶρε ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς.

— Ἑλληνιστὴ γινώσκεις] Supply λαλοῖς, expressed at Nchem. xiii. 24. This is not a Latinism, since we find in Xen. Cyr. vii. 5. 11, τοὺς Συριστὰς ἐπισταμένους. The interrogative here, as often, imports surprise.

38. Αἰγύπτιος, &c.] Namely, an Egyptian Jew, who set himself up at Jerusalem for a prophet. A full account of this may be seen in Joseph. Ant. xx. 8. 6, and Bell. ii. 13. 5; between which, however, and what is here said, a considerable discrepancy exists; for Josephus, in the latter passage, reckons them at 30,000. Many

XXII. 1. In this able address the Apostle first vindicates himself from the charge of throwing contempt on the Mosaic ordinances, by adverting to his Jewish birth and education, which would render the thing highly improbable; he then states his former hatred of Christianity, and relates the circumstance of his miraculous conversion. He, moreover, alleges his praying in the Temple as a proof that he could mean no disrespect to it; and finally he explains the reason why he preached to the Gentiles.

2. παρέσχον ἡσυχίαν.] Not an Hellenistic phrase; the same occurring in Dionys. Hal. Ant.
 ii. 32 (cited by Wetstein), τοῖς περιστάσει
 διασημῶν ἡσυχίαν παρασχέιν, λέγει τοιάδε.
 See also Josephus, Ant. v. 9.

3. ἀνατεθραμμένος—παιδεί] The construction here has been disputed; some (chiefly the ancient and early modern Commentators) joining παρὰ τοὺς πόδας Γ. with the words preceding;
 others (especially the more recent Interpreters)
 with the words following. Of these two modes the former is preferable. As to the regularity imparted to the passage by the other construction,
 that is little characteristic of Scriptural, or, indeed,
 of ancient style in general. Finally, the tautology (if such there be) objected to in the former construction is far overbalanced by the harsh trans- position involved in the latter.

Ἄνατ. παρὰ τοὺς πόδας answers to what we call being educated under such and such a master,—by an Hellenistic idiom, alluding to the posture in which Jewish scholars received instruction from their masters. Here a Classical writer would have used παρὰ with a dative of the person educating. So Plutarch, Polit. Oper. Moral.
 t. ii. p. 434 (of Achilles), τεθραμμένος παρὰ τῷ
 σοφωτάτῳ Χείρωνι.

In the words following, πεπαιδευμένος κατὰ ἀκρίβειαν ('trained by him to the most exact knowledge'), Rosenmüller thinks that ἀκρίβειαν has reference to the ceremonies and institutions of their ancestors; while Wetstein, Morus, Schleusner, and Kuinoel, ascribe to it the signification soberly, as in Acts xxvi. 5, and Sapient.

xii. 21. And so Isocr. cited by Wetstein, νόμος μετὰ ἀκριβείας κείμενος. By νόμος must be understood not merely the patria lex, but also the πατρικαὶ παραδόσεις mentioned in Gal. i. 14.

3. ζηλ. ὑπ. τοῦ Θεοῦ.] Meaning, 'of God's law,' namely, what he then esteemed such. The Apostle may have here had in mind the words of Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 10. 14, 'I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts,' i. e. meaning for his honour. And so Arrian, Epict. ii. 14 (cited by Wetstein), ὡς Θεοῦ τοίνυν ζηλωτῇ τὰ ἔξῃς πάντα καὶ ποιῶν καὶ λέγων. Comp. also Rom. x. 2, ζήλος Θεοῦ.

In so expressing himself, the Apostle, we may suppose, intended delicately to refute the charge brought against him, of blaspheming the Law; speaking of it in terms such as to tacitly admit its divine origin.

4. ἔσ.] The relative must here, as often, be resolved into the demonstrative with a copula.

5. ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς.] Meaning, 'the then High Priest.' Μαρτυρεῖ μοι is to be taken in a popular sense, for 'He can bear me witness,' 'I can appeal to him.'

6—11.] See Notes at ix. 3, seqq.

13. ἀνάβλεψον.] Ἀναβλέπειν properly signifies to look up, and sometimes only to look; namely, when it is followed by εἰς τι or τι. Sometimes, however, the ἀνα signifies re, and thus ἀναβλέπειν has the sense to recover sight, as here; or sometimes (as in John ix.) to recover, obtain the faculty of sight.

14. τὸν Δίκαιον] 'the Just one.' See Note on Luke xxiii. 47.

16. ἀναστὰς βάπτισαι.] So supra ii. 38, βαπτισθῆτω—εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν: reference being made, in each passage, to the method appointed by Christ for remitting the sins of those who rightly receive this sacrament.

17. καὶ προσευχομένου μου.] A change of construction for προσευχόμενον μοι. On ἐν

20. Meaning to say, 'Lord, as these (the ) well know how bitterly I persecuted those believed in Thee, they must be convinced it
 ly on irresistible conviction, that I am no a preacher of the faith I once persecuted;
 accordingly, I may hope that they will

. φυλακίζων] 'committing to prison;' from κῆ, 'a jail.' The word is of rare occurrence,
 l in Wisd. xviii. 4, and Act. Thom. § 45, not in the Classical writers.

. συνευδοκῶν.] On this expression see Note viii. 1. The words τῇ ἀναίρεσει αὐτοῦ, band in several ancient MSS. and some Ver-have been, with some reason, cancelled by Bach, Tittman, and Scholz.

. ἰλάσσω τὰ ἱμάτια.] See Note supra 18. As the persons employed in the office of ing used to throw off their clothes, like the 18, so from this passage, and Macho ap.
 m. 348. F. we find that in the Gymnasia
 o were persons appointed τὰ ἱμάτια τῶν ὄντων λαμβάνοντας τηρεῖν.

. πορεύου.] The Lord overrules this plea
 mply repeating the order.

. αἶρε ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς.] Alluding, it may be used, to the law which ordered that persons ty of sacrilege should suffer the punishment πταποντισμός. So Philo, ap. Euseb. viii.
 82, νόμον κειμένον τὸν ἱερὸν κατὰ
 κείσθαι ἢ καταποντίζεσθαι.

. καθῆκεν.] This, for the common read-καθῆκεν, found in very many MSS., early 1800s, and Fathers, has been received by set every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz.
 l justly; not, indeed, from the preponderance ternal evidence, for that is pretty equally and between the two readings. The words in 1800 are (like προσῆκεν, προσῆκον, and 1800s) so often confounded by the scribes, 1800s suitableness and propriety of language outweigh authority of MSS. Now of the 1800s καθῆκεν and καθῆκον, the former is in 1800s instance decidedly preferable. Nor καθῆκον claim to be received on the ground
 b being the more difficult reading; for that applies not to manifest violations of the b proprietas, which would certainly be the case here, for we have no proof that καθῆκεν was ever used for καθῆκόν ἵσται. If a present sense be thought required, καθῆκεν may be taken for προσῆκει, used in Plato, de Legg. l. iii. p. 168, and ἀνῆκεν for ἀνῆκει in Col. iii. 18. And so often χρῆν is used for χρῆ, and ἵδαι for δεῖ. To this purpose is the gloss (for such it is) of several MSS., and also of all the Versions, ancient and modern, προσῆκει. After all, however, the expression has, strictly speaking, not a present sense; but (as Winer suggests) may best be represented by the Latin debeuerat, answering to our vulgar idiom, 'had not ought.' So 2 Cor.

 xii. 11, ὥφειλον ὑφ' ὑμῶν συνίστασθαι.

23. ριπτούντων τὰ ἱμάτια.] This certainly cannot mean what some understand, 'rending their garments;' or, as others, 'shaking their garments, as if in rage.' More probable is the sense assigned by others, 'tossing up their garments;' this being regarded as an action betoken-ing approbation, proceeding from certain persons too far off to otherwise participate in the tumult.
 I see not, however, how ῥίπτω will bear the sense toss up, nor how it could be thought to import any thing but disapprobation and anger.
 The true interpretation seems to be that of Grotius, Tirinus, Parkh., and Bretsch., 'tossing off, and casting down their garments,' as a preparation for violence; a symbolical action quite in unison with the violent expressions of such of their companions as stood near, the whole forming a lively picture of rabid fury. Here, indeed, we have only to suppose a union of two senses, each separately occurring in both the Scriptural and Classical writers, viz. to cast down, and to cast off; one implied in the other. The above interpretation is indeed placed beyond doubt by a very similar passage of Plato de Rep. p. 665, 'Ἦγού ἐπὶ σὲ πάντων πολλοὺς οἷον ῥίψαντας τὰ ἱμάτια, γυμνοὺς λαβόντας ὅ τι ἑκάστῳ παρέτυχεν
 ὄπλον, εἶναι διατεταγμένους.

In κοινορτὸν βαλλόντων εἰς τὸν αἶρα we have another symbolical action, quite in unison with the preceding; for Grotius, Wetstein, and Kuinoel, rightly take it of kicking up, or otherwise throwing up dust into the air, which, as appears from the Classical citations of Wetstein,
 and the accounts of modern travellers, was then,
 and still is, in the East, a frequent mode of raising a tumult.

 ἔφη· Ναί. Ἀπεκρίθη τε ὁ χιλιάρχος· Ἐγὼ πολλοῦ κεφα- 28 λαίου τὴν πολιτείαν ταύτην ἐκτησάμην. ὁ δὲ Παῦλος ἔφη·

24. ἀγεσθαι.] For this, many ancient MSS. have εἰσαγ., which has been received by Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz; but injudiciously; for the word has every appearance of being a mere interpretation of ἀγασθαι.

— ἐπεφώνουν αὐτῷ.] The word signifies literally to raise the voice AT a person; and has therefore two senses, either acclamo, applaud, as in Acts xii. 22, or incamo, exclaim against, as here.

— μαστίξιν ἀνατ.] The plural is here used with reference to the many things of which the μαστίξ was formed. Ἀνετάξιν signifies properly to examine carefully; but here questionem habere, denoting examination by torture; see Gen. xii. 17. xvi. 6. Wisd. ii. 19. 2 Macc. vii. 37. Sept.

25. ὡς δὲ προέτεινεν αὐτὸν τοῖς ἱμασίν.] There are few passages more perplexed by variety of reading, and diversity of interpretation, than this. Not less than six or seven varr. lectt. exist; but the only material diversity is between the singular προέτεινεν, and the plural προέτεινον or προέτειναν. Before entering into the question as to which of these two should be preferred, I would advert to one main error that runs through the interpretations of most modern Commentators,—which is, the taking ἱμασίν in the sense scourges; q. d. ‘they stretched him for the scourges.’ This is surely most harsh; and, indeed, I know of no authority for such a use of ἱμας in the plural. The true interpretation of the word is doubtless that of the ancient and some modern Expositors, who take it in the ordinary sense straps or thongs, as Mark i. 7. Luke iii. 16. John i. 27. The plural is here used, because, it seems, the prisoner was fastened to a post with two straps. So Dio Cass. xi. 49, Ἀντιγονοῦ ἱμαστίῳσι σταυρῷ προδήσαντες, where σταυρῷ means the whipping-post. How common was the use of these thongs or belts may, as Bp. Middleton suggests, be inferred from the use here of the Article. Again, in προέτ. we have an allusion to the posture of the sufferer, necessarily a stooping one, as the position of the post was an inclining one. As strongly confirmative of the above view, I subjoin the following passage of an ancient Greek Martyrologist from a tract entitled Martyrium Taruchi, περιελόντες αὐτὸν τὸ πᾶλλον, καὶ περιζύσαντες, ταῖναι, καὶ νύτροι ὥμοις τύψατε—δήσαντες αὐτόν—ταῖναι, καὶ νύτροι ὥμοις σχίσατε τὸ νῶτον αὐτοῦ—ταῖναι αὐτόν in τοῖς πᾶλοι, καὶ νύτροι ὥμοις μαστίζεσθαι. These straps, or belts, were, it should seem, fastened about the person something like the harness of our horses, and were then attached to the post by some ring or buckle there provided to receive them. In short, the mode was, I apprehend, exactly like that now adopted in Russia, in the punishment of our horses, and were then attached to the post by the knout; of which Captain Frankland, in his late Travels in Russia, vol. ii. gives the following description:—‘It is a large solid piece of wood, about seven feet in height, thrust end-ways in the ground in an inclining posture. At the top is a groove cut for the reception of the neck of the sufferer; at the two sides are two other grooves for the arms. On the part fronting the spectators, opposite to the side on which the sufferer is placed, are three iron rings, to which the hands, neck, and feet of the criminal are made fast by thongs.’

But to advert to the sense of προέτ. as dependent on the reading,—retaining the singular, we must refer the action not, as has been generally supposed, to the Tribe, but to the Centurion, understanding him as here said to do what he orders to be done, and sees done. Thus supposing the words as they now stand to be in the place of what would have been more plainly expressed as follows: ὡς δὲ προέτεινεν αὐτὸν ὁ ἐκατόνταρχος [ἢ] τοῖς ἱμασίν, εἶπε πρὸς αὐτόν ὁ Π. If, however, this be thought, as it may, too harsh, we must adopt a plural reading, which is strongly supported by the ancient Versions; either προέτειναν or προέτεινον. If προέτειναν be read, it must be taken in a pluperfect sense, and ὡς be taken for ἔτα. So Luke i. 41, ὡς ἤκουσε—τόν ἀσπασμόν, and ii. 39, ὡς ἐτίθεισεν ἅπαντα. John xix. 23, ὅτε ἐσταύρωσαν τὸν Ἰησοῦν. If προέτεινον (for which there exists nearly equal authority) be read, the sense will be, ‘As they were stretching him forward [to the block] by thongs’: which latter, as it seems the more apt sense, is to be preferred.

— τὸν ἐστώτα.] The Article has reference to the custom of the Romans, to have a centurion to stand by at the execution of any punishment.

26. Ὅρα here, and et in the next verse, not found in very many MSS., have been cancelled by the recent Editors.

28. ἰγὼ πολλοῦ—ἐκτησάμην.] These words imply surprise how a person of Paul’s mean appearance could possess this privilege. Perceiving which, the Apostle makes the rejoinder, ‘As, but I am even so by birth.’ Κεφαλᾶν (at which supply σρος) signifies properly the total arising from the addition of several small sums; but as generally implies a tolerably large sum, so it means a considerable sum. On the various whereby the freedom of Rome could be sold by foreigners, i. e. by merit or favour, by liberty, or by being freed, from servitude, and on the secular nature of the freedom claimed by the sons of Tarus, see Recena. Synop. ἀναταξίαν.] This like the simple ἀτάξια, is often, used for βασανίσαι, 'to examine'.

ἀποβιβάζει—ἔτι ἦν αὐτὸν δεδ.] On the tes of Kuinoel and my own in Rec. Syn., I have proved that the term δεδ., here refers only to his having had the belts

 in order to scourging, not to his being put exempt him from that; and, in point of

 we find the bonds retained after his removal
 the post, and he is afterwards called ὁ

III. 1. ἀναστὰς τῷ συνέδῳ.] 'after having [steadfastly at the council].' Not, I apprehend many have supposed), for the purpose of observation, in order to discover the character of his judges, but simply in order to thereby fix attention upon himself, and what he was to say. So supra iii. 4, it is said, Peter then looked fixedly on the cripple, and bade him sit at them, in order to draw his attention to what was about to be said and done. We may say, too, that the Apostle meant thereby to call the Council that he could then as confidently look them in the face as heretofore, when he had been in the highest honour and trust. Thus the action corresponded with the content of his speech, which, as Calvin and Newcome remark, 'are meant to obviate the unfavourable impression occasioned by his appearing before the Council as a malefactor.' Hence his speech agrees with the solemn assurance, that he had at all times, now as heretofore, acted πάσῃ συνειδήσει, according to the best light of his conscience towards God, whether well or ill informed; that he had never acted from sinister motives, but from a sense of duty.

— πάση συναιδ. ἀγ.] An expression occurring also in Herodian, vi. 3. 9, signifying a consciousness of doing what is right.

— πεποιθημαι.] 'I have conducted myself.' The word properly signifies to act as a citizen, and sometimes to have the conduct of state affairs; see my Note on Thucyd. i. 84. 5. Hence it came to mean, to conduct oneself, behave, and was followed by a Dative of the object to which the action is subservient; as here and in 2 Macc. vi. 1, τοῖς νόμοις πολ.

2. The Ananias here meant is undoubtedly Ananias, son of Nebidæus (see Joseph. Ant. xx. 5. 3), who had discharged the pontifical office under the procuratorship of Quadratus, predecessor of Felix. By Quadratus he was sent prisoner to Rome, together with Anna, prefect of the temple, to give an account of his high-priesthood to Claudius Cæsar (see Joseph. Ant. xx. 6. 2). But by the intercession of Agrippa, Junior, they were acquitted, and returned to Jerusalem. Ananias, however, was not reinstated in the pontifical office. For during the procuratorship of Felix it was filled by Jonathan, who (as Josephus tells us, Ant. xx. 10) was successor to Ananias. This Jonathan was, afterwards, by the connivance, at least, of Felix, assassinated in the temple by some sicarii; see Josephus, Ant. xx. 8. 5. The office then remained unoccupied until king Agrippa appointed Iahmael, son of Phabæus, Josephus, Ant. xx. 8. 8. Hence, at the period in question, Ananias was not High-Priest, but was usurping the dignity. (Krebs and Kuinoel.) Or rather Ananias was not usurping the office, but holding it provisionally.

—ἐπράξα τοῖς παρ. α. τῆσιν, &c.] Meaning by this action to intimate both displeasure at what had just been said, as if bordering on profanity (see ver. 4), and an inhibition to speak further. In the former view I would compare Aristoph. Lyist. 635, αὐτὸς γὰρ μοι γίνεταί τις θεὸς ἔχοντας παράξαι τῆσδε γραδὴ τὴν γνώθον. Also 1 Kings xxii. 24, ἐπράξα τὸν Μ. ἐπὶ τὴν σιγῶν. Into this unjustifiable violence towards the Apostle he was hurried, we may suppose, 1. by Paul's solemn protestations of innocency, which gave the lie to the accusations of the Chief Priests. 2. By his addressing them as Brethren, not as Fathers or Rulers of Israel. 3. From his having been liberated by Roman soldiers, and throwing himself on their protection as a Roman citizen.

3. τύπτειν σε μέλλει, &c.] Whether these words are, what most Commentators regard them, a prediction, may be doubted. Certainly they are not, what Camerarius, Zeger, Limborch, Wetstein, Heumann, and most of the recent Commentators suppose, a formula malè precantis, q. d. 'God smite thee, as thou hast smitten me.' A sense not at all permitted by the words. We may, I think, simply understand them as expressing a full persuasion that God would punish Ananias for this outrage (a view supported by the opinion of Chrysostom, Jerome, and Augustin), or we may regard them as a prophetic denunciation.

From what we read in Josephus, Bell. ii. 17. 8, there is some reason to think that Ananias did come to a violent death about six years after.

— τοῖχε κεκονιαμένε.] A frequent metaphor to designate hypocrisy. See Note on Matt. xxiii. 27.

— καὶ σὺ καθὼ, &c.] The καὶ, when prefixed to interrogative sentences, implying admiration, is best rendered thine? and so? so then? see Kuinoel. Παρανομῶν for παρὰ τὸν νόμον.

5. οὐκ ᾔδειν—ἀρχιερεύς.] That the Apostle should have been ignorant of the presence of the High Priest, would seem strange; and has been variously accounted for. Of the many solutions of the difficulty offered by Commentators, two only seem to have any semblance of truth: 1. that of Chrysost., Dionysius, Cajet., Gataker, Wolf, Michaelis, and Townsend, who prove, from the history of the times, as recorded in Josephus, that the office of the High Priest was then vacant, and that Ananias was only discharging its duties pro tempore; which Paul, having been in Jerusalem only a few days, might not be aware of: 2. that of Bps. Sanderson and Mann, Bishop, Bengel, Wetstein, Pearce, Valcknaer, Morn, Schott, and Kuinoel, who take the expression οὐκ ᾔδειν in the sense, 'I did not reflect or consider' (as it were excusing a momentary impetuosity), as in Eph. vi. 8. Col. iii. 24, and some passages of the Classical writers cited by the Commentators. The former seems the most satisfactory solution.

6. περὶ ἐλπίδος καὶ ἀναστ. νεκ.] It is not necessary here to suppose a Hendiadys. We may render, 'for the hope of the dead and their resurrection.' Compare Ps. xvi. 9, and 1 Thes. iv. 13.

8. ἀμφότερα.] At this expression Commentators, both ancient and modern, stumble, because there would seem to be three terms above-mentioned, resurrection, angel, and spirit. To avoid this difficulty some would cancel μηδὲ ἄγγελον. Others would alter the punctuation. Others, again, remark that ἀμφότερα might, by a writer not very attentive to accuracy, be used of more than two. Yet of such an idiom no sufficient proofs have been adduced. The sacred writer, I conceive, here meant to advert to the two points of difference between the Pharisees and Sadducees; and the two things referred to are the Resurrection, and the Existence of Immaterial Beings; πνεῦμα and ἄγγελος being considered as falling under the same head.

9. διεμάχοντο] 'they contended [on behalf of Paul]'. In this manner the word is also used by the Classical writers; not, however, followed by λέγοντες, but by an Infinitive with an Accusative, as in Thucydides, iii. 40. 42, where see my Notes.

— εἰ δὲ πνεῦμα, &c.] Here we have only to suppose an apostrophe, such as is often found in the best writers, when something which we do not care to directly mention, is omitted. Chrysostom supplies ποῖον ἐγκλημα, and the Pesh. Syr. something similar. The words following, ἢ διεμαχῶμαι, are omitted in 7 MSS., 4 Latin Versions, and some Fathers, and are cancelled by

ch and Knapp; but without reason. The authority for so doing is very slender; internal is quite against the omission. I acutely traces the origin of the omission to a founded objection to the words, as if too favouring Christianity. To suppose them used from ver. 39 is too hypothetical. angel, or spirit, is thought to have referred the two kinds of appearance, which those are inclined to think with Paul ascribed Divine vision narrated by the Apostle; for appearances were always supposed to take through the medium of an angel, or a spirit. recent Commentators here attempt to away all idea of Divine appearance; con- the whole as a mere dream produced by workings of high-wrought imagination, and mutation previously taken by Paul to avail of any opportunity of appealing to Cæsar; is from a desire to go to Rome, foreseeing should be able to accomplish much good. Hence (say they), as the event turned wisely, he, as usual, ascribed the dream Divine appearance! How little such a will bear examination (being no other the same flimsy hypothesis advanced by commentators on various other occasions) but little reflection to discover. So far resolution to make this appeal giving to the dream, the appeal was most pre- et thought of until after the dream; cer- et carried into execution till more than two fier, though many opportunities had, in an time, occurred for the Apostle to have d unto Cæsar; which he, however, did for is it probable that he would have done at, had he not been compelled for his per- serty. I mean not to deny that the Apo- thought of going to Rome; but surely he be anxious not to go as a criminal. The then, was undoubtedly preternatural. ἑλαβηθεὶς] for φοβηθεὶς. An Hellenistic found occasionally in the Sept. and Jose- ant scarcely ever occurring in the Classical τὸ στράτευμα, 'the forces.' The word is a vow media significatio, and signifies sometimes a whole army, sometimes, as here, a small detach- ment.

11. ἐπιστὰς.] See Luke ii. 9. Acts xii. 7. — Παῦλε.] This word (not found in a good many ancient MSS. and some Versions and Fa- thers) has been cancelled by Griesb. and Scholz. But the omission may be strongly suspected to have proceeded from certain Critics who wished the passage to run in the usual manner of Classi- cal composition; and from the Syriac and Æthio- pic Versions we find that other Critics, thinking the name should appear somewhere in the sen- tence, while they removed Παῦλα, altered the αὐτῷ into Παύλω.

12. συστροφῇ] 'a conspiracy.' Of this sig- nification of the word numerous examples might be adduced from Dionys. Hal., Josephus, and Artemidorus.

For ποιήσαντές τινες τῶν Ἰουδαίων συστ., many ancient MSS. and some Versions have ποι- ῆσαντες συστρ. οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι: a reading which has been received by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz; but injudiciously: the genuineness of the common reading being attested by a cer- tain harshness of idiom and peculiar character frequent in the New Testament writers; whereas the other reading has every appearance of being an alteration of the Alexandrian Critics, to make the passage run more smoothly.

These persons were probably Zelotæ, or Sicarii, set on by Ananias and his party.

— ἀνεθεμάτισαν ἑ.] This ἀναθ. implied the binding oneself under a curse to do any thing, and was sometimes, as in the present case, ac- companied with a resolution not to eat or drink until the accomplishment of the thing vowed. It appears that the Jews were much given to this banding of themselves together, in order to make away with any one whom they thought ought not to live; and especially when he was accounted to have deserved death by violating the Divine laws. So in Joseph. Ant. xv. 8. 3, we read of ten men binding themselves by an oath to encounter every danger in order to take the life of Herod for his innovations in their religion, and bringing in foreign customs.

ἡ διασπασθῇ.] Priscus, Kypke, and have proved by examples, that the term used of great violence but short of death.

15. ἐμφανίσατε] 'give notice by letter.' A forensic term. Διαγινώσκω has here the sense, also forensic, of examine, literally determine some point; of which several examples are given by Wetstein and Loesner.

— πρὸ τοῦ ἐγγίσει α.] Namely, that the Sanhedrim might not be thought to have any hand in the thing.

16. Παύλου τὸ ἐνεδρον] 'the plot laid against Paul.' The common text has τὴν ἐνέδραν, while all the early Editions (with Mill's) and very many MSS. have τὸ ἐνεδρον, which has been edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz: and with reason; this being an Hellenistic form very frequent in the Sept., while the other is the usual Greek one.

19. ἐπιλαβόμενος τῆς χειρὸς α.] A popular form of expression, signifying (as appears from the examples adduced by Pricæus) little more than taking any one aside.

20. ὡς μέλλοντες τι ἀκριβ. πυνθ.] So Joseph. Vit. § 2, συνιόντων—ὅπῃ τοῦ παρ' ἑμοῦ περὶ τῶν νομίμων ἀκριβέστερόν τι γινώσκειν.

21. τὴν ἀπὸ σοῦ ἐπαγγελίαν.] The Commentators are not agreed whether this should be explained promise, or order. There is much to be urged for either sense, but the context rather requires the latter. Render, 'the order to be given by you, for Paul to be brought up.'

22. παραγγείλας—πρὸς με.] A remarkable instance of the blending of the oratio directa and obliqua, as supra i. 4.

23. δεξιολάβους.] With this word the Commentators have been not a little perplexed. The reading of one MS. and a few Versions, δεξιόβολου, plainly arose from the conjecture of those who could not understand δεξιολάβους, which is generally supposed to denote lictors, like our provost marshals and his attendants. But although there is reason to think that the word came, in after-ages, to bear that sense, yet it were absurd to suppose so many lictors to be attendant on a single tribune's forces, as that 200 should be sent to guard one prisoner. One of the most probable opinions is that of Beza, Drus., Kuinoel, Schlew., and Wahl, that they were the tribune's body guards; so called from taking the right side of their officer (as being the unguarded side. See Thucyd. iii. 23. v. 10. 71), and thus protecting him. It should rather seem, however, that they attendant soldiers on the heavy-armed, and τήν.] There is no occasion to suppose [inocel] that the beasts were for Paul and soldiers who held his chains. We may them to have been for Paul only; for ag and rapid a journey he would require man one horse. The cavalry, we know, ben to take with them each a led horse;

παρίστω.] The usual epithet in address-magistrate; as we say, your Excellency.
is on Luke i. 3. Οὐ χαίρειν καὶ ἔρρωσο, is on Acts v. 23.

ἐν τῷ στρατεύματι.] Not ‘with an ant ‘with the force [under my command].’

—μαθὼν ὅτι Ῥωμ. ἐστι.] It is in vain to attempt to clear Lysias (as some Commentators do) of petty falsification of the truth. He certainly took more credit for zeal in behalf of his fellow citizens, than he deserved.

30. ἔρρωσο.] A formula of salutation (derived from the use of ἔρρωμαι, in a present sense, ‘to be strong or well’) used at the conclusion of epistles (like vale in Latin), as χαίρειν was at the beginning. So Artemid. iii. 44, ἰδίον πάσης ἐπιστολῆς τὸ χαίρειν καὶ ἔρρωσο λέγειν.

31. ἡγάγον διὰ τῆς—A.] From the ancient itineraries, brought to light by the researches of Reiland, we are enabled to trace both the route generally, and the different stages of it; namely,
to Neapolis, 22 miles; to Lydda (or Diospolis), 10; to Antipatris, 10; to Cœsarea, 6. But 42 miles would seem a distance too great for one night, even supposing all the rapidity of a forced march. And yet the words ἡγάγον εἰς τὴν Ἀ.
seem to claim this sense,—at least no other would be thought of in a Classical writer. Most Commentators think it is not necessary to suppose that he was conveyed thither in one night; and they render by night, i. e. by the next night. But it could only mean in the course of the next night, which would be too long a time to allow. It therefore appears safer to understand διὰ τῆς νυκτός of the night on which they set out. And perhaps no more is meant by this expression than that they conveyed Paul all night long towards Antipatris, and arrived there without halting.
Now, as they might, by a forced march (the cavalry helping the infantry), arrive thither by ten or eleven o’clock in the morning, and as by far the greater part of the journey would be really accomplished during the night, they might be said to have conveyed him thither διὰ τῆς νυκτός.

33. ἀναδόντες.] The usual term to express the delivery of a letter.

XXIV. ^a META δὲ πέντε ἡμέρας κατέβη ὁ ἄρχιερεὺς 1 Ἀνανίας μετὰ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων καὶ ῥήτορος Τερτύλλου τινός, οἵτινες ἐνεφάνισαν τῷ ἡγεμόνι κατὰ τοῦ Παύλου. Κληθέντος δὲ αὐτοῦ, ἤρξατο κατηγορεῖν ὁ Τέρτυλλος, 2 λέγων· Πολλῆς εἰρήνης τυγχάνοντες διὰ σοῦ, καὶ κατορθωμάτων γινομένων τῷ ἔθνει τούτῳ διὰ τῆς σῆς προνοίας πάντη 3 τε καὶ πανταχοῦ, ἀποδεχόμεθα, κράτιστε Φηλίξ, μετὰ πάσης εὐχαριστίας. Ἴνα δὲ μὴ ἐπὶ πλείον σέ ἐγκόπτω, 4 παρακαλῶ ἀκοῦσαί σε ἡμῶν συντόμως τῇ σῇ ἐπιεικείᾳ.

34. ὁ ἡγεμὼν.] This (not found in many MSS. and Versions) has been cancelled by Griesbach and Scholz. It may have come in from the margin, or, on the other hand, it may have been thrown out by the ancient Critics for the purpose of removing a tautology.

35. διακούσομαί σου.] The word implies 'diligent and thorough hearing,' and is here used as a forensic term, to denote a full cognisance of any one's cause.

— τῷ πραιτωρίῳ τ. Ἡ.] This was a palace formerly built by Herod, and then used as the residence of the provincial governor.

XXIV. 1. μετὰ δὲ πέντε ἡμ.] Some understand this of five days from Paul's arrival at Cæsarea; others, from the time of the notice given to the High Priest by Lysias, which was on the day before Paul's arrival at Cæsarea.

— ῥήτορος.] The word properly denotes an orator; but as orators, who harangued on the public business before the public assembly, sometimes had the causes of private persons confided to them,—so it came to signify an advocate, and at length merely a pleader, or barrister, as here.

— ἐνεφάνισαν.] Almost all the best Commentators are, with reason, agreed in regarding this as a forensic term, equivalent to the Latin one comparere in judicio, or coram judice; thus supposing an ellipsis of ἐαυτοῦ, as infra xiv. 2. 15. Comp. John xiv. 21, 22, and Note. The sense assigned by the Syriac Translator, Pricæus, Grotius, and Wetstein, 'gave information,' though found elsewhere, is here by no means so suitable to the context.

3. εἰρήνης.] The word here signifies public and political tranquillity; namely, from the troubles under which they had laboured, of rebels, brigands, robbers, and other disturbers of the peace. So Josephus, Antiq. xv. 10. 1, says of Herod's putting down the robbers in Trachonitis, τοὺς τε πονηρομένους αὐτῶν κατέπαυσεν, καὶ τοὺς πέριξ ἀεὶ τὴν εἰρήνην παρέσχεν. And at Bell. i. 10. 6, he says that 'when Herod had put down the band of robbers, the people celebrated his praises, ὡς εἰς εἰρήνην αὐτοῖς παρέω.'

This flattering speech was quite in the manner of the age, as we may infer from several similar ones occurring in Josephus; especially one of Nicolaus, the orator of Damascus, addressed to Agrippa, Cæsar's deputy in the East, who acted as a pleader for the Jews of Asia Minor, when preferring their complaints to Agrippa. See his speech in Joseph. Ant. xvi. 2. 4. It appears, however, from a passage cited by Joseph. Ant. xx. 8. 4, that Felix was not wholly undeserving of the praise here bestowed on him.

— κατορθώματων.] Κατορθῶμα was a term used in boasting, and signified properly to take a straight course down to the end; figuratively, to conduct an affair to a prosperous issue; and, in the passive, to be so conducted, &c. Hence κατορθώμα denoted the thing thus brought to a successful issue. Accordingly κατορθ. may here mean either successful achievements in war, or rather (as the ancient Versions suggest) in respect to the government and political institutions of the country; which is confirmed by Thucyd. ii. 65, where we have ἀ κατορθούμενα μιν, τοῖς ἰδιώταις τιμὴ καὶ ὠφελεία μάλλον ἢν' σφαλίντα δι, τῇ πόλει ἐς τὸν πόλεμον βλάβη καθίσταται.

— διὰ τῆς σῆς προν.] Elanor observes that the old Romans used to ascribe national prosperity to the gods; while, in after-times, whatever happened prosperously was ascribed to the prudent counsels, and even the τύχη, of their rulers, or generals, without any mention of Divine Providence.

— πάντη τε καὶ πανταχοῦ.] These words may be taken either with the preceding, or with the following. The former mode makes the better construction, and yields the apter sense; namely, 'in every respect (or, 'at all times'), and in every place.' We may observe an elegance in this juxtaposition of two terms commencing with the same syllable, something like alliteration.

— ἀποδεχόμεθα.] Ἀποδέχεσθαι signifies properly to accept at any one's hands, and, by implication, to approve, commend, and is used both of persons and things. So Joseph. Ant. vii. 1. 1, ἐπαίνων καὶ ἀποδεχόμενος τὸ ἔργον.

4. Ἴνα μὴ ἐπὶ πλείον σέ ἐγκ. Meaning, 'That I may not [longer than is necessary] detain you from other business; for ἵνα μὴ ἐπὶ πλείον χρόνον παρασχῶ σοι χρηματίζοντι. The term ἐγκόπτειν signifies properly 'to cut a ditch, as a separation between two plots of ground;' and hence, 'to separate, detain from, hinder.'

— συντόμως.] The construction here is lit imperfect; so that, as the words stand, we must ἐξόντων from the subject-matter. Yet gives such a harshness, that we may be in suspecting some corruption in συντόμη, which I would conjecture συντόμως (not, easily), to be construed with παρατέρω. Thus it will exactly correspond to the same—Te celeremur rogo, of frequent use in the best writers, and probably employed on the present occasion, by Tertullus;

 though no MS. is adduced—as having συντέρω the two words are frequently conjoined by the scribes; on which see Hemsterh.
 Plut., p. 71; Heyne's v. 492; and Wessel. on Diod. Sic. i. 279, καὶ συντόμως, where συντόμως is evidently true reading, though not found in any
 MS. and the expression may very well be expressed mean earnestly; since the adjective σύντομος is often opposed to ἀναιμάτως, both in and in a metaphorical acceptance. Thus sense is, 'But that I may no longer hinder, [I will cease this preface,] and I have 'to entreat thee, of thy benignity and wisdom, to hear what we have to say.'
 ἡμεῖς καὶ εἰς τὴν ἑκκλησίαν is well rendered in the Vulg.
 clementia.
 ὅτι γὰρ, &c.] The γὰρ has the in-force, and may be rendered nempe. In the Commentators suppose an ellipse of ὅτι ἄροντες ἵσμεν may be taken for of which they adduce examples. But since they cite, no other principle could be used: here there is no such compulsion;
 neither regard the phraseology as falling the figure anacoluthon; especially as the
 is long and involved.
 [ὅτι] for λοιμὸν, or λοιμώδη, according to the usage of the best writers, especially the Strictly speaking, the noun here is not a cognate adjective, but is used according to a frequent Greek idiom, by which a noun of abstract sense is, as it were, personified
 the attribute inherent in the noun, and it to a person. Thus, then, the expression is 'a corrupter of the morals of others.'
 πρωτοστάτην.] The word, in the earlier

man, and sometimes (as here) figuratively, a principal person. On Ναζωρ. see Note at il. 22.
 8. παρ' οὗ.] This must certainly refer to Paul; not, as some understand, to Lysias. The expression ἀνακρίνας may be supposed to denote examination simply, and not, as has been thought,
 by torture; for from that Paul's Roman citizenship (of which Tertullus could not be unaware) would be a sufficient exemption.
 9. συνεπέθεντο.] This, instead of the common reading συνήεντο,—found in many MSS., some Versions and Fathers, and all the early Editions, with the exception of the Erasmus,—has been adopted by almost every Editor from Wetstein down to Scholz; and rightly, since it is the more difficult reading. Render, 'acted in concert in the attack.' So Thucyd. iii. 54, συνεπιτίθεμα-νοι ἐς ἐλευθερίαν, and Deut. xxxii. 27. Ps. iii. 6.
 10—12. In this simple, but forcible and convincing appeal to the good sense and competent knowledge of Felix, the Apostle commences without any direct attempt to conciliate the good-will of the President by any compliment, but merely contents himself with adverting to his full capability to judge respecting the matter brought before him, from his ample experience; meaning thereby to intimate that he knows the evil dispositions of the persons his accusers, and therefore would be less likely to be swayed by their arts. He then proceeds to refute the charge of sedition, urging that, from the President's knowledge of the state of the province, he must be aware that such was not the case; nay, could not, since (as he was able to prove) he had but lately returned, after a long absence, to Judaea, and been only a few days at Jerusalem. Lastly, he refutes the accusation of violating the religion of his countrymen and profaning the Temple.
 10. νέυσαντος] 'nutu significavit.' On the nature of this expression, and the similar one νέυματι χρῆσασθαι, &c., I have treated in my

 —κριτὴν.] This term is used, because the Procurator held the judicial functions together with the civil and military ones. Τὰ περὶ ἱμαντοῦ ἀπολ.
 Sub. πράγματα. Munthe aptly compares Diod.
 Sic., p. 351, τὰ καθ' ἑαυτὸν ἀπολογησάμενος.
 The words περὶ ἱμαντοῦ Wetstein thinks emphatic, as much as to say, 'I do not, like Tertul-lus, plead my cause, however bad, for hire, but I speak for myself; which is the most equitable mode.

10. δυναμένου σου γνῶναι.] Meaning simply, 'since it may be proved to your satisfaction.' The η before δεκαδύο, not found in very many MSS. and some Fathers, and the early Editions, has been cancelled by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, and Vater: and rightly; for it is far easier to account for its insertion than for its omission.

—ἡμέραι δεκαδύο.] The chronology of this period may be adjusted as follows:—On the first day, Paul arrives at Jerusalem; 2d, he attends the meeting of the Presbyters; 3d, he commences his week of votive abstinence, which he continues on the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th (for that seems required by the words at xxi. 27, ὡς δὲ ἐμελλον αἱ ἑπτὰ ἡμέραι συντελεῖσθαι). On the same day he is assaulted by the Jews, and committed to the castle. On the 9th day he is brought before the Sanhedrim. The 10th he spends in the castle, during which the plot against him is formed. On the night of the 10th he is removed to Antipatris, where he arrives early on the 11th day; and on the 12th he reaches Cæsarea. The remaining day is not reckoned, probably (as Kuin. suggests) because it is not in question, as he could then excite to tumult.

12. διαλεγόμενον] i. e. 'discoursing on religious subjects.' See Luke ii. 46.

—ἐπισύστασιν.] The word is somewhat rare, but it is found, besides 2 Cor. xi. 28, in the Sept., Josephus, Sext. Emp., and other writers here adduced by the Commentators. The verbo συνίστασθαι is found in the best Classical writers. See my Note on Thucyd. v. 34.

13. οὐτε παραστήσαι με δύναται.] The με, not found in several MSS. and all the early Editions, has been cancelled by Griesbach, Matthæi, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz: and with reason; for it admits of no defence. Indeed, it can only have been an error of the scribes for μοι, itself an error for σοι, and that a marginal scholium. Παραστήσαι here signifies 'to establish or prove': a signification which arises from the primary one of placing one thing, παρά, by the side of another; and as that is usually done for the purpose of comparison, so in the juxtaposition consists the proof as to size, excellence, &c. Thus the term comes to signify prove on due evidence: a sense not unfrequent in the best writers.

14. ὁμολογῶ, &c.] After having refuted the charge of sedition, the Apostle proceeds to answer that of taking up and professing a religion differ-

rent from that of his countrymen. This he does by showing that the doctrines he teaches are not mere novelties, but that he worships the same God with the Jews, receives the same sacred books, and has the same belief in the resurrection, both of the just and of the unjust; conformably to which, and as a test of all true religion, he labours to preserve a conscience void of offence towards God and towards man; and accordingly he shows that he is worthy of the protection of the laws, on which he accordingly throws himself.

Αἵρεσις properly denoted only the taking up of an opinion, whether well or ill founded; and sometimes it was applied to the persons who maintained the opinions. Hence many eminent Commentators here render it sect; a sense found in other passages of St. Luke. But the context here will scarcely permit it; and it should seem that St. Paul merely meant to hint at the isotimias sense which the word admitted, and in which it was used by his opponents; just as in our word new-fangled, which properly denotes only what is newly taken up. That St. Luke and Josephus sometimes use the word in a good sense, is so proof that that was the general acceptation. St. Paul always uses it in a bad sense, of an opinion taken up on slight grounds, and so does St. Peter. And this is here required by the words οὐδὲν ἡν λέγουσι.

τῷ πατρίῳ Θεῷ is for τῷ Θεῷ τῷ πατρίῳ, as in v. 30. Gen. xxii. 9, 10, and elsewhere. Of the phrase πατρίῳ θεῷ the Commentators adduce many examples from the Classical writers. But the sense, in almost all of them, is, not the gods of any one's ancestors, but the gods worshipped at any place. A more apposite example may be found in Thucyd. ii. 71, where see my Note. As the privilege of worshipping their θεοὶ πατρίοι had been secured to the Jews by many imperial charters, so Paul hereby throws himself under the protection of the Roman laws.

—καὶ ἐν τοῖς προφήταις.] I have here thought proper to follow the Latin reception, in preference to the Stephanic, where ἐν is not found, which, however, may be from the margin, though propriety of language will scarcely dispense with it. Many MSS., however, have also τοῖς before ἐν; which has been received into the text by Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz. But it has every appearance of being from the margin. Perhaps St. Luke wrote καὶ for καὶ ἐν. A frequent crasis in Latin Greek. And thus καὶ might easily be confounded with καὶ ἐν.

21. 8) 'otherwise than.' In περὶ μᾶς ταύτης φωνῆς there is, as Beza remarks, a delicate irony, like that at 2 Cor. xii. 13, εἰ μὴ ὅτι αὐτὸς ἐγὼ οὐ κατενόησα ὑμῶν; q. d. 'except for this one speech [if they can make an offence of that].'

22. ἀνεβάλετο αὐτοὺς [ampliare illos], put off the decision of their cause. Ἀναβ. signifies to defer a thing (ἀνα) to another time, as ἀνατιθέναι τὸ ἔργον. It has almost always an Accusative of the thing; sometimes, however, of the person, when the business is not our own, but another's; in which case we may be said figuratively to put him off. So the word is used here and in Plutarch, Op., vol. i. 738, Xyl. ἀναβαλίσθαι τὴν σύγκλητον. This idiom has the appearance of being a Latinism; ampliare and differre being thus used of a person, as well as of a thing. So Cicero, Epist. ad Famil. v. 12, 'differs me in aliud tempus.'

— ἀκριβέστερον εἰδὼς τὰ περὶ τῆς οδοῦ.] The sense here has been disputed. Some (as Beza, Grotius, and Rosenmüller,) suppose the meaning to be, 'Having heard these things, Felix put them off, saying that, after he had gained a more perfect knowledge of that way (namely, the Christian religion), and after Lysias had come, he would take full cognizance of the matter.' Yet to this view a sufficient objection exists, in the violence it involves, of thus transposing εἰδὼς, and arbitrarily supplying καθ'. Far preferable is the interpretation of Expositors in general, including Wolf, Wetstein, and Morus, 'Having become better acquainted with Christianity, namely, from the account just given by St. Paul, as well as from what he had learnt during his residence at Cæsarea.'

'H ὁδὸς seems to have been the name given by the Jews to denote what they called the sect of Christians (see supra ix. 2); though sometimes, as here and supra xix. 9, 23, recognised by the Christians themselves. By the Gentiles they were generally called Χριστιανοί, which, as being a more definite appellation, came at length to be adopted by believers themselves, to distinguish them from Jews and Gentiles.

— διαγνώσομαι τὰ καθ' ὑμᾶς.] Render, 'I will decide the matter at issue between you.'

23. τῷ ἑκατοντάρχει.] Render, 'the centurion'; meaning that one of the two centurions sent from Jerusalem who continued with Paul, the other of whom had left him at Antipatris.

The words τηρεῖσθαι καὶ ἔχειν ἄνεσιν in this verse are of such opposite senses, that it would seem they cannot be conjoined. Hence most recent Commentators place no stop after ἄνεσιν, but connect ἔχειν ἄνεσιν with the words following, which they regard as exegetical of these. See Kuinoel. This, however, is scarcely satisfactory; and the ἔχειν seems to have a signification more special. There can be little doubt that the words are to be taken with the preceding, as they were by the ancients and the earlier modern Commentators. And if so, ἔχειν τε ἄνεσιν must be meant to qualify the τηρεῖσθαι; and the sense must be, 'He ordered him to be kept in hold, and [at the same time] to enjoy some relaxation [of his confinement];' namely, as some Commentators think, by being kept ἐν φυλακῇ ἀδίσμῳ. Yet that is surely irreconcilable with xxvi. 25, and perhaps inconsistent with the due security of his person, as his friends were allowed to visit him. It should rather seem that what is meant by the ἄνεσιν is the changing of the close custody of a prison into the milder duration of the custodia militaris; on which see Note supra xxii. 29. Of the phrase ἔχειν ἄνεσιν in this sense an example is cited by Loesner from Philo, and δοῦναι ἄνεσιν occurs in 2 Chron. xxiii. 15, and 1 Eadr. iv. 62. In the same light, I would observe, the passage was evidently viewed by the Peschito Syriac Translator, who closely connects these words with the preceding. His version, as expressed in the Latin of Schaaf, being, 'Precepit Centurioni ut servaret Paulum in quiete.' Rather, 'precepit Centurioni ut custodiret Paulum cum lenitate;' for لنيس may very well bear that sense, since its feminine for لنيس has it at Eph. iv. 2. Col. iii. 12, and 2 Cor. x. 1. As to καὶ in this sense, that is almost its perpetual use. And moreover, the masculine form has a similar sense at 2 Cor. vii. 6. The words καὶ μηδένα αὐτῷ are not meant to explain the preceding order, but to add another privilege, which did not belong to the custodia militaris, and solely appertained to the custodia libera, or the φυλακὴ ἀδίσμῳ.

I must not omit to state, that instead of τῷ Παύλῳ, ten MSS. and some inferior Versions have αὐτῷ, which was preferred by Mill and Bengel, and has been edited by Griesbach, Tittman, and Vater; but rashly; for though it may seem countenanced by a critical reason, yet it is, in fact, not so; since, if αὐτῷ were the original reading, we can scarcely conceive why such a marginal gloss as τῷ Παύλῳ should have been so prevalent, as to eject the true reading in all the MSS. but ten. So very wide a difference in MS. authority between the two readings should make us rather suspect that αὐτῷ came from the margin, where it was probably placed to express that it should be supplied per ellipsin at ἔχειν.

δρῶν.] This word, not found in several MSS. Theophylact, has been cancelled by others: perhaps rightly; for in MSS. ἰδὼς is read, and in some both ἰδὼς and δρῶν. Thus there is some reason to suspect them to be from the margin. The words ἡδὲ ταῖς seem meant to assign the reason why he brought Drusilla with him. She, as a Jewess, would be likely to take some part in the question as to the truth of the religion. By ἄκουσεν αὐτοῦ περὶ τοῦ θεοῦ, 'heard what he had to say concerning,' By τῆς εἰς Χριστὸν πίστεως is here the Christian religion; of which faith in Christ is the distinguishing characteristic. So 20, ἐν πίστει ζῶν τῷ τοῦ Υἱοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ ἀγαπῶν αὐτὸν, &c. Render, 'as oursured.' By δικαιοσύνη is meant rightness; not merely external, but internal, when the heart is right towards God by a holy obedience to his will. By ἐγκράτεια is meant not only abstinence, but continence or chastity. As a sense, of which only two examples are adduced, Xenoph. Ag. v. 4, περὶ τῶν αἰσίων ἐγκρατείας αὐτῶν. Jos. Ant. xv. 10, πρὸς ἐγκράτειαν ἀρίστα γεγεννημένῃ comparat. These two duties are mentioned, because in them Felix was notoriously at fault. In τοῦ κριμαίου τ. π., 'the judgment seat,' the Article has reference to the truth in which he was well known to Drusilla, as a Jewess. ἡμφοδος γενόμενος.] In tracing the nature of this feeling (on which some different opinion exists), it is well to avoid the extremes, either on the one hand of supposing it a feeling to have been that of trembling (with Doddridge), or on the other (with Pearce, and most of the recent foreign commentators), simply an uneasy feeling. For neither view there is no warrant in the story; since, though the words ἡμφοδος and τρομος are combined in Heb. xii. 21, τρομος is a stronger term than ἡμφοδος, and therefore consorting with ἡμφοδος, which is only an adjective formed on the phrase ἡμφοδία. And as little is to be found in the story for the latter; for, considering the subject which could not fail to embrace the performance of the moral duties in their principal part of righteousness and temperance, to make us fit for the mercy of God in Christ,—and that with reference to the solemn period, when we must give an account of the deeds done in the body. Whether, indeed, the Apostle made his observations personally applicable to Felix and Drusilla (who were notorious for their breach of the duties in question) may be doubted, and, indeed, is little probable. Neither was it necessary; for what was put generally, Felix would of course apply to his own case particularly. Hence, it should seem, the alarm thus excited in the breast of Felix was not (what has been usually supposed) caused solely by the Apostle's discoursing of the final judgment, but by the necessary connexion of that doctrine with his own notorious breach of the moral duties, which could not fail to make him look forward with alarm to a judgment to come. Yet this was, as appears from its results, not that godly fear which worketh repentance unto reformation.

— τὸ νῦν ἔχον.] Supply μέρος χρόνου and κατὰ. An Attic and elegant form, meaning 'for the present.' So Max. Tyr. Diss. xxii. 3, ἀλλ' ἐπισχεῖν τὸ νῦν ἔχον. Καρὸν μεταλαβῶν is regarded as a Hellenistic phrase, for καρὸν λαβῶν, or καιροῦ μεταλ. Yet one example has been adduced from Polyb. ii. 16, μεταλαβόντες καρὸν ἀρόμύττοντα.

These unpalatable truths, then, Felix puts off, on the principle suggested by Horace, Epist. i. 2. 39, 'si quid Est (for edit) animum, differs curandi tempus in annum?'

26. ἄρα δὲ καὶ ἐλπίζων.] This is taken by the Commentators as a participle for the verb ἔλπιε. But it may, in construction, be suspended on the ἀπεκρίθη preceding; which has dependent on it two expressions, denoting the two causes which induced Felix to give Paul his dismissal: 1. because he felt uneasiness and apprehension; and 2. because it was his policy to dismiss him, and send for him again and again, in order to get a bribe to set him at liberty; for it appears from Joseph. Antiq. xx. 8, and Bell. ii. 141, that corruption of this kind was then common; and Felix might suppose that as Paul was one of the leaders of a sect disposed to collect money for any pious purpose, a considerable sum might be raised to obtain his release. The δὲ is not found in very many MSS. and some Versions and early Editions, and has been cancelled by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz. It may be suspected, but should not be cancelled, because of such passages as Thucyd. i. 25. 3, ὑπὲρβαλλοντες τὴν τιμωρίαν, νομίζοντας, &c. ἄρα δὲ καὶ μίσειν, &c.

27. διετίας πληρωθ.] Namely, from Paul's imprisonment by Lysias. It is truly observed by Lightfoot, that the sacred writers often number by tacit or unnamed epochs, as in 2 Chron. xxii. 2. Ez. i. 1.

— χάριτας καταθεῖσθαι τοῖς Ἰ. An elegant phrase, by which favours are considered as a deposit, laid up, to be taken again afterwards. So Plato, Cratyl. ii. χρήματα τιλοῦντα καὶ χάριτας κατατιθέμενον.

It was usual for Roman governors to confer some favours upon the people on vacating their post; and one of these, as we learn from Josephus, was a general gaol-delivery; probably accorded here, but from the benefit of which Paul was, it seems, excluded, that a greater favour might be done to the Jews.

XXV. 1. ἐπιβὰς τῇ ἐπαρχίᾳ.] Render, 'after entering upon his province.' Ἐπαρχία was the name peculiarly applied to the larger provinces, to which were sent Procurators or Proconsuls; while the smaller ones were termed ἐπιτροπαί, and their Governors ἐπιτροποί, Procuratores. These, indeed, were little more than collectors of the revenues; though in some provinces they exercised the judicial functions, and indeed most of those held by the ἐπαρχοί. Now Judaea, from particular circumstances, was one of these. Hence it might be called ἐπαρχία; and so Josephus sometimes styles the Governor ἐπαρχος.

2. ἐνεφάνισαν.] See Note supra xxiv. 1.

3. αἰτούμενοι χάριν κατ' αὐτοῦ.] This may best be considered as a brief mode of expression for αἰτούμενοι χάριν ἐν δικῇ τῇ κατ' αὐτοῦ. So at ver. 15 we have αἰτούμενοι δίκην κατ' αὐτοῦ. The reading of some MSS. and Versions, παρ' αὐτοῦ, is evidently a mere emendation.

— ἐνέδραν ποιοῦντες.] It is not necessary, with many of the best Commentators, to take ποιοῦντες in a Future sense. The difficulty which presents itself may be effectually removed by taking ἐνέδ. π. figuratively, for 'having laid a plot,' as in xxiii. 16, ἀκούσας τὴν ἐνέδραν, and often both in the Old Test. and the Classical writers.

4. ἀπεκρίθη, τηρεῖσθαι.] I have in Recens.

Synop. shown that the sense cannot be (as most Translators and Commentators suppose), 'he answered, ordering that Paul should be kept;' but that, on account of the clause following, it can admit of no other sense than 'he answered, that Paul was in confinement at Caesarea;' intimating that where his place of confinement was, and where the residence of the Procurator was, there his trial ought to be. This mode of taking the words is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and the Vulg. At ἐκπορεύεσθαι there is an ellipsis of ἐκτῷ, as often in verbs of motion.

5. οἱ δυνατοί.] Meaning, 'the persons of consequence among you,' equivalent to the οἱ πρῶτοι just before spoken of. In this sense the word occurs not only in Philo and Josephus, but also in Thucyd.; ex. gr. iii. 27. ii. 65. iii. 47. viii. 63.

— εἴ τι.] Supply αἰτιῶν or ἐγκλημα; namely, in his conduct.

6. ἡμέρας—δέκα.] There are few passages more perplexed by variety of reading than this. The received reading is ἡμ. πλείους ἢ δέκα; yet this cannot well be defended, its external authority being far from considerable, and its internal very slender. Beza, Bengel, and Grotius have seen that the context requires that the οὐ, which is found in many of the best MSS. inserted before πλείους, should be adopted. And so Beza edited; though the word was afterwards thrown out by Schmid, or the Elzevir Editor. Are we, then, to abide by the reading of Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz, ἡμέρας οὐ πλείους ὀκτῶ ἢ δέκα? I think not; for there is no proof that the ancients used such an idiom of what was past and certain. Besides, it is not easy to imagine how ὀκτῶ could have been lost. I suspect that the reading of Griesbach is compounded of two readings, ὀκτῶ and δέκα, each found in the MSS., of which the true one is, I apprehend, ὀκτῶ; for which there is great authority in MSS., Versions, and early Editions. The mistake might easily arise from anacronism, which would produce a var. lect. upon π' (8), namely, '10.' If, however, the first mentioned objection to Griesbach's reading could be removed, I would receive it; for in οὐ πλείους π' ἢ δέκα, one might easily absorb the other. At present I have edited etatein directs should be read, except that, ad of cancelling the words in question, I have them in the text, but within brackets.

αἰτιάματα.] Several MSS. and early Editions have αἰτιώματα, which is adopted by Wetstein, and edited by Griesbach, Knapp, Lachmann, Scholz; but on insufficient grounds; for there is no proof that such a word as αἰτιώμα existed; and it is so contrary to analogy, it scarcely could; especially as it was not so, αἰτίαμα being in general use, as I have, in the Synops., proved by examples from Thucydides, Euripides, Dio Cass., and Plutarch.

ἐπ' ἐμοῦ] 'me preside.' For the sentence in the Sanhedrim would have to be confirmed by that of the president, who had courts both at Caesarea and Jerusalem. For ἐπ', ἐπ' is found in many MSS. and Chrysostom; but the former is preferable, as being more agreeable to the sense of the language. So Josephus, Bell. i. 23. πρμακίας ἔκρινεν ἐπὶ Καίσαρος.

does not appear that Festus knew any thing of the intended assassination of Paul, on the road between Caesarea and Jerusalem. He might say partly to gratify the Jews (who, he saw, were so earnestly desirous to get Paul to Jerusalem), and partly because he was at a loss, as he was (ver. 20), how to proceed in the case, and was willing to shift the matter from himself, to the Emperor, who he could not but know that a person was innocent at Caesarea could not be found innocent at Jerusalem; and he plainly saw that Paul was innocent. Why, then, did he not acquit Paul? Because he durst not disoblige the Jews.

Paul was so well acquainted with their temper that he chose to trust himself to the Gentiles rather than to those of his own religion; and he was so much afraid to suspect that Festus would give him more trouble than incur the displeasure of the Jews; that his safest way was to appeal to the Emperor as a Roman citizen. (Markland.) Paul, as a Roman citizen, whose cause had been referred to the President's court, could not be obliged to have his cause shifted to Jerusalem, but tried by the Sanhedrim.

10. τοῦ βήματος Κ.] 'Caesar's Court;' for it might be so called, as being held by the President on the authority of Caesar, and in his name. At με δεῖ κρίνεσθαι there is an ellipsis of λόγον, alluding to what he well knew was their design, to have him tried by the Sanhedrim, subject to the President's confirmation, who, he hints by the words further on, οὐδεὶς με δύναται αὐτοῖς χαρίσασθαι, would give him up to their fury (see Note on ver. 16).

— κάλλιον.] On this use of the comparative for a high degree of the positive (as in 2 Tim. i. 18, βέλτιον σὺ γινώσκεις) see Matthiae, Gr. Gr. § 457.

11. εἰ μὲν γὰρ—ἀποθανεῖν.] In this sentence, popularly expressed, the γὰρ has reference to a clause omitted, the full sense being, 'For I desire to be tried, so that it be but at a proper tribunal; and if I be found guilty of any offence which by the Roman laws is punishable with death, I shall not decline even death.'

— οὐδεὶς με δύναται α. χαρ.] Meaning, 'give up for trial;' which was equivalent to condemnation and death. So infra ver. 16, χαρίζεσθαι εἰς ἀπάλειαν. A sense of the word, I believe, unexampled in the Classical writers. Wahl, however, refers to a similar use of the Latin condono in Cicero, Orat. pro Caelio. This conveys a delicate reproof to Festus for wishing to do a favour to the Jews at his expense, and is meant to hint that he has not the power, i. e. as Grotius explains, salvo jure; δύναται referring to lawful right.

— Καίσαρα ἐπικαλοῦμαι.] On the nature and extent of this privilege of a Roman citizen appealing unto Caesar in extreme cases, see Rec. Syn.; where it is shown that the appeal in question was a privilege, which could not (as Grotius and Kuinoel imagine) have been disallowed by Festus.

12. τοῦ συμβουλίου.] Meaning those persons (termed at ver. 23 οἱ κατ' ἐξοχὴν ὄντες τῆς πόλεως, doubtless the principal officers, military and civil) who were of counsel with him, both in the administration of the government of the pro-

12. Καίσαρα ἐπικέκληται:] Some Editors make the sentence declarative. But that, I think, not a little weakens the spirit of the words; and the interrogation is confirmed by the Syriac and Vulg.

13. Βερνίκη] Great grand-daughter of Salome. — ἀσπασόμενοι τ. Φ.] 'to congratulate and pay their respects to'; see 2 Kings x. 13.

14. ἀνέθετο τὰ κατὰ τ. Π.] 'related the circumstances of Paul's case,' thus referring it to his better judgment. So Diog. Laert. ii. 18. 6, ἀκούει πρὸς σε ἀνατιθῆναι περὶ ἡμῶν. With the expression τὰ κατὰ τὸν Παῦλον may be compared that of Thucyd. iii. 68, τὰ κατὰ Πλαταίαν.

15. δίκην] for καταδίκην, 'judgment,' i. e. condemnation and punishment, as in 2 Thess. i. 9, and often in the Classical writers.

16. πρὸς οὓς ἀπεκ.] 'to whom I made answer.' This construction is rare, but occurs at Luke vi. 3.

— χαρίζεσθαι τινα ἄνθρωπον εἰς ἀπώλειαν.] A brief mode of expression, meaning 'to give up any one to condemnation and destruction (i. e. capital punishment) out of favour to another.' So Seneca says, 'damnare aliquem gratiā,' scil. alicujus, and ἀπώλεια is so used in Hist. of Bel and Dr. v. 41, τοὺς δὲ αἰτίους τῆς ἀπωλείας. Κατὰ πρόσωπον is for πρὸς σωπον πρὸς πρόσωπον. The sense of τόπον ἀπολογίας λάβοι is, 'and shall have opportunity of exculpating himself.' This sense of τόπος indeed often occurs with διδόναι, but very rarely with λαμβάνειν. The most apposite example adduced is from Josephus, Αἰκ. στθ. β. ἀπολογουμένου τόπον λαμβάνειν.

17. ἀναβολὴν μ. ποιησάμενος] 'making no delay.' An elegant phrase. So Thucyd. ii. 42. 4, ἀναβολὴν τοῦ δαινοῦ ἐποιήσατο.

18. περὶ οὗ.] This must be construed with οὐδ. αἰτίαν ἐπέφερον; and ὧν ὑπενόουν is for [ἐκείνων] ἃ ὑπεν. scil. αἰτίαν ὑπενόουν. Festus might think it was a charge of sedition. Ἐπιφέρειν αἰτίαν is a frequent phrase in the best Greek writers, corresponding to the crimes inferre of the Roman orators.

19. ζητήματα] 'subjects for dispute and controversy.' Δεισδαιμονίας here denotes not superstition, but, as the best Commentators have been long agreed, religion; as Josephus, Bell. ii. 9. 3, ὕπερθευμάσαι τὸ τῆς δεισδαιμονίας ἄκρατον, and sometimes in the Classical writers.

— περὶ τινος Ἰησοῦ τεθν.] This is not well rendered, 'of one Jesus who was dead' (for that would require the article τοῦ); rather, 'about a certain person deceased, called Jesus.'

20. ἀπορούμενος δὲ ἐγώ, &c.] The τότον some refer to the question as to Jesus and his resurrection; but it is better, by an ellipsis of πράγματος, to understand it of the whole matter in debate, the religion itself. The general sense being, 'was at a loss how to deal with a matter such as this.' By τότε a little after understand ἐγκλημάτων.

21. ἐπικαλ. τηρηθῆναι.] At τηρ. sub. εἰς τέ. Or ἐπικαλ. may be rendered 'making his appeal,' which includes the sense 'claiming.' Διάγνωσιν, 'cognitionem,' 'determination.' It has reference to the sense causae involved in αὐτόν.

— Σεβαστοῦ] 'Augustus.' The surname borne by all the Emperors from Caesar Octavianus, who first assumed it.

οὐ πέμψω αὐτὸν πρὸς Καίσαρα. Ἀγρίππας δὲ πρὸς τὸν Φῆστον ἔφη· Ἐβουλόμην καὶ αὐτὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἀκούσαι. ἰ δέ· Αὐρίον, φησὶν, ἀκούσῃ αὐτοῦ.

Καὶ φησὶν ὁ Φῆστος· Ἀγρίππα βασιλεῦ, καὶ πάντες οἱ συμπαρόντες ἡμῖν ἄνδρες, θεωρεῖτε τοῦτον, περὶ οὗ πᾶν γὰρ πλῆθος τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἐνέτυχόν μοι ἐν τῇ Ἱεροσολύμοις καὶ ἐνθάδε, ἐπιβοῶντες μὴ δεῖν ζῆν αὐτὸν μηκέτι. Ὁ ἔγωγ δέ, καταλαβόμενος μηδὲν ἄξιον θανάτου αὐτὸν πεπραχέναι, — καὶ αὐτοῦ δὲ τούτου ἐπικαλεσαμένου τὸν Σεβαστόν, — ἔκρινα πέμπειν αὐτόν. XXVI. ἈΓΡΙΠΠΑΣ δὲ πρὸς τὸν Παῦλον ἔφη· Ἐπὶ γρήπεται σοι ὑπὲρ σεαυτοῦ λέγειν. Τότε ὁ Παῦλος ἀπεβουλόμην καὶ αὐτὸς τοῦ ἀνθρ. ἀκ.] ἀκ. is not well rendered by Abp. Newcome, 'sire to hear;' still less so by the Vulg. and ours, volobam. It is best expressed in Syriac and almost all other Versions and translations, vellem, 'I could wish.' There is no mon, however, with some, to suppose an ellipsis; for, as I have shown at Rom. ix. 3, also in my Note on Thucyd. iv. 54. 3 (Ed. Transl.), Imperfects are often put for Pluperfects, of which numerous examples be there seen. The sense, then, is, 'I could wish to have heard him myself;' a modest of saying, 'I could wish, or I wish, to hear φαντασίας] 'pomp, state;' literally, dis-. So the word is used in Hippocrat. ποιεῖν περιέργως, μηδὲ μετὰ φαντασίας. Heliodor. φαντασίας τῶν δορυφόρων, καὶ τῆς ἄλλης θαρραλείας, which exactly means the kind of pomp here meant. The is, indeed, susceptible both of a good and ense; but there is no reason to here suppose atter, with some Commentators. Ἀκροατή is explained judgment-hall, as auditorium is used in the Latin. If such be the sense, it atinism. As, however, there was no trial, mld rather seem to mean 'a private examina room;' where accused persons had a hear- before they were committed to prison. τοῖς ἐξοχῇ οὖσι is for ἐξόχοις, as ἡ ζωή κατ' βαίαν is for εὐσεβή.

οἱ συμπαρόντες ἡ. δ.] Equivalent to συμ- φροῖ; for there is reference not only to the συλλογ mentioned supra v. 12, but to others; ay, persons of consideration and friends of President, to whom he showed the courtesy of giving them a place on the bench, as Wetstein shows; referring to Josephus, Ant. xvi. 11. 2 & 4, τὸν βασιλεύοντα νῦν ἡμῶν, καὶ σοὶ παρακαθ- ζόμενον. xvii. 5. 3.

— ἐνέτυχόν μοι] 'have made application to me.' The word properly signifies 'to address oneself to, hold converse with any one;' and it is usually implied that the purpose is some request or petition. So Philo, 629, B., ἐνέτυχαν τῷ Θεῷ, ἵνα ἐξ ἀμηνῶν ῥύσῃται συμφορῶν. Wisd. viii. 21, ἐνέτυχον τῷ Κυρίῳ, καὶ ἰδεῖσθην αὐτοῦ, and especially Josephus, Ant. xvi. 6. 5; where, in an epistle to the Governor of Cyrene, Agrippa says to the Jews, ἐνέτυχόν μοι νῦν, ὡς ὑπὸ τινῶν συκοφαντῶν ἐπηρεάζοντο.

25. καὶ αὐτοῦ δι' τούτου ἑαυτὸν Σ.] Render, 'and the person himself withal having appealed unto Cæsar.' The words are hypoparaphetical; and the τούτου serves to impart emphasis. So Thucyd. vi. 33, Ἀθηναῖοι αὐτοὶ οὔτοι.

26. τῷ Κυρίῳ.] Render, 'to [my] sovereign.' A title of the Roman Emperors, corresponding to the Latin Domitius, which is said to have been rejected as invidious by Augustus and Tiberius. It was afterwards, however, much used by succeeding Emperors, though instances of its use so early as this are thought rare. An example, however, occurs in Phædr. Fab. ii. 5, 'Perambulante læta Domitio viridia.'

— ἀνακρίσεις.] Meaning, not a regular trial, but a previous examination in order to trial; a sense often found in the Civilians, from whom several examples are adduced by Grotius.

χεῖρα. Spoken graphiōs; such being the attitude for a set speech. So Polyæn. iv. p. 317, ἀντίτεινε τὴν δεξιάν, ὡς δημηγορήσων; and Apul. Met. ii. p. 54, 'Porrigit dextram, et ad instar oratorum conformat articulum.'

After ἀπελογεῖτο I have thought proper (with R. Stephens and the Bäle Editor) to remove the comma, because, otherwise, a circumstance little more than ornamental is made too prominent. The sense is well represented by the Vulg., 'Tum Paulus, extenta manu, cōpit,' &c. And so Montanus: 'extendens manus.' In short, the words are equivalent to (what, indeed, is found in several of the most ancient MSS., but evidently from gloss, though edited by Lachmann) ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα ἀπελογεῖτο, where no one would think of placing a comma.

2. ἡγῆμαι ἑμαυτὸν μακάριον, &c.] Here we have an elegant προθεράπνυσι, or previous conclusion (as the ancient Rhetoricians called it), such as is found supra xvii. 22, also in Thucyd. i. 68. iii. 54, and other passages of the best writers. Pricæus compares a similar commencement of an oration before the Emperor Maximus, by Apuleius, 'Gratulor quòd mihi copia et facultas, to iudice, obigit, purgandæ apud imperitos philosophiæ, et probandi mei.' It is worthy of remark, that the compliment in question was (as Lardner has shown) one by no means unmerited.

3. γνώστην] for ἐπιστάμενον or εἰδότα; which words are, indeed, found in some MSS.; but evidently from gloss. The words γνώστην ὄντα σε may (as they have usually been) be regarded as Accusatives absolute. They are better, however, accounted for on the principle of anacoluthon. By the ἔθνη just after are to be understood the institutes, laws, and rules of the Jews; and by the ζητήματα, the questions which arose upon the interpretation of those laws.

— μακροθύμως] 'patiently' (see supra xxiv. 4). For it was in ancient times thought a favour to have a patient and unprejudiced hearing. So Josephus, Bell. i. 32. 1, ἐκείνους παρασχεῖν μοι τὰς ἀκοὰς ἀκεραίους εἰς τὴν ἀπολογίαν.

4. βίωσιν] 'mode of life.' A word occurring no where else, I believe, but in the Preface to the Book of Ecclesiasticus: διὰ τῆς ἐννόμου βίωσιως.

5. ἄνωθεν.] Meaning, 'my earliest age.' So

Herodian viii. 6, κατ' εὐνοίαν, ἣν εἶχον πρὸς αὐτὸν ἀνωθείν.

— ἀκριβεστάτην.] A term particularly appropriate to denote Pharisaism. The sense is not, 'the strictest (i. e. the most severe) sect,' for equally such was that of the Essenes; but, 'the sect which held the most rigidly exact observance of the precepts of the Mosaic Law.' This is attested by various passages of Josephus, in which the very expression occurs.

— θρησκείαν.] The word here, as in James i. 27, signifies religion. By the Classical writers it was used, like δαισιδαιμονία, to denote superstition.

6. ἐπ' ἐλπίδι—τοῦ Θεοῦ.] On the sense of ἐλπίδι some difference of opinion exists. Chrysostom and most of the earlier modern Commentators, as also Doddridge and Newcome, understand, 'the hope of the resurrection of the dead'; appealing to supra xxiii. 6, and xxiv. 15. Others, however, comprehending all the later Commentators, as Michaelis, Wakefield, Kuinoel, &c., think this view is precluded by ver. 7; and they, more properly, explain it of 'the hope of the Messiah.' Certainly the hope of the resurrection cannot here exclusively be meant; for, as Mr. Scott observes, 'it may truly be said that the promise of a Redeemer was the most prominent part of the revelation made unto Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the grand subject of prophecy; while the doctrine of the resurrection was not so fully revealed in the Old Test. as in the New.' 'The resurrection of Jesus demonstrated that he was the promised Messiah, against all the unbelieving Jews; and the doctrine of the resurrection, against the Sadducees.' Admitting, then, the principal meaning of ἐλπίδι to be the promise of the Messiah, yet that would necessarily include the promise of the resurrection of the dead by his means, as it was proved to have been fulfilled by Christ's rising from the dead; and as his resurrection was the pledge and proof of our own, it may here be admitted as a secondary sense; especially since St. Paul adds here (as at xxiii. 4), περὶ τοῦ ἐλπίδος ἐγκαλοῦμαι ὑπὸ τῶν Ἰουδαίων.

7. δωδεκάφυλον.] A periphrasis for 'the Jewish nation,' at which supply ἔθνος. I would compare the idiom τὸ Ἑλληνικὸν in Thucyd. i. 1. 1.

ἐγκαλοῦμαι, βασιλεῦ Ἀγρίππα, ὑπὸ [τῶν] Ἰουδαίων. Τί;

8. τί; ἀπιστον—ἐγείρει;] q. d. 'What! is it considered by you as a thing incredible, that God to raise the dead?' The older Commentators take the τί for διὰ τί, why? But the punctuation τί; (found in the Greek Scholiasts) has been adopted by the best Commentators, from Beza onwards; and rightly; since it is far more fitted, and agreeable to Paul's style; see Rom.
 9. vi. 15. The εἰ may be rendered quidem,
 [as is the case]; a sense often found both in Classical and the Scriptural writers. The force of the argument is this: 'You will not deny that God can raise the dead; why then deny that I can have been raised, and thus be proved to be the Messiah?'

9. ἐγὼ μὲν οὖν ἔδοξα, &c.] The transition is abrupt, and the connexion disputed. The sense seems to be this: 'And remember, however subjective you may be in your opinion, and however you may act according to the dictates of your conscience, you may be mistaken, and your conscience deceived. I, for instance, thought of myself (i. e. was self-persuaded), that I ought, &c. In ἐμαντῶ ἔδοξα there is an idiom confined, however, to the first person, and most always in the present tense) of which many examples are adduced by Wetstein.
 Δεῖν—αἰσῆσαι. The phraseology is idiomatical (of which many examples are adduced by Wetstein), and may be rendered, 'that I was bound, in many ways, to oppose the doctrine of Jesus.'

10. τῶν ἁγίων] 'the Christians.' The name which the followers of Christ then bore among pagans.

—φυλακαῖς κατέκλειςα.] Before φυλ. many ancient MSS. have ἐν, which is received by Schumann and Scholz. So at Luke iii. 20, we read κατέκλειςα τὸν Ἰ. ἐν τῇ φυλακῇ. And the word is always subjoined in the Sept. and the classical writers.

—ἀναιρουμένων τε αὐτῶν κατ. ψῆφ.] Rendered, 'when they were being [tried to] put to death by trial was equivalent to execution, I voted for [literally, 'I cast down my vote [with those who condemned them];' meaning, I concurred with them; equivalent to what is said supra xxii. 20, ἡμην συνενδοκῶν [αὐτοῖς] τῇ ἀναίρεσει, &c. Here

 the κατὰ is highly intensive; and no wonder;
 since as the simple expression φέρειν ψῆφον
 would signify 'to give one's vote'; so καταφέρειν ψῆφον would mean to throw down the voting-pebble, implying vehemence and earnestness.
 The expression is not to be taken in a literal sense (for Paul was not a member of the Sanhedrim), but,
 as often, metaphorically, of consenting to and approving of what was done. Nor is it necessary (with many recent Commentators) to suppose this spoken with reference to Stephen only, and consequently a mere Rhetorical or Oratorical amplification; for though no other execution but Stephen's is recorded in the New Test., yet (as Doddridge, Hasselaar, and Heinr. have shown),
 there is reason to think that many such did occur;
 to which there are at least allusions in the New Test.; see viii. 1. xxii. 4.

11. κατὰ πάσας τὰς συν.] This is mentioned as being the place where the punishment was inflicted.

—τιμωρῶν αὐτοὺς ἠνάγκ. βλασφημεῖν.]
 The Christian converts were then, and still more afterwards, compelled by torture to pronounce certain forms expressive of abuse of Jesus, and consequently abandonment of his religion; as appears from Pliny's Epist. xiii. 97. Euseb. Hist.
 Eccl. vi. 34, and other passages cited in Recens.
 Synop. This was, however, but a repetition of the same cruelty that had been exercised by the Heathens towards the Jews, ἵνα βλασφημήσωσι τὸν νομοθέτην, ἢ φάγασί τι τῶν ἀσυνήθων,
 as says Josephus, Bell. ii. 8. 10.

—περισσῶς ἐμμαινόμενος.] A very strong expression, which may be rendered, 'and being exceedingly infuriate against them.' Ἐμμαινεσθαι is a very rare word, though formed regularly from ἐμμανής. It occurs also in Josephus, Ant.
 xvii. 6. 5, ἐμμαινόμενον πᾶσι τοῦ βασιλέως ὁμοίως.

16. The particulars contained in this and the two next verses are not found in the account supra, chap. ix.; but are here introduced by the Apostle in order to show the authority he had for what he was doing, in evangelizing the heathens.

— ἀνάστηθι καὶ στήθι.] Namely, as ready to execute my mandates.

— προχειρίσασθαι.] Supply εἰς τό. The word properly signifies 'to hand forward, to put forward;' and, when applied to a person, means, from the adjunct, 'to appoint,' &c. So also προ-βιβάζω supra xix. 33, where see Note.

— ὑπηρετὴν.] Since a person cannot be said to be a minister of what he has seen, though he may be a witness, it is proper to keep ὑπηρετὴν distinct from ὧν τε εἶδες; ἀτὴν. and μάρτυρα understanding εἶναι. From the context, ὑπηρετὴν must mean 'a minister of my word;' answering to what is said, Rom. xv. 16, εἰς τὸ εἶναι με λειτουργὸν Ἰησοῦ Χρ. εἰς τὰ ἔθνη.

Ἐν ὧν τε εἶδες ὧν τε ὀφθήσομαί σοι we have a somewhat unusual construction. The first ὧν is for ἐκείνων & (see xxii. 15); and the second ὧν for ἐκείνων [καθ'] &. Ὁ ὀφθήσομαι the sense is not, what Morus, Rosenmuller, Schleusner, and Kuinoel assign, revelabo tibi. There is no reason to abandon the commonly received interpretation, 'I shall be revealed unto,' i. e. shall reveal myself to thee; which may be understood, 1. of the several personal appearances of Christ to Paul (see supra xviii. 9. xxii. 18. xxiii. 11. 2 Cor. xii. 1, 2); and 2. of the various revelations which were vouchsafed to him. Thus the full sense will be, 'a witness both of the things which thou hast [now] seen (meaning, the personal presence of the Lord Jesus, in attestation of his resurrection) and of those things wherein I shall further reveal myself to thee;' alluding to those manifestations of the Divine will, and displays of the Divine glory, which were vouchsafed to this eminent Apostle. A similar use of ὀφθαίμαι may be noticed in Isaiah lx. 3. Sept., ἐπὶ σὺ φανήσεται Κύριος, καὶ ἡ δόξα αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ σὺ ὀφθήσεται.

17. Ἐξαιρούμενός.] The sense assigned to this term by the older Commentators, 'delivering from' (as the word is used at vii. 34. xii. 11. xxiii. 27, and often in the Sept.) is here little agreeable to the context. And not without reason is it that the best Interpreters for the last half century have been agreed in preferring the sense 'choosing, setting apart for myself' (so Deut. xxxiii. 11. Job xxvi. 21. Isaiah xlviii. 10. Josephus, Ant. iv. 8. 5, and sometimes in the Classical writers), which is quite agreeable to the context; the expression serving to explain the foregoing one, προχειρίσασθαι σε ὑπηρετὴν. Here, then, St. Paul is said to be 'chosen out of all the nations of the world,' both Jews and Gentiles, as, on another occasion, supra ix. 15, he is declared to be 'a chosen vessel,' σκεῦος ἐκλογῆς; and so he speaks of himself, Rom. i. 1, as 'separated unto the gospel of God.' By a similar mode of expression it is said, Deut. xviii. 5. Sept. αὐτὸν ἐξελέξατο Κύριος ἐκ πασῶν τῶν φυλῶν σου, and Judges xvii. 2. Symm. οὗν ἐξαιρέτουν εἶχε.

— εἰς οὓς.] This must (as appears from ver. 20) be understood both of the Jews and the Gentiles, though the words which immediately follow are more applicable to the latter. And it appears that the Apostle was, for many years of the earlier part of his ministry, employed in heathen countries; see Gal. i. 17, seqq.

18. ἀνοίξαι ὀφθαλμοὺς αὐτῶν, &c.] These words are meant to show the purpose and intent of his ministry, and of the Gospel in general. Here, it is to be borne in mind, the power of the Spirit accompanying the word is supposed,—that being, as Calvin well observes, to the outward ministry what the soul is to the body.

— πίστει τῇ εἰς ἐμέ.] The older Commentators in general, misled by the Vulgate, construe these words with ἡγιασμένοις; while the best of the later Expositors (including Beza and Calvin) have seen that they must be taken with λαβεῖν. A view, it may be added, supported by the authority of the Pesch. Syr. Version.

I have removed the comma after ἁμαρτιῶν, because, as Bp. Bull has shown in his Exam. Cens. vii. 42, in the words λαβεῖν ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν and λαβεῖν κληρὸν ἐν τοῖς ἡγιασμένοις we have set forth the two benefits from God through Christ, constituting what is elsewhere called being 'justified by faith.'

20. The Apostle now proceeds to declare what he did in obedience to the heavenly injunction.

lepravity of the human heart, and its aliena-

y it are required as the fruits worthy of stance.

οὐδὲν ἐκτὸς—γίνεσθαι.] Construe, λέγων
ἐκτὸς [ἐκείνων] ὁ οἱ προφῆταις ἠλάλησαν δυνάμει (for μέλλοντα) γίνεσθαι; for προούμενος, I have, from many MSS., early ones, and Editors, received μαρτυρόμενος;
the latter is more agreeable to the usage of the Text., as well as the Classical writers: for μαρτυροῦμαι, as Rinck observes, has there is a passive, and μαρτύριος a deponent verb, which is here required. Render, 'bearing my testimony.'

εἰ παθητός, &c.] Ei is here for ὅτι, quod. Παθητός is best rendered, 'must be.' The words ἐξ ἀναστ. νεκρῶν may signify, 'after the resurrection from the dead,'
or 'the resurrection.' But the latter sense is impossible, and confirmed by supra i. 18.

μαίνω.] Many recent foreign Commentaries take this to mean no more than 'Thou art
an enthusiast!' adducing several examples from the Classical writers of μαίνειναι so

But this sense is surely forbidden by the following, τὰ πολλὰ σε γράμματα εἰς μαίνω περιτρέπει! 'thy much learning (lit., the learning thou hast) hath driven thee mad!'
usual interpretation, then, 'thou art mad,' certainly be retained. It is remarkable that it has always been the common notion, that de-attention to mental pursuits tends to madness, an illustration of which Wetstein and Kypke give many examples from the Classical writers, Isaac, Soloc., σὺ δὲ ὑπὸ τῆς ἀγαν παιδείας ἤσθης. Petron. 48, 'Scimus te pro literis in casu.'

—εἰς μ. περιτρέπει.] Lit., 'oversets thy wits!' for περιτρέπω signifies properly to turn
any thing upside down.

27. πιστεύεις—προφῆταις; οἶδα ὅτι πισ-
τεύεις.] Of this elegant use of the interrogation
immediately followed by an answer on the part of the speaker himself, several examples are ad-
duced by Grotius and Pricæus (so Lucian, Dial.
Meret., τί φῆς; ποιήσεις ταῦτα; ποιήσεις,
οἶδα), yet none such as to equal in beauty the present passage. Inasmuch that Longinus, de Subl., at § 18, treats of this as a component
of the Sublime, as he had on another occasion
adduced an example of the Sublime from the Mosaic: 'Let there be light; and there was light;' so he might have adduced the present passage of St. Paul.

28. ἐν ὀλίγῳ με πείθεις, &c.] These words
of Festus seem to have interrupted the thread
of the Apostle's reasoning; otherwise he would probably have proceeded to adduce some particular proofs from the Prophets of what he had been saying. The words in question may be supposed to have been merely a civil speech, pronounced in
that complimentary insincerity into which good-natured, easy, and unscrupulous persons, like Agrippa (and such he is characterized by Josephus), are apt to run. Besides, it is unlikely that any strong impression could have been made so soon;
or that, if made, Agrippa would have interrupted
the Apostle, and then left him almost as abruptly
as Felix had done, or Pilate did our Lord, without waiting to hear the conclusion of his sentence.
This, no doubt, arose from the Apostle's having become (as Markland observes) more personal in his application to Agrippa concerning religion
than he liked.

29. εὐχάϊμην ἂν τ. Θ.] Here εὐχ. has the sense of optare, I could wish to God, I would to God; and so it is sometimes used in the Classical writers; ex. gr. Æschin. Dial. iii. 6, ἐγὼ δὲ εὐχάϊμην ἂν τὰ κοινὰ ταῦτα εἶδέναι. Joseph.

29. ἐν πολλῷ.] The exact sense of the expression has been somewhat disputed; but from the antithetical ἐν ὀλίγῳ it must be omnino, though it would be difficult to find another example of the word so used. Here, however,—as often, when a speaker takes up the words of another, and gives them a turn to suit his own purpose,—we must allow for a slight detortion of the sense of a word or phrase.

—παρεκτός τῶν δεσμῶν τ.] Spoken δικτικῶς, holding out his chains. This proves that St. Paul was then not (as some have imagined) ἐν φυλακῇ ἀδίσμῳ, but rather in custodia militari, chained to the soldier who guarded him.

30. ταῦτα εἰπόντος αὐτοῦ.] These words, not found in a few MSS. and Versions, have been cancelled by Griesbach and Scholz; and, indeed, internal evidence is against them.

32. εἰ μὴ ἐπέκλετο Κ.] For thus the power of the judge, whether for acquittal or condemnation, had ceased, and the cognizance of the cause rested solely with the superior court.

XXVII. 1. ἐκρίθη] 'it was determined,' namely, by the decision of Agrippa and Festus, that Paul must be sent to Italy. At τοῦ ἀποπλεῖν there is not, as is generally supposed, an ellipse of περί; but τοῦ with the inf. is here, as supra xxvi. 18, and elsewhere, put for ἵνα and a sub-junctive; only here the ἵνα is, as often, for ἔτι. See the Note supra iii. 18; or we may, with Markland, resolve ἐκρίθη into ἐγενήθη κρίσις (i. e. γνώμη), to which the Genitive is to be referred.

—παρεδίδουν.] Namely, οἱ δεσμοφύλακες.

—σπειρῆς Σεβ.] From the time of Augustus, legions took the name Augustianae. Hence many have supposed that, as in all the other legions, so in the five cohorts stationed at Caesarea, there was one cohort called the Augustan, or that the cohort here mentioned was a legionary cohort of an Augustian legion stationed in Syria and Judaea. And it is worthy of attention, what Bretschneider suggests, that Josephus in various passages makes mention of troops in the Roman army called Sebastophoroi.

2. πλοίῳ Ἀδραμ.] Meaning, 'a vessel of

Adramyttium, and bound thither.' As we say, a London vessel, a Liverpool vessel, &c. Adramyttium was in Mysia, opposite to Lesbos. The early orthography of the name was Ἀδραμυττίον, as found in Thucydides, Xenophon, and the ancient coins in general. Afterwards, however, it was pronounced, and sometimes spelt, Ἀδραμυττίον. From the termination σιω it would seem that the place derived its name from a fane or temple of some hero or god. Ἀδραμυττίον appears to be a noun plural of Oriental origin, from the Heb. מִצְדָּה מִצְדָּה, 'an ensign of elevation, an elevated ensign.' So Is. xxx. 17, 'till ye be left as an ensign on an hill.' The Centurion, it should seem, did not intend to remain with the vessel to its place of final destination, but only to some point of Asia Minor, from which he might meet with a convenient passage to Italy; expecting to find some ship in the ports of Lycia or Caria, on board of which he might embark his soldiers and prisoners for Rome. The event answered his expectation; for at Myra in Lycia he found an Alexandrian vessel bound for Italy.

—μέλλοντες.] Several of the best MSS. and Versions have μέλλοντι, which is preferred by Mill, Bengel, and Pearce, and edited by Griesbach and Knapp, with the approbation of Kuinoel, who thinks the change of μέλλοντι into μέλλοντας was made in accommodation to ἐπιβάντες preceding, and ἀνέχθημεν following. But that is surely too hypothetical; and as to the reading in question, it has every appearance of being a mere emendation, as, indeed, it is regarded by Matth., Vat., and Tittm. Here, then, according to the critical canon, the more difficult reading is to be preferred. And accordingly I have thought proper, with Vater, Tittman, and Scholz, to retain the common reading. Certainly the words τοὺς κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν τόπους must mean 'the parts over against Asia;' which use of κατὰ and τόπος Wetstein well illustrates from Polyb., p. 4, eis τοὺς κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν τόπους, and ἐκ τῶν κατὰ τὴν Ἰταλίαν καὶ Λιβύην τόπων, p. 31, τοῖς κατὰ τὴν Σικελίαν τόποις. Hansen Pez. p. 1., πλεῖν τοὺς παραθαλάσσιους τόπους. No change, then, is necessary; the scope of the words being, to assign a reason why they went on board this Adramyttian vessel; namely, because they coast the [southern] part of Asia, and as a vessel bound to Adramyttium would as they would desire in the way to Italy. μελείας τυχεῖν 'to receive their kind lot.' Of this phrase two examples are ad-

γ Wetstein. ὑπεπλεύσαμεν τὴν Κ., &c.] With these and those at v. 5, as far as διαπλεύσαντες commentators have been not a little per- and that chiefly from imperfect compre- of the nautical term ὑποπλεῖν, though an inattention to the situation of the places ed. Now in sailing from Sidon to the Lycia, it is probable that, had the weather r, they would have taken a course to the f Cyprus;—not, however, near its shores, & the S.W. promontory, Zephyrium,—and would have struck across to Rhodes, or t of Caria. Since, however, we are told, h were contrary (viz. though varying, yet e or less adverse), they changed that and ὑπεπλεύοντες. τὴν Κ. Now, for the e be contrary, they must have been N. or r N.N.E., or such like. And then the y to evade their force would be, to sail der the coast of Cyprus, after having cut e the promontory of Pedalium, so as to e bay of Catium. That they coasted along e, and then made for the Eastern pro- of Cyprus (as the best Commentators is improbable, because they would thus ght more into the wind's eye (as the y), and into tempestuous seas. At all s it is plain that ὑποπλεῖν must mean to ler the lee of any high land (such as , so as to get shelter from it. From sm it is plain they crossed over (διαπλεύ- to Myra in Lycia; a port of great cele- id (as appears from a passage of Porphyry r Wetstein) the one generally used in from Cyprus to Lycia or Caria.

εἶον.] Here, as often in the Classical the word denotes a ship of burden (as to a ship of war), such as, it appears, the rian corn vessels were; and this was one (see v. 38). On these vessels, and a trade from Egypt to Italy, see Hassius as Alexandria, Crit. Sac., vol. xiii, p. Bryant's remarks on Euroclydon, in his

Analysis of Myth., vol. iii. p. 343—9. Myra is indeed out of the track from Cyprus to Dic- archia in Italy; but the winds had been contrary, and the ship had made for the Lycian coast for shelter.

7. βραδυπλοοῦντες.] Of this very rare word one example has been adduced from Artemid. iv. 32. I add another from Cosmas Indicopl. 133. in Bekker's Anecd. i. 225.

—μὴ προσεῶντος ἡμᾶς τοῦ ἀνέμου.] In order to remove the difficulty involved in προσε- ῶντος, Markland proposes to read πρὸς αὐ- ῶντος, but unnecessarily; for the common read- ing may have the very same sense, πρὸς in com- position being often used for πρὸς αὐτόν, as in several passages of Sophocles, Euripides, and Diodo- rus, cited by me in Recens. Synop. The sense is plainly, 'not letting us make any progress.' So Lucian, V. H., p. 657 (cited by Kuinoel) οὐ γὰρ εἰς ὁ ἀνέμος.

—ὑπεπλεύσαμεν τὴν Κ., &c.] Render, 'we ran under,' (see Note supra v. 4) i. e. 'made for Crete, at Salmone, and coasted along the island.' This they did, as thinking they should get more under the wind.

8. μόλις παραλεγόμενοι 'doubling it.' The wind might be adverse, and doubling promon- tories was to the ancients a long and difficult business, usually effected (as we may infer from the term here employed) by toeing. See my Note on Thucyd. iv. 25, παρὰ πλεῖν ἀπὸ κάλων; to which operation there is an allusion in the Latin legere.

—ἦν πόλις Λασαία.] Of this we find no mention in the Classical writers. Hence Com- mentators either resort to conjectures, or suppose this one of the towns of the hundred-cities isla not mentioned by the geographers or other writers. There is little doubt, however, that Lassa is meant, which occurs in Pliny's list of the inland towns; and Lassa was, it is plain, such. The difference between the two names is trifling; since πόλις Λασαία means, in fact, the city of Lassa. So Hesych., Λασιων πόλις, ἢ χωρίον, where read Λασαίων. The situation of Fair- Havens is, by the modern term being discovered in Kalos Limenis, fixed to a place a little to the N.E. of Cape Leon, the present C. Matala. It was not a regular port, but an open roadstead

Ἰκανοῦ δὲ χρόνου διαγενομένου, καὶ ὄντος ἤδη ἐπισφαλούς 9 τοῦ πλοός, διὰ τὸ καὶ τὴν νηστείαν ἤδη παρεληλυθέναι, παρῆναι ὁ Παῦλος λέγων αὐτοῖς· Ἄνδρες, θεωρῶ ὅτι μετὰ 10 ὕβρεως καὶ πολλῆς ζημίας, οὐ μόνον τοῦ * φορτίου καὶ τοῦ πλοίου, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν ψυχῶν ἡμῶν, μέλλειν ἔσεσθαι τὸν πλοῦν. (so Steph. Byz. calls it by the name καλὴ ἄκτι), though well sheltered from tempestuous winds by the Cape and some islands situated to the west and east of it. Laazea was probably on the brow of the chain of hills which rise about four miles from the shore.

9. διὰ τὸ τὴν νηστείαν ἤδη παραλ.] The best Commentators are agreed that in τὴν νηστείαν we have a designation of time made after the manner of the Jews, and even Heathens (nay, which is adopted even at the present day), whereby a particular time of the year is denoted by some Festival which falls at that time, as we say Christmas, Lady-day, and Michaelmas. The fast here meant was the day of expiation, or 10th of Tisri (answering to our October), and thus corresponding to what we call Old Michaelmas. Now, in our own times, the Levantine sailors particularly dread what they call the Michaelmas floss. The ancients, it is well known, considered the navigation of the sea, after the beginning of winter, as dangerous. So Joseph. Antiq. xvi. 2. 1, τὸν γὰρ πλοῦν, ἐπιβαίνοντες τοῦ χειμῶνος, οὐκ ἐνόμιζεν ἀσφαλῆ.

10. ὕβρεως.] The word here signifies injury, damage; as Anthol. iii. 22, 58, Σαλάττης ὕβριν. Pind. Pyth. i. 140, ναυσίστονον ὕβριν ἰδῶν, and Jos. Ant. iii. 6, 4. And so injuria in Latin. Grot. observes that ὑβρις respects the persons, ζημία the goods; comparing Philo: ζημία χρημάτων.

— φορτίου.] This (for the common reading φόρτου) found in many MSS. and the Ed. Princ., was rightly restored by Bengel, Wetstein, Matth., Griesbach, Tittmann, Vater, and Scholz; for (besides the authority of MSS.) it is confirmed by the fact, that while the earlier writers used φόρτος, the later ones used φορτίου.

11. τῷ κυβερνήτῃ καὶ τῷ ναυκλ.] These offices were properly distinct; on the nature and difference of whose duties I have copiously treated in Recens. Synop., adducing a great body of proofs and illustrations from the Classical writers. Suffice it here to say, that the former term denoted the master, the latter the supercargo. But it was only large merchant ships, like this, that had both. The smaller had but one person for both offices, who was then called ναυκλήρος.

12. ἀνευθέτου] for the Classical ἀνεπιτηδεῖον, Thucyd. ii. 20. The place was unfit to winter in, as not being a regular port. Πρὸς παραχ., for πρὸς τὸ παραχειμάζειν. The word occurs also in Polybius.

— ἔθεντο βουλὴν] consilium statuerunt, or literally (and indeed the phrase occurs in Petronius), proseuerunt.

— ἐκείθεν.] This I have, with Scholz, received from many MSS., and nearly all the Versions and Chrysostom, for the common reading κακί-θεν, which cannot be defended, unless we suppose it to stand for ἐκείθεν; which, however, is not allowable. I suspect that the κ came from the ναί preceding, in abbreviation ναί.

— εἰπὼς δύν.] In εἰπὼς there is an ellipsis of πειρώμενος, as not unfrequently in the purest writers. So Herodot. ix. 14, ἰβουλεύετο, εἰπὼς τούτους πρῶτον ἔλοι. The idiom is, indeed, as early as the time of Homer. So Il. ψ. 39, εἰ-τίκα κηρύκισσι λιγυφθόγγοις κίλευσαν—ἀμφὶ πυρὶ στήσαι τρίποδα μέγαν, εἰ πενί-θοιεν Πηλεΐδην. In this case the εἰ should be rendered whether.

— εἰς Φοῖνικα] 'to Phœnix' (not Phœnice); the present port Sphæcia. From its description (with which I would compare Pausan. v. 25, 2, ἀκρὰν τετραμμένην ἐπὶ Λιβύῃ καὶ Νότῳ), we may (as Grotius and Schmid. think) infer that the port was formed by two jutting horns, which looked to seaward to the S.W. and N.W. respectively.

13. ὑποπνεύσαντος δὲ νότου] 'a gentle south wind having sprung up.' So Virg. Æn. iii. 70, 'lenis crepitans vocat Auster in altum,' and Es-rip. Phœn. 218, Ζεφύρου πνοαῖς ὑπνεύσαντος ἐν οὐρανῷ Κάλλιστα κελάδημα.

— τῇ προθέσει κεκρατηκῆναι.] Of the phrase κρατεῖν προθέσειως, 'to thoroughly attain a purpose,' several examples are adduced by Wetstein from Polybius and Galen. Their purpose was to sail safely along the coast of Crete; which they thought they should now effect, since, though the wind that had sprung up was not favourable, yet, being so gentle a breeze, it would not hinder them from maintaining their course.

— ἄραντες.] Here it is usual to supply ἀγκυραῖς, which word is often expressed, as in several passages cited by Wetstein. The term, however, may also allude to the raising of the mast, which were usually lowered on reaching shore. So in Thucyd. vii. 26, ἄρας ἐκ τῆς Λίγνης where the Schol. supplies τὰ ιστία. Yet, after all, from the expression ἔβαλε κατ' αὐτῇ just to the Poets; and moreover, the sense arising (wide-wavy) is too feeble. For the latter (namely Εὐρακλύδων, N.N.E. wind) which has been proposed by Grotius, Mill, Le Clerc, Bentley, and Bengel, there is some, though very slender,

authority in MSS. and Versions; while the objections against it are,—1. that it would not be formed analogically, but ought to be Εὐροακύ-λων. 2. That it would be heterogeneously compounded of Greek and Latin; and ἀκύλων could not well represent aquilo. Besides, the name was doubtless the same that had prevailed for centuries, and was therefore not likely to be otherwise than Greek throughout, not Greek and Latin. 3. It would not at all correspond to the accurate descriptions of the τυφῶν, or Typhoon,
given by ancients and moderns, who agree in
representing it, not as a point-wind, but as veer-
ing about, and blowing in all quarters in succe-
sion from N.E. to S.E.—East, however, prevailing. So Hom. Od. i. 295, Σὺν δ' Εὐρὸς τε Νό-τος τ' ἵπτεσι, Ζήφυρός τε δύσας, Καὶ βορέης αἰθρηγυῖτης μέγα κύμα κυλινδῶν. Virg. Æn.
i. 8, 'Unà Eurusque Notusque ruunt, oreberque
procellis Africus: et vastos volvunt ad litora fluctus.' Hence it is clear that both external and internal evidence unite in requiring the common
reading to be retained; the sense of which may be expressed, 'the wave-stirring Easter,' or literally, 'East-sower;' which designation is confirmed and illustrated by the numerous passages
of the Greek and Latin Classics adduced by me
in Recens. Synop.

15. συναρπασθέντες τοῦ πλοίου.] An expression often used of tempestuous winds. So Æschyl. Ag. 610, χεῖμα—ἥρπασε (scil. αὐτόν).
Thucyd. vi. 104, ἀρπασθεὶς ὑπ' ἀνέμου. Ἀν-οφθαλμῶν signifies 'to bear up against the wind;' or, as we say, to face it. At ἐπιδόντες may be supplied either πλοίου, or ἑαυτούς. Of ἐφερόμεθα the sense is, 'we were driven,' or drifted.
So Herodot. iii. 10, ἐφείροντο κατὰ κύμα καὶ ἀνε-μον: what is properly true only of the ship, being applied to the crew.

16. ὑποδραμόντες.] Not 'running up to,' but
'running under;' i. e. close in-shore. So The-mist., p. 152: τὰ μὲν (partly) ὑποδραμοῦσαι,
τὰ δὲ περιδραμοῦσαι.

—Κλαύδην.] The name given by Mela and Pliny countenances the reading Καύδην found in some Versions, &c.; but the common reading is confirmed by Hierocl. ap. Ptolem. iii. 7, and Athenæus. Περικρατῆς γινέσθαι, for περικρατῆν,
'to become masters of,' 'secure the boat;' which,
it seems (whether it had been towed by a rope,
or had hung fastened to the ship, or been on deck), had been nearly staved, or washed away by the waves.

17. βοηθ. ἐχρῶντο, υποζωννύντες τὸ πλοῖον.] On the sense of the expressions βοηθ. and υποζωννύντες Commentators are little agreed. Some by βοηθ. understand the aid or united help of the mariners and the soldiers, or other passengers. But that would surely suppose the sense to be most imperfectly expressed. Others take it of the tackling, as ropes, hooks, &c. by which assistance is rendered to a ship in rough weather. Yet of such a signification of the word no authority has been adduced. By the other term υποζωννύντες, both the above classes of Interpreters are agreed, is meant that under-girding which, they say, was employed in ancient as well as modern times; whereby thick cables were drawn around a rickety ship, to keep the timbers tight together. In proof and illustration of which numerous passages have been adduced, both from the Classical and from modern writers: yet, upon close examination, scarcely any one of these will be found to the purpose. How uncertain is the passage of Horat. Od. i. 14. 6 (sine funibus Vix durare carinae Possint imperiosius Aëquor), may be imagined from the fact, that no Commentator, except Baxter, takes it to refer to the undergirding of a ship with ropes. And as to the gloss of Hesychius on the word ζωμαύματα, i. e. σχοινία κατὰ μέσον τὴν ναῦν διασπινόμενα, that is known to refer to a passage of Aristoph. Eq. 279, and is only the opinion of a Grammarian on the sense of the word there used, which has been better explained by the Scholiasts, by Suidas, and even by another gloss of Hesychius himself, to mean ὑποζώματα· ξύλα τῶν ναῶν; an explanation, indeed, far more agreeable to the context and the subject, and which is confirmed by the Scholiast on Thucyd. i. 29, ζεύσαντες (ναῦς), where he speaks of these ξύλα (calling them ζυγώματα) as stays necessary to bind together a rickety ship's hull. And to these there seems an allusion in Æschyl. Suppl. 457, Schutz, σκάφος Στρίβλαισι ναυτικαῖσι ὡς προσηγγίμου. So also we have in Theogn. Admon. 513, νηὸς τοι πλευρήσιν ὑπὸ ζυγὰ δέσσομαι, i. e. ὑποθέσσομαι ζυγὰ. In fact, nearly all the passages that have been adduced, in proof or illustration of the above undergirding, belong rather to that operation alluded to in the passages just cited, which may be called under-(meaning inner)-belting. To this purpose may be noticed, as quite decisive, a passage of Athen. p. 204, where he says that the gigantic ship of Ptolemy Philopater had twelve ὑποζώματα, each 100 feet long; and in Plutarch, Romul. ch. vii. we read of these ὑποζώματα, as being made of brass. In short, from the evidence I have brought forward on the passage of Thucydides ubi supra, there can be no doubt that the ζυγώματα, or ὑποζώματα, were pieces of strong wooden planking, or metallic plating, to serve as stays wherewith to bind the inner frame-work of a ship together; which were sometimes, in the case of an exceedingly large ship, put in at first, but usually after the ship had been some time in use, and had grown rickety.

tion above proposed, it may be noticed that, according to the other mode of taking the words, the phrase βοηθείαις ἐχρῶντο, which occupies the most prominent place in the sentence, would be almost useless. At least we should rather have expected ὑπεζωννύντο τὸ πλοῖον, βοηθείαις χρώμενοι. But to advert to the meaning of βοηθείαις, according to either of the two interpretations above detailed, the expression will be little suitable. Its true sense, I have no doubt, is that in which (as Wetstein attests) the word is used in the Greek writers on mechanics, namely, props, or stays; the ζυγὰ or ζυγώματα above mentioned. Thus we may render, 'they had recourse to the use of stays, underbelting the ship with them.' These had doubtless been provided for an emergency: and there is reason to think that, in the largest class of merchant ships, carpenters were regularly employed. This was certainly the case in ships of war; for Xenophon, de Republ. Athen. 12, enumerating the various officers on board a trireme, reckons the ναυπηγοί. — τὴν Σύρτιν.] Meaning, the Syrtis major, an immense bay on the coast of Africa, occupying the whole of what is now called the Gulf of Sidra; and indeed running far out to seaward: a full account of which is given by Captain Beechey in his description of the north coast of Africa, from Tripoli to Cyrene.

— χαλάσαντες τὸ σκεῦος.] The meaning of this expression τὸ σκεῦος has been somewhat disputed. Certainly it cannot mean, what some suppose, the anchor; for the mariners were not in soundings; and if they had, they would in that case have let down two anchors, as ver. 29. If we consider what other ὄπλον might deserve to be called the σκεῦος, we cannot doubt that it is the mast which is here meant. A view supported by the Syr. Version, and adopted by Grotius, Heraldus, Bolten, and Kuinoel. Of course, in taking down the mainmast, the yards and sails would have also to be removed. Here χαλᾶν is used, because the masts of the ancients were so formed as to go into a socket, and to be raised or lowered at pleasure. Thus there was no occasion to cut it away, as is now done in similar circumstances.

— ἐφέροντο.] Meaning, were 'drifted, hurried forward at the mercy of the waves.' What is properly true only of the ship, being, as often, applied to the crew. So in the second fragment of Alcæus, Mna. Crit. vol. i. 423, ἄμμε δ'—Ναὶ φορήμεθα σὺν μελαινῇ, χεῖμασι ποθέειν τε μεγάλῳ κῶλον.

18. ἐκβολὴν ἐποιούοντο] 'heaved overboard [the lading];' for of that term ἐκβολή, when used without any addition, is always to be understood; since the order of the circumstances (as Grotius justly remarks) is, first that the lading should be thrown overboard, as here; then the tackling, ver. 19; and lastly, the provisions, as ver. 38. From the Classical citations of Wetstein it appears that the thing was by no means unfrequent in ancient navigation. The following passage of Jonas i. 5 (where we have the very passage

οὐντο· καὶ τῇ τρίτῃ αὐτοῖς χεῖρες τὴν σκευὴν τοῦ πλοίου ἐρρίψαμεν· μήτε δὲ ἡλίου μήτε ἀστρον ἐπιφαίνοντων ἐπὶ πλείονας ἡμέρας, χεμῶνός τε οὐκ ὀλίγου ἐπικειμένον, λοιπὸν περὶ τρεῖτο πάσα ἐλπίς τοῦ σῶζεσθαι ἡμᾶς. lonas i. 5, and signifying all the armamenta or attire of a ship, otherwise called ὅπλα, as

We have only to suppose that the word found in the best writers is Note on Thucyd. ii. 44), i. e. 'to suffer'; namely, 'it behoved you to have hearkened to and not to have loosed from Crete; and thus would have been gainers by all this injury and this loss;' i. e. you would have avoided it;

see ver. 10.

23. ἄγγελος τοῦ Θεοῦ.] Render, 'an angel of the God whom,' &c.

— ōu [ai] scil. δοῦλος; as Exod. xxxii. 26, 'Who is the Lord's?' and Levit. xx. 26. So also in Is. xlv. 14, where the LXX. render πᾶν τὸ by καὶ σοὶ ἵστανται δοῦλοι. Παράν properly implies devoted service generally, but in Scripture religious service and worship, whether external or internal.

24. καὶ χάριται σοι—σου.] Χαρίζεσθαι τινα or τινα sometimes signifies 'to grant any one's life for another.' Here, however, it means, 'to spare any one's life on account of another.'

27. τισσαρισκ.] Namely, from their having left Fair-havens. Διαφρ. ἡμῶν, 'as we were tossed up and down.' A sense almost confined to the later writers.

— Ἀδρία.] By this is meant not what is now called the Adriatic gulf, but the Adriatic sea; which, as the Commentators have proved, from Ptolemy, Strabo, &c., comprehended what had originally been called the Ἰόνιον πῖλαγον, and denoted the sea between Greece, Italy, and Africa; see my Note on Thucydides, i. 24, τὸν Ἰόνιον κόλπον.

— προφάσι τινα αὐτοῖς χάραν.] There is here a nautical idiom by happalage, like ἀπαφανίνας τῇ Κ. at xxi. 3, in either case originating in the optical illusion, by which, on drawing near to a coast, the land seems to approach to the ship, not the ship to the land. So Ach. Tat. ii. 2. 32, τὴν γῆν ἐωρῶμεν ἀπὸ τῆς θηδὸς κατὰ μικρὸν ἀναχωρούσας ἐς αὐτὴν πλέουσαι. By the same idiom our sailors speak of neuring a coast, and fetching a port.

28. βολίσαντες] 'having heaved the lead' (βολίδα).

denotes the space that a man may compass by stretching out his arms to the farthest, a fulsom.

29. τραχεῖς τόπους] 'rocky ground,' or rocky places where breakers are found; see Xen. Anab. iv. 6. 12, and Tab. Ceb. 15.

— ἐκπίσωμεν.] This (for the common reading ἐκπίσωσι) found in many MSS. and Versions, Chrysostom, and all the early Editions except the Erasmus, has been received by Bengel, Griesbach, Matthæi, Tittmann, Vater, and Scholz; and with reason; since internal evidence is strongly in its favour, it being the more difficult reading.

— ἐκ πρύμνης.] However unusual it may now be for anchors to be dropped from the stern of a ship, yet the passages adduced by Wetstein and Bpæ Pearce show that such was very usual in ancient times (nay, in modern and even recent times the same custom continues in the ships plying between Alexandria and Constantinople); also that four anchors were thought necessary on occasions of great peril. So Cæsar, Bell. Civ. i. 25, 'Navæ quatuorvis ancoris destinabat, ne fluctibus moverentur.'

— ἤχοντο ἡμέραν γενέσθαι.] As persons so circumstanced naturally would.

30. ζητούντων φυγεῖν ἐκ τοῦ πλοίου.] This, as we learn from various passages cited by the Commentators, was in ancient times by no means unusual.

— μελλόντων.] Supply αὐτῶν; an ellipsis not unfrequent when the participle is accompanied with an ὥς.

— ἀγκύρας ἐκτείνειν.] This phrase (as Markland observes) means in effect 'to cast anchor,' since it is by Pollux, i. 9, joined with ἀγκύρας βάλειν. He further remarks, that 'the expression means more than ρίπτειν ἀγκύρας at ver. 29; for in the latter case the sailors had no occasion to leave the vessel; whereas they could not perform the other operation (ἐκτείνειν ἀγκύρας) without going out of the ship by boat.'

31. οὐ δύνασθε] i. e. humanly speaking. For the promise of safety was conditional, and involved the obligation to use the ordinary means for preservation: to neglect which would have been tempting God; see Calvin.

33. προσδοκῶντες.] Namely, that the storm would cease. Ἀσιτοὶ διατελεῖτε. A popular form of speaking, denoting 'ye have taken little or no food,' no regular meal: μηδὲν προσλ. meaning, by a popular hyperbole, 'little or nothing.' No wonder, since at such periods the regular times of meals are thrown out of their course; consequently the food is snatched up as opportunity offers; and so very little is taken. Not to say that during a storm provisions can scarcely be cooked. Thus, in the records of shipwrecks, it is often mentioned that the sailors had scarcely tasted food,—since the state of the ship rendered it impossible to dress any.

34. τροφῆς.] Supply τι.

— τοῦτο γὰρ, &c.] 'this will tend to your preservation.' A sense of πρὸς frequent in the best writers, especially Thucydides.

— οὐδεὶς γὰρ ὑμῶν θρῖξ, &c.] A proverbial mode of expression (occurring also at 1 Sam. xiv. 45. 1 Kings i. 52, and Luke xxi. 18), by which it is simply meant that they would be preserved. The reading ἐπὶολεῖται, found in several MSS. and Versions, ought not to have been edited by Griesbach and Scholz; being evidently a marginal scholium derived from Luke xxi. 18.

37. The number 276 may seem large; but the Alexandrian vessels were very bulky, and fitted it for carrying a great number of passengers. Thus Josephus, in Vit. C. 3, says the ship in which he sailed, and which was cast away in the Adriatic sea, had 600 persons on board.

38. τὸν σίτον.] Meaning, either, as some explain, the wheat, or rather, the provisions, which would be reserved till the last, the lading and tackling being before thrown overboard.

39. τὴν γῆν οὐκ ἐπέγν.] A brief mode of expression, denoting 'they took a view of the country; but recognised it not.' Κόλπον—ἔχοντα αἰγιαλόν. As all inlets have shores, Schmid. and Kuinoel construe the words thus: κατενύουν αἰγιαλόν ἔχοντα κόλπον τινα, 'they perceived shore having a certain creek.' This, however, doing violence to the construction. It is best to retain the natural one, and take αἰγ., with totius, Matthæi, and Schleusner, in a popular sense, to denote 'a shore practicable for landing,' and indeed the passages cited by those Commentators prove that αἰγιαλός signifies properly a sandy shore (as opposed to a rocky one) and consequently one convenient for landing. Κόλπος taken in the sense, which Theophylact says is usual in the common dialect, viz. an inlet. This on the N. W. side of the island, and now called La Cala di San Paolo. Ἐξῶσαι τὸ πλοῖον, 'to strand the vessel.' On this sense of ἐξωθεῖν see my Note on Thucyd. ii. 90.

For the common reading δύναιτο, many MSS., some Versions, and all the early Editions, have πατόν, which was received by Wetstein, Benzel, and Scholz.

40. περιελόντες.] This cannot mean, as several Commentators imagine, 'having taken up the anchors; for that sense would require ἀναλύνειν or ἀνελόμενοι; neither, as they were with- boats, could they weigh the anchors; but the verb must be (as the best Interpreters, ancient and modern, are agreed) 'removed the anchors; namely, by cutting the ropes, and leaving them to the sea. So supra v. 20, we have the figurative expression περιηρῶτο πᾶσα ἱλπίς. The verb often signifies 'to take or cast away,' remove, as, referred, as it ought to be, to the anchors, i. e. 'let them go.'

— ἀνέντες τὰς ζευκτ. τῶν πηδ.] 'having ended the bands of the rudders.' So Eurip. i. 1536, speaks of the rudder as fastened ζεύματα. Some Commentators are not a little perplexed with the circumstance of two rudders being spoken of to one ship. But Grotius, Hart, Elæner, Scheffer, Lips., and Perizonius have proved, that among the ancients large ships burdened had two rudders. To the passage cited by them in proof, I have in Recena. Synop. added a passage, yet more apposite than any, from Orpheus in Argonaut. 274: Καὶ οἱ ἐπ' ἀρτία θῆκαν ἀρρότα πορούσοντας, Ἴστον τ' ἡδ' ὀνάας: ἐπὶ δ' αὐτ' οἰήσαν ἰδῆσαν, Πηνελόπειαν ἀρτήσαντας, ἐκασφίξαντο δ' ἱμάσι. From which passage it appears probable that the rudders were regularly taken off when the ship was in port, and were laid up in the docks. But the question is, how and where were they fixed on? Many (as Alberti, Bp. Pearce, and Kuinoel) think that the rudders were one at the stern, and the other at the bow of the ship; while others suppose both to have been at the stern. I know not, however, of the numerous passages cited by the above Commentators, any one that determines this point; but that which I have adduced from Orpheus undoubtedly does; namely, as we have seen, that they were both at the stern.

— ἐπάραντες τὸν ἀρτέμονα τῇ πν.] scil. αὐρᾷ, the breeze or wind, as Lucian, Herm. § 25. The term ἀρτέμων, as it rarely occurs, is almost unnoticed by the ancients, and hence its sense is disputed. Luther took it to mean the mast; and Erasmus the sail-yard; interpretations devoid alike of proof and probability. Bayfield, Junius, Alberti, and Wolf, with more probability, explain it the large sail of the poop, answering to our mizen sail, and even yet called by the Venetians artemon. The best founded opinion, however, seems to be that of Grotius, Voss., Heumel, Wetstein, Michaelis, Rosenmüller, and Kuinoel, who understand by it a small sail near the prow, called by Pollux the dolon, which was used to keep the ship steady in a rough sea, and prevent its working too much, when the larger and upper sails were set. So Juvenal, Sat. xii. 68, 'Vestibus extensis, et quod superaverat unum Velo prora suo,' where the Scholiast explains, 'artemone solo vellicaverunt.' This was not unfrequently done. So in the Narration of Campbell's Shipwreck, vol. ii. 206, we read, 'The foresail was let go; and in this way they scudded towards the land.'

— κατεῖχον] scil. τὴν ναῦν; which word is sometimes expressed, as Hom. Od. xi. 455. Herodot. vii. 59.

41. περιπεσόντες εἰς τόπον διθάλ.] Διθάλασσον has not here its usual signification, as said of an isthmus which divides seas, but denotes a tongue of land running out into the sea, and consequently washed on two sides by it. The word is applied both to promontories, and to narrow spits of land jutting out into the sea—partly above and partly under water—which guide the currents, and therefore make the place διθά-

XXVIII. * ΚΑΙ διασωθέντες, τότε ἐπέγνωσαν ὅτι 1 Μελίτη ἡ νῆσος καλεῖται. ^b Οἱ δὲ βάρβαροι παρείχον οὐ 2 τὴν τυχούσαν φιλάνθρωπιαν ἡμῖν· ἀνάψαντες γὰρ πυρὰν, προσελάβοντο πάντας ἡμᾶς διὰ τὸν ὑετὸν τὸν ἐφιστώτα καὶ διὰ τὸ ψύχος. Συστρέψαντος δὲ τοῦ Παύλου φρυγᾶ- 3

λασσον, and consequently rough. So Clemens, cited by Wetstein, διθάλασσοι καὶ θηριώδεις τόποι, where, for the manifestly corrupt θηριώδεις, I propose to read τραχώδεις or βραχώδεις, which latter is confirmed by a passage of Dio Chrys. Orat. v., who, speaking of the Syrtis, says they are surrounded by βράχια καὶ διθάλαττα καὶ ταινίαι.

41. ἐρῆσασα] 'having fixed itself.' On this idiom, by which words with an active sense, and generally active use, have sometimes a reflexive sense; see Matthæi, Gr. Gr. p. 521. This idiom is the more to be attended to, since for want of knowing, or at least remembering it, the greatest Critics have occasionally failed. Thus in Æschyl. Agam. 974, νόσος γὰρ γέιτων ὁμότοιχοις ἐρῆσας, the sense (unperceived by all the Editors) must undoubtedly be, 'the disease has fixed itself [with me];' taken its post, as a fellow-occupier of the same house, or one under the same roof. So Thucyd. ii. 49, κατέβαινεν ἐς τὰ στήθη δὲ πόνος (the malady) καὶ ὅσῳα εἰς τὴν καρδίαν (the stomach) στήριζαι, where see my Note.

— ἔμεινεν ἀσάλευτος.] Præcurs compares Virg. Æn. v. 206, 'Illiusque prore pendit.'

— ἐλύετο] 'was severed,' broken asunder. So solvitur in a similar passage of Virg. Æn. x. 363. A circumstance often occurring in shipwrecks, where, from the violence of the surge, the vessel parts asunder, the poop separating from the rest.

42. διαφύγει.] This (for the common reading διαφύγοι), found in many of the best MSS., the Edit. Princ., Chrysostom, and Theophylact, has been received by Bengel, Wetstein, Griesbach, Matthæi, Tittman, and Scholz.

44. οὓς μὲν—οὓς δὲ] for τοὺς μὲν—τοὺς δὲ. On which idiom see Matthæi, Gr. Gr.

— ἐπὶ τινων τῶν ἀπὸ τ. π.] 'some of the things which came out of the ship,' namely, barrels, boxes, &c.

XXVIII. 1. Μελίτη.] It was an old opinion, strenuously supported in the last century by De Rheor and Ignacio Georgi, that this is not the Africa Melita, but another, on the coast of Illyrium. And it has of late been revived, and ably maintained by Bryant, Coleridge, and others. Yet it is, I conceive, untenable, for various reasons, pointed out by Scaliger, Bochart, Cluverius, Cellarius, Wandelin de Melita Pauli, and lately by Dr. Walsh, in his Travels in Turkey, vol. i. p. 51, sq.

2. οἱ δὲ βάρβαροι.] The pride of the Greeks and Romans accounted men of all other nations barbarians, just as the Chinese now do. The not being able to speak the languages of those countries involved the charge of barbarism; nay, many have supposed that such was the primitive import of the word barbarian; see Note on Rom. i. 14. So Mr. Mitchell, on Aristoph. Vesp., is of opinion that the term originally referred only to difference of language, but afterwards to difference of manners, and was especially used to express the difference of Asiatic and European manners.' See the Note on 1 Cor. xiv. 11. This notion, however, is quite at variance with the etymon of the word, which has been rightly referred to an Oriental origin,—being derived, I apprehend, not indeed (as has been supposed) from the Arabic berber, to murmur, but from the Punic berber, a shepherd. Now it was originally appropriated to the indigenous and pastoral inhabitants of Africa, who, to their more civilized fellow-men on the other side of the Mediterranean, appeared rustics and barbarians. Hence the term βάρβαρος came at length to mean simply a rustic, or clown.

— οὐ τὴν τυχ. φιλασθ.] 'no common benevolence, or kindness.' An elegant litotes.

— ἀνάψαντες πυρὰν.] Literally, 'having set fire to a pyre [of wood];' a signification found both in the Sept. and the Classical writers. The common rendering, 'lighting a fire,' would require πῦρ.

— προσελάβοντο] 'took us into their protection and care.' Ἐφιστώτα. Equivalent to ἐπικεῖσθαι supra xxvii. 20. The full sense is, 'which had come on and assailed us.' So Polyb. p. 1053, ἔσται, διὰ τὸν ἐφιστώτα [ῥέως, μηδὲ τοὺς ἐν ποσὶ δύνασθαι θάλατταν].

3. συστρέψαντος] for συλλέξαντος, 'when he had heaped together.' There is something græcism in the term. Wetstein compares from Hesych. οἱ γναφεῖς ἀκαθῶς σωρὸν συστρέψαντες. By φρύγανον (which word is from φρύγω and φρύσσω) is meant dry brush-wood, for fuel. So Xenoph. Anab. iv. 3. 11, φρύγανον συλλέγοντες ὡς ἐπὶ πῦρ.

νων πλῆθος, καὶ ἐπιθέντος ἐπὶ τὴν πυρὰν, ἔχιδνα ἐκ τῆς

— ἐκ τῆς θέρμης] præ calore, 'urged by the heat.'

— καθῆψε] for καθήψατο, by a common Hellenistic idiom. Some, indeed, have maintained that the expression does not necessarily convey the idea of biting; nay, that even καθήπτειν, had it been used, could not have any such meaning. But see my Note in Recens. Synop. Suffice it to say, that as καθάπτειν has been proved to signify lay fast hold of, fasten on, the term, as used of a serpent, cannot but imply biting. As the argument deduced from the words at ver. 4, ἔπαθεν οὐδὲν κακόν, it is very inconclusive; the sense affixed to them, that 'the reptile did not hurt Paul,' is one which, even in a Classical writer, the position of the clause and the rest of the narrative would utterly exclude. Still less, then, could it be admitted in an Hellenistic writer, where the popular sense of words always to be preferred; which would here be, at 'no harm came of it.' Again, that the reptile really bite the Apostle, is surely confirmed by the expression at ver. 4, κρεμάμενον ἐκ τῆς χειρὸς αὐτοῦ. For how, it may be asked, can a serpent hang upon any part of a man's body, except his teeth?

Finally, as to the fancy of certain neologians, at the serpent was not venomous, it is quite ribbden by the fact, that the natives standing by felt assured that Paul would not survive the bite; which could only be from their well knowing the serpent to be venomous. Indeed, the term ἔχιδνα is never used of any serpent but the viper, which is, I believe, always venomous.

4. τὸ θηρίον.] The word is one used, not of beasts properly so called, but of serpents; though primarily means any wild creature; and Galen uses the word Theria to denote medicines to cure the bite of a serpent.

— φονεὺς ἐστὶν ὁ ἄνθ.] Why they should have fixed upon murder, rather than any other time drawing down Divine vengeance, is not told. Most Commentators, from the time of Isner downwards, think they concluded it from the viper seizing his hand; which, as being the offending member, was, by the lex talionis, to be visited with punishment; in like manner as the sight hand of parricides used to be cut off. A law by which the Greeks and Romans not only constantly acted on themselves, in apportioning punishment to crime, but on which they also supposed the Deity to act. Yet surely the idea is one too artificial and far-fetched to have been

likely to occur to the barbarous people here spoken of. We may rather suppose them simply to have reasoned thus: 'The man will surely die, and no doubt for some crime worthy of death; and considering that he has been thus rescued from the jaws of a watery grave, and brought here to suffer death, surely he must have been guilty of the greatest of all crimes,—murder.' From the Classical citations of Grotius, Pricæus, and Wetstein, it appears that the ancients held the opinion that Divine justice (here called ἡ δίκη) sometimes delivered criminals out of dangers, in order to reserve them for heavier calamities and severer punishments. Of these the most apposite is a passage of Achill. Tat. l. v. *ὡς θαλάσσης, πλοῦσάν με δίσωσας, σώσασα δὲ μάλλον ἀπολώλει*cas.

Here there is no reason to suppose (with many eminent Commentators) that by ἡ δίκη is meant the Goddess of Justice, Nemesis. Instead of Deification, we have merely a Rhetorical personification, as in Hor. Od. i. 35. 17: 'Te semper anteit ævæ Necessitas Clavos trabales et cuneos manu Gestans ævæ,' where the attribute of justice is personified, as in Soph. Antig. 538, ἀλλ' οὐκ ἴδασιν τοῦτό γ' ἡ δίκη σ'.

6. πύμπρασθαι, ἡ κατ., &c.] Here are represented the two kinds of symptoms, which supervene on the bite of a poisonous serpent, according to the virulence of the poison, and the strength of the body to which it is communicated. The first represents the swelling, and inflammation, in the beginning local, then general, which brings on a burning fever, that quickly destroys the patient. So Lucian, Dips. 4, ὄφεις ἑκκαταί—καὶ πύμπρασθαι ποιεῖ. Æl. Anim. iii. 18. The second is the effect of the strongest poison on the weakest body.

— μηδὲν ἄτοπον εἰς αὐτὸν γ.] This phrase is Hellenistic in its character, and corresponds to ἔπαθεν οὐδὲν κακόν just before. 'Ατοπον is not unfrequent in the best writers in the sense evil, especially, as here, corporeal; in which sense it is often used in the best writers, especially the Medical ones.

— θεόν.] The Commentators are needlessly minute in debating what god is meant; for the question is undeterminable; and, after all, the word might be used in that lower sense, (to denote a divine person) which is occasionally found in the later writers, especially Philostratus.

7. χωρία] estates. See Note on Matt. xxvi. 36. — τῇ πρώτῃ τῆς νήσου.] We may interpret νησου, ὀνόματι Ποπλίῳ, ὃς ἀναδεξάμενος ἡμᾶς, τρεῖς ἡμέρας φιλοφρόνως ἐξένισεν. * Ἐγένετο δὲ τὸν πατέρα τοῦ Ποπλίου 8 πυρετοῖς καὶ δυσεντερίᾳ συνεχόμενον κατακείσθαι· πρὸς ὃν ὁ Παῦλος εἰσελθὼν, καὶ προσευξάμενος, ἐπιθείς τὰς χεῖρας αὐτῷ, ἰάσατο αὐτόν. Τούτου οὖν γενομένου, καὶ οἱ λοιποὶ, 9 οἱ ἔχοντες ἀσθενείας ἐν τῇ νήσῳ, προσήρχοντο καὶ ἰθερα- πεύοντο· οἱ καὶ πολλαῖς τιμαῖς ἐτίμησαν ἡμᾶς, καὶ ἀναγο- 10 μένοις ἐπέθεντο τὰ πρὸς τὴν χρεῖαν.

Μετὰ δὲ τρεῖς μῆνας ἀνηχθημεν ἐν πλοίῳ παρακεχει- 11 μακότι ἐν τῇ νήσῳ, Ἀλεξανδρίῳ, παρασήμῳ Διοσκούροις· καὶ καταχθέντες εἰς Συρακούσας, ἐπεμείναμεν ἡμέρας τρεῖς· 12 ὅθεν περιελθόντες κατηντήσαμεν εἰς Ῥήγιον, καὶ μετὰ μίαν 13 either, with most Commentators, 'the principal person of the island,' or, with Grotius, Bochart, and other eminent Expositors, 'the governor of the island;' a sense of πρῶτος which they confirm from the collections of ancient Inscriptions, especially one found in Malta, to the memory of one Prudens, a Roman knight, πρῶτος Μελιταίων, καὶ Πατρὸν ἄρξας. Yet there (as probably in other passages that have been cited) the expression seems only to signify 'a principal person.' And, indeed, in the present passage the sense commonly assigned, 'the principal person' (meaning, for property and influence), is probably the true one, as being the more simple and natural, and more suited to the manner of Scripture, where rank and station are never adverted to unless the occasion absolutely requires it. This use of πρῶτος in the plural is one by no means unfrequent in the New Test.; see infra v. 17. Mark vi. 21, &c. In the singular it is rare. Yet Pricæus cites from Philo, ὁ κύριος πρῶτος, 'the principal person of the village.'

7. ἀναδεξάμενος—ἐξένισεν.] 'having taken us to his house, kindly entertained us.' Ἀναδ. is used for ἠναδ. Yet one example of this sense is adduced by Wetstein from Ælian. Ξυλίζω and φιλ. are usual terms on this subject.

8. πυρετοῖς.] The plural is here, as often, used in a singular sense, like febres in Latin. This plural form may be supposed to have reference to those paroxysms by which fever makes its attacks. And possibly the Σέρμας λοχυραὶ of Thucydides ii. 49, may be explained on the same principle. Συνέχεσθαι is a term usually applied to attacks of fever; see Note on Mark i. 30. To this purpose is a passage of Ammianus Marc. i. 26 (cited by Wetstein), 'constricti rapidis febribus,' where for rapidis (which must certainly be corrupt) I would read rabidis; as in Aul. Gell. viii. 20, 'ibi febre rabida decubueram.'

9. οἱ ἔχοντες ἀσθενείας.] On this expression see Luke xiii. 11. sq.

10. πολλαῖς τιμαῖς ἐτίμησαν ἡμᾶς.] Many of the best Commentators are of opinion, that τιμαῖς is here to be taken in a sense frequent in the Classical writers, and not unknown in the Scriptures, to denote honorary rewards. So Ecclus. xxxviii. 1, τίμα λατρὸν πρὸς τὰς χρεῖας τιμαῖς αὐτοῦ. 1 Tim. v. 17, οἱ καλοὶ προϊστά- τες περισσύτεροι διπλῆς τιμῆς ἐξιοίσθωσαν: the former of which passages was probably in the mind of St. Luke. The sense seems to be 'honorary presents:' not, however, of money (which Paul probably would refuse), but of necessities. The words following seem meant to give an example of the kind of presents made. Ἐπί- Δεῖτο is well explained by Wetstein, 'onerarunt nos, et cumulate ingesserunt,' referring to Ruth iii. 15.

11. παρασήμῳ Διοσκούροις.] The παρά- σημον, 'insigne, ensign,' was that from which the ship derived its name. So Plutarch, Sept. Sap. Conv. 18, πυθόμενον τοῦ τε ναυκλήρου τοῦτομα—καὶ τῆς νιὸς τὸ παράσημον. It was a painting or bas-relief, on the prow, of some god or hero, or sometimes animal; nay, even inanimate sub- stances, as shield, &c.; see Ovid Trist. i. 10, 1, and Virg. Æn. v. 115, seqq. The poop bore the picture or image, called the tutela, of some god, under whose protection the ship was supposed to be placed. Both the tutela and the insigne were of gold (or rather gilded metal), ivory, or other rich material. So Virg. Æn. x. 171. 'Et aurato fulgebant Apolline puppis.' Aristoph. Ach. 493, παλλαδίων χρυσομένων. Thus of the ship mentioned in the above cited passage of Ovid, the navis tutelares was Minerva, placed on the poop; but the insigne, ensign, or παράσημον, was a helmet of Minerva painted on the prow; and this gave name to the ship. Yet such was not the invariable custom. Sometimes the tutela and the παράσημον were the same; as, for instance, whenever the effigies of the Deity himself, to whose protection the ship was committed, supplied the place of an insigne; then the ship was called by the name of that god, who was painted or carved on the prow. Thus the Alexandrian ship in which Paul sailed had the Διοσκουρί for an insigne as well as a tutela; whence it was called Διοσκουροι.

12. ἐπεμείναμεν ἡμέρας τρεῖς.] No doubt, in a great measure, for commercial purposes.

13. περιελθόντες.] Not 'fetching a compass,' but 'coasting about,' as most Translators render; with reference, I imagine, to the promontories, especially that of Taurus, to be doubled in coasting the Sicilian shore; for, in the former sense, the term would not be justified by geographical truth; unless, indeed, it were to be understood of taking a course, by reason of a westerly wind, very much to the east, and so getting to Rhegium by tacking. And from the ἐπιγυρομένων πόν- τος

ἡμέραν, ἐπιγενομένου νότου, δευτεράιοι ἤλθομεν εἰς Ποτιόλους· οὐ εὐρόντες ἀδελφούς, παρεκλήθημεν ἐπ' αὐτοῖς ἐπιμεῖναι ἡμέρας ἑπτὰ· καὶ οὕτως εἰς τὴν Ῥώμην ἤλθομεν. is certain that the wind had shifted, and was the same. But if so, they could not coast ng Sicily.

14. παρεκλήθημεν—ἑπτὰ] ‘we were entreated stay seven days.’ It is probable that they had ived there on the day after the Lord’s day. nce they were requested to stay the next Lord’s ver, to give an opportunity to all the Chris- of hearing Paul’s preaching. See Note on 18.

ἐκεῖθεν—ἀκούσαντες] ‘having heard from e,’ viz. from Puteoli, either by letter or by ge. No doubt there was a constant com- ation between the two places.

εἰς ἀπάντ. ἡμῖν ἄχρις Ἀ.] The distance niles) marks the profound respect paid to y the Roman Christians.

Τριῶν ταβερνῶν.] These are supposed to be tents for the refreshment of travellers ig to and from Rome; but they were pro- rather retail shops for the sale of all sorts ables and drinkables. Thus Zosimus, ii. 10, them the Τρία καπηλῆα; and, indeed, this he usual sense of taberna.

παρίδωκε, &c.] It was ordered by law all persons sent as prisoners to Rome should elivered to the custody of the Præfectus orio, and guarded in the Prætorian camp. Luke has expressed himself with extreme ty, but his meaning seems to be this:—‘The VOL. I.

Centurion delivered his prisoners to the charge of the Prefect, [by whom] it was permitted to Paul,’ &c. Καθ’ ἑαυτὸν, i. e. ‘apart from the other prisoners,’ who were confined in the carcer castræ. A great favour this: for even those to whom the libera custodia, or φυλακὴ ἀδελφῶν, was granted, were yet usually confined in a part of the public prison called the δασμωτήριον ἐλευθέρων. So in Philostr. V. A. vii. 22, ἐκέλευσε τό ἐλευθέρων οἰκῆν δασμωτήριον.

—σὺν τῷ φυλ. α. σ.] And, as appears from v. 20, and, according to the invariable custom of persons kept in such sort of durance, chained by the hand to the soldier. Nay, from Joseph. Ant. xviii. 7. 6, we find that even king Agrippa, when in confinement at Rome, was chained to a soldier.

17. τοὺς ὄντας τῶν Ἰουδ. πρώτους.] Meaning, not the Rulers of the synagogue, but, in a general way, ‘those who were the principal persons;’ by a similar use of the participle as supra v. 17, ἡ οὖσα αἵρεσις τῶν Σαδδουκαίων, and xiii. 1, ἐν Ἀντιοχείᾳ κατὰ τὴν οὐσαν ἐκκλησίαν, ‘in the church that was at Antioch.’

—ποιήσας] ‘though I had done;’ a somewhat unusual sense of the participle. Ἐναντίον must be accommodated in sense to the two clauses to which it belongs,—namely, ‘nothing injurious to the Jewish people, or at variance with,’ &c.

19. οὐχ ὡς—κατηγορησας.] Literally, ‘not as having ought to accuse my own nation of;’ i. e. not intending thereby to accuse.

20. ἐνεκεν γάρ.] The γάρ refers to a clause omitted; q. d. ‘[And I may justly claim to be free from all offence to my nation, nay, even to b. attached to it,] for, for the hope of Israel’ (i. e. t. e long-expected Messiah), &c.

21, 22. The latter of these two verses shows that the former must, in interpretation, be qualified; and the sense contained in both may be thus expressed: 'We have neither received any letters from Judæa [containing any bad account of thee], nor have any of the brethren come here and related or spoken aught of evil concerning thee. But we wish to hear from thee what thou thinkest, or hast to say, concerning this Sect [viz. in its justification]; for it has come to our knowledge that it is every where evil spoken of.' There is something obscure and indefinite in the wording, which may partly be ascribed to the delicacy of the speakers. They say that they have heard no evil of him, because they did not regard his professing Christianity as involving any thing πονηρόν· such rather respecting actions than opinions. Ἀξιούμεν—φρονεῖς is a delicate way of asking what he has to say in defence of Christianity, which they probably understood to be alluded to in the words ἐνεκεν τῆς ἀπίδος τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ.

23. ταξάμενοι, &c.] 'having appointed,' or, as the sense rather seems to be, 'having agreed with him for;' on which signification of the word, see my Note on Thucyd. i. 99.

—ξενίαν] 'lodging.' The word is rarely used in this sense. Two examples occur, in Philem. 22, and Joseph. Ant. v. 2. 8.

—πλείονες.] The Jews resident must have been numerous, since, in his War, ii. 6. 1, Josephus speaks of 8000 of them (heads of families, it should seem) being of the Anti-Herodian party. From Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 12. 1, it appears that the number of Jews was very great at Rome.

26, 27. See Note on Matt. xiii. 14, 15. Compare Soph. Aj. 65, where Minerva says to Ulysses, ἐγὼ σκοτώσω βλέφαρα καὶ διδορκότα.

30. ἐν ἰδίῳ μισθώματι] 'in his own hired lodging.' So Plato, ἐν μισθώματι οἰκῆν, and Theophr. Char. 23, μισθώτην οἰκίαν οἰκῶν. In the words μετὰ πάσης παρρησίας, ἀκωλύτως there is a sort of pleonasm, with which Wetstein compares Herodian, viii. 2. 1, δειβήσαν ἀκωλύτως, μηδεὶς ἐμποδῶν γαστρίμου.

16. The particulars contained in this and the two next verses are not found in the account supra, chap. ix.; but are here introduced by the Apostle in order to show the authority he had for what he was doing, in evangelizing the heathens. — ἀνάστηθι καὶ στήθι.] Namely, as ready to execute my mandates.

— προχειρίσασθαι.] Supply εἰς τό. The word properly signifies 'to hand forward, to put forward;' and, when applied to a person, means, from the adjunct, 'to appoint,' &c. So also προ-βιδάξω supra xix. 33, where see Note.

— ὑπέρβλην.] Since a person cannot be said to be a minister of what he has seen, though he may be a witness, it is proper to keep ὑπέρβλην distinct from ὥν τε εἶδες; at ὑπέρβλην, and μάρ-τυρα understanding εἶναι. From the context, ὑπέρβλην must mean 'a minister of my word;' answering to what is said, Rom. xv. 16, εἰς τὸ εἶναι με λειτουργόν Ἰησοῦ Χρ. εἰς τὰ ἔθνη.

In ὥν τε εἶδες ὥν τε ὀφθήσομαί σοι we have a somewhat unusual construction. The first ὥν is for ἐκείνων ἃ (see xxii. 15); and the second ὥν for ἐκείνων [καθ'] ἃ. Of ὀφθήσομαι the sense is not, what Morus, Rosenmuller, Schleusner, and Kuinoel assign, revelabo tibi. There is no reason to abandon the commonly received interpretation, 'I shall be revealed unto,' i. e. shall reveal myself to thee; which may be understood, 1. of the several personal appearances of Christ to Paul (see supra xviii. 9. xxii. 18. xxiii. 11. 2 Cor. xii. 1, 2); and 2. of the various revelations which were vouchsafed to him. Thus the full sense will be, 'a witness both of the things which thou hast [now] seen (meaning, the personal presence of the Lord Jesus, in attestation of his resurrection) and of those things wherein I shall further reveal myself to thee;' alluding to those manifestations of the Divine will, and displays of the Divine glory, which were vouchsafed to this eminent Apostle. A similar use of ὅπτοιμαι may be noticed in Isaiah lx. 3. Sept., ἐπὶ σε φανήσεται Κύριος, καὶ ἡ δόξα αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ σε ὀφθήσεται.

17. ἑξαιρούμενός.] The sense assigned to this term by the older Commentators, 'delivering from' (as the word is used at vii. 34. xii. 11. xxiii. 27, and often in the Sept.) is here little agreeable to the context. And not without reason is it that the best Interpreters for the last half century have been agreed in preferring the sense 'choosing, setting apart for myself' (so Deut. xxxiii. 11. Job xxvi. 21. Isaiah xlvi. 10. Josephus, Ant. iv. 8. 5, and sometimes in the Classical writers), which is quite agreeable to the context; the expression serving to explain the foregoing one, προχειρίσασθαι σε ὑπέρβλην. Here, then, St. Paul is said to be 'chosen out of all the nations of the world,' both Jews and Gentiles, as, on another occasion, supra ix. 15, he is declared to be 'a chosen vessel,' σκεῦος ἐκλογῆς; and so he speaks of himself, Rom. i. 1, as 'separated unto the gospel of God.' By a similar mode of expression it is said, Deut. xviii. 5. Sept. αὐτὸν ἐξελέξατο Κύριος ἐκ πασῶν τῶν φυλῶν σου, and Judges xvii. 2. Symm. οὓς ἐξαιρέτους εἶχε. — εἰς οὓς.] This must (as appears from ver. 20) be understood both of the Jews and the Gentiles, though the words which immediately follow are more applicable to the latter. And it appears that the Apostle was, for many years of the earlier part of his ministry, employed in heathen countries; see Gal. i. 17, seqq.

18. ἀνοίξαι ὀφθαλμούς αὐτῶν, &c.] These words are meant to show the purpose and intent of his ministry, and of the Gospel in general. Here, it is to be borne in mind, the power of the Spirit accompanying the word is supposed,—that being, as Calvin well observes, to the outward ministry what the soul is to the body.

— πίστει τῇ εἰς ἐμέ.] The older Commentators in general, misled by the Vulgate, construe these words with ἡγιασμένοις; while the best of the later Expositors (including Beza and Calvin) have seen that they must be taken with λαβεῖν. A view, it may be added, supported by the authority of the Pesch. Syr. Version.

I have removed the comma after ἁμαρτιῶν, because, as Bp. Bull has shown in his Exam. Cens. vii. 42, in the words λαβεῖν ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν καὶ λαβεῖν κληρὸν ἐν τοῖς ἡγιασμένοις we have set forth the two benefits from God through Christ, constituting what is elsewhere called being 'justified by faith.'

20. The Apostle now proceeds to declare what he did in obedience to the heavenly injunction.

— μετανοεῖν, καὶ ἐπιστρέφειν ἑ. τ. θ.] Here (as Calvin observes) turning unto God is placed

ὁ δὲ ἐκτός—γίνεσθαι.] Construe, λέγων ἔλεγον (for μέλλοντα) γίνεσθαι: for μέλλοντα, I have, from many MSS., early editions, and Editors, received μαρτυρούμενος;

 after is more agreeable to the usage of the text, as well as the Classical writers: for εἶσθαι, as Rinck observes, has there is passive, and μαρτύρεσθαι a dependent which is here required. Render, 'bearing ] testimony.'

παθητός, &c.] El is here for ὅτι, mod. Παθητός is best rendered, 'must'

The words ἐξ ἀναστ. νεκρῶν may signify, 'after the resurrection from the dead,'
 the resurrection. But the latter sense is false, and confirmed by supra i. 18.

αἰνή.] Many recent foreign Commentaries take this to mean no more than 'Thou art
 very enthusiastic!' adducing several examples from the Classical writers of μαίνεσθαι so
 but this sense is surely forbidden by the
 following, τὰ πολλὰ σε γράμματα εἰς περιτρέπει! 'thy much learning (lit., the learning thou hast) hath driven thee mad!'
 mal interpretation, then, 'thou art mad,' plainly be retained. It is remarkable that may have been the common notion, that debention to mental pursuits tends to madness. Illustration of which Wetstein and Kypke many examples from the Classical writers,
 as, Solæc., οὐ δὲ ὑπὸ τῆς ἀγαν παιδείας παθεῖ. Petron. 48, 'Scimus te pro literis esse.'

—εἰς μ. περιτρέπει.] Lit., 'oversets thy wits!' for περιτρέπει signifies properly to turn
 any thing upside down.

27. πιστεύεις—προφῆταις; οἶδα ὅτι πισ-
 τεύεις.] Of this elegant use of the interrogation
 immediately followed by an answer on the part
 of the speaker himself, several examples are ad-
 duced by Grotius and Pricæus (so Lucian, Dial.
 Meret., τί φῆς; ποιήσεις ταῦτα; ποιήσεις,
 οἶδα), yet none such as to equal in beauty the
 present passage. Inasmuch that Longinus, de Subl., at § 18, treats of this as a component
 of the Sublime, as he had on another occasion
 adduced an example of the Sublime from the Mosaic: 'Let there be light; and there was
 light;' so he might have adduced the present
 passage of St. Paul.

28. ἐν ὀλίγῳ με πείθεις, &c.] These words
 of Festus seem to have interrupted the thread
 of the Apostle's reasoning; otherwise he would
 probably have proceeded to adduce some particular proofs from the Prophets of what he had been saying. The words in question may be supposed to have been merely a civil speech, pronounced in
 that complimentary insincerity into which good-
 natured, easy, and unscrupulous persons, like Agrippa (and such he is characterized by Josephus),
 are apt to run. Besides, it is unlikely that any
 strong impression could have been made so soon;
 or that, if made, Agrippa would have interrupted
 the Apostle, and then left him almost as abruptly
 as Felix had done, or Pilate did our Lord, without waiting to hear the conclusion of his sentence.
 This, no doubt, arose from the Apostle's having become (as Markland observes) more personal in
 his application to Agrippa concerning religion
 than he liked.

29. εὐχαίμην ἂν τ. Θ.] Here εὐχ. has the sense of optare, I could wish to God, I would to God; and so it is sometimes used in the Classical writers; ex. gr. Æschin. Dial. iii. 6, ἐγὼ δὲ εὐχαίμην ἂν τὰ κοινὰ ταῦτα εἰδέναι. Joseph.

29. ἐν πολλῷ.] The exact sense of the expression has been somewhat disputed; but from the antithetical ἐν ὀλίγῳ it must be omnino, though it would be difficult to find another example of the word so used. Here, however,—as often, when a speaker takes up the words of another, and gives them a turn to suit his own purpose,—we must allow for a slight detortion of the sense of a word or phrase.

—παρεκτός τῶν δεσμῶν τ.] Spoken δεικτικῶς, holding out his chains. This proves that St. Paul was then not (as some have imagined) ἐν φυλακῇ ἀδέσμου, but rather in custodia militari, chained to the soldier who guarded him.

30. ταῦτα εἰπόντος αὐτοῦ.] These words, not found in a few MSS. and Versions, have been cancelled by Griesbach and Scholz; and, indeed, internal evidence is against them.

32. εἰ μὴ ἐπέκλεητο K.] For thus the power of the judge, whether for acquittal or condemnation, had ceased, and the cognizance of the cause rested solely with the superior court.

XXVII. 1. ἐκρίθη] ‘it was determined,’ namely, by the decision of Agrippa and Festus, that Paul must be sent to Italy. At τοῦ ἀποπλεῖν there is not, as is generally supposed, an ellipse of περί; but τοῦ with the inf. is here, as supra xxvi. 18, and elsewhere, put for ἵνα and a sub-junctive; only here the ἵνα is, as often, for ἔτι. See the Note supra iii. 18; or we may, with Markland, resolve ἐκρίθη into ἀγινήθη κρίσει (i. e. γνώμη), to which the Genitive is to be referred.

—παρεδίδουν.] Namely, οἱ δεσμοφύλακες.

—σπείρης Σεβ.] From the time of Augustus, legions took the name Augustas. Hence many have supposed that, as in all the other legions, so in the five cohorts stationed at Caesarea, there was one cohort called the Augustan, or that the cohort here mentioned was a legionary cohort of an Augustan legion stationed in Syria and Judaea. And it is worthy of attention, what Bretschneider suggests, that Josephus in various passages makes mention of troops in the Roman army called Σεβαστηνοί.

2. πλοίῳ Ἀδραμ.] Meaning, ‘a vessel of

Adramyttium, and bound thither.’ As we say, a London vessel, a Liverpool vessel, &c. Adramyttium was in Mysia, opposite to Lesbos. The early orthography of the name was Ἀδραμυττειον, as found in Thucydides, Xenophon, and the ancient coins in general. Afterwards, however, it was pronounced, and sometimes spelt, Ἀδραμυττιον. From the termination ειον it would seem that the place derived its name from a fane or temple of some hero or god. Ἀδραμυττειον appears to be a noun plural of Oriental origin, from the Heb. מִצְרַיִם, ‘an ensign of elevation, an elevated ensign.’ So Is. xxi. 17, ‘till ye be left as an ensign on an hill.’ The Centurion, it should seem, did not intend to remain with the vessel to its place of final destination, but only to some point of Asia Minor, from which he might meet with a convenient passage to Italy; expecting to find some ship in the ports of Lycia or Caria, on board of which he might embark his soldiers and prisoners for Rome. The event answered his expectation; for at Myra in Lycia he found an Alexandrian vessel bound for Italy.

—μέλλοντες.] Several of the best MSS. and Versions have μέλλοντες, which is preferred by Mill, Bengel, and Pearce, and edited by Griesch and Knapp, with the approbation of Kuinoel, who thinks the change of μέλλοντες into μέλλοντας was made in accommodation to ἐπιβάντες preceding, and ἀνήχθημεν following. But that is surely too hypothetical; and as to the reading in question, it has every appearance of being a mere emendation, as, indeed, it is regarded by Matth., Vat., and Tittm. Here, then, according to the critical canon, the more difficult reading is to be preferred. And accordingly I have thought proper, with Vater, Tittman, and Scholz, to retain the common reading. Certainly the words τοὺς κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν τόπους must mean ‘the parts over against Asia,’ which use of κατά and τόπος Wetstein well illustrates from Polyb. p. 4, εἰς τοὺς κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν τόπους, and 3, τοὺς κατὰ τὴν Ἰταλίαν καὶ Λιβύην τόπους, p. 31, τοὺς κατὰ τὴν Σικελίαν τόπους. Hansen Repl., πλεῖν τοὺς παραθαλασσίους τόπους. No change, then, is necessary; the scope of the words being, to assign a reason why they went on board this Adramyttian vessel; namely, because they to coast the [southern] part of Asia, and where a vessel bound to Adramyttium would as far as they would desire in the way to Italy. ἰπιμελείας τυχεῖν 'to receive their kind portion.' Of this phrase two examples are added by Wetstein.

ὑπεπλεύσαμεν τὴν Κ., &c.] With these εἰς, and those at v. 5, as far as διαπλεύσαν, Commentators have been not a little per-
 1 pected,—and that chiefly from imperfect compre-
 2 hension of the nautical term ὑποπλεῖν, though
 3 ly from inattention to the situation of the places
 4 tioned. Now in sailing from Sidon to the 5 of Lycia, it is probable that, had the weather
 6 fair, they would have taken a course to the 7 th of Cyprus;—not, however, near its shores,
 8 apt at the S.W. promontory, Zephyrium,—and 9 ce would have struck across to Rhodes, or 0 coast of Caria. Since, however, we are told, winds were contrary (viz. though varying, yet more or less adverse), they changed that 1, and ὑπεπλεύσ. τὴν Κ. Now, for the 2 to be contrary, they must have been N. or 3 or N.N.E., or such like. And then the 4 way to evade their force would be, to sail
 5 under the coast of Cyprus, after having cut 6 to the promontory of Pedalium, so as to 7 the bay of Catium. That they coasted along
 8 time, and then made for the Eastern pro-
 9 mory of Cyprus (as the best Commentators 0), is improbable, because they would thus 1 rought more into the wind's eye (as the 2 s say), and into tempestuous seas. At all 3 s, it is plain that ὑποπλεῖν must mean to 4 under the lee of any high land (such as 5 us), so as to get shelter from it. From 6 yrium it is plain they crossed over (διαπλεύ-
 7 ο) to Myra in Lycia; a port of great cele-
 8 y, and (as appears from a passage of Porphyry 9 by Wetstein) the one generally used in 0 ng from Cyprus to Lycia or Caria.

πλοῖον.] Here, as often in the Classical 1, the word denotes a ship of burden (as 2 sed to a ship of war), such as, it appears, the 3 andrian corn vessels were; and this was 4 ably one (see v. 38). On these vessels, and 5 corn trade from Egypt to Italy, see Hassius
 6 avibus Alexandrinis, Crit. Sac., vol. xiii. p.
 7 and Bryant's remarks on Euroclydon, in his Analysis of Myth., vol. iii. p. 343—9. Myra is indeed out of the track from Cyprus to Dic-1 archia in Italy; but the winds had been contrary,

 2 and the ship had made for the Lycian coast for 3 shelter.

7. βραδυπλοοῦντες.] Of this very rare word
 one example has been adduced from Artemid. iv.
 32. I add another from Cosmas Indicopl. 133.
 in Bekker's Anecd. i. 225.

—μὴ προσεῶντος ἡμᾶς τοῦ ἀνέμου.] In order to remove the difficulty involved in προσε-
 1 εῶντος, Markland proposes to read πρόσω
 2 εῶντος, but unnecessarily; for the common read-
 3 ing may have the very same sense, προς in com-4 position being often used for πρόσω, as in several 5 passages of Sophocles, Euripides, and Diodo- 6 rus, cited by me in Recens. Synop. The sense is 7 plainly, 'not letting us make any progress.' So 8 Lucian, V. H., p. 657 (cited by Kuinoel) οὐ γὰρ 9 εἰα ὁ ἀνέμος.

—ὑπεπλεύσαμεν τὴν Κ., &c.] Render, 'we ran under,' (see Note supra v. 4) i. e. 'made for 1 Crete, at Salmone, and coasted along the island.'
 2 This they did, as thinking they should get more
 3 under the wind.

8. μόλις παραλεγόμενοι 'doubling it.' The wind might be adverse, and doubling promon-
 1 tories was to the ancients a long and difficult
 2 business, usually effected (as we may infer from 3 the term here employed) by towing. See my 4 Note on Thucyd. iv. 25, παραπλεῖν ἀπὸ κάλων;
 5 to which operation there is an allusion in the 6 Latin legere.

—ἦν πόλις Λασαία.] Of this we find no mention in the Classical writers. Hence Com-1 mentators either resort to conjectures, or suppose 2 this one of the towns of the hundred-cities isle
 3 not mentioned by the geographers or other writers.
 4 There is little doubt, however, that Lasos is 5 meant, which occurs in Pliny's list of the inland
 6 towns; and Lasos was, it is plain, such. The 7 difference between the two names is trifling;
 8 since πόλις Λασαία means, in fact, the city of 9 Lasos. So Hesych., Λασιῶν πόλις, ἢ χωρίον, 0 where read Λασιῶν. The situation of Fair-
 1 Havens is, by the modern term being discovered
 2 in Kalos Limenis, fixed to a place a little to the 3 N.E. of Cape Leon, the present C. Matala. It
 4 was not a regular port, but an open roadstead

Ἰκανοῦ δὲ χρόνου διαγενομένου, καὶ ὄντος ἤδη ἐπισφαλούς 9 τοῦ πλοῦς, διὰ τὸ καὶ τὴν νηστείαν ἤδη παρεληλυθῆναι, παρήνει ὁ Παῦλος λέγων αὐτοῖς· Ἄνδρες, θεωρῶ ὅτι μετα 10 ὕβρεως καὶ πολλῆς ζημίας, οὐ μόνον τοῦ * φορτίου καὶ τοῦ πλοίου, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν ψυχῶν ἡμῶν, μέλλειν ἔσσεθαι τὸν πλοῦν. (so Steph. Byz. calls it by the name καλὴ ἄκτι), though well sheltered from tempestuous winds by the Cape and some islands situated to the west and east of it. Lasæa was probably on the brow of the chain of hills which rise about four miles from the shore.

9. διὰ τὸ τὴν νηστείαν ἤδη παρελ.] The best Commentators are agreed that in τὴν νηστείαν we have a designation of time made after the manner of the Jews, and even Heathens (nay, which is adopted even at the present day), whereby a particular time of the year is denoted by some Festival which falls at that time, as we say Christmas, Lady-day, and Michaelmas. The fast here meant was the day of expiation, or 10th of Tisri (answering to our October), and thus corresponding to what we call Old Michaelmas. Now, in our own times, the Levantine sailors particularly dread what they call the Michaelmas fairs. The ancients, it is well known, considered the navigation of the sea, after the beginning of winter, as dangerous. So Joseph. Antiq. xvi. 2. 1, τὸν γὰρ πλοῦν, ἐπιβαίνοντος τοῦ χειμῶνος, οὐκ ἐνομιζον ἀσφαλῆ.

10. ὕβρεως.] The word here signifies injury, damage; as Anthol. iii. 22, 58, θαλάττης ὕβριν. Pind. Pyth. i. 140, ναυσίστονον ὕβριν ἰδών, and Jos. Ant. iii. 6, 4. And so injuria in Latin. Grot. observes that ὕβρις respects the persons, ζημία the goods; comparing Philo: ζημία χρημάτων.

— φορτίου.] This (for the common reading φόρτου) found in many MSS. and the Ed. Princ., was rightly restored by Bengel, Wetstein, Matth., Griesbach, Tittmann, Vater, and Scholz; for (besides the authority of MSS.) it is confirmed by the fact, that while the earlier writers used φόρτος, the later ones used φορτίον.

11. τῷ κυβερνήτῃ καὶ τῷ ναυκλ.] These offices were properly distinct; on the nature and difference of whose duties I have copiously treated in Recens. Synop., adducing a great body of proofs and illustrations from the Classical writers. Suffice it here to say, that the former term denoted the master, the latter the super-cargo. But it was only large merchant ships, like this, that had both. The smaller had but one person for both offices, who was then called ναύκληρος.

12. ἀνευθύνου] for the Classical ἀνεπιτηδεύου, Thucyd. ii. 20. The place was unfit to winter in, as not being a regular port. Πρὸς παραχ., for πρὸς τὸ παραχειμάειν. The word occurs also in Polybius.

— ἐθεντο βουλὴν] consilium statuerunt, or literally (and indeed the phrase occurs in Petronius), proserunt.

— ἐκίθεν.] This I have, with Scholz, received from many MSS., and nearly all the Versions and Chrysostom, for the common reading ἐκείθεν, which cannot be defended, unless we suppose it to stand for ἐκείθεν; which, however, is not allowable. I suspect that the κ came from the ναί preceding, in abbreviation ναί.

— εἰπὼς δύν.] In εἰπὼς there is an ellipsis of πειρώμενος, as not unfrequently in the purest writers. So Herodot. ix. 14, ἰβουλεύετο, εἰπὼς τούτου πρῶτον ἔλοι. The idiom is, indeed, as early as the time of Homer. So Il. ψ. 39, εἰ-τίκα κηρύκισσι λιγυφθόγγοισι κίλισσας—ἀμφὶ πυρὶ στήσῃ τριπόδα μέγαν, εἰ πεπύθουεν Πηλεΐδην. In this case the εἰ should be rendered wheither.

— εἰς Φοῖνικα] 'to Phoenix' (not Phœnice); the present port Sphaciæ. From its description (with which I would compare Pausan. v. 25, 2, ἀκρὰν τετραμήνην ἐπὶ Αἰθῶνι καὶ Νότῳ.) we may (as Grotius and Schmid. think) infer that the port was formed by two jutting horns, which looked to seaward to the S.W. and N.W. respectively.

13. ὑποπνεύσαντος δὲ νότου] 'a gentle south wind having sprung up.' So Virg. Æn. iii. 70, 'lenis crepitans vocat Auster in altum,' and Esrip. Phœn. 218, Ζεφύρου πνοαῖς ὑππνεύσαντι ἐν οὐρανῷ Κάλλιστον κελάδῃμα.

— τῆς προθέσεως κεκρατηκῆναι.] Of the phrase κρατεῖν προθέσας, 'to thoroughly attain a purpose,' several examples are adduced by Wetstein from Polybius and Galen. Their purpose was to sail safely along the coast of Crète; which they thought they should now effect, since, though the wind that had sprung up was not favourable, yet, being so gentle a breeze, it would not hinder them from maintaining their course.

— ἄραντες.] Here it is usual to supply ἀγκυραν, which word is often expressed, as in several passages cited by Wetstein. The term, however, may also allude to the raising of the mast, which were usually lowered on reaching shore. So in Thucyd. vii. 26, ἀρὰς ἐκ τῆς Αἰγίου, where the Schol. supplies τὰ ἱερία. Yet, after all, from the expression ἔβαλε κατ' αὐτὴν καὶ

πον παρελέγοντο τὴν Κρήτην. Μετ' οὐ πολὺ δὲ ἔβαλε
τ' αὐτῆς ἀνεμος τυφωνικός, ὁ καλούμενος † Εὐροκλύδων.

(In which see Note) it should rather seem ναῦν was intended to be supplied; an confirmed by Thucyd. i. 52, τὰς ναῦς ἀπὸ γῆς.

[σπον.] A word used by the best writers,
poets, but prose-writers; as Herodot. iv.
Joseph. Ant. i. 20, l. xix. 2. 4. Hip-Plutarch, &c. It signifies, not nearer, near, and here answers to our nautical shore. Thus the phrase ἄσπον παραλί-signifies to coast along close in-shore. The were probably proceeding partly by for the wind was only a side wind, and use), and partly by being towed, which ὁρμυλκεῖσθαι, and has been copiously
by me on Thucyd. iv. 25.

[ἐπὶ τῆς.] It is not agreed to what this has
be. Some suppose to προθίσαι, others to ; while others again (including the most Commentators) refer it to Κρήτην. I take it to mean the ship itself, with referναῦν, just before left to be supplied at
s. This is confirmed, and the force of the αμος τυφωνικός] i. e. a wind like the m: the name then, and to the present day, s a tempestuous wind prevailing in the tanean, and blowing a sort of hurricane directions from N.E. to S.E., and perhaps

s Homer, Odys. s. 313, and Virg. Æn. i.
l. The word is, I think, wrongly derived Etymologists from τύφω, fumo; it rather from τύφω, cognate with τύπω and τύl properly signifies the Striker; which is ed and illustrated by Æschyl. Agam. 637.

term Εὐροκλύδων, which has so per-objections have been made to the coming, but of no great weight. To advert objection, the *incongruity of the con-

l* should be remembered that κλύδων sly not only a wave, but a rough wave the examples in Steph. Thes., and must s sometimes used as an adjective (which,
I suspect, was its original form), as ap-

the compound would be contrary to analogy, since there is no instance of εὐρύ with a substantive;
and even those with adjectives are almost confined
to the Poets; and moreover, the sense arising (wide-wave) is too feeble. For the latter (namely Εὐροκλύδων, N.N.E. wind) which has been proposed by Grotius, Mill, Le Clerc, Bentley, and Bengel, there is some, though very slender,
authority in MSS. and Versions; while the objections against it are,—1. that it would not be formed analogically, but ought to be Εὐροκλύδων. 2. That it would be heterogeneously compounded of Greek and Latin; and δακύνω could not well represent aquilo. Besides, the name
was doubtless the same that had prevailed for centuries, and was therefore not likely to be otherwise than Greek throughout, not Greek and Latin. 3. It would not at all correspond to the accurate descriptions of the τυφῶν, or Typhoon,
given by ancients and moderns, who agree in
representing it, not as a point-wind, but as veer-
ing about, and blowing in all quarters in succe-
sion from N.E. to S.E.—East, however, prevailing. So Hom. Od. s. 235, Σὺν δ' Εὐρὸς τὰ Νό-τος τ' ἔπεισι, Ζέφυρός τε δυσαῆς, καὶ βορρῆς αἰθρηγενίτης μίγα κύμα κυλινδῶν. Virg. Æn.
i. 8, 'Unâ Euræque Notusque ruunt, creberque
procellis Africus: et vastos volvunt ad litora
fluctus.' Hence it is clear that both external and
internal evidence unite in requiring the common
reading to be retained; the sense of which may be expressed, 'the wave-stirring Easter,' or literally, 'East-souther;' which designation is confirmed and illustrated by the numerous passages
of the Greek and Latin Classics adduced by me
in Recens. Synop.

15. συναρπασθέντος τοῦ πλοίου.] An expression often used of tempestuous winds. So Æschyl. Ag. 610, χεῖμα—ῥρσας (scil. αἰτόν).
Thucyd. vi. 104, ἀρπασθεὶς ὑπ' ἀνέμου. Ἀνοφθαλμαίνει signifies 'to bear up against the wind;' or, as we say, to face it. At ἐπιδόντες may be supplied either πλοίου, or ἑαυτοῦς. Of ἐφερόμεθα the sense is, 'we were driven,' or drifted.
So Herodot. iii. 10, ἐφείροντο κατὰ κύμα καὶ ἀνε-
μον: what is properly true only of the ship, being applied to the crew.

16. ὑποδραμόντες.] Not 'running up to,' but
'running under;' i. e. close in-shore. So The-mist, p. 152: τὰ μὲν (partly) ὑποδραμοῦσαι,
τὰ δὲ περιδραμοῦσαι.

—Κλαύδην.] The name given by Mela and Pliny countenances the reading Κλαύδην found in some Versions, &c.; but the common reading is confirmed by Hierocl. ap. Ptolem. iii. 7, and Athe-neus. Περικρατεῖς γινέσθαι, for περικρατεῖν,
'to become masters of,' 'secure the boat;' which,
it seems (whether it had been towed by a rope,
or had hung fastened to the ship, or been on deck, had been nearly staved, or washed away by
the waves.

17. βοηθ. ἐχρῶντο, υποζωννύντες τὸ πλοῖον.] On the sense of the expressions βοηθ. and υποζωννύντες Commentators are little agreed. Some by βοηθ. understand the aid or united help of the mariners and the soldiers, or other passengers. But that would surely suppose the sense to be most imperfectly expressed. Others take it of the lacking, as ropes, hooks, chains, &c. by which assistance is rendered to a ship in rough weather. Yet of such a signification of the word no authority has been adduced. By the other term υποζωννύντες, both the above classes of Interpreters are agreed, is meant that under-girding which, they say, was employed in ancient as well as modern times; whereby thick cables were drawn around a rickety ship, to keep the timbers tight together. In proof and illustration of which numerous passages have been adduced, both from the Classical and from modern writers: yet, upon close examination, scarcely any one of these will be found to the purpose. How uncertain is the passage of Horat. Od. i. 14. 6 (sine funibus Vix durare carinae Possint imperiosius Aëquor), may be imagined from the fact, that no Commentator, except Baxter, takes it to refer to the undergirding of a ship with ropes. And as to the gloss of Hesychius on the word ζυμώματα, i. e. σχοινία κατὰ μέσον τὴν ναῦν δεσμευόμενα, that is known to refer to a passage of Aristoph. Eq. 279, and is only the opinion of a Grammarians on the sense of the word there used, which has been better explained by the Scholiasts, by Suidas, and even by another gloss of Hesychius himself, to mean υποζώματα· ξύλα τῶν νεῶν; an explanation, indeed, far more agreeable to the context and the subject, and which is confirmed by the Scholiast on Thucyd. i. 29, ζυζάντες (ναῦς), where he speaks of these ξύλα (calling them ζυγώματα) as days necessary to bind together a rickety ship's hull. And to these there seems an allusion in Æschyl. Suppl. 457, Schutz, σκάφος Στρυβλαῖσι ναυτικάσιν ὡς προσηγμῖνον. So also we have in Theogn. Admon. 513, νῆός τοι πλεურῆσιν ὑπὸ ζυγὰ Σήσμεν, i. e. υποθήσμεν ζυγά. In fact, nearly all the passages that have been adduced, in proof or illustration of the above undergirding, belong rather to that operation alluded to in the passages just cited, which may be called under-(meaning inner)-belting. To this purpose may be noticed, as quite decisive, a passage of Athen. p. 204, where he says that the gigantic ship of Ptolemy Philopater had twelve υποζώματα, each 100 feet long; and in Plutarch, Romul. ch. vii. we read of these υποζώματα, as being made of brass. In short, from the evidence I have brought forward on the passage of Thucydides ubi supra, there can be no doubt that the ζυγώματα, or υποζώματα, were pieces of strong wooden planking, or metallic plating, to serve as days wherewith to bind the inner frame-work of a ship together; which were sometimes, in the case of an exceedingly large ship, put in at first, but usually after the ship had been some time in use, and had grown rickety.

As an additional argument for the interpretation above proposed, it may be noticed that, according to the other mode of taking the words, the phrase βοηθείαις ἐχρῶντο, which occupies the most prominent place in the sentence, would be almost useless. At least we should rather have expected ὑπεζωννύντο τὸ πλοῖον, βοηθείαις χρώμενοι. But to advert to the meaning of βοηθείαις, according to either of the two interpretations above detailed, the expression will be little suitable. Its true sense, I have no doubt, is that in which (as Wetstein attests) the word is used in the Greek writers on mechanics, namely, props, or stays; the ζυγὰ or ζυγώματα above mentioned. Thus we may render, 'they had recourse to the use of stays, underbelting the ship with them.' These had doubtless been provided for an emergency: and there is reason to think that, in the largest class of merchant ships, carpenters were regularly employed. This was certainly the case in ships of war; for Xenophon. de Republ. Athen. 12, enumerating the various officers on board a trireme, reckons the πανηγροί.

— τὴν Σύρτιν.] Meaning, the Syrtis major, an immense bay on the coast of Africa, occupying the whole of what is now called the Gulf of Sidra; and indeed running far out to seaward: a full account of which is given by Captain Beechey in his description of the north coast of Africa, from Tripoli to Cyrene.

— χαλάσαντες τὸ σκεῦος.] The meaning of this expression τὸ σκεῦος has been somewhat disputed. Certainly it cannot mean, what some suppose, the anchor; for the mariners were not in soundings; and if they had, they would in that case have let down two anchors, as ver. 29. If we consider what other σκαῖος might deserve to be called the σκεῦος, we cannot doubt that it is the mast which is here meant. A view supported by the Syr. Version, and adopted by Grotius, Heraldus, Bolten, and Kuinoel. Of course, in taking down the mainmast, the yards and masts would have also to be removed. Here χαλᾶν is used, because the masts of the ancients were so formed as to go into a socket, and to be raised or lowered at pleasure. Thus there was no occasion to cut it away, as is now done in similar circumstances.

— ἐφέροντο.] Meaning, were 'drifted, hurried forward at the mercy of the waves.' What is properly true only of the ship, being, as often, applied to the crew. So in the second fragment of Alceus, Mus. Crit. vol. i. 423, ἄμμε δ'—Ναὶ φορήμεθα σὺν μελαίνῃ, χεῖμασι μοχθῶντες μεγάλῃ κέλευ.

18. ἐκβολὴν ἔποιοντο.] 'heaved overboard [the lading];' for of that the term ἐκβολή, when used without any addition, is always to be understood; since the order of the circumstances (as Grotius justly remarks) is, first that the lading should be thrown overboard, as here; then the lacking, ver. 19; and lastly, the provisions, as ver. 38. From the Classical citations of Wetstein it appears that the thing was by no means uncommon in ancient navigation. The following passage of Jonas i. 5 (where we have the very phrase οὐντο· καὶ τῇ τρίτῃ αὐτόχειρες τὴν σκευὴν τοῦ πλοίου ἐρρίψαμεν· μήτε δὲ ἡλίου μήτε ἀστρῶν ἐπιφαινόντων ἐπὶ πλείονας ἡμέρας, χειμῶνός τε οὐκ ὀλίγου ἐπικειμένου, λοιπὸν περιηρεῖτο πᾶσα ἐλπίς τοῦ σώζεσθαι ἡμᾶς. Πολλῆς δὲ ἀσιτίας ὑπαρχούσης, τότε σταθεὶς ὁ Παῦλος ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν εἶπεν· Ἐδεῖ μὲν, ὦ ἄνδρες, πιθαρχῆσαντάς μοι μὴ ἀνάγεσθαι ἀπὸ τῆς Κρήτης, κερδῆσαί τε τὴν ὕβριν ταύτην ἢ τὴν ζημίαν. Καὶ τανῦν παραινῶ ὑμᾶς εὐθυμεῖν· ἀπολὴ γὰρ ψυχῆς οὐδεμία ἔσται ἐξ ὑμῶν, πλὴν τοῦ πλοίου. Ιαρέστη γάρ μοι ταύτῃ τῇ νυκτὶ ἄγγελος τοῦ Θεοῦ, οὗ μί, ᾧ καὶ λατρεύω, λέγων· Μὴ φοβοῦ, Παῦλε, Καίσαρί· δεῖ παραστῆναι· καὶ ἰδοὺ, κεχάρισται σοι ὁ Θεὸς πάντας τοὺς πλείοντας μετὰ σοῦ. Διὸ εὐθυμεῖτε, ἄνδρες· ἵστεν γὰρ τῷ Θεῷ, ὅτι οὕτως ἔσται καθ' ὃν τρόπον ἐλάληται μοι. εἰς νῆσον δὲ τίνα δεῖ ἡμᾶς ἐκπεσεῖν. ^{d 1st 28. 1.} Ὡς δὲ τεσσαρεσκαίδεκάτῃ νυξ ἐγένετο, διαφερομένων ἡμῶν ἐν τῷ Ἀδρία, κατὰ μέσον τῆς νυκτὸς ὑπενόουν οἱ ναῦται προσάγειν τινὰ αὐτοῖς χῶραν. τὴν σκευὴν.] Synonymous with the σκευή nas i. 5, and signifying all the armamenta or ture of a ship, otherwise called ἔπλα, as a, yards, sails, rigging, &c. (see Thucyd. vii. including the baggage of the passengers; for ἡ sometimes means such.

μήτε δὲ ἡλίου—ἡμᾶς.] This non-appearance of the sun and stars was to the ancients at times perplexing, especially in tempestuous her, because they had then no means of ring where they were, and were positively see Thucyd. viii. 42. Under such circumstances they were reduced to the utmost straits; so much from want of practical skill in navigation, as from being destitute of what a great finely calls χειμῶνος ἐπικειμένου.] So the Virgilian, pestas incubuit silvas. Compare also Ps. xviii. 7.

λοιπὸν] for τὸ λοιπόν. Περιηρεῖτο. der, 'was wholly taken away'; the περι g intensive, as in Hebr. x. 10, περιελθὲν πρίλας, 'to make complete expiation for.'

ἀσιτίας.] Render, inedia, the not taking for which they would, in their present have little appetite. This circumstance is not unfrequently noticed in narratives of ecks.

κερδῆσαι ὕβριν καὶ ζημίαν.] To explain emingly strange expression, it is not necessary some, to extend the μή to κερδῆσαι, nder κερδ. to suffer. We have only to suppose of the word found in the best writers y Note on Thucyd. ii. 44), i. e. 'to suffer;' y, 'it behoved you to have hearkened to id not to have loosed from Crete; and thus ould have been gainers by all this injury and this loss;' i. e. you would have avoided it; see ver. 10.

23. ἄγγελος τοῦ Θεοῦ.] Render, 'an angel of the God whom,' &c.

—ὁ δὲ εἰμι] scil. δοῦλος; as Exod. xxxii. 26, 'Who is the Lord's?' and Levit. xx. 26. So also in Is. xlv. 14, where the LXX. render γὰρ τῇ by καὶ σοὶ ἔσονται δοῦλοι. Λατρεύω properly implies devoted service generally, but in Scripture religious service and worship, whether external or internal.

24. κεχάρισται σοι—σοῦ.] Χαρίζεσθαι τινα or τιμὴ sometimes signifies 'to grant any one's life for another.' Here, however, it means, 'to spare any one's life on account of another.'

27. τεσσαρεσκ.] Namely, from their having left Fair-havens. Διαφρ. ἡμῶν, 'as we were tossed up and down.' A sense almost confined to the later writers.

—Ἀδρία.] By this is meant not what is now called the Adriatic gulf, but the Adriatic sea; which, as the Commentators have proved, from Ptolemy, Strabo, &c., comprehended what had originally been called the Ἰόνιον πάλαιος, and denoted the sea between Greece, Italy, and Africa; see my Note on Thucydides, i. 24, τὸν Ἰόνιον κόλπον.

—προσάγειν τινὰ αὐτοῖς χῶραν.] There is here a nautical idiom by hypallage, like ἀναφανύντες τὴν Κ. at xxi. 3, in either case originating in the optical illusion, by which, on drawing near to a coast, the land seems to approach to the ship, not the ship to the land. So Ach. Tat. ii. 2. 32, τὴν γῆν ἐπαύσαν ἀπὸ τῆς νηὸς κατὰ μικρὸν ἀναχωροῦσαν ὡς αὐτὴν πλίουσαν. By the same idiom our sailors speak of nearing a coast, and fetching a port.

28. βολίσαντες] 'having heaved the lead' (βολίδα).

—ὀργυιάς.] This word, derived from ὀρέγεσθαι, Y 2
